Dolbier and Sir William Balfour. But the Dutch adminiſtration abſolutely refuſed to give it any countenance, pretending that it would interfere with the recruting of their own cavalry; and the project was equally diſagreeable in England, where the Parliament condemned it as dangerous to liberty; ſo that Charles the Firſt was obliged to revoke the commiſſion. A final anſwer to the Engliſh Embaſſador's memorial was not returned till the beginning of April, 1628; and then it was ſuch, as he could by no means recommend to his Court as ſatisfactory. Theſe were the laſt public offices, which paſſed between the Lord Carleton and the States. He had received his letters of revocation in February; but as the time of making uſe of them was referred entirely to his diſcretion, he determined to continue at the Hague, ſo long as his reſidence there might be of any importance to his Maſter's buſineſs. That being now over, he took his leave of their High Mightineſſes, and preſented his re-credentials on the 12th of April, 1628. It appears, however, that on the 17th of May, he was waiting for a paſſage at the Brill, whence he ſent an account to England of the ſurrender of Stade, after a long ſiege, to Count Tilly, the Emperor's General; and he had an opportunity of doing ſome conſiderable ſervices to the Engliſh garriſon, under Sir Charles Morgan, which had defended the place with great gallantry. This was, by taking proper meaſures for the reception of his countrymen, and the payment of their arrears; when, agreeably to their capitulation, they were to return back to the United Provinces. At his departure, he left the King's affairs at the Hague, in the hands of his nephew, Mr. Dudley Carleton, who had diſcharged that truſt before, during his abſence, with diligence and capacity (u).

(u) Hiſt. Preface, ubi ſupra, p. xv —xx. where the facts we have mentioned are related more at large. During Lord Carleton's long reſidence in Holland, he had been conſtantly informed of domeſtic tranſactions, by his old friend Mr. John Chamberlain, of the Court of Wards.

Before Lord Carleton's return to England, he had the ſatisfaction of being aſſured, by his old acquaintance, the Earl of Carliſle, who took the Hague in his way to Italy, as extraordinary Embaſſador to the Duke of Savoy and the republic of Venice, that King Charles intended to make him Secretary of State. Soon after his coming over (w), as an earneſt of the more important promotion deſigned for him, he was created Viſcount Dorcheſter. In the mean while, he continued to attend the Court in his office of Vice-Chamberlain; and was employed in foreign buſineſs of the moſt ſecret nature, as an aſſiſtant to the Duke of Buckingham. When that Miniſter ſet out for Portſmouth, to take the command of the fleet and army, which was preparing for the relief of Rochelle, the Lord Dorcheſter accompanied him, and was entruſted by Contarini, the Venetian Embaſſador here, to manage the firſt overtures of an accommodation with France. The treaty was in conſiderable forwardneſs, when a ſtop was ſuddenly put to it at that time, by the murder of the Duke of Buckingham. The alteration made by the Duke's death in the domeſtic ſtate of affairs was, that King Charles declared he would, for the future, be his own firſt Miniſter, and leave the executive part of the adminiſtration to every man within the compaſs of his province. The firſt queſtion of importance, which came before the Council, was, whether the Parliament ſhould ſit on the day appointed, which was the 20th of October. Some were of opinion, that it would be the moſt probable method of reſtoring a happy union between the King and his people; but his Majeſty cut the matter ſhort at the council-table, by declaring his pleaſure for a farther prorogation till the 20th of January, 1628-9. "Laudatur ab his, "culpatur ab illis," ſays Lord Dorcheſter, in a manuſcript letter to the Earl of Carliſle, "but ſurely it is the wiſeſt courſe; for that fourneſs, which was in men's minds, re-"quires time to take it away; and I will give your Lordſhip the comfort, that the "medicine of a conſtant and ſettled form of government (which is indeed the only "remedy for the diſtemper of our affairs, both at home and abroad) is like to be ap-"plied." The King was now determined to execute the deſign which he had for ſome time formed, of giving the ſeals of Secretary of State to the Lord Dorcheſter; and as the meaſure was taken, though not yet divulged, of making peace as ſoon as poſſible, both with France and Spain, he judged it of the utmoſt conſequence to have one in that department, whoſe judgment and ſkill in negotiation had been exerciſed in a long courſe of foreign employment. Lord Conway had for ſeveral years diſcharged that great truſt, according to the Earl of Clarendon's expreſſion, with notable inſufficiency. He had been put in ſolely at the Duke of Buckingham's recommendation, and had been kept in for no other reaſon, but becauſe he was wholly ſubſervient to that proud favourite. As old age and ſicklineſs were now added to his original incapacity, the Court and Nation muſt, with great ſatisfaction, have ſeen him ſucceeded by ſo able a Miniſter as the Lord Dorcheſter. The Parliament, when it met on the day appointed, acted totally contrary to the expectations of the Miniſtry, by agreeing no better with the Court than it had done in the preceding ſeſſion. The Lord Treaſurer Weſton, and Dr. Laud, Biſhop of London, were become as great objects of national diſlike as Buckingham had ever been. The Commons ſhewed their averſion to Weſton's authority in the ſtate, and to Laud's power in the church, by warm remonſtrances againſt the illegal exaction of tonnage and poundage, and the increaſe of Popiſh and Arminian doctrines; on which account the King diſſolved the Houſe, in an angry manner, on the 10th of March (x). According to ſome writers, the Lord Dorcheſter, in this Parliament, propoſed the laying an exciſe upon the nation; which was taken ſo heinouſly ill, that though he was a Privy-Counſellor, and and principal Secretary of State, he with difficulty eſcaped being committed to the Tower (y). Of this ſtory, which, we believe, originated in Howel's letters, and is referred to in Lloyd's State Worthies, we find no traces in the parliamentary hiſtory, or in the Lords and Commons journals. It is, however, generally ſuppoſed, upon the authority of the Earl of Clarendon, that the Lord Dorcheſter was better acquainted with the management of foreign affairs, than with the conſtitution, laws, and cuſtoms of his own country. In his capacity of Secretary of State, he was a chief agent in carrying on and compleating the treaties with France and Spain; for a particular relation of his conduct in which reſpects, we muſt content ourſelves with referring to the valuable work (z) already ſo often cited [C]. Beſides the negotiations with France and Spain, he directed, in the courſe of the years 1629, and 1630, thoſe of Sir Henry Vane in Holland, and Sir Thomas Roe in Poland and the maritime parts of Germany. The former was ſent to the Hague, to explain to the States the motives of our treaty with Spain, and to ſound their diſpoſitions about joining in it; and the latter was employed as mediator between the Kings of Sweden and Poland; after which he was very inſtrumental, in working up the heroic Guſtavus Adolphus to undertake his German expedition. The Lord Dorcheſter appears, likewiſe, to have kept up a private correſpondence with the Queen of Bohemia, whoſe vigour of mind, and vivacity of ſpirits, roſe ſuperior to her misfortunes. He uſed the beſt offices in his power to prevent miſunderſtandings between her and the King her brother; and he gave advice, when the occaſion required it, with the freedom and ſincerity of an old friend and ſervant to her and her family (a).

(w) On the 25th of July, 1628.

(x) Hiſt. Preface, ubi ſupra, p. xxi, xxii, xxvii.

(y) Biog. Brit. p. 1174. note [G] firſt edition. Granger's Biog. Hiſtory, v. i. p. 384. ſecond edition.

(z) Hiſt. Preface, ubi ſupra, p. xxiii—xxii.

(a) Hiſt. Preface, p. xxxiii. Appendix to ditto, p. lix—lxvii.

Our worthy and well intentioned Secretary of State, did not live to ſee an end of the perplexed negotiations he was engaged in with reſpect to the affairs of Germany and the reſtitution of the Palatinate, and which were the weak efforts of a diſtracted reign; for, having long ſtruggled with the diſorders occaſioned by frequent returns of the ſtone

[C] We muſt content ourſelves with referring to the valuable work already ſo often cited.] With regard, however, to the treaty with Spain, we cannot avoid tranſcribing a paſſage, relative to Lord Cottington's conduct, which is peculiarly curious. "Some private tranſaction there was between the two Kings with regard to the Palatinate; and the concluding paragraph in a letter from Sir Francis Cottington of November the twelfth relates to it; but we may preſume it was rather calculated to ſave the honour of King Charles, than really intended to be performed: 'When I tell them all here, that this peace cannot 'hold, unleſs ſatisfaction be given in the buſineſs of 'the Palatinate, putting them in mind, that the 'treaty is grounded on the promiſe made in that be-'half; they confeſs that they do all ſo underſtand 'it. But of that I have written ſo much in my let-'ter to his Majeſty, as I ſhall not here need to repeat 'it.'

"The ſecret of this buſineſs has ſince come to light, from Secretary Windebanke's papers, which make a part of that noble collection of State Letters formed by the firſt Earl of Clarendon. The King of Spain (Philip the Fourth) wrote a private letter in his own hand to Charles the Firſt, at the time of ſigning the treaty; in which he abſolutely engaged for the reſtitution of ſuch parts of the Palatinate as were in his poſſeſſion, and admitted that the good underſtanding between Great-Britain and Spain, ſhould depend on the accompliſhment of this condition; but together with the public treaty, a ſecret one was concerted by Sir Francis Cottington and the Duke de Olivarez, in which the former moſt ſhamefully agreed to a partition of the Seven Provinces with the Crown of Spain, and engaged his maſter to join his arms to thoſe of his Catholic Majeſty, againſt the ancient Proteſtant ally of this nation, the Republic of Holland. From what motives Cottington ventured to bring along with him to England this extraordinary convention, does not appear; but it is certain that King Charles the Firſt never ratified it. The Court of Spain never fulfilled the condition, for which its King had pledged his honour; and probably conſidered the non-ratification of the ſecret treaty, as a ſort of defeaſance on the part of Charles the Firſt. It entangled him ever afterwards in his negotiations with the Court of Spain, and reminds one too ſtrongly of ſimilar tranſactions with France, in the reign of his ſon and ſucceſſor; of which that elegant and intereſting hiſtorian Mr. Hume has given the firſt authentic account, from King James's Memoirs, and which have been more fully laid open, in the later diſcoveries of Sir John Dalrymple and Mr. Macpherſon.

"The cauſe of Popery was undoubtedly at the bottom of both; the Dutch were to have been the ſacrifice; and the faith of treaties, and the national honour, were alike ſacrificed in them. But Charles the Firſt had luckily in his councils a virtuous Miniſter, who adviſed him to ſhun the ſnare, The convention in Spaniſh is publiſhed in the firſt volume of the Clarendon Papers, and the tranſlation of it in the ſecond, together with an extract (communicated by the editor) of a remarkable diſpatch from the Lord Dorcheſter to Sir Robert Anſtruther. For the further illuſtration of this dark tranſaction, it is thought proper to print at length, two very material letters relative to it. It appears from them, that the Spaniards diſcovered this ſecret treaty to the Auſtrian Miniſtry; and that Charles the Firſt abſolutely denied having any knowledge of the negotiation at Madrid, and would not even caſt his eye on the draught of it, when produced by Cottington at his return. It is, however, very ſingular, and not eaſy to be explained, why Charles did not diſavow more ſtrongly the preſumption of his Embaſſador, in giving any countenance to ſo extraordinary a project, and ſuffering his name to be uſed in the preamble, and to be ſigned at the bottom of the inſtrument. Cottington was no novice in the forms and eſſence of buſineſs, and more likely to impoſe on Olivarez, than to be his dupe. He was, all along, a notorious partiſan of the Spaniſh cauſe, in his politics; and with regard to his religion, his noble friend, Lord Clarendon, owns that he changed it, during his firſt reſidence at Madrid; then, with a ſcandalous duplicity, he conformed again to the Proteſtant, and finally was reconciled to the Church of Rome, in order to ſecure a retreat and a penſion from Spain. When he came home from his embaſſy in 1631, he ſays, in a private letter, that he brought the ſhoeing-horn of the whole buſineſs with him; by which is plainly intended this ſecret treaty: the Court of Spain never loſt ſight of it during their intercourſe with that of England, till the troubles broke out, and always conſidered it as an inſtrument regularly agreed upon, and ſigned by Olivarez and Cottington, and not, as the letter from Lord Dorcheſter treats it, a project (ſine auctore) given in by one of the parties, without the ſanction of the other; and conſequently they availed themſelves of the non-ratification, as an excuſe for not fulfilling the engagement in the King of Spain's private letter (3)."

(3) Hiſt. Preface, ubi ſupra, p. xxxi, xxxii.

and gravel, he died on the 15th of February, 1631-32, in the 59th year of his age, and was interred in Weſtminſter Abbey, where a handſome monument is erected to his memory. He was twice married; firſt, to Anne, daughter and coheir of George Gerrard, Eſq; by whom he had one ſon, who died an infant; and ſecondly, to a daughter of Sir Henry Glenham, and the widow of the Lord Viſcount Banning, who was left with child of a daughter, that lived but a few months (b). There are two prints of Sir Dudley Carleton, the firſt of which was engraved in 1620, in quarto, by W. Delff, from a painting of Mierevelt; the other is by Sturt. His portrait is at Chriſt Church, in Oxford. In the inſcription to Delff's print, Sir Dudley is deſcribed, not only as an admirer of the art of painting, but as eminently ſkilled in it (c). With regard to the general abilities and character of the Lord Dorcheſter, it appears, from all his political remains, that he was a judicious, faithful, and diligent Miniſter; and better qualified for his department, than any who were his immediate predeceſſors, or ſucceſſors in the ſame office. King Charles himſelf, who was a good judge of his ſervants abilities, uſed to ſay, as Sir P. Warwick relates in his Memoirs, "that he had two Secretaries of State, "the Lords Dorcheſter and Falkland; one of whom was a dull man in compariſon of "the other, and yet pleaſed him the beſt; for he always brought him his own thoughts "in his own words: the latter cloathed them in ſo fine a dreſs, that he did not always "know them again." Allowing for ſome defects of ſtiffneſs and circumlocution, which are common to all the writings of that time, Lord Dorcheſter's diſpatches are drawn up in that plain, perſpicuous, and unaffected ſtile, which was fitteſt for buſineſs. Domeſtic concerns were no part of his province, but entirely managed by the Lord Treaſurer Weſton and Archbiſhop Laud. He held the pen ſingly in foreign affairs, and was regretted by thoſe, who were uſed to receive the inſtructions of government from a Secretary of State, upon whom they could depend that he would make a juſt report of their ſervices, and that he would not miſlead or miſrepreſent the Miniſters with whom he correſponded. That he died much lamented by the public in general, and with the reputation of an honeſt and well deſerving Stateſman, is declared by Sir Thomas Roe, in a manuſcript letter to a friend in Holland (d). The famous Poet Cowley wrote an elegy on the death of Lord Dorcheſter, of which the following are the concluding lines.

(b) Ibid. p. xxxiv.

(c) Granger's Biogr. Hiſtory, vol. i. p. 383.

(d) Hiſt. Preface, ubi ſupra, p. xxxiv, xxxv.

"An angry fever,
"Whoſe quenchleſs thirſt by blood was ſated never,
"Envying the riches, honour, greatneſs, love,
"And virtue (loadſtone, that all theſe did move)
"Of noble Carleton, him ſhe took away,
"And like a greedy vulture ſeiz'd her prey.
"Weep with me, each who either reads or hears,
"And know his loſs deſerves his country's tears!
"The Muſes loſt a patron by his fate,
"Virtue a huſband, and a prop the ſtate.
"Sol's chorus weeps, and to adorn his hearſe,
"Calliope would ſing a tragic verſe.
"And, had there been before no ſpring of theirs,
"They would have made a helicon with tears (e)."

(e) Johnſon's Poets, vol. i. p. 64, 65.

The Earl of Clarendon's aſſertion that, though the Lord Dorcheſter underſtood very well all that related to foreign employments, and the condition of other Princes and nations, he was unacquainted with the government, laws, and cuſtoms of his own country, and the nature of the people, is diſputed by Dr. Birch, who conſiders it as abſolutely incompatible with the experience which he muſt have acquired in the Houſe of Commons (f). But, not to mention that the noble Hiſtorian, who had no prejudice againſt his Lordſhip, could not well be deceived in the fact, it is, we think, confirmed by the unhappy figure he made in the Parliament of 1626, and by his acquieſcence in all the obnoxious meaſures of Buckingham, Weſton, and Laud. Several things were written by him [D], and a compleat ſeries of his diſpatches is preſerved in the Paper-Office (g). The (f) Birch's View, ubi ſupra, p. 204.

(g) Hiſt. Preface, ubi ſupra, p. iii.

[D] Several things were written by him.] The account of his writings, as given in Wood's Athenæ, the firſt edition of the Biographia Britannica, and Mr. Walpole's royal and noble Authors, is as follows. 1. "Balance, pour peſer en toute Equité & "Droicture la Harangue fait vagueres en l'Aſſem-"blee des illuſtres & puiſſans Seignoures Meſſeig-"neurs les Eſtats generaux des Provinces Unies du "pais bas, &c." 1618, quarto. 2. "Harangue "fait au Counſeile de Meſſ. les Eſtats generaux des "Provinces Unies, touchant le Diſcord & le "Troubles de l'Egliſe & la Police, cauſés par la "Doctrine d'Arminius." 6 Oct. 1617. Stil. nov. printed with the former. 3. Various Letters in the Cabala, or Scrinia ſacra, London, folio, 1663. 4. Various Letters to George, Duke of Bucks, in Cabala, or Myſteries of State, London, 1654, quarto. 5. Several French and Latin Letters to the learned Ger. Jo. Voſſius, printed in Ger. Jo. Voſſii & clarorum Virorum ad eum Epiſtolæ, London, 1690, folio. Publiſhed by Paulus Colomeſius. 6. Several Speeches in Parliament, in 1626, in Ruſhworth's Collections. In one of theſe ſpeeches, Sir Dudley Carleton ſays, that in his voyage to Venice, the ſhip in which he was, ſtruck thrice upon a ſand. 7. Several Letters in the three volumes of Sir Ralph Winwood's

The letters from and to Sir Dudley Carleton, during his embaſſy in Holland, from January 1615-16, to December 1620, properly ſelected, and as occaſion required, abridged, or only noted, were publiſhed by the preſent Earl of Hardwicke, in one volume quarto, in 1757, with an hiſtorical preface. The ſecond edition of the ſame work, with large additions to the hiſtorical preface, appeared in 1775. By this preface, which is drawn from materials that are entirely new, and which ſhews, in the ſtrongeſt manner, what excellent uſe may be made of the many untouched manuſcript collections in the kingdom, we have been enabled to give a totally different form to the preſent article, from what was in the power of our learned predeceſſors. The letters contained in Lord Hardwicke's publication, if ſome allowances be made for party violences and prejudices, contain more clear, accurate, and intereſting accounts of that remarkable period of Dutch hiſtory to which they relate, than are any where extant. There are likewiſe diſcuſſed in the courſe of them, many points of great importance, at that time, to the Engliſh commerce; ſuch as the conteſts between the two nations about the exportation of dreſſed cloths; the Greenland fiſhery; that upon the coaſt of Scotland; and the Eaſt-Indian territorial and commerical differences. The reader will find alſo, within the compaſs of the volume, the riſe and progreſs of the famous Bohemian war, till after the loſs of the battle of Prague; and muſt feel, with indignation, that the generous efforts of the States General, to animate King James in the ſupport of that great quarrel, in which both the religious and civil intereſts of this country were deeply concerned, were repaid with neglect and ſilence; whilſt the Engliſh Embaſſador was preſſing for inſtructions upon the ſubject for months together, and could receive none (b). Mr. Walpole having obſerved (i), that it was not the fault of the Miniſter or of the editor, that the tranſactions related in Sir Dudley Carleton's letters turned chiefly on the Synod of Dort; the noble writer of the hiſtorical preface, hath concluded the ſecond edition of it with the following remarks: "The editor cannot finally diſmiſs this ſubject, without acknowledging the polite mention which Mr. Walpole has made of him in his elegant account of noble authors; but he may be allowed to ſay, that had the negotiations of Sir Dudley during this period turned chiefly on the Synod of Dort, the publick would never have been troubled with them. Whoever looks into theſe letters with any ſort of attention, muſt agree, that a very ſmall part of them relates to that venerable council: the political conteſts which gave riſe to it, are as remarkable as any in the annals of the United Provinces; Maurice and Barnevelt were amongſt the firſt ſtateſmen and politicians of the time, and Bogerman and Utenbogardt are very ſubordinate figures in the piece. The riſe and progreſs of the thirty years war in Germany, forms no inconſiderable part of Sir Dudley's correſpondence: and though his maſter negotiated, when he ſhould have drawn the ſword, yet ſtill it is not in the diſputes between Vorſtius or Epiſcopius, that the Embaſſador or the Monarch take up the pen; and the Editor profeſſes that he has not the leaſt ambition to be a compiler, or a writer, in the quinque-articular controverſy. He therefore claims a right to rank this correſpondence amongſt the materials for no unintereſting period of Civil Hiſtory (k)."] K.

(i) Royal and noble Authors, vol. i. p. 194, 195.

(b) Ibid. p. vi.

(k) P. xxxv, xxxvi.

Winwood's Memorials, publiſhed at London, in folio, 1725. 8. A Letter to the Earl of Saliſbury, printed in Howard's Collection. 9. Memoirs for Diſpatches of political Affairs relating to Holland and England, ann. 1618; with ſeveral Propoſitions made to the States. Manuſcript. 10. Particular Obſervations of the military Affairs in the Palatinate, and the Low Countries, annis 1621, 1622. Manuſcript. 11. Letters relating to State Affairs, written to the King and Viſcount Rocheſter, from Venice, ann. 1613. Manuſcript (4). The manuſcript pieces here mentioned, are probably no more than parts of the collections preſerved in the Paper Office.

(4) Athenæ, vol. i. col. 563, 564. Biogr. Brit. vol. ii. p. 1175, note [H] firſt edition. Royal and noble Authors, vol. i. p. 196, 197.

CARPENTER (Richard), a Divine and Poet of the laſt age, had his education at Eaton-College near Windſor, and from thence was elected Scholar of King's-College in Cambridge, in the year 1622: where continuing about three years, he afterwards went out of England, and ſtudied in Flanders, Artois, France, Spain, and Italy; and at length received holy orders at Rome from the hands of the Pope's ſubſtitute. Soon after, having taken upon him the order of St. Benedict, he was ſent into England to make proſelytes; in which employment having continued ſomewhat above a year, he returned to the Proteſtant Religion, and, through the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's intereſt, obtained the ſmall vicarage of Poling by the ſea-ſide, near Arundel Caſtle, in Suſſex. Here he was expoſed to the inſults and abuſes of the Romiſh party, particularly one Francis à S. Clara, living in that neighbourhood under the name of Hunt, who would be very free with him, and expoſe him to ſcorn before his pariſhioners. In the time of the Civil War, he quitted his living, and retired to Paris, where, reconciling himſelf to the Romiſh Church, he made it his buſineſs to rail againſt the Proteſtants. Afterwards returning to England, he ſettled at Ayleſbury in Buckinghamſhire, where he had ſome relations; and, being once more a Proteſtant, he would often preach there in a very fantaſtical manner, to the great mirth of his auditors. He was living there in 1670; but, before his death, he returned a third time to Popery, cauſing his pretended wife to embrace that perſuaſion; and in that faith he died. He publiſhed ſome Sermons and a Comedy, Comedy, called The Pragmatical Jeſuit [A]. He was generally eſteemed a man of the moſt fantaſtical character, one that changed his opinions as often as his cloaths, and, for his juggles and tricks in religion, a Theological Mountebank (a).

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 515, 516.

[A] Some Sermons, and a Comedy called The Pragmatical Jeſuit.] His ſermons are theſe following. I. The perfect Law of God, being a Sermon and no Sermon, preached and yet not preached. Printed in 1652, in octavo. II. Aſtrology proved harmleſs, uſeful, pious; on Gen. i. 14. And let them be for ſigns. Lond. 1657, in 4to. Dedicated to Elias Aſhmole. At the end of the Epiſtle Dedicatory is Richard Carpenter's picture, with a face looking towards him, out of the mouth of which iſſues a ſerpent, and out of the ſerpent's mouth fire. Underneath are written theſe words: Ricardus Carpenterus porcello cuidam Geraſenorum, ſcilicet in omnia præcipiti, fluctibuſque devoto, eidem porco loquaci pariter & minaci mendacique indicit ſilentium, & obmuteſcit. III. Rome in her fruits. Preached the 1ſt of November 1662, near the Standard in Cheapſide; in anſwer to a Pamphlet intitled, Reaſons why the Roman Catholics ſhould not be perſecuted. Lond. 1663, 4to. on Matth. vii. 16. There is extant by the ſame author, a treatiſe intitled, Experience, Hiſtory, and Divinity, in five books. Lond. 1642, in a thick octavo. Dedicated to the Parliament then ſitting; with his picture before it. This book was republiſhed in 1648, under the title of The Downfall of Antichriſt. His comedy, called The Pragmatical Jeſuit, came out after the Reſtoration. The picture before it repreſents him in a very genteel lay-habit; whereas that before his Experience, &c. exhibits him in the dreſs of a formal Clergyman, with a mortified countenance (1). Mr. Langbaine (2) ſpeaks with ſome commendation of this play. He ſays, 'it is very 'inſtructive, tending chiefly to morality, ſhewing the 'difference between true religion and hypocriſy; the 'author having made it his buſineſs to expoſe all the 'ſubtilties and inventions of the Romiſh Clergy to 'gain profelytes, and promote their religion.'

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 515.

(2) Account of the Dramatic Poets, Lond. 1691, 8vo. p. 50.

 [Prints of Richard Carpenter are prefixed to ſeveral of his publications. In the upper part of that which is before the firſt edition of his "Expe-"rience, Hiſtory, and Divinity," he is repreſented kneeling to the Pope. Juſt below is this inſcription, "Mitto te in Angliam, ad paſcendos Ca-"tholicos, & Hæreticos reducendos." In this work, which is a ſtrange medley, may be found ſome particulars of the author's perſonal hiſtory. He tells us in his book, in which he ſpeaks with great freedom of the corruptions of the Church of Rome, that his whole heart was never converted to that Church; 'and we are ſure, ſays Mr. Granger, that it was never half converted to the Church of England.' The ſame Biographer hath given a ſpecimen of Carpenter's ſtile, from before the table of errata at the end of the work above-mentioned. "I humbly de-"ſire all clean-hearted and right-ſpirited people, "who ſhall reade this book, (which becauſe the preſſe "was oppreſſed, ſeems to have been ſuppreſſed, "when it was by little and little and impreſſed; but "now at leaſt hath preſſed through the preſſe into "the publicke) firſt to reſtore it by correcting the "following errata." One would imagine, as Mr. Granger juſtly obſerves, that the author, during his reſidence in Spain, had been particularly converſant with books of chivalry. This ſpecimen is exactly of a piece with the following, which was taken by Cervantes from one of the Spaniſh Romances, and is the ſtile which is ſuppoſed to have turned Don Quixote's brain; "The reaſon of your unreaſonable "uſage of my reaſon, does ſo enfeeble my rea-"ſon, that I have reaſon to expoſtulate with your "beauty (3)."] K.

(3) Biogr. Hiſt. of England, vol. ii. p. 201, 202. Vol. iii. p. 345, 346, octavo edition.

There was another RICHARD CARPENTER, a Divine, of a very different character from the above, and prior in order of time: he was a Corniſh man, and became a Batler in Exeter-College in Oxford, in 1592, and four years after Fellow of that houſe, being then Bachelor of Arts. By the advice and direction of the Rector, Dr. Holland, he applied himſelf to Theological ſtudies, and, in a few years, proved a learned Divine, and an excellent Preacher. In 1611, he was admitted to the reading of the ſentences; and about that time was made Rector of Sherwill, and of Loxhore adjoining, in Devonſhire; and afterwards obtained the benefice of Ham near Sherwill. He died the 18th of December 1627, aged fifty-two, and was buried in the chancel of the Church of Loxhore (b) [B]. He publiſhed ſome Sermons [C]. Langbaine (c) confounds theſe two Carpenters [D].

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon, vol. i. col. 514.

(c) In his account of the Dramatic Poets, London, 1691, 8vo. p. 50.

[B] He was buried in the chancel of the church of Loxhore.] Over his grave is a large epitaph in proſe and verſe, beginning thus: Richardus Carpenter S. Theol. D. ab eruditione multiplici venerandus, pietate vitæ, integritate, morumque comitate valde clarus: hujus & eccleſiæ Sherwillenſis paſtor fidus, &c. i. e. 'Richard Carpenter, Doctor in Divinity, reſpectable 'for his extenſive learning, famous for piety of life, 'integrity, and courteous manners; and a faithful 'Paſtor of this and the Church of Sherwill, &c.'

[C] He publiſhed ſome Sermons.] I. The Soul's Centinel. Preached at the funeral of Sir Arthur Acland, Knt. 9 Jan. 1611, on Job xiv. 14. Lond. 1612, 8vo. II. A Paſtoral Charge, faithfully given and diſcharged at the Triennial Viſitation of W. Biſhop of Exon, at Barnſtaple, 7 Sept. 1616. on Acts xx. 28. London, 1616. 8vo. III. Chriſt's Larum-bell of Love re-ſounded, &c. on John xv. 12. Lond. 1616, 8vo. IV. The conſcionable Chriſtian, &c. Being three Aſſize Sermons at Taunton and Chard in Somerſetſhire, 1620, on Acts xxiv. 16. Lond. 1623, 4to (3).

(3) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 514, 515.

[D] Langbaine confounds theſe two Carpenters.] Speaking (4) of the play called The Pragmatical Jeſuit, written by the firſt-mentioned Richard Carpenter, he ſays: 'I know not whether or no it might not be 'writ by a Divine of that name, the author of ſe-'veral ſermons, particularly three, of keeping a good 'conſcience, printed in quarto, London, 1623.' Theſe are the three Aſſize Sermons, mentioned in the laſt remark. B.

(4) Ubi ſupra.

CARPENTER (GEORGE, Lord) Baron Carpenter of Killaghy, in the county of Kilkenny, in the kingdom of Ireland, a Nobleman during the latter end of the laſt and beginning of the preſent Century, and who by his military atchievements greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf through the whole courſe of the wars in Ireland, Flanders, and Spain; whoſe courage and prudence raiſed him, by gradual promotions, through the ſeveral ſtations and degrees of the army to almoſt the higheſt pitch of military honours (a). He was deſcended from an ancient family in Herefordſhire [A], and born at Pitchers Ocull, in (a) See his epitaph in note [H].

[A] Deſcended from an ancient family in Herefordſhire.] We alſo find the name, and, in all probability, the ſame family, of great antiquity and repute, in other parts of England, particularly in the Weſt. In 1303, in that county, on the 10th of February 1657, and was the ſon of Warncomb Carpenter, ſixth ſon of Thomas Carpenter, Eſq; Lord of the manor of the Homme or Holme, in the pariſh of Dilwynne, near Weobley in this county; which manor, with a conſiderable eſtate, has been in this family, and lineally deſcended from father to ſon for above four-hundred years, and is now in the poſſeſſion of the preſent Earl of Tyrconnel (b):——Mr. Warncomb Carpenter married Eleanor, daughter of William Taylor, Eſq; of the ſame county, and widow of John Hill, Eſquire [B], by whom ſhe had only one ſon [C]: But by Mr. Warncomb Carpenter ſhe had ſeven, of whom, George (Lord Carpenter) was the youngeſt. He had his education at a private Grammar-ſchool in the country, where he made much improvement in claſſical learning; and was upon his arrival in London, ſoon recommended, as well by the ſweetneſs of his diſpoſition, his behaviour, and accompliſhments, as by his friends, to be Page to the Earl of Montague, whom he attended in his embaſſy to the Court of France in 1671, at the age of fourteen. Upon his return in 1672, he rode as a private gentleman in the third troop of guards, which was then looked upon as an honourable poſt, none but the youngeſt ſons of noblemen and gentlemen of fortune being admitted. He was ſhortly after appointed Quarter-maſter to the regiment of horſe, commanded by the Earl of Peterborough, and paſſed through all the commiſſions of Cornet, Lieutenant, and Captain (c), till he was advanced to be the Lieutenant-Colonel of the regiment, in which poſt he continued thirteen years, till 1685, though the regiment was almoſt conſtantly in ſervice. In the year 1693, he married Alice, daughter of the Right Honourable William Baron Cawfield, afterwards created Viſcount Charlemont (and always known by the memorable epithet of good Lord Charlemont) who had a conſiderable jointure by her firſt huſband, James Margetſon, Eſq; by the ſale of part of which, he was enabled to purchaſe the King's own regiment of dragoons, which he commanded till he died. He ſerved through the whole courſe of the wars with France, Ireland, Flanders, and Spain, with unblemiſhed honour and reputation; and diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage, by his courage, conduct, and humanity (d). For the particulars of his military atchievements, we muſt refer the reader to the ſeveral Hiſtories of thoſe wars, in which, all his actions are recorded greatly to his honour. At the unfortunate battle of Almanza in 1707, by his prudent conduct in bringing up the rear in the laſt ſquadron of the retreat, he preſerved the baggage of the whole army (e). In the action at Almenara, July 27, 1710, he was wounded, and had, among the other Generals, the honour of receiving the compliments of his Majeſty Charles III. King of Spain, for his judicious conduct and bravery in that engagement (f). In defending the breach at Brihuega, he was again deſperately wounded; and had his advice been followed, the town had certainly held out till relieved by Count Staremberg [D]; inſtead of which, all our forces, after an obſtinate reſiſtance againſt the whole French and Spaniſh army, were here taken priſoners. The wound Col. Carpenter received was by a muſket-ball, which broke part of his jaw-bone, beat out all his teeth on one ſide, and lodged itſelf in the root of his tongue, where it remained a whole year before it was extracted; during which time he underwent the moſt exquiſite pain, and he wholly ſubſiſted by liquids, being incapable of ſwallowing any other food. In 1705, he was made Brigadier-General, in 1708 Major-General, (b) This, and great part of this article, is taken from Memoirs communicated by the family.

(c) See his epitaph in note [H]. As alſo, The Preamble to his patent in note [G].

(d) See the Preamble to his Patent, note [G].

(e) Annals of Queen Anne, vol. ix. p. 89.

(f) Annals of Queen Anne, vol. ix. p. 94.

1303, the 33d of Edward I. John Carpenter was Member of Parliament for the Borough of Leſkard in the county of Cornwal; as in the 35th of that reign, was Stephen le Carpenter for the borough of Crediton in the county of Devon; and in the 19th of Edward II. 1325, Henry le Carpenter was Member for the town of Derby (1).

(1) The Iriſh Compendium, p. 359.

[B] Mr. Warncomb Carpenter (Lord Carpenter's father) married Eleanor daughter of William Taylor, and widow of John Hill, Eſq;] With this Lady he had a conſiderable jointure, beſides fifteen hundred pounds his own private fortune, given him by his father; a large patrimony at that time for a younger ſon, eſpecially a ſixth. This enabled him to ſupport himſelf, and his large family, in a handſome and genteel manner, to give all his ſons a proper education, and to purſue the bent of his own natural inclinations, in eſpouſing the Royal Cauſe, to which he was moſt zealouſly attached; and by which he was a conſiderable ſufferer, loſing not only great part of his fortune, but even his life, in defence thereof; for being an active officer in the King's army, and a man of high ſpirit, he was, in the heat of the battle of Naſeby, June 14, 1645, wounded by a muſket-ball, which went through both his legs. This, though not the cauſe, of his immediate death, the wound being curable, proved ſo however at laſt; for breaking again out ſome years afterwards, it became incurable, and ſo was the occaſion of his death.

[C] Widow of John Hill, Eſq; by whom ſhe had only one ſon.] Named William, who being a favourite ſervant of his Royal Highneſs James Duke of York, then Lord High-Admiral of England (2), and afterwards King James II. he gave him the command of the ſhip Coventry; and not long afterwards made him Governor, and Captain-General of the Leeward Iſlands; which being afterwards taken by the French, he bravely re-took them, and continued Governor of them to the time of his death.

(2) The Duke of York's Naval Memoirs, 8vo. p. 125, 126.

[D] And had his advice been followed, the town had certainly held out till relieved by Count Staremberg.] In the Council of War, called upon the imminent danger in which they found themſelves, upon being inveſted by the French and Spaniſh armies, Lieutenant-General Carpenter was of opinion, that all the horſe and dragoons ſhould march out of the town over the bridge, and that the foot, with the heavy baggage, ſhould be left; where, by caſting up entrenchments and barricadoes, they might hold out two or three days, till they could get ſuccour from Count Staremberg. This counſel was the more to be regarded, in that they had not a ſufficient quantity of powder and ſhot for all the troops; they who ſhould have taken care of it, having neglected to provide them before the armies ſeparated. But whether, upon expectation of being timely relieved, or out of fear of loſing their baggage and plunder, the majority reſolved, that all the troops ſhould ſtay in and defend the town. Count Staremberg, upon notice of their danger, marched with all poſſible expedition to their reſcue: but before he could come up, they had been forced to yield priſoners of war for want of ammunition (3).

(3) Boyer's Reign of Queen Anne, p. 495.

[E] This

General, and in 1710 Lieutenant-General. In 1714 he was chosen Member of Parliament for Whitchurch in Hampshire, and the year following was appointed Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Vienna, having acquired the personal regard and esteem of the Emperor, by serving under him in Spain. But when he had prepared all things in readiness, and was just setting out for his embassy, the rebellion in 1715 broke out, and he was sent into the North; where he not only prevented the rebels from seizing upon Newcastle, and marching into Yorkshire, but having overtaken them at Preston, where they were invested by Major-General Willes, he, by altering the disposition which that General had made, cut off entirely both their escape and receiving any fresh supplies; and obliged them to send out hostages, that they should raise no works for the defence of the town, nor endeavour to escape themselves, or suffer any of their party to do so till the next morning, when they were to determine whether they would surrender at discretion or not; which, however, they accordingly did in the morning (g). This was all the treaty the General made with the rebels, nor were any hopes of pardon or mercy so much as suggested to them [E]. At the beginning of February 1716, General Carpenter sent a challenge by Col. Churchill to General Willes [F]. The motives reported for this were some words which had passed between them in Spain, and were revived again at Preston. But this duel was honourably compromised, by the generous interpositions of the Dukes of Marlborough and Montague. In 1716 he was constituted Governor of Minorca, and Commander in Chief of his Majesty's forces in Scotland; and in 1719, was created Baron

(g) See an Account of his conduct in this affair, in A True Relation of the Pursuit of the Rebels in the North, and of their Surrender at Preston to Lieutenant-General Carpenter, Commander in Chief of his Majesty's Forces there; joined to a Plan published under this title, An exact Plan of the Town of Preston, with the Barricadoes of the Rebels, and the Dispositions of the King's Forces under the Command of Lieutenant-General Carpenter, and Major-General Willes. See likewise, The Political State of Great-Britain, for Feb. 1715-6, vol. xi. p. 179, &c.

[E] This was all the treaty the General made with the rebels, nor was any hope of pardon or mercy so much as suggested to them.] As is, without foundation, asserted by some favourers of those unhappy sufferers in that rebellion. Upon this account, we think it incumbent upon us to clear the General's conduct in this respect, which we cannot better do, than by giving the circumstances of these proceedings from the trial of Lord Wintoun (4).

(4) State Trials, vol. vi. p. 38.

'Sir J. Jekyll. Mr. Carpenter, please to inform my 'Lords what passed at Preston after you came there?

'Gen. Carp. After I came, the rebels sent out to 'know, what terms they might expect? and were 'answered, None, but at discretion. They soon after sent out one Captain Dalziel, to desire a cessation till next morning; upon which I sent in Colonel Churchill, to tell them I agreed to a cessation, provided they sent out an English Lord, and 'a Scotch Lord, as hostages:——and he brought 'out my Lord Derwentwater, and Colonel Mackintosh, as hostages, that they should make no attempt 'to escape, nor any works for defence in the town.

'Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, acquaint my Lords who you 'sent in with Colonel Churchill?

'Gen. Carp. Colonel Cotton.

'Att. Gen. When did they agree to surrender the 'place?

'Gen. Carp. Not till the next morning. The 'hostages were, That none should attempt to escape, 'nor any defences should be made in the town, till 'the next morning; at which time they would determine, whether they would surrender, or not.

'Att. Gen. I desire you to acquaint my Lords, 'whether these were all the terms offered; or whether 'there were any hopes of mercy given them?

'Gen. Carp. I gave them none at all myself, and 'it is very unlikely any body else should. I commanded in Chief his Majesty's forces there: No 'body ought to have done it; and if any officer took 'upon him so to do, without my order or leave, it 'was very unanswerable by the rules and discipline 'of war, and what he cannot answer: I hope no body 'did: I am sure, I gave no such directions: Colonel 'Churchill can acquaint your Lordships, whether I 'directed him to mention any other conditions to 'them, than at discretion.

'Sir J. Jekyl. Did you hear any other officer give 'them any hope or expectation of mercy?

'Gen. Carp. No, I did not.

[In relation to General Carpenter's evidence, Colonel Churchill was sworn, and asked, viz.]

'Mr. Cowper. The question proposed is, Whether 'you were sent into Preston, and by whom?

'Col. Churchill. I came up to Preston on Sunday 'morning, under General Carpenter's command, 'about ten o'clock; about one, they sent out to capitulate; about five, I was sent in by General 'Carpenter; their request being, that they might 'have till next morning to consider whether they 'would surrender, or not. My directions were they 'should have that, upon condition they sent out 'hostages that none should attempt to escape, and 'that no defence should be made in the town. The 'people named to me by General Carpenter, were 'my Lord Derwentwater, or my Lord Widdrington; and my Lord Kenmure, or Mackintosh, was 'mentioned for the Scotch. I directed them to send 'hostages to me. They could not find my Lord 'Derwentwater nor Widdrington, and Mackintosh 'was gone to bed. A little before eight I went with 'them, and told them the terms I was to deliver to 'them, that they were to throw up no works to 'fortify themselves; and should answer that none of 'them should escape. My Lord Derwentwater and 'Mackintosh went out with me: I carried them to 'the two Generals there, and at seven o'clock next 'morning they surrendered themselves.

'Mr. Cowper. Please to give me leave to ask you, 'whether you had any commission from the General 'that sent you into the town; or whether you of 'yourself, without such commission, gave them any 'hopes of mercy?

'Col. Churchill. I had not any power to do it; and 'was so far from doing it, that I don't remember a 'single syllable was mentioned either on our side, or 'theirs, about it.

'Mr. Cowper. Did you at any other time hear any 'other officers give them such assurance?

'Col. Churchill. I never heard a single word like it.'

Surrendering at discretion between an enemy and an enemy (said the General to a friend in the Court of Request who asked him the question) always implies mercy, and is never refused; but, added he, the Law of Arms is the very reverse in cases of intestine commotions; thus illustrating the case: If a robber attempted my life, and missing his aim, threw himself at my feet, I would shew him mercy: but if my servant attempted my life, and missed his aim, were he ever so submissive, I would shoot him through the head (5).

(5) The Life of the late Right Hon. George Lord Carpenter, a pamphlet published in 1736.

[F] In the beginning of February 1715-16, he sent a challenge to General Willes.] We shall represent this affair in the words of Mr. A. Boyer, the author of The Political State of Great-Britain (6). 'On Monday, 'February 6, the town was surprized, and all the 'well-affected concerned, to hear that Lieutenant-'General Carpenter and Lieutenant-General Willes, 'two officers, who on all occasions had distinguished 'themselves for their bravery and conduct, were like 'to fight a duel. The truth is, a challenge was sent 'for that purpose from General Carpenter to General 'Willes; and Colonel Churchill, who carried it, was 'to be second to the first, and Brigadier Honeywood 'to the other. But this affair having taken vent, and 'reached the ears of the Duke of Montague, his Grace 'prevented

(6) The Political State of Great-Britain, for Feb. 1715-16, vol. xi. p. 168.

Baron Carpenter of Killaghy in the county of Kilkenny in the kingdom of Ireland [G]. In the year 1722, Lord Carpenter was choſen member of Parliament for the city of Weſtminſter, and was now as diligent in the ſervice of his country in the Houſe, as he had before been in the field; on all occaſions voting for what he thought the good of his country, without any regard to party, from the ſtricteſt principles of honour, juſtice, and integrity; never giving a vote, till upon the matureſt deliberation he was fully convinced of its equity. After ſeven years conſtant attendance in Parliament, age came upon him, and he declined apace. In October 1731, being nearly ſeventy-four years of age, he began to labour under a failure of appetite; and having had a fall by which his teeth were looſened on that ſide which had not been wounded, he was capable of receiving but little nouriſhmen. This complaint, together with old age and a gradual decay of nature, ended his life on the 10th of February 1731-2. His body was interred, purſuant to his own directions in his will, at Owſelbury in Hampſhire, near his Lady, where a neat monument of white and blue-veined marble is erected to his memory, by his ſon [H] the late Lord Carpenter, who was all the iſſue he left.

'prevented the combat by ſending a guard into the 'field. After which, the Duke of Marlborough in-'terpoſed in, and allayed this unhappy quarrel, at 'which all the enemies of the government did heartily 'rejoice. The ſubject-matter of it is not yet fully 'known, but was then, and is ſtill, reported to be, 'an old grudge upon a diſpute that happened between 'theſe two great men in Spain; and which having 'bled afreſh at Preſton upon the competition of the 'command, they wiſely thought fit to defer the de-'ciſion of it, till they met in London, and in the 'mean time, to act with all the chearfulneſs and 'unanimity againſt the rebels.'

[G] In 1719, he was created Baron Carpenter of Killaghy, in the county of Kilkenny, in the kingdom of Ireland.] The preamble to his patent is as follows, in Engliſh (7). 'Since we and our predeceſſors have 'liberally beſtowed titles of honour on perſons emi-'nent for arts and qualifications proper to a peaceable 'reign; we judge it moſt reaſonable, that military 'virtue, which ſeems, for many years paſt, to have 'been a principal ſupport of the government, ſhould 'be diſtinguiſhed by due rewards: For this reaſon 'eſpecially, we have thought fit to advance our 'faithful and well-beloved GEORGE CARPENTER, 'Eſq; Lieutenant-General of our armies, to the 'peerage of this kingdom; a perſon who, having ap-'plied himſelf early to the profeſſion of arms, has 'paſſed through all the military employs, to the rank 'he now bears, by ſlow and gradual promotions, his 'ſervice always preceding his advancement. When 'Britain was delivered from arbitrary power, he rea-'dily embraced the intereſt of the Revolution, and 'ſerved under King William of Glorious Memory, 'and afterwards in Flanders, behaving himſelf as a 'brave and induſtrious officer. After a ſhort interval 'of an unſafe peace, the war breaking out again with 'great violence, and ſpreading itſelf almoſt through 'all Europe, Spain was the ſcene of his ſervices. 'Earl Stanhope, Chief Commander of the Britiſh 'forces in that kingdom, freely imparted to him his 'deſigns, and in the execution of them ſucceſsfully 'experienced his courage and conduct. And when 'that General's preſence was required in England, he 'intruſted him with the command of his troops, as 'being fully aſſured that the public cauſe would ſuf-'fer no diſadvantage by his management; for his 'diligence and circumſpection in performing the 'duties of his employment were not leſs remarkable, 'than his conſtancy and preſence of mind in the time 'of action and moſt imminent danger. By his in-'tegrity, prudence, and evenneſs of temper, he not 'only gained the affections of his countrymen, but 'the eſteem and regard of the Generals of the Al-'lies, and even of his Imperial Majeſty. We have 'had a proof of his loyalty and abilities in an 'inſtance very beneficial to the public; for when 'ſedition, which was ſeaſonably repreſſed in other 'places, had taken root in the county of Northum-'berland, and there broke out into an open rebel-'lion, he, by our command, haſtened thither to 'extinguiſh this flame of civil war, though with 'unequal numbers. He prevented the rebels ſeiz-'ing Newcaſtle, intended by them for their place of 'arms; hindered their march into Yorkſhire; and 'at laſt having overtaken them at Preſton, where 'they were inveſted by other parts of our troops, 'blocked them up more cloſely, and obliged them 'to ſurrender; by which ſucceſs peace was reſtored 'to England, which greatly conduced to the ſub-'duing the rebels in Scotland. For theſe reaſons, 'that a perſon ſo well deſerving of Great-Britain 'and Ireland, allied by marriage to a noble family 'of that kingdom, may from himſelf tranſmit an 'honour to poſterity, we create him a Peer, as be-'ing every way worthy of that honour, &c.'

(7) The Iriſh Compendium, p. 359.

[H] Where a neat monument of white and blue-veined marble is erected to his memory by his ſon.] Having the following inſcription. 'Here lies the Right 'Honourable George Lord Carpenter, Colonel of 'his Majeſty's own regiment of Dragoons, Gover-'nor of the Iſland of Minorca, Lieutenant-General 'and Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's forces 'in North-Britain; deſcended from an ancient fa-'mily in Herefordſhire, and bred in arms; having 'been fifty-nine years in the army, and paſſed 'through all the military employs, from a private 'gentleman in the Horſe-guards, to the rank in 'which he died, by ſlow and gradual promotions; 'his ſervices always preceding his advancement. 'He ſerved through the whole courſe of the laſt wars 'of England with France, in Ireland, Flanders, and 'Spain, with honour and reputation; was never 'abſent from his poſt, when there was any action, 'or that action was expected; and was as remarkable 'for his great humanity, as for his courage and pre-'ſence of mind in time of ſervice and moſt immi-'nent danger. By his prudence, integrity, and 'evenneſs of temper, during the Spaniſh war, he 'not only gained the affections of his countrymen, 'but the eſteem and regard of the Generals of the 'Allies, and of the Emperor himſelf; to whom he 'was appointed Envoy-Extraordinary and Plenipo-'tentiary in 1715. He married Alice daughter of 'the Lord Charlemount, by whom he left iſſue only 'one ſon; who erected this monument to the me-'mory of the beſt of fathers. Obiit 10 die Februarii '1731, ætat. 74.' H———n.

 [It is remembered, that General Gueſt uſed to flatter Lord Carpenter on account of his conduct at the battle of Almanza, and to put him in mind, particularly of his horſe Crop, which he rode in that battle. His Lordſhip, it ſeems, was not a little pleaſed with being reminded of a circumſtance, that brought fully to his recollection an event which he regarded as one of the moſt glorious actions of his life. It hath been ſaid, that Lord Carpenter's chief merit conſiſted in his ſkill as a Quarter Maſter General, and in his induſtry in providing for the ſubſiſtence of the troops (8).

(8) From private information.

Mr. Jonathan Richardſon, jun. as an inſtance that the poor never fairly forgive the rich their conveniencies and ſuperiority, but are ſure, on every occaſion, to ſeize an opportunity of exerting their own pride, and little temporary boaſt of power, relates, that Lord Carpenter, at a Weſtminſter election, where the event of the conteſt was very doubtful, could not prevail on four ſturdy butchers to poll as he would have them, but by letting them ride in his coach, whilſt he himſelf walked at the horſes heads, and led them (9).] K.

(9) Richardſoniana, p. 259.

CARSTARES (WILLIAM) an eminent Scotch Clergyman, who was Confidential Secretary to King William the Third, and afterwards Principal of the Univerſity of Edinburgh, was born on the 11th of February 1649, at Cathcart, in the neighbourhood of Glaſgow. His father, the Rev. Mr. John Carſtares, was a younger branch of a very ancient family of that name in Fifeſhire; and his mother was a daughter of Muir of Glanderſton, an equally reſpectable family in the county of Renfrew. As their ſon gave early indications of uncommon abilities, it was determined that he ſhould have the beſt education the country could afford. Accordingly, he was ſent to Ormiſton, in East-Lothian, and put under the tuition of Mr. Sinclair, a Preſbyterian Clergyman, who kept an academy, where many young gentlemen of the chief families in Scotland were educated. Here it was that Mr. Carſtares formed thoſe connections, which ſubſiſted betwixt him and ſome of the greateſt men in the nation during the whole of his life; and at this place, he firſt acquired that taſte for the learned languages for which he was afterwards diſtinguiſhed. Mr. Sinclair was ſo great a devotee to the Latin tongue, that he would ſuffer no other to be ſpoken in his family; a circumſtance, which enabled his pupils to expreſs themſelves in it with peculiar eaſe and fluency. When Mr. Carſtares left this academy, his father ſent him to the Univerſity of Edinburgh, under the particular inſpection of Mr. Paterſon, then one of the regents of the College, afterwards Sir William Paterſon, and Clerk to the Privy-Council of Scotland. Under the care of this gentleman, he made great progreſs in the ſeveral parts of School-Philoſophy then in vogue, and afterwards devoted himſelf particularly to the ſtudy of Divinity, for the profeſſion of which he was intended (a). The ardour, however, of his literary purſuits was damped, by the unhappy ſituation of Scotland at that period. Being naturally of an active, bold, and enterprizing ſpirit, and having connections, both of blood and friendſhip, with many of the perſons who had ſuffered the moſt ſeverely under the perſecutions of King Charles the Second's reign, he gave early indications of a diſpoſition to unite with them in obtaining a redreſs of grievances, and in defending the civil and religious liberties of his country. To prevent, therefore, the ill conſequences that might ariſe from his engaging too deeply in deſigns of this kind, his father, under the pretence of affording him the beſt aſſiſtances for furniſhing his Theological Studies, ſent him to the Univerſity of Utrecht. It happened, that the very meaſure which old Mr. Carſtares took to keep his ſon from being involved in political intrigues, was the occaſion of his entering into them more fully than before. When he ſet out from Scotland, he carried from his father a letter, recommending him to the kind offices and beſt advice of a phyſician at London, who was a particular friend of his family. This was at the time, when England had begun to take the alarm about the Popiſh Succeſſion; and when many, who were diſſatisfied with the ſtate of publick affairs, had entered into a correſpondence with ſeveral who belonged to the Court of the Prince of Orange, and eſpecially with Mr. Fagel, Penſionary of Holland. Amongſt theſe correſpondents with the Hollanders, was the very phyſician to whom Mr. Carſtares had been recommended; and this gentleman, finding that he was a young man who was well acquainted with the ſituation of things in Scotland, and qualified to give the fulleſt information upon that head, put a letter into his hands, directed to the Prince's phyſician. The conſequence of this letter was, that Mr. Carſtares was firſt introduced to the Penſionary Fagel; and after that, by means of the Penſionary, to the Prince of Orange himſelf, who was highly pleaſed with the ſagacity and penetration which he ſhewed in the intelligence communicated by him concerning the affairs of Great-Britain, and with the ſentiments he diſcovered relative to the ſtate of parties at that time. During his reſidence at the Univerſity of Utrecht, and whilſt he applied himſelf to his literary purſuits, Mr. Carſtares improved ſo well the opportunities his ſituation afforded him of waiting upon the Prince, and ſo far ingratiated himſelf into his favour, that nothing of conſequence was tranſacted in the Dutch Court, in reſpect to Britiſh concerns, with which he was not entruſted. By the time he returned to his native country, he had, as Dr. Burnet obſerves, all the ſecrets of the Prince of Orange in his breaſt. By his reſidence in Holland, and by his perſonal attachment to a Prince who was the avowed patron of the friends of liberty, Mr. Carſtares's principles, both in religion and politics, were ſtrongly confirmed. In conſequence of theſe principles, the wretched condition of Scotland, at the period of his return to it, could not avoid making a deep impreſſion upon his mind. He beheld with the moſt ſenſible regret, the encroachments which arbitrary power was daily making upon the rights and privileges of his fellow-citizens; and accordingly, he entered with zeal into the counſels and ſchemes of thoſe noblemen and gentlemen, who oppoſed the tyrannical meaſures of Government. Mr. Carſtares's political engagements did not, however, make him forget his purpoſe of embracing the profeſſion of Divinity. Being not only by education, but by principle, a Preſbyterian, he paſſed his trials according to the forms of that ſyſtem of Church Government, and obtained a licence to preach the goſpel. But finding that all his hopes of uſefulneſs in the character of a Clergyman, were blaſted in his own country, by the ſeverities which were then practiſed againſt the Preſbyterians, he formed the reſolution of returning again to Holland, that he might enjoy, under a more indulgent and auſpicious Government, the liberty he was denied at home (b). As he intended to paſs through London, in his way to the Low Countries, he was employed by Argyle, and the other Scotch Patriots, in treating with the Engliſh Excluſioniſts. When he arrived at the metropolis, which was in the month of November 1682, he had many conferences both with the principal leaders, and the ſubordinate inſtruments of the party; and he was engaged in a ſeries of negotiations with the male-contents in England, Scotland, and Holland, in order to effect, though without ſucceſs, an union of deſigns and efforts in the common cauſe (c). In a converſation which he had with Robert Fergusſon, commonly called the Plotter, that violent man threw out ſome hints concerning the aſſaſſination of the King and his brother; but the ſuggeſtion was rejected by Mr. Caſtares with the utmoſt indignation. Although he treated Fergusſon's propoſal with an honeſt reſentment, yet having good reaſon to think that it was merely the idea of a ſingle perſon, he continued his intercourſe with the other conſpirators (d), and was concerned with them in what hath been called the Rye-Houſe Plot, ſo far as it related to obtaining a free Parliament, the redreſs of publick grievances, and the excluſion of the Duke of York; and he thought it juſtifiable to take up arms for procuring thoſe conſtitutional remedies, which had repeatedly been denied to complaints and remonſtrances. On the diſcovery of the conſpiracy, Mr. Carſtares was ſeized at Tenterden in Kent, thrown into the jail of that place, and thence conducted to London, and committed to cloſe cuſtody at the Gate-houſe, Weſtminſter, where he continued upwards of eleven weeks. During this time, he was often brought before the Privy-Council, to whom he always proteſted his utter abhorrence of any deſigns againſt the life of the King or the Duke of York; but never could be prevailed upon to reveal any particulars, which could affect thoſe who had been concerned in the ſcheme for preventing the Popiſh Succeſſion. Finding, at laſt, that he had nothing to expect in the way of favour from his Majeſty, but upon terms with which he was incapable of complying, he gave in a petition to the Court of King's Bench, for his Habeas Corpus. Inſtead of obtaining it, he was ſent the next day down to Scotland, to take his trial in that kingdom, contrary to his own warm remonſtrances, and the manifeſt dictates of reaſon and juſtice; which required that he ſhould be tried by the laws of that country, wherein the crimes he was charged with were alledged to have been committed. At that period, the Privy Council of Scotland, into the hands of which he was conſigned, deſerved no better a character than that of a political inquiſition. The inhuman practice of extracting evidence by torture ſtill ſubſiſted in all its rigour, though baniſhed from the courts of England, as repugnant to the genius and conſtitution of a free people. Upon Mr. Caſtares's being brought to Edinburgh, in 1684, he was immediately thrown into irons, and continued in them ſome weeks; during which time he was frequently viſited by Lord Melfort, one of the Secretaries of State, who urged him in the moſt earneſt manner to reveal what he knew, and promiſed him a full pardon in caſe of his compliance. As he firmly refuſed to comply with his Lordſhip's offers, he was produced before the Privy Council, in the preſence of whom he was put to the torture; which he endured with great compoſure and firmneſs, though it was inflicted with ſuch ſeverity, that all the Privy Counſellors were ſo affected as to be obliged to quit the room, excepting the odious Earl of Perth, the Lord Chancellor of the kingdom, who did not diſcover the leaſt ſymptom of compaſſion for the ſufferer. When the Privy Council found, by experience, that all attempts to bring Mr. Carſtares to a confeſſion by violence, would probably prove ineffectual, they empowered Lord Melfort to treat with him upon milder terms. They ſpecified certain queſtions to be put to him; and, upon condition that he would anſwer them, they authorized the Secretary to procure him an ample pardon to himſelf, and that he ſhould never be produced as a witneſs in any trial. Not only ſo, but if Mr. Carſtares inſiſted upon it, they farther engaged, that none of his anſwers to the interrogatories they were to put to him, ſhould ever be urged in evidence, either directly or indirectly, againſt any perſon, or before any judicatory whatſoever. By ſuch inſidious terms, the ſtubbornneſs of his fortitude and virtue was in ſome degree relaxed, after he had firſt ſtipulated that the promiſe of the Privy Council to him ſhould be ratified by a deed of Court, and recorded in their books. He told them, that the reaſon why he inſiſted upon this, was, not that he had any thing to reveal, which could, in the eye of the law, be hurtful to his friends, but that he was determined rather to die an hundred deaths, than to ſubmit to the diſhonour of having his teſtimony produced in Court, againſt any one of thoſe who were at that time under proſecution before the criminal judicatures. This agreement, as might, perhaps, have been expected from the temper of the men and the character of the age, was violated in the moſt ſhameful manner. The Privy Council cauſed a paper to be printed, entitled, Mr. Carſtares's Confeſſion; and containing a moſt lame, falſe, and imperfect account of the whole tranſaction. Not content with this, in direct violation of the only condition upon which he would conſent to anſwer the queries propoſed to him, they ſuffered his evidence, as they falſely termed it, to be produced in open Court againſt one of his moſt intimate friends, Mr. Baillie of Jarviſwood. Before they went this length, they had endeavoured to prevail vail with Mr. Carſtares, judicially to acknowledge before the Juſticiary Court, his anſwers to their interrogatories; but he told them that he had ſpirit enough left to reject their propoſal with diſdain, and to endure any ſeverities they could inflict, rather than comply with ſo diſhonourable and unjuſt a demand. The treacherous uſe which was made of his confeſſion, affected him in the moſt ſenſible degree. His natural fortitude could ſupport him under perſonal ſufferings, but it almoſt ſunk under the imputation of his being in any meaſure acceſſary to the ſufferings of a friend; a friend too, as the Hiſtorians generally agree, of moſt excellent character, and whoſe public ſpirit merited a better fate than that of an ignominious death; to which, however, he ſubmitted with the courage of an ancient Hero, and the reſignation of a primitive Martyr (e). After theſe tranſactions, Mr. Caſtares was releaſed from his confinement in a dungeon of the caſtle of Edinburgh, where he had continued for ſome months, cut off from all communication with his friends, and ſtruggling under the infirmities of a ſhattered conſtitution. Whilſt he was in theſe diſagreeable circumſtances, having procured a copy of Thuanus, who was his favourite Author, he ſpent moſt of his time in the peruſal of that excellent Hiſtorian. As he had no variety of books, he read that volumnious work no leſs than three times over; and the effect of this was, that beſides its contributing greatly to relieve the irkſomeneſs of a priſon, it became as familiar to him to think and to ſpeak in Latin as in Engliſh (f). Another anecdote reſpecting his impriſonment, which he uſed to take great pleaſure in relating, ſhall be inſerted below [A].

(a) Life of Mr. Carſtares, prefixed to his State Papers, publiſhed by Dr. M'Cormick, 1774, quarto, p. 3, 4.

(b) Ibid, p. 4—8.

(c) Carſtares's Life, ubi ſupra, p. 8—15, where theſe negotiations are related more at large.

(d) Ibid, p. 10, 11.

(e) Life of Carſtares, ubi ſupra, p. 15—22.

(f) Ibid. p. 22.

When Mr. Carſtares was releaſed from the Caſtle of Edinburgh, he was permitted to retire to Holland, and obtained a paſs from Lord Melfort for that purpoſe. From his firſt leaving that country, until he was apprehended in England, he had maintained a correſpondence with Penſionary Fagel, and Mr. Bentinck, afterwards Earl of Portland. This correſpondence he had taken ſuch effectual methods to conceal, that no ſuſpicion appears to have been entertained of it by the Engliſh Government. When, therefore, he arrived in Holland, at the latter end of the year 1684, or the beginning of 1685, the invariable fidelity and profound ſecrecy which he had preſerved with regard to ſo important an article, obtained for him a moſt favourable reception from the Prince of Orange, who appointed him one of his own Chaplains, and procured him to be elected Miniſter of the Engliſh Proteſtant Congregation at Leyden. Mr. Carſtares was now more capable than ever of being ſerviceable to his illuſtrious Patron. As, during his reſidence in Britain, he had had full occaſion for the exerciſe of his talents in judging of political men and political conduct, he was hence enabled to give an exact delineation of the principal characters concerned in the adminiſtration of public affairs, and of the meaſures they purſued. Accordingly, the Prince frequently had recourſe to him on this head, and particularly for information concerning the diſpoſitions and views of thoſe who reſorted to Holland; and his Highneſs uſed to obſerve, that he never, in a ſingle inſtance, had reaſon to charge him with attempting to miſlead him. It appears, likewiſe, from ſome of Mr. Carſtares's papers, that he was one of the channels through which the Britiſh male-contents conveyed their private intelligence (g). When the Prince of Orange had formed the deſign of tranſporting an army into England, in order to reſcue this country from the ſlavery with which it was threatened, he reſolved that our Divine, in quality of his Domeſtic Chaplain, ſhould accompany him in his expedition. Upon the diſembarkation of the troops at Torbay, Mr. Carſtares ſuggeſted to the Prince, that, as one chief deſign of his undertaking was to protect the Proteſtant Religion as by law eſtabliſhed, it might have a good effect upon the forces, and make a favourable impreſſion on the minds of the people, to conclude the landing with a religious ceremony. The thought being approved of by his Highneſs, Mr. Carſtares, as ſoon as the ſoldiers had landed, performed divine ſervice at the head of them; after which all the army

(g) Ibid. p. 25—30.

[A] Another anecdote, reſpecting his impriſonment, ſhall be inſerted below.] "One day, ſays Dr. M'Cormick, not long after his commitment, a boy, about twelve years of age, ſon to Erſkine of Cambo, Lieutenant-governor of the Caſtle, in the courſe of his rambles through the court, came to the grate of his apartment. As he always loved to amuſe himſelf with young people, he went towards the grate, and began a converſation with him. The boy was captivated with the gentle and engaging manner in which he accoſted him; and, mightily pleaſed with his firſt interview, he reſolved to cultivate his new acquaintance. In a day or two after, he returned at the ſame hour to the grate; and, in the courſe of a few periodical viſits of this kind, he conceived the ſtrongeſt attachment to the priſoner——would ſit by him for hours, lamenting his unhappy ſituation, and telling a thouſand ſtories to divert him. He would ſometimes load his pockets with proviſions of different ſorts, and oblige him to partake with him. At other times, he would purchaſe for him pen, ink, and paper; and, when he had written his letters, he would come at night and carry them to the Poſt Office himſelf. He was quite unhappy, if Mr. Carſtares had no errand to ſend him, or no favour to aſk. This intimacy ſubſiſted between them ſo long as Mr. Carſtares continued in cuſtody; and, when their intercourſe was broken off by his releaſe, the ſeparation was attended with tears on both ſides. It was not many years before Mr. Carſtares had an opportunity of teſtifying his gratitude. One of the firſt private favours he aſked of King William, was, that he would beſtow the office of Lord Lyon upon his young friend, to whoſe humanity and kind offices he had owed his chief conſolation in his deepeſt diſtreſs; and he obtained his requeſt, with this additional compliment, that it ſhould be hereditary in the family. He did not, however, live long to enjoy it in his own perſon; and his eldeſt ſon forfeited the ſucceſſion, by engaging in the rebellion of 1715 (1)."

(1) Life of Mr. Carſtares, prefixed to his State Papers, p. 22, 23.

joined in ſinging the 118th Pſalm. From this time, until the ſettlement of the Crown upon King William and Queen Mary, he continued about the Prince's perſon; and from ſome private papers it appears, that he had been conſulted and employed in the negotiation of various affairs, and in the diſtribution of certain ſums of money [B]. At the period of the Revolution, Mr. Carſtares had it in his power to be of eminent ſervice both to his own country and to the Prince of Orange. Nothing of conſequence was tranſacted relative to the ſettlement of Scotland, in which the Prince did not conſult him in private. He was inſtrumental in procuring from the Preſbyterian Clergy of that kingdom, an addreſs, full of gratitude to the Prince of Orange, for his ſeaſonable interpoſition; and this addreſs was the more acceptable, as it was thought to contain the general ſentiments of the common people of the country, who regarded their preachers as oracles. As ſoon as William and Mary were proclaimed King and Queen of Scotland, their Majeſties gave Mr. Carſtares a proof of their eſteem, by appointing him to be their Chaplain for Scotland; and by annexing to that office, the whole revenue belonging to the Chapel Royal, which he continued to enjoy to the end of his life. His Majeſty intimated to him, at the ſame time, that he required his conſtant attendance upon his perſon. For this purpoſe, apartments were aſſigned him in the Palace, when in England; and when the King went abroad, Mr. Carſtares was allowed five hundred pounds, every campaign, for camp-equipage (b) [C]. The eaſy acceſs which his ſituation gave him upon all occaſions, to the preſence of his Royal Maſter, was improved by him, in ſuggeſting, without reſerve, whatever he judged conducive to the intereſt of his native country, or the honour and ſtability of his Majeſty's Government. It appears, that he was not a little inſtrumental in promoting the ſettlement of Preſbytery in Scotland, a meaſure to which the King's conſent was with difficulty obtained; not, as we may well be aſſured, from a diſlike to that mode of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, but from a deſire which he had, that, in conjunction with a toleration, the ſame form of Church Government ſhould be eſtabliſhed over the whole Iſland. The act for aboliſhing patronage was ſtill more contrary to his Majeſty's private inclinations; nor was it approved of by Mr. Carſtares, who, though the beſt friend the Preſbyterians ever had at Court, knew too well, that the zealots of the party would abuſe any power which ſhould be put into their hands. The effects of the liberal conceſſions which were made to them, juſtified his apprehenſions. The Preſbyterian miniſters, inſtead of conducting themſelves with that temper and moderation which ſound policy dictated, and the King earneſtly enjoined, diſguſted him ſo much, by narrowing the terms of aſſumption for the Epiſcopal Clergy, and by rejecting the plan of accommodation which was offered in their name, and approved of by his Majeſty, that his Commiſſioner to the General Aſſembly, according to his inſtructions, ſuddenly diſſolved that Court in the year 1692; and William the Third, was not eaſily prevailed with to countenance its meeting for the future. The reſult of this bigotry in the violent Preſbyterians was, that few of the preachers who favoured epiſcopacy, choſe to incorporate with the eſtabliſhment; in conſequence of which, whole provinces, eſpecially in the Northern parts of the kingdom, were deprived of the means of religious inſtruction (i). Theſe proceedings of his brethren were very diſagreeable to Mr. Carſtares, who, though ſincerely attached to the cauſe of Preſbytery, wiſhed to maintain it with temper and with candour. He was not a friend to the abſolute predominance of any ſet of men whatſoever. It had been his advice to the King with regard to the contending parties, whether in Church or State, that he would not permit himſelf to be ſo far engroſſed or monopolized by any of them, as to adopt their private animoſities and reſentments, but to let them underſtand that he would have his ears open to the juſt complaints of ſuch as were injured or oppreſſed. Another maxim recommended by our political Divine to his Majeſty was, to be extremely cautious in giving up any one branch of the royal prerogative; as being a danger to which the King was the more expoſed, from having been raiſed to the throne by the voice of the people,

(b) Life of Carſtares, ubi ſupra, p. 32—38.

(i) Ibid. p. 38—50.

[B] In the diſtribution of certain ſums of money.] In a paper concerning accounts of money diſburſed by him for the Prince's ſervice, he informs his Highneſs that he had diſpoſed of ſuch and ſuch ſums in concert with Lord Melvil; but with regard to other ſums, he mentions that none were privy to the diſtribution of them but himſelf. Among the reſt of the particulars, there is a ſum ſtated as paid to a Captain Wiſhart, who was maſter of the veſſel in which the Earl of Argyle went home; "of whoſe honeſty and willingneſs to ſerve his Highneſs, ſays Mr. Carſtares, I am fully aſſured."

'This, adds Dr. M'Cormick, is the only evi'dence I have ever met with, that Monmouth and 'Argyle were countenanced in their undertaking by
'the Prince of Orange. Here we have William
'giving money to the perſon who brought Argyle
'over, in order to aſſiſt the Duke of Monmouth in 'his rebellion, at the very time when he was offer'ing to James to come in perſon to extinguiſh that 'rebellion (2)."

[C] And when the King went abroad, &c.] 'That 'Monarch, ſays Dr. Mac Cormick, amidſt all the 'hurry of ſecular affairs in which he was involved,
'found leiſure for performing the duties of piety
'and devotion, at which Mr. Carſtares frequently
'aſſiſted him. Upon the day of battle, he always 'accompanied him in his chariot to the field. He 'had thus many opportunities of ſtudying the cha'racter of that great man in the moſt trying circum-
'ſtances, and of admiring his tranquillity and 'compoſure immediately before action, as well as 'his abſolute contempt of danger in the field. Mr.
'Carſtares aſcribed both the one and the other to 'the influence of religious principles, no leſs than
'to conſtitutional courage (3).'

(2) Life of Carſtares, ubi ſupra, p. 35. note.

(3) Ibid. p. 38. note.

in oppoſition to the encroachments of the royal prerogative in the preceding reign (k). The wiſdom of this counſel is highly extolled by the Writer of Mr. Carſtares's Life; but different perſons will think differently of it, according to the reſpective turn of their ſentiments. It might be alledged, that if Princes are made for the people, and not the people for Princes, it behoves the latter to conſent to ſuch enlargements of the liberty of the ſubject, as the reaſon of things, the progreſs of knowledge, and the circumſtances of the times may require; and that this is particularly incumbent upon thoſe Sovereigns who are at the head of a free nation, and who have been exalted to the Crown, out of the line of the regular ſucceſſion, for the very purpoſe of ſecuring and extending the rights and privileges of the community.

(k) Ibid. p. 40—42.

In 1693, an event happened, which gave Mr. Carſtares a ſignal opportunity of diſplaying his regard for his native country, and his influence with his royal Maſter. In the Parliament which ſat in Scotland in that year, an act was paſſed, obliging all in office to take the oath of allegiance to their Majeſties, and at the ſame time to ſign the aſſurance, (as it was called) whereby they declared William to be King de jure, as well as de facto. As this was the firſt inſtance of an oath and declaration of that kind impoſed upon the Church; and as thoſe who urged it were known not to be her friends, the Preſbyterian Miniſters took the alarm, and conſidered it as intended with a view to involve them in the ſame ſituation with the Epiſcopal Clergy. From a paper, inſerted in Mr. Carſtares's Life (l), it appears that the Preſbyterian Clergy had reaſon to be diſſatisfied on this occaſion. But be that as it may, they refuſed ſigning the declaration, and applied for redreſs to the Privy Council; who, by the law, had a power to diſpenſe with the requiſition of the oath, in ſuch caſes as they ſhould think proper. The Privy Council, however, were ſo far from complying with their demands, that they recommended to his Majeſty, that an order ſhould be iſſued out for every Miniſter's taking the oath, and ſigning the aſſurance, before he ſhould be admitted to his ſeat in the general aſſembly. Advantage being taken of the abſence of Mr. Carſtares from Court, the King was prevailed upon to give inſtructions to his Commiſſioner, the Lord Carmichael, to require all the repreſentatives of the Clergy, in the enſuing general aſſembly, to ſign the aſſurance; and, if they refuſed, to diſſolve the aſſembly in his Majeſty's name. When Lord Carmichael communicated his orders to ſome of the Clergy in Edinburgh, he found them obſtinate in their reſolutions not to comply; and he ſaw, that all his attempts to bring them to a better temper would be fruitleſs. As the Commiſſioner was ſenſible that the diſſolution of the aſſembly would not only prove fatal to the Church of Scotland, but alſo to his Majeſty's intereſt in that kingdom, he undertook to lay the matter, as it ſtood, fully before the King; and for that purpoſe, ſent off a flying packet, which he expected to return from London, with William the Third's final determination, the night before the appointed meeting of the aſſembly. At the ſame time, the Clergy ſent up a memorial to Mr. Carſtares, urging him to uſe his good offices in this critical conjuncture, for the preſervation of that Church in the eſtabliſhment of which he had been peculiarly active. The flying packet reached Kenſington in the morning of that day upon which Mr. Carſtares returned. But before his arrival, his Majeſty, at the inſtance of Lord Stair and Lord Tarbot, who repreſented the obſtinacy of the Clergy as an act of rebellion againſt his government, had renewed his inſtructions to the Commiſſioner, and commanded them to be ſent off by the ſame packet. When Mr. Carſtares came to Court, and had peruſed his letters, he immediately enquired into the nature of the diſpatches which had been ordered to be forwarded to Scotland; and, upon learning their contents, he went directly to the meſſenger, who was juſt ſetting off, and required him, in the King's name, to deliver them up. It was now late at night, and the meeting of the general aſſembly was ſo near, that no time was to be loſt. He ran, therefore, to his Majeſty's apartment; and being informed that he was gone to bed, Mr. Carſtares told the Lord in waiting, that it was a matter of the laſt importance which had brought him at that unſeaſonable hour, and that he muſt ſee the King. On entering the chamber he found his Majeſty faſt aſleep; upon which, drawing aſide the curtain, he fell down on his knees, and gently awakened him. The King, greatly ſurprized to ſee him at ſo late an hour, and in ſuch a poſture, enquired of him what was the matter. He anſwered, that he had come to aſk his life. And is it poſſible, replied his Majeſty, that you have been guilty of a crime which deſerves death? He acknowledged that he had, and at the ſame time produced the diſpatches which he had brought back from the meſſenger. And have you, ſays the King, with a ſevere frown, have you indeed preſumed to countermand my orders? Mr. Carſtares then intreated only to be heard a few words, after which he was ready to ſubmit to any puniſhment that his royal maſter ſhould think proper to inflict upon him. Accordingly, he repreſented the reaſons of his conduct to his Majeſty [D], who heard him with great attention, and when he had finiſhed, deſired him to (l) P. 52—57.

[D] He repreſented the reaſons of his conduct to his Majeſty.] "He ſaid, that the King had now known him long, and knew his entire fidelity and attachment to his perſon and government. Some of his ſervants to throw the dispatches into the fire; after which, he ordered him to draw up the instructions to the Commissioner in what terms he pleased. Mr. Carstares immediately wrote to Lord Carmichael, signifying, that it was the King's pleasure to dispense with putting the oaths to the Ministers. When his Majesty had signed the letter, it was instantly forwarded by the messenger, who did not arrive at Edinburgh till the morning of the day which had been fixed for the sitting of the general assembly. By this time the Commissioner and the Clergy were in the utmost perplexity. Lord Carmichael was obliged to dissolve the assembly, if the members of it continued obstinate in refusing to sign the declaration; and they, on the other hand, were determined to assert their own authority, independently of the civil magistrate. The fate of the Church of Scotland depended upon the event of this day's contest; when, to the inexpressible joy both of the Commissioner and the Clergy, their terrors were removed by the arrival of the packet. Next to the establishment of Presbytery in that kingdom, there was no act of William the Third's administration, which endeared him so much to the Presbyterians as this. It was soon, likewise, understood, how highly they had been indebted to the interposition of Mr. Carstares. The eminent service he had performed for them, gave him entire credit with the whole body of his brethren, many of whom had of late begun to suspect that he had deserted their cause; and the obligation was gratefully acknowledged by most of the Clergy, after he came to reside in Scotland. In one case, indeed, he was laid under a necessity of recalling it to their remembrance. When some of the violent Presbyterian Ministers, in the heat of debate in a general assembly, charged him with want of zeal for the interests of their Church, he was provoked to such a degree, that, notwithstanding his usual modesty and coolness of temper, he rose up, and begged leave, in justice to his own character, to observe, 'That such a reflection came with a very bad grace from any man who sat in that Court, which, under God, owed its existence to his interposition; that if ever, in any one instance, his zeal had carried him beyond the bounds of discretion, it was in favour of the Church of Scotland; and that he never received a frown from the greatest and best of masters, but once, and that was on her account (m).'

(m) Life of Carstares, ubi supra, p. 51—64.

It would extend this article to too great a length, were we to mention distinctly every political transaction in which Mr. Carstares was engaged. It must suffice, therefore, to observe, that during the period of King William's reign, he had, by his intimate friendship with the Earl of Portland, and by his personal favour with his master, the chief direction of Scottish affairs; and was considered by his correspondents, as a kind of Viceroy for Scotland. Lord Portland's letters to him are full of the warmest expressions of affection and esteem. Another eminent person, with whom Mr. Carstares cultivated a particular friendship, during his residence at Court, was the famous Mr. Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, and Lord High Treasurer of England. His correspondence with this gentleman, began before the latter was brought into administration by King William; and it was continued in Queen Anne's reign, chiefly with relation to the settlement of the Protestant succession, the union of the kingdoms, and the management of the Church of Scotland. Mr. Carstares, though firmly attached servants in Scotland might find it their interest to impose upon his Majesty, to screen themselves from his merited displeasure. Others might, under the mask of zeal for his service, seek only to gratify their own private resentments; and, whilst they pretended to conciliate all parties to his government, might pursue such measures as would only unite them in opposing it.

" That this was the foundation of all those factions which had hitherto rent that kingdom, and made its crown sit so uneasy upon his head: That, for his own part, he could call God to witness, that, ever since he entered into his Majesty's service, he had no interest, for he could have none, separate from that of his master: That, though he had been educated a Presbyterian, and, on that account, had a natural bias to this form of Church-government; yet his Majesty knew, that, when he recommended the establishment of Presbytery in Scotland, he did it, because he was firmly persuaded the Presbyterians were the only friends his Majesty had in that country: That his regard to their principles had not rendered him blind to their faults: That he had been aware of the indiscreet use they would make of the liberal concessions in their favour in Lord Melvil's Parliament, and had freely given his sentiments upon that head: That, with the same freedom, he had remonstrated against the precipitate measures adopted in the last session of Parliament, under the pretext of correcting the errors of the former: That the effects had justified his opinion of both. The first had alienated all the Episcopals, the last, great part of the Presbyterians, from his administration. One thing alone was wanting to complete the wishes of his enemies, and that was, to cement the two parties by one common bond of union: That nothing could be better calculated for this purpose, than the advice which had been given to his Majesty to push the administration of the oaths to the Ministers before the sitting down of the assembly: That, although there was nothing unreasonable in what his Majesty required, yet some who had credit with them had fallen upon methods to represent their compliance as inconsistent with their principles, and had been so far successful, that they were determined not to comply: That, however unjustifiable in other respects their conduct might be, it proceeded from no disaffection to his person and government; and that, whilst this was the case, it was more for his Majesty's interest to confirm their attachment, by dispensing with the rigour of the law, than to lose their affections by enforcing it. What avail oaths and promises to a Prince, when he has lost the hearts of his subjects? Now was the time, therefore, to retrieve his affairs in that kingdom: That, by countermanding the instructions he had sent down to his commissioner, he conferred the highest obligations upon the whole body of the Presbyterian Clergy, gratified all his friends in that kingdom, and effectually thwarted the insidious arts of his and their enemies (4)."

(4) Carstares's Life, p. 59, 60.

to

to the Whigs, could not bear any perſonal reflections againſt the Earl of Oxford, or any intimations that he would be in the leaſt acceſſary to the deſign of ſetting aſide the ſucceſſion in the Houſe of Hanover. This ſucceſſion the Earl had been greatly concerned in eſtabliſhing; and, therefore, it was the leſs likely that he ſhould be deſirous of overturning a ſettlement, to which he had contributed with ſo much apparent ſincerity and zeal. The principal correſpondents of Mr. Carſtares in Scotland, were, James Johnſon, Secretary of State; his brother Alexander Johnſon; Lord Tarbat; Sir James Ogilvie, afterwards Earl of Seafield; Sir James Stewart, Lord Advocate; the Earl of Marchmont; the Dukes of Queenſbury and Argyle; Lord Carmichael; Cockburn of Ormiſton; and Murray of Philiphaugh. Many other perſons, likewiſe, of eminence, wrote and applied to him on various occaſions. As Mr. Carſtares's Scotch correſpondence was carried on at a moſt intereſting period, and when faction raged in all its violence, it exhibits a juſt picture of the ſtate of the nation in general, and an exact portrait of the chief characters who acted their part in the ſeveral ſcenes to which it relates. The game which he had to play was a difficult one, and he managed it with ſkill and addreſs. Whilſt all parties poured out their complaints to him as their friend, and laid their ſeveral pretenſions before him, none of them ever accuſed him of partiality or neglect. It was not, however, poſſible, that, with ſo great a ſhare of power and influence, Mr. Carſtares ſhould eſcape creating the envy of ſome who were ſuperior to him in rank and fortune. This tax, the uſual concomitant of diſtinguiſhed merit, he chearfully paid. Amongſt his friends, he uſed to divert himſelf with aſſuming the title of Cardinal, which certain of his enemies had beſtowed upon him, in alluſion to Cardinal Ximenes, who boaſted that he could play at foot-ball with the heads of the Caſtilian Grandees. The adverſaries of Mr. Carſtares attempted, on different occaſions, though wholly without ſucceſs, to ſupplant him in his Royal Maſter's favour. The longer that Monarch knew him, the more highly he eſteemed him; nor was he ever ſo much conſulted by his Majeſty, as between the time of the Earl of Portland's retirement from buſineſs and the King's death. The laſt event affected him in ſo ſenſible a manner, that he could never afterwards ſpeak of it, or hear it mentioned, without a ſenſible concern. It is greatly to the honour of Mr. Carſtares, that he was a man of ſuch a diſintereſted temper, as to pay no attention to his private fortune. With the faireſt opportunities of acquiring wealth, he was left, at his Maſter's deceaſe, as poor as when he firſt entered into his ſervice; and this, we are told, was a circumſtance which never gave him one moment's uneaſineſs (n).

(n) Ibid. p. 64—68.

The connection of Mr. Carſtares with public buſineſs, which had been entirely founded on his perſonal favour with King William, in a great meaſure ceaſed upon that Monarch's demiſe. However, he was of too much conſequence to government to be wholly forgotten or neglected in the ſucceeding reign. Queen Anne, without any ſolicitation, nominated him to be her Chaplain for Scotland, with the ſame appointments which had been annexed to that office by her predeceſſor. About this time, there was a vacancy in the College of Edinburgh, by the death of Dr. Rule, the Principal of the Univerſity. The ſtation, though far from being lucrative, was, on ſeveral accounts, a ſtation of conſiderable honour and reſpect, as well as of uſefulneſs; and Mr. Carſtares received an invitation to accept of it, which was ſupported by the united ſolicitations of all his friends in Scotland. After ſome deliberation and heſitation, he yielded to their importunity, and was admitted, in 1704, Principal of the College, and firſt Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Edinburgh. In this public character, it ſoon appeared to the world, that his employment as a Stateſman had not excluded his literary purſuits. In his firſt Oration, which was pronounced before a numerous and reſpectable audience, he diſplayed ſuch a fund of erudition, ſuch a thorough acquaintance with claſſical learning, ſuch a maſterly talent for compoſition, and ſuch eaſe, fluency, and purity in the uſe of the Latin tongue as delighted his hearers. It was the obſervation of the famous Dr. Pitcairn, whoſe claſſic elegance and taſte are ſo well known, that, when Mr. Carſtares began to addreſs his auditors, he could not help fancying himſelf tranſported to the forum in the days of ancient Rome. The new Principal was no ſooner placed at the head of the Univerſity, than by the gentleneſs and affability of his manners, united with a becoming dignity of deportment, he ſecured both the affection and the reſpect of the maſters and ſtudents. The ſalaries of the ſeveral regents being at that time extremely ſmall, he immediately formed a ſcheme for getting them augmented. For this purpoſe he made a journey to London, and exerted his influence with Queen Anne and her Miniſters, to obtain a gift out of the Biſhop's rents, to all the Univerſities of Scotland. At length he ſucceeded, and the Queen left the diſtribution of her Royal Bounty to the Univerſity of Edinburgh ſolely to his diſpoſal. With his uſual generoſity, he refuſed to appropriate any part of it to the augmentation of his own ſalary. In other reſpects he manifeſted his zeal to promote the intereſts of the learned Seminary over which he preſided (o) In the ſame year in which Mr. Carſtares was appointed Principal of the College of Edinburgh, he received an unanimous call to be one of the Miniſters of that city. This invitation he accepted, and he diſcharged the duties of the paſtoral office

(o) Ibid. p. 63—71.

with

with great fidelity and diligence. It is underſtood that his ſermons were generally eſteemed, although he had been a conſiderable time out of the habit of preaching. He had ſuch a comprehenſive view of the general ſubjects of religion, and ſo happy a talent of arranging his ideas, that this part of his duty was performed by him with facility. An inſtance of it will be inſerted below [E]. The firſt general aſſembly which met after Mr. Carſtares became a member of the Church of Scotland, made choice of him for their Moderator. This honour was conferred upon him no leſs than four ſeveral times in the ſpace of eleven years; and it was an honour to which he was juſtly entitled, by his ſervices to the Church, and by his abilities for commanding the reſpect, and moderating the heats of ſo numerous, and in thoſe days, ſo turbulent a judicatory. His manner of ſpeaking, in conjunction with his influence over the moſt conſiderable members of the aſſembly, gave great weight to his opinion in every debate. The authority which he had acquired, he knew well how to maintain: in matters of ſmaller moment, he ſeldom ſpoke at all; and in buſineſs of conſequence, he ſpoke only in the cloſe of the debate. By thus preſerving his influence in the Church, he rendered himſelf of real importance in the State, and preſerved his intereſt with the Court to the laſt. When the negotiation for the union of the two kingdoms was in agitation, his conduct was of ſignal ſervice to Government. There was nothing done with regard to that important tranſaction, in which he was not conſulted. It was well underſtood by Queen Anne and her Miniſters, that if the Preſbyterian Clergy had ſtated themſelves in formal oppoſition to the treaty, it could not have taken effect; and it was equally known, that the intended remonſtrances and complaints of the Clergy to Parliament againſt that meaſure, were chiefly, if not ſolely, prevented by the influence of Mr. Carſtares. The Queen was ſo ſatisfied with his good offices on this occaſion, that, upon his going to London the year after, ſhe took an opportunity of returning thanks to him in private; and, at the ſame time, preſented him with a ſilver medal, ſtruck on occaſion of the union—a very few of which ſhe had ordered to be caſt off for her particular friends (p).

(p) Life of Carſtares, ubi ſupra, p. 71—78.

One of the conſequences ariſing from the union of the two kingdoms, was, that the Church of Scotland, from that time, loſt much of its importance in the eye of Government. The General Aſſembly ceaſed likewiſe to be ſo formidable to Adminiſtration, as from the revolution it had conſtantly been. To all this was added, that Adminiſtration, during the latter end of Queen Anne's reign, had no diſpoſition to favour the claims of the Preſbyterian eſtabliſhment. Theſe circumſtances, however, did not teach the Scottiſh Clergy that prudence and moderation, which the delicate ſituation they were placed in required. They continued, with their uſual violence, to carry on proſecutions againſt the epiſcopal miniſters, ſome of whom, upon the moſt frivolous pretexts, were turned out of their livings. Mr. Carſtares endeavoured, though in vain, to reſtrain the bigotry of his rigid brethren, and to prevent them from giving any juſt occaſion of offence to government. On this account, ſo high did the ſpirit of party run, that, although he was the moſt reſpectable, he was, perhaps, the moſt unpopular Clergyman in the Church. He uſed frequently to complain of it, as a peculiar hardſhip, that he was forced, firſt to draw on himſelf the cenſure of his brethren by encountering their prejudices, and putting a ſtop to their violent proceedings; and then to juſtify to adminiſtration, thoſe very meaſures which he had diſapproved, and unſucceſsfully attempted to fruſtrate. His condeſcenſion, in this reſpect, might poſſibly be carried too far; and his conduct with regard to the two bills for the reſtoration of patronages, and the toleration of the epiſcopal Clergy of Scotland. we can by no means commend. When theſe acts were brought into Parliament, Mr. Carſtares was one of the agents ſent up to London to oppoſe them, and he appears to have done it with ſincerity. Whatever [E] An inſtance of it will be inſerted below.] "About the time of the union, a national faſt had been appointed, which the violent oppoſers of that ſcheme amongſt the Clergy would not obſerve, as they could not approve the reaſons for which it was appointed. Mr. Carſtares had given his advice againſt the appointment; but, as a zealous friend of the union, he obſerved the faſt. His colleague, who was equally zealous in his oppoſition to that meaſure, not only refuſed to obſerve it, but next Sunday took occaſion, in the forenoon-ſermon, to throw out ſome bitter reflections upon the union in general, and upon certain contrivers and promoters of it in particular; who, he alledged, were traitors to their country and to the Church of Scotland, although ſome of them were Miniſters of that Church, and had too great influence over their deluded brethren.

"As this violent attack was directly pointed at Mr. Carſtares, it fixed the whole eyes of the congregation upon him, whilſt, with great compoſure, he began to turn over the leaves of his Bible. His colleague's diſcourſe being conſidered by the people as a formal challenge to Mr. Caſtares to vindicate his conduct, a great crowd from all corners of the city were aſſembled to hear him in the afternoon, when he gave out for his ſubject theſe words of the Pſalmiſt, Let the righteous ſmite me, it will not break my bones. From which he took occaſion, with great calmneſs of temper, to vindicate his colleague from any ſuſpicion of being deficient in point of regard and affection for him: That difference in opinion was the natural effect of the weakneſs and corruption of the human mind: That, though he differed from him in his ſentiments upon ſome points, yet he was ſure both of them had the ſame end in view: And that, as he knew the uprightneſs of his colleague's intentions, and the goodneſs of his heart, he was determined to conſider any admonitions or rebukes directed to himſelf from that place as the ſtrongeſt expreſſions of his love.

"This diſcourſe had a wonderful effect upon the whole audience: It effectually obliterated every prejudice they had conceived againſt him; obliged his colleague to confeſs, that he had obtained a complete victory; and that ſo ſoft an anſwer had turned away wrath (5)."

(5) Life of Carſtares, ubi ſupra, p. 72, 73.

reaſons he might have found to change his opinion concerning patronage, the abolition of which he had diſliked at the time of the Revolution, his oppoſition to the law of toleration was the indication of a narrow mind. He was, indeed, carried away with the terrors which had ſeized the generality of his brethren, who conſidered the acts in queſtion as preludes to the reſtoration of Prelacy and the Pretender. But no apprehenſions of this kind ought to have prevailed againſt complying with the dictates of reaſon, of juſtice, of humanity, and of the Chriſtian Religion. Although Mr. Carſtares was happily unſucceſsful in the commiſſion entruſted to him [F], his preſence in London was of conſiderable ſervice to the Church of Scotland. It gave him an opportunity of defeating certain projects which would have been really hurtful to the power of that Church. It was propoſed by ſome of the adminiſtration, to diſcontinue her annual aſſemblies, or, if they met, to prorogue them, as ſoon as they were conſtituted; and a bill was talked of, which ſhould take away the only pretext for holding them for the future. Mr. Carſtares, therefore, wiſely thought proper to compound matters with Queen Anne's Miniſtry; and, upon condition that he might be authoriſed to aſſure his brethren, that no attempt would be made to introduce any alterations in the government or diſcipline of the church, he undertook to uſe all his influence to allay the ferments which the late proceedings in Parliament had occaſioned. In theſe endeavours he was remarkably ſucceſsful. The Queen and the Adminiſtration were aſtoniſhed at the peaceable temper of the next general aſſembly; and expreſſed, by various letters, their approbation of Mr. Carſtares's prudent management. So great a reſpect was retained for him by the Engliſh Court, that, before the meeting of the aſſembly in 1713, he was deſired, by the Earl of Oxford, to name whom he would chuſe to be commiſſioner, and to ſend up a copy of ſuch inſtructions as he judged to be ſeaſonable at that juncture. This was accordingly done by him; and the Duke of Athol, whom he recommended as a proper perſon, was appointed to the office (q).

(q) Ibid. p. 78—85.

All this time, Mr. Carſtares was remarkably active in expreſſing his zeal for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion in the Houſe of Hanover. He had been inſtrumental, in 1711, in procuring the order for prayers to be put up in the Churches of Scotland, for the Princeſs Sophia and her family. Every addreſs of the general aſſemblies, till the demiſe of the Queen, was full of the warmeſt proteſtations of their inviolable attachment to the ſucceſſion eſtabliſhed by law; and they were among the foremoſt in their congratulations of King George the Firſt, upon his coming to the Crown. The addreſs on that occaſion was drawn up by Mr. Carſtares. His Majeſty, two years before his arrival in England, had ſignified by a letter from his Secretary, his acknowledgments to our Divine for the part he had acted; and continued him in the office of Chaplain for Scotland. This office Mr. Carſtares did not live long to enjoy. In the month of Auguſt, 1715, he was ſeized with an apoplectic fit, which gave ſuch a ſhock to his conſtitution, as impaired his faculties, and carried him off, on the 28th day of the following December, in the 66th or 67th year of his age, being lamented by his country as a true patriot; by the Church, as her beſt benefactor; and by the Univerſity, as her greateſt ornament. Mr. Carſtares's private character was, in every view of it, amiable and reſpectable. His religion was not tinctured with the extravagancies of enthuſiaſm, or debaſed by the rigours of ſuperſtition. He was diſtinguiſhed for his diſcharge of the duties of hoſpitality; and his charity was unbounded. Such of the epiſcopal Clergy as had been deprived of their

(7) Life o
ſtares, p. 9

[F] Mr. Carſtares was happily unſucceſsful in the commiſſion entruſted to him.] The advantages which have ariſen from the patronage and toleration acts, are thus repreſented by Dr. Mac Cormick. "The experience of ſixty years has at laſt evinced, what it was impoſſible for human ſagacity then to diſcover, that the act of toleration, and the act reſtoring patronages, which were conſidered by the friends of the Church of Scotland as fatal to her intereſts, and which were probably intended as the preludes to greater changes, have proved the ſource of her greateſt ſecurity, and the remedy of thoſe evils which Mr. Carſtares dreaded moſt from the conceſſions in favour of Preſbytery at the revolution.

"Upon the one hand, the act of toleration, by taking the weapon of offence out of the hands of the Preſbyterians, removed the chief ground of thoſe reſentments which the friends of Prelacy entertained againſt them, and, in a few years, almoſt annihilated Epiſcopacy in Scotland. Upon the other hand, the act reſtoring patronages, by reſtoring the nobility and gentlemen of property to their wonted influence in the ſettlement of the Clergy, reconciled numbers of them to the eſtabliſhed Church, who had conceived the moſt violent prejudices againſt that mode of election, and againſt the Preſbyterian Clergy who were ſettled upon it. It is likewiſe an inconteſtible fact, that, from the date of theſe two acts, the Church of Scotland has enjoyed a ſtate of tranquillity to which ſhe was an utter ſtranger before.

"There is another advantage flowing from the act of toleration, which it was impoſſible to foreſee, viz. that the very people, whoſe principles led them moſt eagerly to oppoſe it, have derived the greateſt, if not the ſole, benefit from it. For, although the act was certainly intended for no other purpoſe but to give relief to thoſe of the Epiſcopal perſuaſion, who judged themſelves aggrieved by the Church-judicatories in Scotland; yet, by the moderation of the Church ſince that period, and by the lenity of Adminiſtration, Diſſenters of every denomination have been permitted to take the benefit of that ſtatute without any moleſtation; and long may they continue to enjoy it unmoleſted! It will give a ſenſible pleaſure to every worthy member of the Church of Scotland, to reflect, that, whilſt his diſſenting brethren vie with him in loyalty to his Sovereign, and attachment to the civil conſtitution, they enjoy at leaſt a legal protection in the exerciſe of their religion. That man is unworthy of thoſe privileges which belong to members of an eſtabliſhment, who can grudge his fellow-citizens thoſe rights which belong to them as men and as Chriſtians (6)."

(6) Life of Mr. Carſtares, p. 85, 86.

livings

livings at the Revolution, he always treated with peculiar tenderneſs and humanity. He often relieved their families when in diſtreſs, and was ſolicitous to diſpenſe his benefactions in the manner that would be the leaſt offenſive to the delicacy of their feelings. His ingenuity was ſometimes exerciſed, in deviſing methods of impoſing upon the modeſty and pride of ſuch as would have rejected his good offices with diſdain, if he had not diſguiſed his intentions [G]. Several of the epiſcopal Clergy, who were his annual penſioners, never knew from what channel their relief flowed, till they found by his death that the ſource of it was dried up. The body of Mr. Carſtares was interred in the Gray-friars Church-yard, Edinburgh; where a monument was erected ſome time after, with a ſuitable inſcription in Latin. The inſcription already begins to wear out; but his eulogium was pronounced, long before his deceaſe, by King William; who, in the preſence of ſeveral of his courtiers, declared, "That he had known Mr. Carſtares long: That he knew him well; and knew him to be an [H] HONEST MAN (r)."] K.

(r) Life of Carſtares, ubi ſupra, p. 80—91.

[G] If he had not diſguiſed his intentions.] An inſtance, out of many that are told of him, is given by Dr. Mac Cormick. "One Caddel, an ejected Epiſcopal Clergyman, ſometimes waited upon him when he came to Edinburgh. One day, when Caddel came to call upon him, he obſerved that his cloaths were threadbare; and, eying him narrowly as he went away, he deſired him to call again two days after, pretending he had ſome commiſſion to give him before he went to the country. He was no ſooner gone, than Mr. Carſtares ſent for his taylor, and deſired him to make a ſuit of cloaths that would anſwer himſelf as to length, but not ſo wide by two or three inches, and to have them ſent home about the hour at which Caddel had engaged to call upon him. Caddel kept his appointment; but, upon entering the room, found Mr. Carſtares in a violent fit of paſſion at his taylor for miſtaking his meaſure, ſo that neither coat, waiſtcoat, nor breeches, would ſit upon him. At laſt, turning to Caddel, who agreed with him that it was impoſſible he could ever wear them; then, ſays he, they are loſt if they don't fit ſome of my friends; and, by the bye, adds he, I am not ſure but they may anſwer you: be ſo good as try, for it is a pity they ſhould be thrown away. Caddel complied, after ſome importunity; and, to his ſurprize, found they anſwered as if they had been made for him; upon which Mr. Carſtares ordered the cloaths to be packed up, and ſent to his lodgings. Next day, upon putting them on, he found a ten pound note in one of the pockets, which he naturally imagined Mr. Carſtares had forgot to take out when he threw off the cloaths. Returning directly to the College, he told Mr. Carſtares, he had come to reſtore him a note, which he had neglected to take out of the pocket of the ſuit of cloaths he had ſent him. By no means, ſays he, Caddel, it cannot belong to me; for when you got the coat you acquired a right to every thing in it (7)." Without derogating from the delicacy of Mr. Carſtares's generoſity, we can ſcarcely help thinking, that there was ſomething too operoſe, and full of contrivance, in this method of proceeding; ſomething which indicated that circuitous turn of mind, ſo habitual to a Stateſman. He might, otherwiſe, as in the caſes mentioned above, have ſupplied Mr. Caddel's neceſſities, without letting him know his benefactor. The exerciſe of ſo much ingenuity, almoſt puts us in mind of the political Lady in Young's Satires;

(7) Life of Carſtares, p. 90, 91.

Nor takes her tea without a ſtratagem.

[H] In 1774, were printed, in one volume quarto, "State Papers and Letters, addreſſed to William "Carſtares, confidential Secretary to King William, "during the whole of his Reign; afterwards Prin"cipal of the Univerſity of Edinburgh, relating to "public Affairs in GREAT-BRITAIN, but more par"ticularly in SCOTLAND, during the Reigns of "King William and Queen Anne. To which is "prefixed, the Life of Mr. Carſtares. Publiſhed "from the Originals, by Joſeph Mac Cormick, D. D. "Miniſter at Preſtonpans." To this publication we are wholly indebted for the materials of the preſent article.

"The life of Mr. Carſtares is followed by an abſtract of the Hiſtory of the Stateſmen, whoſe letters are contained in this publication. This abſtract, which is an agreeable appendage to the work, is taken from a manuſcript communicated by the Earl of Hyndford to the publiſher. It ſeems to have been written in the year 1704, or in the beginning of 1705, although there are ſome additions to it of a poſterior date, and in a different hand. The author intended it for the private uſe of the Princeſs Sophia, and the Elector of Hanover.

"The perſons, of whom a ſhort account and character are here given, are, Secretary Johnſton; the Earl of Argyle; Secretary Ogilvy, afterwards Earl of Seafield, Lord High Chancellor of Scotland; Lord Tarbat; the Earl of Melville; Sir James Stewart, Lord Advocate; the Duke of Queenſberry; the Earl of Tullibardine; the Marquis of Annandale; the Earl of Stair; Cockburn of Ormiſton; Murray of Philliphaugh; Mr. Carſtares; the Earl of Marchmont; Sir Hugh Dalrymple, Preſident of the Court of Seſſion; and Andrew Fletcher of Salton. Though the laſt-named gentleman bore no part in the correſpondence now publiſhed, Dr. Mac Cormick juſtly obſerves, that his character merits a place in a work intended to illuſtrate the hiſtory of a period in which he made ſo great a figure.

"This collection of letters and papers includes a period of more than twenty years; beginning in the latter end of 1689, and ending in 1711. Something of Argyle's correſpondence with Monmouth, Ruſſel, and the excluſioners is prefixed; but it is ſo obſcured by the cyphers, and the intelligence communicated by it is ſo inſignificant in itſelf, that, perhaps, it might well have been ſpared.

"Though the papers in the preſent publication extend to the year 1711, the far greater part of them relate only to the reign of King William. The letters are very few after the deceaſe of that Monarch, except about the time of the union, when they become more numerous.

"From the papers here given, a good account might be extracted of the affairs of Scotland, from the acceſſion of King William to his death. We ſee the various meaſures of Adminiſtration, and the different views of the parties and factions into which the country was divided. We have, in particular, a full detail of the proceedings and management of the Scotch Parliaments; and may perceive, that the arts of cajolement and corruption were not then unknown. Many of the letters diſplay the private concerns, pretenſions, jealouſies, rivalſhips, and diſlikes of Mr. Carſtares's correſpondents; and it is apparent, that perſons who were very oppoſite to one another, did not ſcruple to write their ſentiments freely to him, having a great confidence in his wiſdom and integrity.

"The papers relative to the two affairs of Glenco and Darien, form no inconſiderable part of the collection. In brief, this work exhibits a juſt picture of the politics and principles of the leading men in Scotland, at the period to which it is confined. On all theſe accounts, it may be deemed intereſting to North Britons; and, in ſeveral reſpects, it will ſerve to gratify the hiſtorical curioſity of the Engliſh reader. But, after all, it will not, we think, be regarded, in general, as peculiarly important or entertaining. Neither the facts here communicated, nor the manner in which moſt of the letters are written, are ſuch as will excite univerſal attention.

"Mr. Carſtares's correſpondence, though chiefly, was not wholly confined to the Stateſmen of Scotland.

land. There are two letters to him from Lord Sunderland, ſeven from the Earl of Portland, and the ſame number from Robert Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford (8)."

(8) The preceding extract is from another publication, by the writer of the preſent article.

Beſides the letters of Mr. Harley, publiſhed in the collection, three others are inſerted in Dr. Mac Cormick's life of Mr. Carſtares. A tranſcript of one of them will probably be acceptable to our readers, ſome of whom will undoubtedly ſmile at the religious ſpirit with which it is written. Whether the language uſed in it was intended to pleaſe Mr. Carſtares as a Preſbyterian Clergyman, or whether it aroſe from the Earl of Oxford's puritanical education, we leave others to determine.

" SIR, 8th May, 1711.

" Although I have not recovered ſufficient ſtrength to reſiſt the attacks of the ill weather we have had ſince I have been abroad, yet I cannot longer delay my acknowledgments to you for your moſt chriſtian and affectionate letter. I do not doubt but I have had the advantage of your prayers; for which I return you my hearty thanks, and deſire their continuance. My ſole view is, the ſervice and glory of God, and the peace and happineſs of the Queen and country. My daily ſupplications are, that he who hath delivered my ſoul from death, would keep my feet from falling, that I may walk before him; and that he would guide me in his truth, and teach me the way wherein he would have me to walk.

" I did intend you a much longer letter; but my cold makes writing uneaſy to me at preſent; therefore I muſt refer what I would ſay to another time. But I cannot omit aſſuring you, that the Queen, and all who have the honour to have credit with her Majeſty, are not only reſolved to maintain the union in all its parts, both religious and civil, but there will be no attention given to any propoſals which may juſtly alarm your friends; and, particularly, as to that affair of patronages, it was never entertained, and was really an invention, ſuggeſted to two raſh perſons, with a deſign to create jealouſies; but it never was in the leaſt countenanced or entertained. As to the penſions; I have laid your deſire before the Queen, who has commanded me to ſignify to you her pleaſure, that ſhe intends to continue the ſame payments to the Univerſities. I doubt not you will continue your beſt endeavours to calm the ſpirits of people in the aſſembly, that they may give no occaſion to blaſpheme; and I am confident, they will have no juſt grounds to apprehend any danger from hence. I am, with great ſincerity, Reverend Sir, your's, &c. (9)" (9) Carſtares's Life, p. 81, 82.

This collection of State Papers and Letters doth not tend to inſpire us with any exalted opinion of the great men who flouriſhed in Scotland, at and after the revolution. Some of them, however, appear to have been perſons of integrity. It is to be feared, that a minute examination of the characters of Stateſmen, of whatever age or country, will not greatly redound to the honour of human nature in general, or to the credit of Courts in particular; which will be found, at all times, to have been powerful corruptors of patriotiſm and virtue.

(a) For the materials of this article we are indebted to Mr. Nichols, who obliged us with the proof ſheets of the quarto edition of his Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, not then publiſhed.

 [CARTE (THOMAS) (a) a very learned and laborious hiſtorian in the preſent century, was born at Clifton upon Dunſmoor, in Warwickſhire; at which place his father, the Rev. Samuel Carte, at that time reſided as Vicar [A]; and was baptized there by immerſion, on the 23d of April, 1686. If this account be exact, his progreſs in grammatical learning muſt have been very rapid and extraordinary; for it appears that he was admitted a member of Univerſity College (b), in Oxford, and matriculated on the fourth day of July 1698, having then not long entered into the thirteenth year of his age. He took his degree of Bachelor of Arts on the 25th of January 1702; after which he was incorporated at Cambridge, where he became Maſter of Arts in 1706. All this, if his baptiſm quickly ſucceeded his birth, muſt have been tranſacted when he was little more than twenty years old. In due time he entered into holy orders; and the only notice we find of any preferment he received, is, that he was appointed reader of the Abbey Church at Bath. Whilſt he was in this ſituation, he preached a ſermon, on the 30th of January, 1713-14, in which he took occaſion to vindicate King Charles the Firſt from the aſperſions that have been caſt upon that unhappy Monarch with regard to the Iriſh rebellion. This drew Mr. Carte into a controverſy with Mr. Chandler, a diſſenting miniſter at Bath, and father of the celebrated Dr. Samuel Chandler. The diſpute gave riſe to our Hiſtorian's firſt publication, which was entitled, " The Iriſh " Maſſacre ſet in a clear light; wherein Mr. Baxter's account of it in the hiſtory of his " own life, and the abridgment thereof by Dr. Calamy, are fully conſidered; together " with two letters from Mr. Chandler, reviving the aforeſaid account, to the Rev. Mr. " Thomas Carte, at Bath; with his two replies to Mr. Chandler." This is inſerted in the collection called Somers's Tracts. Upon the acceſſion of King George the Firſt to the Crown, Mr. Carte's principles not permitting him to take the oaths to the new government, he aſſumed a lay habit. What particular concern he had in the rebellion of 1715 does not appear; but that he had ſome degree of guilt in this reſpect, or, at leaſt, that he was ſtrongly ſuſpected of it by adminiſtration, is evident, from the King's troops having (b) It is ſaid, that he afterwards removed to Braſenoſe College.

[A] At which place his father, the Rev. Samuel Carte, at that time reſided as Vicar.] Samuel Carte was the ſon of Thomas Carte, a Clothier at Coventry, where he was born October 21, 1652, and in the Free-ſchool of which place he received his grammatical education. From that ſchool he was removed to Magdalen College, Oxford, where he took both his degree of Bachelor of Arts, 1672; and Maſter of Arts, 1675. After he entered into holy orders, he had ſeveral preferments, the chief of which were, a Prebend in the cathedral Church of Litchfield, the Rectory of Eaſtwell in Leiceſterſhire, and, laſt of all, the Vicarage of St. Martin's, in the town of Leiceſter. We ſuppoſe that he reſigned his preferments at the acceſſion of King George the Firſt, as at one time he aſſiſted the celebrated Jeremiah Collier, in preaching to a Nonjuring congregation in Broad-ſtreet, London. However, Mr. Samuel Carte ſeems to have ſpent the latter part of his life chiefly at Leiceſter, where he died, on the 16th of April, 1740, in the 87th year of his age. A high, and, we doubt not, a juſt character is given of him, in an inſcription to his memory in the chancel of St. Martin's church. He publiſhed two Sermons, and " Tabula chronologica Archiepiſcopatuum & Epiſ- " copatuum in Anglia & Wallia, Ortus, Diviſiones, " Tranſlationes, &c. breviter exhibens; una cum " Indice alphabetico Nominum, quibus apud Au- " thores inſigniuntur." Folio, without date. He left, likewiſe, a ſmall manuſcript, concerning the antiquities of Leiceſter. A more compleat enumeration of particulars concerning him, may be ſeen in the Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer.

having orders to diſcover and apprehend him. He had the good fortune to elude their ſearch, by concealing himſelf at Coleſhill, Warwickſhire, in the houſe of a Clergyman, Mr. Badger, then Curate of that town. Mr. Carte himſelf officiated for a time as Curate in the ſame place; after which, it is certain that he acted as Secretary to the celebrated Biſhop Atterbury *. This connection threw him into freſh difficulties. So deeply was he thought to be engaged in the conſpiracy aſcribed to that eminent prelate, that a charge of high treaſon was brought againſt him; and a proclamation was iſſued, on the 13th of Auguſt, 1722, offering a reward of a thouſand pounds for ſeizing his perſon. He was again ſucceſsful in making his eſcape, and fled into France, where he reſided ſeveral years, under the borrowed name of Philips. Whilſt Mr. Carte continued in that country, he was introduced to the principal men of learning and family, and gained acceſs to the moſt eminent libraries, public and private, by which means he was enabled to collect large materials for illuſtrating an Engliſh edition of Thuanus. The collection was in ſuch forwardneſs in 1724, that he conſulted Dr. Mead, at that time the great patron of literary undertakings, on the mode of publication. The Doctor, who perceived that the plan might be rendered more extenſively uſeful, obtained Mr. Carte's materials at a very conſiderable price, and engaged Mr. Buckley in the noble edition of Thuanus [B], in ſeven volumes, folio, which was compleated in 1733. Whilſt this grand work was carrying on, Queen Caroline, whoſe regard to men of letters is well known, received ſuch favourable impreſſions of Mr. Carte, that ſhe obtained permiſſion for his returning to England in ſecurity; which he did ſome time between the years 1728 and 1730. He had not long been reſtored to his own country, before he engaged in one of the moſt important of his works, "The Hiſtory of the life of James "Duke of Ormonde, from his birth in 1610, to his death in 1688." This work is extended to three volumes folio. The third volume, which contains a collection of letters written by the Kings Charles the Firſt and Second, the Duke of Ormonde, the Secretaries of State, the Marquis of Clanrickarde, and ſeveral eminent men beſides, during the troubles of Great-Britain and Ireland, and which was intended to verify and clear up the matters related in the hiſtory, was printed and publiſhed firſt, that the references to the proper pages of it might be made in the other volumes. It came out in 1735, and the firſt and ſecond volumes appeared in 1736. Allowance being made for Mr. Carte's attachment to arbitrary principles of government, and for his predilection in favour of his Hero, whoſe abilities and talents he ſomewhat exaggerates, it muſt be acknowledged, that his Hiſtory of the Duke of Ormonde is a very valuable and uſeful performance [C]. It throws much light on the tranſactions of the time, and particularly on the affairs of Ireland; upon which account it hath been of ſignal ſervice to Dr. Leland, in the third volume of his Hiſtory of that country. From a letter of Mr. Carte's to Dr. Swift (c), dated Auguſt the 11th, 1736, it appears that, in writing the life of the Duke of Ormonde, he had availed himſelf of ſome inſtructions which he had derived from the Dean. In the ſame letter, he mentions his deſign of compoſing a general Hiſtory of England, and finds great fault not only with Rapin de Thoyras, but with Rymer's Fœdera. His accuſations of that noble collection, are in ſeveral reſpects miſtaken and groundleſs. It is highly probable, that the ſucceſs and popularity of Rapin's Hiſtory, gave conſiderable diſguſt to Mr. Carte and other gentlemen of the ſame principles, and ſuggeſted the ſcheme of a new undertaking. It is evident, from ſome letters † written about this time to Dr. Zachary Grey by our author, that he laid a great ſtreſs upon that part of his life of the Duke of Ormonde which vindicated King Charles the Firſt, in his tranſactions with the Earl of Glamorgan, and which brought a charge of forgery againſt

* It appears, by a report of the Houſe of Commons, that he ſucceeded Kelly in that office; and that a riotous election at Coventry had been greatly animated by Carte.

(c) Swift's works, vol. xxiv. p. 30—33. 24mo edition.

† Preſerved in the Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer.

[B] And engaged Mr. Buckley in the noble edition of Thuanus.] Mr. Carte himſelf would probably have been the principal editor, if he had not been abroad in exile at the time when the undertaking commenced. The Latin addreſs to Dr. Mead, prefixed to that work, and dated from the Inner Temple, 7 Kal. Jan. 1733, was ſigned Thomas Carte. It might poſſibly receive ſome corrections from Profeſſor Ward, who tranſlated into neat and perſpicuous Latin, Mr. Buckley's three introductory letters. Mr. Buckley, in one of his letters, expreſſes his particular acknowledgments to Mr. Carte, for having communicated his numerous collections from manuſcripts, and printed copies; for correcting the orthography of proper names; for his uſeful explanatory notes; for reviſing the life of Thuanus, and compiling the indexes. Mr. Buckley's words are as follow: "Variantes lectiones ex manuſcriptis cunctiſque editionibus collectas, & nominum proprierum interpretationes, Cartius in exemplari, quod prelo erat parandum, accurate deſcripſit. In quem finem dum totum opus evolvit, plurima quoque in utraque Genevenſi editione errata typographica correxit, notis etiam brevioribus in extrema pagina adſcriptis multa explicuit, & quædam emendavit. Ad hæc ingentem numerum propiorum nominum, quæ à Puteano prætermiſſa erant, ex auctoribus ipſis, unde narrationes ſuas hauſerat Thuanus, aliiſque illius ævi ſcriptoribus, interpretatus eſt. Qua in re de omnibus ſane eruditis, atque adeo de Thuano ipſo, optime meritus eſſe videtur.——Simile quoque ſtudium & induſtriam in vitâ auctoris recenſendâ idem vir doctus poſuit: quæ & in ſex hiſtoriæ tomorum, vitæque in ſeptimo tomo, indicibus quos conficere ſuſcepit eum adhibiturum pariter expectare licebit."

[C] Is a very uſeful and valuable performance.] Lord Orrery, in a letter to Mr. Carte, from Dublin, writes to him in the following terms. "Your Hiſtory is in great eſteem here. All ſides ſeem to like it. The Dean of St. Patrick's honours you with his approbation. Any name after his could not add to your ſatisfaction. But I may ſay, the worthy and the wiſe are with you to a man, and you have me into the bargain."

that Nobleman. But however well ſatisfied Mr. Carte might be with the arguments produced upon the ſubject, it is now certain that he was miſled. The authenticity of the commiſſion to the Earl of Glamorgan, hath lately been eſtabliſhed by the publication of the ſecond volume of the Clarendon State Papers, as we have had occaſion fully to ſhew in Dr. Birch's article (d). Some bookſellers of Dublin having formed a deſign of printing, in Ireland, a piratical edition of the Hiſtory of the Duke of Ormonde, Mr. Carte recollected an order of the Houſe of Lords, made in 1721, which was full to his purpoſe. By this order, which had been iſſued upon occaſion of Curll's publication of the Duke of Buckingham's writings, it was declared, that whoever ſhould preſume to print any account of the Life, the Letters, or other works of any deceaſed Peer, without the conſent of his heirs or executors, ſhould be puniſhed, as guilty of a breach of privilege of that Houſe. An atteſted copy of the order was carried by our Hiſtorian to the Earl of Arran, and his Lordſhip ſent it to his agent in Dublin, to ſerve upon the bookſellers concerned in the pirated impreſſion, and to diſcharge them in his name, from proceeding in the deſign. But as this was a remedy only in Mr. Carte's caſe, and ariſing from the particular nature of his work, he was very ſolicitous that a new act of parliament ſhould be paſſed, to ſecure the property of Authors in their writings, and drew up a paper recommending ſuch an act. Lord Cornbury, at the inſtance of the Univerſity of Oxford, had procured the draught of a bill to be prepared, which was approved by the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons; but we do not recollect that any farther meaſures were purſued in the affair. In April, 1738, Mr. Carte publiſhed, on a ſeparate ſheet, a general account of the neceſſary materials for a Hiſtory of England, of the ſociety and ſubſcriptions propoſed for defraying the expences of it, and the method in which he intended to proceed in carrying on the work. In the following October, he had obtained ſubſcriptions, or the promiſe of ſubſcriptions, to the amount of ſix hundred pounds a year. Not long after, he was at Cambridge, collecting materials for his Hiſtory, from the Univerſity and other libraries. Whilſt he was thus employed, his head quarters were at Madingley, the ſeat of Sir John Hinde Cotton, Bart. whoſe large collection of old pamphlets and journals, publiſhed during the grand civil war between 1639 and 1660, he methodized, and procured to be bound in a great number of volumes. On the 8th of March, 1744, a cauſe in Chancery was determined in his favour, againſt his brother Samuel and his ſiſter Sarah, with regard to a doubt concerning their father's will. Mr. Samuel Carte the elder, had made Thomas his eldeſt ſon executor and reſiduary legatee; but, in a clauſe added to the will, it was provided, that, if he ſhould be moleſted and proſecuted by the government, ſo as to incur a forfeiture, and be diſabled from diſcharging the duty of an executor, then Samuel and Sarah were to aſſume that office, and to poſſeſs what was given to Thomas. Not many weeks after, our Author, for what reaſons we know not, fell under the ſuſpicions of adminiſtration, and was taken into cuſtody, together with a Mr. Garth, at a time when the Habeas Corpus act was ſuſpended, in conſequence of ſome apprehended deſigns in favour of the Pretender. It is ſaid, that, whilſt he was under examination, the Duke of Newcaſtle aſked him if he was not a ‖ Biſhop; "No, my Lord Duke," replied Mr. Carte, "there are no Biſhops "in England but what are made by your Grace; and I am ſure I have no reaſon "to expect that honour." It is certain, that nothing material was diſcovered againſt him, for he was ſoon diſcharged out of cuſtody (e). This event did not detract from his popularity, or prevent his receiving great encouragement in his hiſtorical deſign. On the 18th of July (f), the court of Common Council of the city of London agreed, "to ſubſcribe fifty pounds a year for ſeven years to Mr. Carte, towards defray-"ing the expence of his writing the Hiſtory of England." In the next month was printed a collection of the ſeveral papers that had been publiſhed by him relative to his great work. On the 18th of October, the company of Goldſmiths voted twenty-five pounds a year, for ſeven years, towards defraying the expences of tranſcribing letters, negotiations, and other materials of the like nature; and, in the December following, the companies of Grocers and Vintners ſubſcribed twenty-five pounds a year each, to the ſame purpoſe. Propoſals for printing the Hiſtory were circulated in 1746, and the firſt volume of it, which concluded with the death of King John, was compleated in December 1747; when the credit of a work which had been uſhered into the world with ſo much preparation and expectation, and which had been ſupported by ſuch ample ſubſcriptions, was almoſt wholly overturned by a remarkable act of literary indiſcretion. As the firſt volume was confined to an early period of the Engliſh Annals, it might eaſily have been written without giving diſtinguiſhed offence to any party. But Mr. Carte, having taken occaſion to ſpeak of the unction of our Kings, and of the great effects annexed to it, (which ſection, and another on the cure of the King's evil by the royal touch, are ſufficiently replete with credulity and ſuperſtition), introduced, in a note a ſtory of one Chriſtopher Lovel, a native of Wells in Somerſetſhire, who is repreſented as having been healed of that diſorder, at Avignon, in 1716, by application to the Pretender (g). The fact appears to have been, that the man, by his journey, his change of diet, and the aſſiſtance of phyſicians, was conſiderably relieved; but his cure laſted only

(d) Biog. Britannica, vol. ii. p. 319—321. note [F].

‖ Soon after the acceſſion of King George I. walking in a heavy ſhower, he was plied with "A coach, your Reverence?" "No, honeſt friend," anſwered Carte, "this is not a reign for me to ride in a coach"

(e) On the 9th of May, 1744.

(f) In the ſame year.

(g) Carte's General Hiſtory of England, vol. i. p. 291, 292. Ibid. p. 357.

only for a ſhort time. His ſores broke out again, with violence, in many other parts of his body; and he returned, in hopes of the ſame ſucceſs, to France, where he died miſerably, before he reached Avignon (b). It has been alledged, in extenuation of our Author's conduct, that the note concerning Chriſtopher Lovel was not in reality his own; and that he was overperſuaded to inſert it, after the ſheet in which it was printed had been committed to the preſs. But he could not have been prevailed upon to introduce it, if he had not himſelf believed the fact; and if he had not, at the ſame time, been extremely ſolicitous to lay hold of any circumſtance which he thought would promote the Jacobite cauſe. In the preface to his ſecond volume, he continues to avow the truth of the ſtory. He had, according to his own account of the matter, been an unbeliever with regard to the cure of the King's evil by the royal touch, till he was convinced of his miſtake by Mr. Anſtis, who furniſhed him with thoſe proofs out of the Engliſh records, which atteſt the facts, and are printed in Tooker's Treatiſe on the ſubject, publiſhed in 1597. If, however, Mr. Carte's mind had riſen to a truly philoſophical enlargement, or if he had examined the narrations with a due degree of ſcepticiſm, he would not have been ſo eaſily miſled [D]. The indiſcretion he had been guilty of was hurtful

(b) Gent. Mag. vol. xviii. p. 14.

[D] He would not have been ſo eaſily miſled.] Three pamphlets were occaſioned by our Hiſtorian's obnoxious note. 1. "Remarks on Mr. Carte's general Hiſtory of England." 2. "A Letter to the "Jacobite Journaliſt, concerning Mr. Carte's Hiſtory, by Duncan Mac Carte, a Highlander;" and 3. "Some Specimens of Mr. Carte's Hiſtory of England, with Remarks thereon, by Donald Mac "Carte." Mr. Barrington has given the following account of what he heard, with reſpect to this ſuppoſed miraculous power of healing, from an old man who was witneſs in a cauſe. "He had, by his evi- "dence, fixed the time of a fact, by Queen Anne's "having been at Oxford, and touched him, whilſt "a child, for the evil. When he had finiſhed his "evidence, I had an opportunity of aſking him "whether he was really cured: Upon which he "anſwered, with a ſignificant ſmile, that he be- "lieved himſelf to have never had a complaint that "deſerved to be conſidered as the evil; but that "his parents were poor, and had no objection to the "bit of gold." "It ſeems to me," adds the honourable and learned writer, "that this piece of "gold, which was given to thoſe who were touched, "accounts for the great reſort upon this occaſion, "and the ſuppoſed afterwards miraculous cures. "Fabian Phillips, in his Treatiſe on Purveyance, "aſſerts, that the angels iſſued by the Kings of "England on theſe occaſions, amounted to a charge "of three thouſand pounds per annum, p. 257. "Queen Elizabeth was ſo tired of touching thoſe "who deſired to be cured for the evil, that, in Glou- "ceſterſhire, during one of her progreſſes, ſhe told "thoſe who were preſſing on her, that God only "could relieve them from their complaints. Sir "Kenelm Digby informed Monſ. Monconys, that "if the perſon cured loſt the piece of gold, the "complaint immediately returned. Gemelli (the "famous Traveller) alſo gives an account of 1600 "perſons being preſented for this purpoſe to Lewis "the Fourteenth, on Eaſter Sunday, in the year "1686. Gemelli was himſelf preſent at this cere- "mony, and ſays the words uſed were, Le Roy te "touche, Dieu te gueriſſe. Every Frenchman re- "ceived fifteen ſous, and every foreigner thirty, "after being touched.——This power of healing by "the Kings of France, occaſioned great reſort to "Francis the Firſt (whilſt priſoner at Madrid) by "the Spaniards, who did not conceive that their "own King's touch would effect the cure.——It "appears by a proclamation of the 25th of March, "and 14 James I. that the Kings of England would "not permit ſuch patients to approach them during "the ſummer. By another proclamation of the "18th of June, 1626, it is ordered, that no one "ſhall apply for this purpoſe, who does not bring a "proper certificate that he was never touched be- "fore. This regulation undoubtedly muſt have "ariſen from ſome ſuppoſed patients, who had at- "tempted to receive the bit of gold more than once "(1)." The following ingenious paper, upon the ſame ſubject, which hath been communicated to us by Mr. Nichols, will, we believe, be acceptable to our readers.

(1) Barrington's Obſervations on the more ancient Statutes, p. 107, 108. note. The fourth edition.

Remarks on Serjeant Surgeon Wiſeman's Teſtimony, concerning the Efficacy of the royal Touch in the King's Evil.

Though the ſuperſtitious notions reſpecting the cure of the King's evil by the touch of our Engliſh Kings, are, probably, at preſent, entirely eradicated, it is ſtill a curious, and not uninſtructive object of enquiry, by what means they were ſo long ſupported, and by what kind of evidence they have been able to gain credit, even in the dawning of a more enlightened period.

The teſtimony of Richard Wiſeman, Serjeant Surgeon to King Charles I. has been alledged as one of the ſtrongeſt and moſt unexceptionable in favour of the touch. He was a man of the greateſt eminence in his profeſſion, and his works bear all the marks of an honeſt and upright diſpoſition in their author. On the ſubject of the royal touch, he delivers himſelf in the following ſtrong and unequivocal terms. "I "myſelf have been a frequent eye-witneſs of many "hundreds of cures performed by his Majeſty's "touch alone, without any aſſiſtance of Chirurgery; "and thoſe, many of them, ſuch as had tired out "the endeavours of able Chirurgeons, before they "came thither. It were endleſs to recite what I "myſelf have ſeen, and what I have received ac- "knowledgments of by letter; not only from the "ſeveral parts of this nation, but alſo from Ireland, "Scotland, Jerſey, and Guernſey." The queſtion which will naturally ariſe upon this paſſage is, did Wiſeman really believe what he aſſerted, or was he knowingly promoting an impoſture? Both ſuppoſitions have their difficulties, yet both are in ſome degree probable. His warm attachment to the royal family, and early prejudices, might, in ſome meaſure, make his faith preponderate againſt his judgment; and, on the other hand, certain paſſages in his treatiſe, ſhow a neceſſary conſciouſneſs of colluſion and fraudulent pretenſions.

It was his buſineſs, as Serjeant Surgeon, to ſelect ſuch afflicted objects as were proper to be preſented for the royal touch. In the hiſtory of the diſeaſe, relating its various ſtates and appearances, he ſays, "Thoſe which we preſent to his Majeſty, are chiefly "ſuch as have this kind of tumour about the muſ- "culus maſtoideus, or neck, with whatever other cir- "cumſtances they are accompanied; nor are we "difficult in admitting the thick-chapped upper "lips, and eyes affected with a lippitudo: in other "caſes we give our judgment more warily."

Here is a ſelection of the ſlighteſt caſes, and a manifeſt doubt expreſſed concerning the ſucceſs in more inveterate ones. A little below, obſerving that the ſtrumæ will often be ſuppurated or reſolved unexpectedly, from accidental ferments, he ſays, "In "caſe of the King's touch, the reſolution doth often "happen, where our endeavours have ſignified no- "thing; yea, the very gummata, inſomuch that I "am cautious of predicting concerning them, "(though they appear never ſo bad) till fourteen "days be over." From this we learn, that the touch was by no means infallible; and that the pretence of its ſucceeding, was not given up till a fortnight hurtful to his intereſt. The Corporation of London, in conſequence of a motion made by Sir William Calvert, and ſeconded by Sir John Barnard, unanimouſly reſolved, in April 1748, to withdraw their ſubſcription; and the Hiſtory fell into very general neglect. It is to the honour of Mr. Carte's fortitude, that he was not diſcouraged from proſecuting his undertaking; and perhaps he might receive private aid and ſupport, though public aſſiſtance was withdrawn. Whatever may have been the caſe in that reſpect, his ſecond volume, containing an account of all public tranſactions from the acceſſion of Henry the Third, in 1216, to the death of Henry the Seventh in 1509, appeared in 1750. The third volume, which extended to the marriage of the Elector Palatine with the Princeſs Elizabeth, daughter of James the Firſt, in 1613, was publiſhed in 1752. Both theſe volumes were printed for the Author, at his houſe in Dean's Yard, Weſtminſter. Twenty two copies of the three volumes were ſent, in 1752, to Monſ. Lemoignon, Grand Chancellor of France. The fourth volume, which Mr. Carte did not live to compleat, appeared in 1755. It was intended to have been carried on to the Reſtoration, but concludes with the year 1654. It was his deſign to have brought the narration down to the Revolution, for which purpoſe he had been at uncommon pains to collect materials, wherever they could be found. Notwithſtanding our Author's peculiar opinions and prejudices, his general Hiſtory is undoubtedly a work of great merit in point of information. It is written with eminent exactneſs and diligence, and with a perfect knowledge of original Authors. "In the early part of "the Engliſh Hiſtory, ſays Mr. Daines Barrington, I ſhould always prefer the authority "of Carte to any other Hiſtorian. He was indefatigable himſelf in his reſearches, "having dedicated his whole life to them; and was aſſiſted in what relates to Wales, by "the labours of Mr. Lewis Morris of Penbryn, in Cardiganſhire. As for his political "prejudices, they cannot be ſuppoſed to have had any bias in what relates to a tranſ-"action five hundred years ago, and which hath nothing to do with the royal touch for "the cure of the King's evil (i)." Without diſputing whether the laſt obſervation will ſtrictly hold good, we ſhall add the teſtimony of a foreign writer, Monſ. d'Eyverdun. This gentleman, in a note to his criticiſm on Mr. Walpole's Hiſtoric Doubts, inſerted in the "Memoires Litteraires de la Grand Bretagne," for the year 1768, has expreſſed himſelf as follows [E]: "Mr. Carte has publiſhed a general Hiſtory of England, in "four volumes, in folio, with the deſign of oppoſing that of Rapin. He died before "he had finiſhed this great undertaking, which he had carried on to the protectorate of "Cromwell. This learned work, which in other reſpects is but indifferently written, is "replete with very uſeful reſearches, though mixed with incurable prejudices." This character we apprehend to be preciſely the truth; and it will apply to ſome of Mr. Carte's other writings [F]. Our Hiſtorian departed this life, at Caldecot-Houſe, near Abingdon, night had paſſed, without any change for the better. Indeed it appears very plain, that the worſt kind of caſes were ſeldom or never offered to the touch; for in no diſeaſe does Wiſeman produce more obſervations from his practice of difficult and dangerous chirurgical treatment, and in not one of theſe did he call in the aſſiſtance of the royal hand. It was indeed propoſed in a ſingle inſtance, but under ſuch circumſtances as furniſh a ſtronger proof of impoſture, than any thing hitherto related. A young gentlewoman had an obſtinate ſcrophulous tumour in the right ſide of the neck, under the maxilla. Wiſeman applied a large cauſtic to it, brought it to ſuppuration, treated it with eſcharotics, and cured it. "About a year after (he ſays) I ſaw her again in "town, and felt a ſmall gland of the bigneſs of a "lupin lying lower on that ſide of the neck. I "would have perſuaded her to admit of a reſolvent "emplaſter, and to be touched; but ſhe did not, as "ſhe ſaid, believe it to be the King's evil." Here, after allowing his patient to undergo a courſe of very ſevere ſurgery, he is willing to truſt the relics of the diſeaſe to the royal touch, aſſiſted by a reſolving plaſter; but the complaint was now too trifling to engage her attention. Surely the greateſt opponent of the touch could not place it in a more contemptible light!

(i) Obſervations on the more ancient Statutes, p. 107. note. Fourth edition.

Dr. Ducarel has informed Mr. Nichols, that being in 1746 on a viſit to the Rev. Mr. Buſh, Vicar of Wadhurſt, in Suſſex, he was ſhewn, in the Regiſter Book of that pariſh, certificates for divers perſons to recommend them for the touch in the reign of James the Second, ſigned by the Vicar and Church-wardens; ſetting forth, that they verily believed A. B. was afflicted with the King's Evil, and that he had never been touched before. By this it ſeems to have been underſtood, ſo late as the cloſe of the laſt century, that people could be preſented but once to the King on that account.—Charles the Second touched ninety-two thouſand one hundred and ſeven perſons, between May 1661 and April 1682.

[E] Has expreſſed himſelf as follows.] "Mr. "Carte a donné une Hiſtoire generale de l'Angle-"terre en 4 volumes en folio, dans le deſſein de "l'oppoſer à celle de Rapin. Il eſt mort avant "d'avoir achevé ce grand travail, qu'il a pouſſé "juſqu' au protectorat de Cromwell. Ce ſçavant "ouvrage, d'ailleurs aſſez mal ecrit, eſt mempli de "recherches fort utiles, & de prejuges qui ne le ſont "gueres." Mr. Carte, in his account of King Richard the Third, agrees with Buc, and hath advanced the very ſame ſentiments concerning that Monarch, which have been enlarged upon by Mr. Walpole (2).

(2) General Hiſt. of England, vol. ii. p. 809—821.

[F] Mr. Carte's other writings.] Beſides the works mentioned in the text, he was the author of the following publications. 1. A Collection of original Letters and Papers, concerning the Affairs "of England, from 1641 to 1660," in two volumes, octavo, 1739. 2. "The Hiſtory of the Revolutions "of Portugal, from the Foundation of that Kingdom to the Year 1567, with Letters of Sir Robert "Southwell, during his Embaſſy there, to the "Duke of Ormonde; giving a particular Account "of the depoſing Don Alfonſo, and placing Don "Pedro on the throne." Octavo, 1780. 3. "A "full Anſwer to the Letter from a Byſtander." A pamphlet, octavo, 1742. 4. "A full and clear Vindication of the full Anſwer to a Letter from a "Byſtander." Ditto, 1743. The letter from a byſtander was written by the late Corbyn Morris, Eſq; 5. "Catalogue des Rolles Gaſcons, Normans, "& Fran-Abingdon, in Berkſhire, on the ſecond of April, 1754. At his deceaſe, all his papers came into the hands of his widow, who was a daughter of Colonel Brett, and who afterwards married Mr. Jernegan, a gentleman intended for Orders in the Church of Rome; which, however, he declined taking, after he had received an education for that purpoſe. Mrs. Carte left the papers to her ſecond huſband for life, and after his death to the Univerſity of Oxford. They are now depoſited in the Bodleian Library, having been delivered by Mr. Jernegan to the Univerſity, in 1778, for a valuable conſideration. Whilſt they were in this gentleman's poſſeſſion, the Earl of Hardwicke paid two hundred pounds for the peruſal of them. For a conſideration of three hundred pounds, Mr. Macpherſon had the uſe of them; who from theſe and other materials, compiled his Hiſtory and State Papers. Mr. Carte was a man of a ſtrong conſtitution, and indefatigable application. Dr. Mangey, whoſe great learning was univerſally allowed, uſed to ſay, that he always thought he could ſit as long at his ſtudies as any man, till he came to live in the ſame houſe with Mr. Carte; who, he obſerved, was accuſtomed to write or read from early in the morning till night, only allowing himſelf time to take a diſh or two of tea, or ſomething of that kind; "ſo that, added the Doctor, I could not keep "pace with him at all (k)." When the ſtudies of the day were over, our Hiſtorian would eat heartily; and in converſation he was very chearful and entertaining. With regard to his external appearance, he was extremely deficient in propriety and neatneſs (l); a fault, which was formerly more common amongſt men of letters than it is at preſent. From a general change in the habitudes of life, and the more extenſive diffuſion of polite manners, there are now not many ſtudious perſons who would chooſe to loſe in the ſcholar the outward form and attentions of the gentleman [G]. K.

(k) Supplement to the new general and biographical Dictionary, p. 75. Dr. Mangey acknowledges his obligations to Mr. Carte, for many communications out of the King of France's library, for his edition of Philo Judæus, and calls him "Vir præclaræ induſtriæ, eruditionis, & ingenii."

(l) Ibid.

"& François, conſervés dans les Archives de la "Tour de Londres; tiré d'après celui du Garde "deſdites Archives: & contenant la Precis & le "Sommaire de tous les Titres qui s'y trouvent con"cernant la Guienne, la Normandie, & les autres "Provinces de la France, ſujettes autre fois aux "Rois d'Angleterre, &c." In two volumes, folio, with two moſt exact and correct indexes of places and perſons. Paris, 1743. This valuable collection, being calculated for the uſe of the French, is introduced with a preface in that language. 6. "A Pre"face to a Tranſlation, by Mrs. Thompſon, of the "Hiſtory of the memorable and extraordinary Ca"lamities of Margaret of Anjou, Queen of Eng"land, &c. by the Chevalier Michael Bandier." Octavo, London, 1736. 7. "Advice of a Mother "to her Son and Daughter, tranſlated from the "French of the Marchioneſs de Lambert." This hath gone through ſeveral editions. 8. "Farther "Reaſons, addreſſed to Parliament, for rendering "more effectual an Act of Queen Anne, relating to "the veſting in Authors the Right of Copies, for "the Encouragement of Learning, by R. H." Mr. Carte wrote, alſo, a paper, the manuſcript of which is in Mr. Nichols's poſſeſſion, recommending a public library to be formed at the Manſion-Houſe, and that the twelve great Companies of the city of London, ſhould each of them ſubſcribe two thouſand pounds for that purpoſe. A tranſlation of Mr. Carte's general Hiſtory of England into French, was undertaken by ſeveral gentlemen in conjunction, but was never compleated. Some parts of the tranſlation are in Dr. Ducarel's poſſeſſion. Mr. Carte left behind him, in manuſcript, "A "Vindication of King Charles the Firſt, with regard "to the Iriſh Maſſacre." In 1758, was publiſhed a book, partly upon the ſame ſubject, entitled, "The "Caſe of the Royal Martyr conſidered with Can"dour," in two volumes, octavo, the author of which acknowledges his obligations to Mr. Carte. It was written by the Rev. John Boſwell, M. A. a Clergyman and Schoolmaſter, at Taunton, in Somerſetſhire. The ſame gentleman was the author of "A Method of Study, or a uſeful Library," printed in 1738, in octavo, a work of no diſtinguiſhed merit; and of two pamphlets, called "Remarks on "the free and candid Diſquiſitions," which appeared in 1750 and 1751.

[G] Mr. Carte had two brothers, Samuel and John. Samuel Carte was admitted a Scholar of Trinity-Hall, Cambridge, on the 5th of May, 1704, and proceeded LL. B. He was afterwards a Member of Symond's Inn, and practiſed as a Solicitor in Chancery, in which profeſſion he became eminent. He was alſo a learned Antiquary. Moſt of his manuſcripts and papers relative to antiquities, are ſuppoſed to have been ſold by his widow to the late Sir Thomas Cave, Bart. He aſſiſted Dr. Jackſon, Schoolmaſter of Coventry, in his account of the benefactions and charities belonging to that city; and was the editor, though without his name, of Brewſter's Collectanea Eccleſiaſtica, to which he added many learned notes. Mr. Samuel Carte was alive in 1760, but died not long after. Several manuſcript letters of his, relative to ſubjects of antiquity, are in Dr. Ducarel's poſſeſſion.

Mr. John Carte was entered at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, Jan. 9, 1707, where he was admitted to the degree of LL. B. Having taken holy orders, he became firſt Vicar of Tachbroke, in the county of Warwick, and was afterwards promoted, by the Dean and Chapter of Weſtminſter, to the Vicarage of Hinckley, in Leiceſterſhire, with the Rectory of Stoke annexed. At this place he reſided, from the year 1720, till his death, which was on the 17th of December, 1735. Mr. John Carte was very remarkable for his abſence of mind. Some years before his deceaſe, he paid his addreſſes to Miſs Dugdale, a deſcendant of the illuſtrious Antiquary, and the wedding-day was fixed. But he forgot to go to the place appointed for the celebration of the marriage, till the day after the time agreed upon; which the lady, as might juſtly be expected, reſented ſo much, that ſhe abſolutely refuſed him her hand. Being perpetually abſorbed in thought, he was careleſs in his dreſs, and deſtitute of œconomy. His inattention to money matters he carried to ſuch an exceſs, that, when the inhabitants of Stoke have brought to him the tithes, which he never took the trouble to aſk for, it was not unuſual with him, if he chanced to be engaged with a book, to requeſt that they would come at a future time, though perhaps he was the next hour obliged to borrow a guinea for his ſubſiſtence. The Parſonage-houſe adjoins to the Churchyard; and yet he was frequently ſo engaged in ſtudy, that the ſermon-bell uſed to ring till the congregation were weary of waiting, and the Clerk was obliged to remind him of his duty. During the fifteen years in which he was Vicar of Hinckley, he neglected to make any demand for tithes of the hamlet of Hide, belonging to that pariſh. Mr. John Carte's unaffected piety, his learning, his integrity, his ſimplicity of manners, and, we may probably add, his avoiding to inſiſt upon his legal dues, are ſtill remembered, with veneration, by his ſurviving pariſhioners. Some farther particulars of him are collecting, by Mr. Nichols, for an intended "Hiſtory "of the ancient Town of Hinckley," which is to form one number of a valuable work now publiſhing under the title of "Bibliotheca Topographica Bri"tannica."

 [CARTERET (JOHN), Earl Granville, one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed Orators and Stateſmen of the preſent century, was born on the 22d of April, 1690. His father was George Lord Carteret, Baron Carteret, of Hawnes in the county of Bedford, having been ſo created on the 19th of October 1681, when he was only fifteen years of age; and his mother was Lady Grace, youngeſt daughter of John, Earl of Bath. By both parents he was deſcended from very ancient and honourable families, and from anceſtors who had rendered themſelves illuſtrious by many notable exploits [A]. When he was no more

[A] He was deſcended from very ancient and honourable families, and from anceſtors who had rendered themſelves illuſtrious by many notable exploits.] The eminent and noble family of Greenvile, Grenville, or Granville, we ſhall not take notice of in this place, as an ample account is given of it under other articles (1); neither ſhall we enlarge greatly upon the Carterets, it not being our intention to convert the Biographia ſo much into a Peerage as our learned predeceſſors have ſometimes done. The family of the Carterets came originally from Normandy, where they were ſettled, and had conſiderable poſſeſſions, previouſly to the conqueſt. Two of them accompanied Duke William in his ſucceſsful expedition into this country. In proceſs of time, the Carterets loſt their Barony and lands in Normandy, upon account of their adherence to the crown of England, and fixed in the Iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey, chiefly the latter, in both of which Iſlands they performed many valiant exploits againſt the French. Their brave and loyal conduct procured them, at different periods, a variety of honours and rewards. They were frequently knighted, had conſiderable poſts beſtowed upon them, and ſometimes ſhared in the chief government of Guernſey, Jerſey, Sark, and Alderney. The office of High Bailiff of Jerſey, an honourable ſtation, was uſually poſſeſſed by the family. In the latter end of the reign of Edward the Third, Reginald de Carteret, and his ſeven ſons, all received the honour of Knighthood in one day, for the great ſervice of having preſerved the Iſland of Jerſey from falling into the hands of the famous Bertrand de Gueſclin, Conſtable of France. During the contentions between Henry the Sixth, and Edward the Fourth, Sir Philip de Carteret ſignalized himſelf in many brave actions; and particularly, by his conduct and valour, was the means of again preventing Jerſey from being ſubjected to the French dominion. But not to purſue the Hiſtory of the family through all the perſons who reflected honour upon it, for which we ſhall refer to Collins (2), we proceed to the Gentleman who firſt occaſioned its being raiſed to an Engliſh Peerage. This was Sir George Carteret, the great grandfather to the ſubject of the preſent article. Sir George Carteret was born at Jerſey, in 1599, his father Helier Carteret, Eſq; being at that time Deputy Governor of the Iſland. He entered early into the ſea ſervice, and, by his courage and conduct, had acquired the character of an experienced officer, when King Charles the Firſt aſcended the throne. This circumſtance recommending him to the notice and eſteem of the Duke of Buckingham, he was appointed, by the intereſt of that great favourite, in 1626, joint Governor of Jerſey, with Henry, afterwards, Lord Jermyn; and, in 1639, he obtained a grant of the office and place of Comptroller of all his Majeſty's ſhips. He was in the poſſeſſion of theſe poſts at the commencement of the civil war, and at the ſame time, was of great eminency and reputation in naval command. When the Houſe of Commons, in concurrence with the Houſe of Lords, formed a peremptory reſolution for ſending out the Earl of Warwick as Admiral of the fleet, they alſo reſolved, that Captain Carteret ſhould be Vice-Admiral. But he, thinking that he ought not to accept the command without knowing the royal pleaſure, addreſſed himſelf to the King for direction; who ordered him to decline the employment, which he accordingly did without noiſe; and another officer of the Navy, Captain Batten, Surveyor-General, was ſubſtituted in his place. His Majeſty ſoon found much cauſe to repent of his error; as, if Captain Carteret had been permitted to accept of the charge, there was the higheſt reaſon to believe, that he would have prevented the greater part of the fleet from engaging in the cauſe of the Parliament. When Captain Carteret gave up the command he had been appointed to in the Navy, he likewiſe quitted the poſt of Comptroller, and retired, with his family, to the Iſland of Jerſey; the inhabitants of which received him with gladneſs, and were confirmed by him in their adherence to the King. However, his ardent couuage, and his fidelity to his Royal Maſter, not permitting him to continue long in this inactive ſtation, he tranſported himſelf into Cornwal, with the purpoſe of raiſing a troop of horſe. When he arrived in that country, finding there was a great want of powder, he went into France to procure that and other neceſſary ſupplies; in which he was ſo ſucceſsful, that, through the remainder of the war, the Corniſh army was never deſtitute of ammunition. This was ſo important and ſeaſonable a ſervice, that the King acknowledged it by a particular warrant of approbation; and by conferring upon him, at Oxford, the honour of Knighthood; which was ſpeedily followed by his being advanced, on the 9th of May 1645, to the dignity of a Baronet. Returning, the ſame year, into Jerſey, he found that ſeveral of the inhabitants had been induced to embrace the cauſe of the Parliament, on which account he threw ſome of them into confinement. This was ſo alarming and offenſive to the Members at Weſtminſter, that an order was made, that if for the future, he ſhould put to death any of the Iſland, whom he ſhould take priſoners, for every one ſo ſlain, three of the King's men ſhould be hung up. From the words here uſed, it ſeems evident, that Sir George Carteret had actually executed ſome one or more of the people of Jerſey who had appeared for the Parliament. If this was the caſe, his conduct, as circumſtances then ſtood, was highly impolitic; and, indeed, ſuch as could in no degree be juſtified. It is not, therefore, ſurprizing that the indignation of the Houſe of Commons ſhould riſe ſo high againſt him, that, in all the ſubſequent propoſitions for peace with the King, Sir George was amongſt the perſons of eminence who were excepted from pardon. When the Prince of Wales, and many perſons of diſtinction with him, came into Jerſey in 1646, and brought with them very little for their ſubſiſtence, they were all chearfully entertained, and at a large expence, by Sir George Carteret; who, being ſenſible how much it behoved him to take care for ſupplies, equipt about half a ſcore ſmall frigates and privateers, which ſoon ſtruck a terror through the whole channel, and made a number of captures. Upon the Prince's leaving the iſland, at the poſitive command of the Queen, ſeveral of the Council choſe to ſtay with Sir George; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer (afterwards Earl of Clarendon) reſided with him no leſs than five and twenty months. After Charles the Firſt was beheaded, Sir George Carteret, though the republican party and the army were ſo completely triumphant, and though Charles the Second was at the Hague in a very deſtitute condition, did not heſitate in teſtifying his allegiance to his new Royal Maſter, but immediately and ſolemnly proclaimed him at Jerſey, with all his titles. Some months afterwards, when his Majeſty was in the greateſt perplexity whither to bend his courſe, he determined to pay a ſecond viſit to the Iſland of Jerſey. Accordingly he arrived there in the latter end of September 1649, being accompanied by his brother the Duke of York, with ſeveral of the nobility. Here they were ſupplied by Sir George with all neceſſaries. The King, when Prince of Wales, had procured his father's leave for making Sir George Carteret his Vice-Chamberlain, and he now appointed him Treaſurer of his Navy; which, however, at this time chiefly conſiſted of the privateers that Sir George had provided, more than four years and five months old, he became Lord Carteret, by the death of his father, who departed this life at the age of twenty-ſix (a). His Lordſhip received his grammatical education at Weſtminſter ſchool, from which he was removed to Chriſt Church College Oxford; in both which places he made ſuch extraordinary improvements, that he became one of the moſt learned young Noblemen of his time; and he retained to the laſt his knowledge and love of literature (b). Dr. Swift humorouſly aſſerts, that he carried away from Oxford, with a ſingularity ſcarcely to be juſtified, more Greek, Latin, and Philoſophy, than properly became a perſon of his rank; indeed, much more of each, than moſt of thoſe who are forced to live by their learning will be at the unneceſſary pains to load their heads with (c). Being thus accompliſhed, Lord Carteret was qualified to make an early figure in life. As ſoon as he was introduced into the Houſe of Peers, which was on the 25th of May, 1711, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ardent zeal for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion. His conduct, in this reſpect, procured him the early notice of King George the Firſt, by whom he was appointed, in 1714, one of the Lords of the Bedchamber; in 1715, Bailiff of the Iſland of Jerſey; and in 1716, Lord Lieuteprovided, and of the men of war with Prince Rupert. Charles the Second ſtaid in the Iſland till the latter end of March 1650, when he embarked for Holland, in order to be more commodiouſly ſituated for treating with the Scots, concerning their invitation of him into that kingdom. During his Majeſty's reſidence in Jerſey, he enjoyed more peace and ſatisfaction of mind than he had hitherto done, either within or without his dominions. By riding about the Iſland, he grew ſo well acquainted with all the parts of it, that he drew a map of it with his own hand; and he did not diſdain, in his various excurſions, to accept invitations and entertainments from the gentry, at their reſpective habitations. The defiance which Sir George Carteret had ſhewn to the ruling powers, by harbouring the King, and taking many of their trading veſſels, enraged them ſo much, that they determined to exert every nerve for the reduction of Jerſey. A formidable armament being prepared, it put to ſea in October 1651, under the command of Admiral Blake, and Major General Holmes, to the laſt of whom the charge of the forces for the deſcent was committed. In this criſis, Sir George Carteret behaved with the utmoſt courage and conduct. He prevented the landing of the republican army as long as poſſible; and when that was effected, and the remaining forts of the Iſland were taken, he retired into Elizabeth Caſtle, reſolving to hold it out to the laſt extremity. The King being ſafely arrived in France, after the fatal battle of Worceſter, Sir George informed him of the ſtate of the garriſon, and requeſted his aſſiſtance, if any ſuch could be obtained from the Court of France. This being out of his Majeſty's power to procure, he adviſed Sir George Carteret, rather to accept of a reaſonable compoſition, than, by too obſtinate a defence, to bring himſelf and the loyal Gentlemen who were with him, into danger of being made priſoners of war. Sir George, it ſeems, had the noble ambition, that Elizabeth Caſtle ſhould be the laſt of the King's garriſons (as was in fact the caſe) which ſhould bend under the prevailing powers. Seeing, therefore, that the caſtle was ſtill tenable, he determined to keep the enemies out ſome time longer, and concealed his Majeſty's permiſſion to treat, that the knowledge of it might not renew the cry, which had already been made, for a ſurrender. But, at length, proviſions growing ſcarce, the number of defenders leſſening daily by death and deſertion, and there being no poſſibility of ſupplies or recruits, he ſubmitted to neceſſity, as many other brave men have been compelled to do on ſimilar occaſions. Elizabeth Caſtle was ſurrendered in the latter end of December. When Sir George Carteret quitted the Iſland of Jerſey, he went firſt to St. Maloes, and thence to Paris, after which he travelled through ſeveral parts of Europe. To facilitate his reception at the different courts and places he might be diſpoſed to viſit, he obtained from his Royal Maſter a very honourable and remarkable certificate of recommendation. In 1657, Sir George had given ſuch offence to Oliver Cromwell, by ſome hoſtile deſign or attempt againſt the Engliſh veſſels trading to the French ports, that, by the Protector's intereſt with Cardinal Mazarine, he was committed priſoner to the Baſtile; from which he was, after ſome time, releaſed by the interceſſion of his friends, upon the condition of his quitting France. His deſign was to go to Savoy, and thence to Venice, to ſeek for ſome employment in that city. If this deſign was accompliſhed, he did not make a very long reſidence there; for, in 1659, we find him at Rheims, from which place he repaired to the King at Bruſſels, and followed him to Breda. Upon his Majeſty's being reſtored to his kingdoms, Sir George Carteret rode with him in his triumphant entry into the city of London, on the 29th of May 1660. The next day, Sir George was declared Vice-Chamberlain of the Houſhold, and ſworn of the Privy-Council, in conjunction with the Marquiſes of Hertford, Dorcheſter, Ormond, and others of the nobility. He was alſo conſtituted Treaſurer of the Navy; and at the coronation of the King, he had the honour of being ſpecially appointed, by his Majeſty, Almoner for the day. In the firſt Parliament called by Charles the Second, and which met at Weſtminſter, on the 8th of May, 1661, Sir George Carteret was elected Repreſentative for the Corporation of Portſmouth; and it appears, that he was an active Member of the Houſe. When the Duke of York, 1673, reſigned the office of High Admiral of England, Sir George was conſtituted one of the Commiſſioners of the Admiralty; and in 1676, he was appointed one of the Lords of the Committee of Trade. He was alſo, Vice-Treaſurer of Ireland, and Treaſurer of the Military Forces there. At length, in conſequence of his merit and ſervices, the King determined to raiſe him to the dignity of a Peerage; but before the deſign could be accompliſhed, he departed this life, on the 14th of January, 1679, being nearly eighty years of age. On the 11th of February following, a royal warrant was iſſued, in which it is recited, "That whereas "Sir George Carteret died before his patent for his "Barony was ſued out, his Majeſty authorizes Eli-"zabeth, his widow, and her youngeſt children, "James Carteret, Caroline, wife of Sir Thomas "Scot, Knt. and Louiſa, wife of Sir Robert Atkins, "Knt. to enjoy their precedency and pre-emi-"nency, as if the ſaid Sir George Carteret had "actually been created a Baron." Sir George's eldeſt ſon, by his Lady Elizabeth, who was his couſin-german, being the daughter of Sir Philip Carteret, was named Philip after his grandfather. This gentleman eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Civil Wars, and was knighted by Charles the Second, at his arrival in Jerſey. After the King's Reſtoration, Sir Philip Carteret married Jemima, daughter of Edward Montague, the firſt Earl of Sandwich, and periſhed with that illuſtrious nobleman, in the great ſea-fight with the Dutch, in Solbay, on the 28th of May, 1672. Sir Philip determined, whilſt many others left the ſhip, to ſhare the fate of his father-in-law. His eldeſt ſon George, who was the firſt Lord Carteret, and whom we have mentioned in the text, as having been ſo created when only fifteen years of age, had that dignity conferred upon him, at this early period of life, upon account of the diſtinguiſhed merit of his father and grandfather, and eſpecially of the laſt (3).

(1) Biog. Brit. vol. iv. p. 227, &c.

(2) Collins's Peerage, ſeventh edition, p. 360—381.

(a) Collins's Peerage, ſeventh edition, vol. iv. p. 399—401.

(b) Characters by Lord Cheſterfield, p. 36. quarto edition.

(c) Swift's works, vol. x. p. 249. 2to edition.

(3) See Collins's Peerage, ubi ſupra, p. 381—400, where the facts we have mentioned are more fully related.

nant

nant and Cuſtos Rotulorum of the county of Devon; which laſt office he held till Auguſt, 1721, when he reſigned it in favour of Hugh Lord Clinton (d). His mother alſo, Lady Grace, was created Viſcounteſs Carteret, and Counteſs Granville, by letters patent, bearing date on the firſt of January, 1714-15, with limitation of theſe honours to her ſon John Lord Carteret (e). His Lordſhip, though ſtill young, became, from the early part of King George the Firſt's reign, an eminent Speaker in the Houſe of Peers. The firſt inſtance we find ſpecifically recorded of the diſplay of his eloquence, was in the famous debate on the bill for lengthening the duration of Parliaments. In this debate, he ſupported the Duke of Devonſhire's motion for the repeal of the Triennial Act, by thoſe peculiar and powerful arguments which the ſituation of affairs at that time afforded; but of which, in a former article, we have expreſſed our diſapprobation (f). On the 18th of February, 1717-18, he ſpoke in behalf of the bill for puniſhing mutiny and deſertion; and in the ſeſſion of Parliament, which met on the 11th of November following, he moved for the addreſs of thanks to the King, to congratulate his Majeſty on the ſeaſonable ſucceſs of his naval forces; and to aſſure him, that the Houſe would ſupport him in the purſuit of thoſe prudent and neceſſary meaſures he had taken to ſecure the trade and quiet of his dominions, and the tranquillity of Europe (g). The evidence Lord Carteret had given of his great abilities, exciting farther the attention of government, he was appointed, on the 25th of January, 1718-19, Embaſſador Extraordinary, and Miniſter Plenipotentiary to the Queen of Sweden. He did not, however, leave England till the 1ſt of June following, when he embarked in the river for Gottenburgh, in his way to Stockholm, where he arrived on the 30th of the ſame month. On the 6th of July he preſented his memorial to the Queen, and had her Majeſty's anſwer the ſame day. His firſt buſineſs was, to remove the difficulties which the Britiſh ſubjects had met with in regard to their commerce in the Baltick, and to procure ſatisfaction for the loſſes they had ſuſtained. In this he ſo happily ſucceeded, that the Queen ordered an equitable compenſation to be made to the rightful claimants; and ſhe farther ordered, that the ſhips belonging to Great-Britain, ſhould have freedom of trade and navigation in the Baltick, even though they were bounds to the ports which had been taken from her by the Czar of Muſcovy. On the 6th of November, 1719, Lord Carteret firſt took upon him the character of Embaſſador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary; at which time, in a private audience, he offered his royal Maſter's mediation to make peace between Sweden and Denmark; and alſo his Majeſty's mediation, to effect the ſame purpoſe between Sweden and the Czar. Both theſe mediations were readily accepted by the Queen. A peace between Sweden, Pruſſia, and Hanover, having been concluded by Lord Carteret, it was proclaimed at Stockholm, on the 9th of March, 1719-20. This was the prelude to a reconciliation between Sweden and Denmark. His Lordſhip having ſettled a preliminary treaty between theſe two Crowns, and having been appointed, in conjunction with the Lord Polwarth, Embaſſador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Congreſs of Brunſwick, for finally adjuſting all differences in the North, he had his audience of leave of the King and Queen of Sweden, at Carlberg, on the 9th of June, 1720. Upon the ſame day he had the honour of dining with their Majeſties, who expreſſed their eſteem for him in the moſt gracious terms. A few days after, he ſet out for Denmark; and on the 19th of June he had his firſt audience, at Frederickſburgh, of the Daniſh King, by whom he was received with great marks of attention and regard. He had brought with him the treaty of peace between Denmark and Sweden, which had already been agreed to and ſigned on the part of Sweden. After a conference of two days between Lord Carteret and the Daniſh Miniſters, the treaty was, likewiſe, acceded to by the King of Denmark, and ſigned on the 3d of July. From the Gazette of Auguſt the 19th, in this year, we find his Lordſhip appointed, together with Earl Stanhope and Sir Robert Sutton, Embaſſador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at the Congreſs of Cambray; but whether he acted in this capacity doth not appear. The ratifications of the treaty of peace between Denmark and Sweden, were exchanged on the 22d of October, 1720; by which event an end was, in fact, put to the war, that had ſo long raged between Sweden, Ruſſia, Denmark, and the King of Pruſſia; for though the Czar ſtill held out, nothing very material was tranſacted; and that Monarch, at length, entered into an agreement with their Daniſh Majeſties, without the intervention of a mediator. Lord Carteret having concluded his important and ſucceſsful negotiation, left Denmark, and returned through Hanover, in his way to England, where he arrived on the 5th of December, with the ſatisfaction of having highly pleaſed his royal Maſter (h).

A few weeks after our noble Peer had returned from his Embaſſy, we find him taking a ſhare in the debates on the ſtate of the national credit, occaſioned by the unfortunate and iniquitous effects of the South-Sea ſcheme; and ſupporting Earl Stanhope's opinion, that the eſtates of the criminals, whether directors or not directors, ought to be confiſcated, to make good the public loſſes (i). Whilſt this affair was in agitation, King George the Firſt, in teſtimony of his approbation of Lord Carteret's late conduct in Sweden and Denmark, appointed him to the honourable and important ſtation of Embaſſador

(d) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 401, 402.

(e) Ibid. p. 401.

(f) See the article of Earl BATHURST.

(g) Lords Debates, vol. iii. p. 31. 76. 78. 95.

(h) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 402, 403.

(i) Lords Debates, ubi ſupra, p. 129.

Embaſſador Extraordinary to the Court of France. Accordingly, his Lordſhip received his inſtructions, and was on the point of ſetting out, when James Craggs, jun. Eſq; Principal Secretary of State, on whoſe character ſo much luſtre hath been ſhed by his friendſhip with Addiſon, and his connection with Pope, departed this life on the 17th of February, 1720-21. The reſult of this event was, that Lord Carteret's deſtination to the French Court was changed, and he was conſtituted, on the 4th of May, ſucceſſor to Mr. Craggs. On the next day he was admitted into that great office, and, at the ſame time, was ſworn one of his Majeſty's moſt honourable Privy Council (k). Whilſt Lord Carteret was Secretary of State, he not only diſcharged the general duties of his employment to the ſatisfaction of his royal Maſter, but ably defended in Parliament the meaſures of Adminiſtration. This he did in the debate concerning Mr. Law, the famous projector of the Miſſiſſippi ſcheme, whoſe arrival in England, in 1721, by the connivance, as it was thought, and even under the ſanction of the Miniſtry, excited no ſmall degree of diſguſt. Earl Coningſby having expreſſed the apprehenſions and jealouſies of the public upon the occaſion, and having aſked, whether Sir John Norris, who brought him over, had orders for that purpoſe, Lord Carteret replied, that Mr. Law had had, many years before, the misfortune to kill a gentleman in a duel; but that having, at laſt, received the benefit of the King's clemency, and the appeal which was lodged by the relations of the deceaſed being taken off, he had come over to plead his Majeſty's moſt gracious pardon. It was added by his Lordſhip, that there was no law to keep any Engliſhman out of his own country; and that, as Mr. Law was a ſubject of Great-Britain, it was not even in the King's power to hinder him from coming over, if he thought fit. Lord Carteret took, alſo, a part, on the ſide of government, in the debate on the navy debt, and with regard to the various other motions and bills of the ſeſſion (l). In the new Parliament, which met on the 11th of October, 1722, his Lordſhip was equally active in ſupporting the meaſures of Adminiſtration. The firſt ſubject which engaged the attention of the Peers being the diſcovery of Layer's plot, he ſpoke in favour of the Duke of Grafton's bill to ſuſpend the Habeas Corpus act for one year; acquainted the Houſe with the Biſhop of Rocheſter's, Lord North and Grey's, and the Earl of Orrery's commitment to the Tower; and defended the motion for the impriſonment of the Duke of Norfolk. In all the debates concerning this conſpiracy, and particularly with regard to the famous Atterbury, Lord Carteret vindicated the proceedings of the Court; as he did, likewiſe, in the caſe of the act for laying an extraordinary tax upon Papiſts (m). On the 26th of May, 1723, when the King's affairs called him abroad for the ſummer, his Lordſhip was appointed one of the Lords Juſtices of the kingdom; but this did not hinder him from following his Majeſty to Hanover, as Secretary of State. He went thither, in conjunction with Lord Townſhend, the other Secretary; and both theſe noblemen, in their return to England, had ſeveral conferences at the Hague, with the principal perſons of the Dutch Adminiſtration, on ſubjects of importance (n). In the ſucceeding ſeſſion of Parliament, which opened on the 9th of January, 1723-4, Lord Carteret, in the debate on the Mutiny Bill, ſupported the neceſſity of eighteen thouſand men being kept up, as the number of land-forces, in oppoſition to Lord Trevor, who had moved that the four thouſand additional men, who had been raiſed the year before, ſhould be diſcontinued. It was ſtrongly urged by our noble Secretary, that the public tranquillity proceeded from the ſecurity of government; and that as this ſecurity was in ſome meaſure owing to the additional forces, they were become neceſſary to preſerve that happy tranquillity (o). Not many days after this debate, which happened on the 16th of March, ſeveral alterations took place at Court. Among the reſt of the changes, Lord Carteret quitted the office of Secretary of State, in which he was ſucceeded by the Duke of Newcaſtle; and on the ſame day, being the third of April, 1724, he was conſtituted Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It was not till the October following that he arrived at Dublin, where he was received with the uſual ſolemnity. The Iriſh were at that time in a great ferment about the patent for Wood's halfpence, which makes ſo ſignal a figure in the life and writings of Dr. Swift. One of the firſt things done by the Lord Lieutenant, was to publiſh a proclamation, offering a reward of three hundred pounds for a diſcovery of the author of the Drapier's Letters. When he was aſked, by Dr. Swift, how he could concur in the proſecution of a poor honeſt fellow, who had been guilty of no other crime than that of writing three or four letters for the good of his country, his Excellency replied, in the words of Virgil,

——————Regni novitas me talia cogit
Moliri——————

Lord Carteret lived at that very time in great friendſhip with the Dean; and, therefore, if he ſuſpected the real author, could have no ſincere wiſh that he might be diſcovered. Notwithſtanding the meaſures his Lordſhip was obliged officially to purſue, he was ſenſible that Wood's patent ought not to be ſupported; and, accordingly, procured its being revoked; by which means, one of the moſt univerſal and remarkable ferments

(k) Collins, ubi ſupra.

(l) Lords Debates, ubi ſupra, p. 186. 188. 191. 193, 194. 199, 200. 202. 205, 206. 211. 227. 231. 234. 236.

(m) Ibid. p. 244, 245. 249. 253, 254. 268, 269. 273. 275. 277. 403.

(n) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 403.

(o) Lords Debates, ubi ſupra, p. 406. 414, 415.

ments ever raiſed in Ireland ſpeedily ſubſided (p). The Lord Lieutenant uſed ſometimes to converſe with Dr. Swift on public affairs. The Dean, on ſome occaſion, happening to diſpute with him concerning the grievances ſuffered by the Iriſh, and the folly and nonſenſe of the Engliſh government, in the management of Ireland, his Excellency replied with ſuch maſtery and ſtrength of reaſon, that Swift was incapable of ſupporting his argument. Being diſpleaſed at this, he cried out in a violent paſſion, "What "the vengeance brought you among us; get you gone, get you gone; pray God Al- "mighty ſend us our boobies back again (q)." At another time, Dr. Swift having written two lines on a window of the Caſtle, in which his pride affected an abſolute independence, Lord Carteret gently rebuked his haughtineſs, by inſcribing under them the following couplet:

(p) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 404. Supplement to the new and general Biographical Dict. p. 76. Britiſh Biography, vol. x. p. 47.

(q) Monthly Review, vol. xi. p. 59. from Delaney's Obſervations on Swift.

"My very good Dean, none ever comes here,
"But who hath ſomething to hope, or ſomething to fear (r)."

(r) Richardſoniana, p. 111.

His Lordſhip, however, kept on good terms with Swift, and obliged him by conferring preferment on Dr. Sheridan, and others of his friends. Even in the Drapier's Letters, the Dean expreſſed a very high opinion of the Lord Lieutenant. Having obſerved, that the Crown could not devolve upon another the power of obliging the people to accept of Wood's money in payment, he adds: "This I ſpeak with the utmoſt "reſpect to the perſon and dignity of his Excellency the Lord Carteret, whoſe character "was lately given me by a gentleman, that hath known him from his firſt appearance "in the world. That gentleman deſcribes him as a young man of great accompliſh- "ments, excellent learning, regular in his life, and of much ſpirit and vivacity. He "hath ſince, as I have heard, been employed abroad; was principal Secretary of State; "and is now, about the thirty-ſeventh year of his age, appointed Lord Lieutenant of "Ireland. From ſuch a governor, this kingdom may reaſonably hope for as much "proſperity as, under ſo many diſcouragements, it can be capable of receiving (s)." Beſides revoking Wood's patent, Lord Carteret's adminiſtration was, in other reſpects, very acceptable and beneficial to the Iriſh. He diſcharged the duties of his high ſtation, in general, with wiſdom and fidelity, and the people were happy under his government (t). On the 21ſt of September, 1725, his Excellency went with the uſual ſtate to the Houſe of Peers, and being attended there by the Commons, delivered a ſpeech from the throne. The ſeſſion, which was conducted with great harmony, and in which ſeveral acts were paſſed, evidently calculated for the good of the kingdom, was concluded by him, with the ſame ſolemnities, on the 3d of March, 1725-6 (u). After this, his Lordſhip having conſtituted Hugh, Archbiſhop of Armagh, R. Weſt, Lord Chancellor, and William Conolly, Eſq; Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, Lords Juſtices during his abſence, embarked for England, where he arrived in May, 1726, and received his Majeſty's approbation of his prudent conduct (w). During the times of his abſence from Ireland, the Primate Boulter kept up a continual correſpondence with him; and from that excellent Prelate's letters, may be learned many particulars concerning the ſtate of affairs, and the characters of perſons, in that kingdom, by thoſe who have the curioſity to enquire into the ſubject (x). On the 24th of January, 1726-27, Lord Carteret ably defended the King's ſpeech, which had been warmly animadverted upon by the oppoſition. In his Lordſhip's reply, there is one paſſage which ſhews the opinion he then entertained, concerning the general nature of a commerce to the Eaſt-Indies. Having taken notice that our ſhare in the Eaſt-India trade was neither ſo inconſiderable nor ſo unprofitable as ſome had been pleaſed to repreſent it, he added, that, indeed, as that commerce drained Europe of a great quantity of ſilver, and returned only trifling commodities, which ſerved to feed luxury, and which conſequently might well be ſpared, it ought, perhaps, to be wiſhed, that it might be entirely laid aſide. Such were the ſentiments which the wiſeſt politicians were then diſpoſed to entertain, concerning an object which hath ſince become of ſuch mighty importance in a national view. His Lordſhip, however, was of opinion, that the trade to the Eaſt-Indies ought not to be laid aſide, without the general conſent of all the nations concerned in it; becauſe, otherwiſe, they who gave it up would be obliged, at a dear rate, to purchaſe of them who ſhould carry it on, thoſe commodities which cuſtom had rendered in a manner neceſſary (y). On the 31ſt of May, 1727, Lord Carteret was appointed one of the Chief Juſtices for the adminiſtration of the government during his Majeſty's abſence. The ſame honour had been conferred upon him on the firſt of June, 1725. Upon the deceaſe of George the Firſt, who died ſuddenly at Oſnabrug, in his way to Hanover, on the 11th of June, 1727, Lord Carteret was one of the old Privy Council who aſſembled at Leiceſter Houſe, where the new King was proclaimed. This was on the 14th of June, and the ſame day he was ſworn of his Majeſty's Privy Council. On the 29th of July following, he was again appointed Lord Lieutenant and chief Governor of the kingdom of Ireland. Thither he paſſed over in the ſucceeding November, in conſequence of the calling of a new Parliament. On the 28th of the ſame month, (s) Swift's works, vol. x. p. 97, 98.

(t) Britiſh Biography, ubi ſupra.

(u) Hiſtorical Regiſter, vol. x. p. 280—299. Ibid. vol. xi. p. 1—16. 94—102.

(w) Collins, ubi ſupra.

(x) See Boulter's Letters, vol. the firſt, paſſim; where are ſeveral particulars relative to Lord Carteret's ſecond, as well as his firſt Adminiſtration in Ireland.

(y) Lords Debates, ubi ſupra, p. 462.

month, the Parliament was opened, by his Excellency, with the uſual ſolemnities; and the ſeſſion continued till the 6th of May, 1728, when he gave the royal aſſent to twenty public acts, and concluded with a ſpeech, expreſſive of his high regard for the welfare of the kingdom. After this, having conſtituted the Archbiſhop of Armagh, Thomas Windham, Eſq; Lord Chancellor, and William Conolly, Eſq; Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, Lords Juſtices, during his abſence, he embarked for England, and arrived at St. James's about the middle of May. In 1729, Lord Carteret returned again to Ireland, and held another ſeſſion of Parliament, which began on the 23d of September, and ended on the 15th of April, 1730 (z). His Lordſhip's ſecond Vicegerency over the Iriſh nation, was as popular, if not more ſo, as the firſt. The many excellent laws that paſſed under his government, will be monuments to poſterity of his wiſe adminiſtration (a). His polite and ſociable manners were, likewiſe, highly acceptable to all ranks of people. What particularly recommended him was, his being above the little diſtinctions of party. He maintained a good correſpondence with ſeveral of thoſe who were called or reputed Tories, and occaſionally diſtributed a few preferments, of no great ſignificance, in that line. This having excited the complaint of ſome of the bigotted Whigs, gave occaſion to a facetious and ſenſible tract of Dr. Swift's, entitled, "A Vindication of his Excellency John Lord Carteret, from the "Charge of favouring none but Tories, High-church-men, and Jacobites." In this tract, the futility and folly of the accuſations brought againſt his Lordſhip are well expoſed (b). With Dr. Swift the Lord Lieutenant appears to have maintained a ſtrict friendſhip; and he was ſolicitous to act agreeably to the Dean's views of the intereſt of the kingdom. In one of his letters, written to the Dean ſome years afterwards, he thus expreſſes himſelf; "When people aſk me how I governed Ireland? I ſay, that I "pleaſed Dr. Swift (c)." The editor of Archbiſhop Boulter's letters ſeems to think, that this doth not redound to the honour of Lord Carteret (d); but we ſee no reaſon to believe that it derogates from his character, or from the wiſdom of his adminiſtration. The preferments which his Excellency beſtowed, at the inſtance of the Dean of St. Patrick's, were conferred on learned and worthy men, who did not diſgrace their recommender; and whatever may be thought of the pride, petulance, and peculiarities of Swift, it cannot rationally be denied, that he was ſincerely devoted to the welfare of the Iriſh nation. The great advantages which, with ſo much equity and good policy, have lately been granted to Ireland, and which that country would not have dared to expect at the period we are writing of, will never permit us to look back with a favourable eye on the narrow meaſures of former times, or to think that the indulgences of Lord Carteret were deſerving of cenſure. His Lordſhip, having continued the uſual time allotted to his high office, quitted it in 1730, and was ſucceeded by the Duke of Dorſet (e).

We now come to a part of Lord Carteret's life, including nearly twelve years; which, if we were to judge of it from the Peerages, and other biographical works, we might ſuppoſe to have been ſpent in the utmoſt inactivity. The very contrary, however, will be found to be the truth of the caſe: for though his Lordſhip was in no department of government from 1730 to 1742, his abilities were far from lying torpid. Hitherto his parliamentary talents had been exerted only on the ſide of Adminiſtration; but from this time he engaged in the grand oppoſition, that was carried on ſo long, and with ſo much pertinacity, againſt Sir Robert Walpole. In this oppoſition he took a very diſtinguiſhed part, and was one of its ableſt and moſt ſpirited leaders. There was ſcarcely any motion or queſtion on which his eloquence was not diſplayed. His powers of oratory are allowed to have been eminently great; and it is highly probable, that they were invigorated and increaſed by that ſuperior ardour which naturally accompanies an attack upon the meaſures of Government. If ſevere criticiſm were to examine all the ſpeeches of Lord Carteret in this mighty conteſt, it might, perhaps, be ſaid, that ſome of them would not appear entirely conſiſtent with thoſe which were delivered by him when he was employed by the Crown. The whole of what we can alledge, in anſwer to ſuch a charge, is, that different ſituations give riſe to different ſentiments, and that modern patriotiſm doth not always preſent to us uniform objects and characters. But, though men are changeable, this ought not to excite in us any prejudice againſt the topics upon which they inſiſt, when engaged on the ſide of oppoſition. Perſons who are out of power would not ſo ſtrenuouſly enlarge upon the neceſſity of good œconomy in government, upon the danger of large ſtanding armies, upon the importance of reſtraining the undue influence of the Crown, and upon the utility of ſhortening the duration of Parliaments, unleſs ſuch things were right in themſelves, agreeable to the principles of the conſtitution, and adapted to the wiſhes, feelings, and intereſts of the bulk of the people. Were we to mention every occaſion on which Lord Carteret exerted his oratorical abilities, this article would be extended to an undue length. We ſhall content ourſelves, therefore, with ſpecifying the more eminent debates in which he appeared. His courſe of oppoſition began, by his moving, on the 21ſt of January, 1730-31, for a clauſe of addition to be made, in the addreſs of the Peers,

(a) Britiſh Biog. ubi ſupra, p. 48.

(b) Swift's works, vol. x. p. 248—273.

(c) Ibid. vol. xxi. p. 234.

(d) Boulter's Letters, vol. i. p. 281.

(e) Collins's Peerage, ubi ſupra.

(z) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 404, 405. Hiſtorical Regiſter, vol. xiii. p. 10—49. 192—200. Ibid. vol. xv. p. 25—53. 77—131. 193—201.

Peers, in anſwer to the King's ſpeech. In the ſame ſeſſion of Parliament, he ſupported the bill, from the Commons, againſt Penſioners being permitted to ſit in that Houſe; and defended the motion for an application to his Majeſty, that he would diſcharge the twelve thouſand Heſſian forces in the pay of Great-Britain (f). In the ſubſequent ſeſſion, which opened on the 13th of January, 1731-32, beſides ſpeaking in favour of the penſion bill, Lord Carteret exerted his whole ability againſt the paſſing of the act for reviving the ſalt duty. This tax he aſſerted to be grievous, pernicious, and inſupportable; oppreſſive to the lower part of the people; and dangerous to public liberty, by the numerous dependents it would create upon the Crown. When the bill was read the third time, he ſaid, that he would not let that opportunity ſlip of once more declaring his opinion againſt it. It was, he thought, the worſt bill that had ever been brought before that Houſe. He would not repeat what he had already alledged in oppoſition to it, as he was perſuaded that he had proved it to be contrary to the intereſt of England, contrary to the intereſt of Scotland, deſtructive to the landed intereſt, deſtructive to the trading intereſt; and, what was worſt of all, that it would ruin the conſtitution (g). At preſent, whatever opinion may be formed againſt the political wiſdom and expedience of reviving the ſalt duty, it will ſcarcely be ſuppoſed, that it was a meaſure which required to be condemned in ſuch ſtrong language. In the next year, the grand objects that engaged the attention of the Minority, were, the motion for the reduction of the land forces; the produce of the forfeited eſtates of the South-Sea Directors in 1720; and the bill for granting eighty thouſand pounds for the Princeſs Royal's marriage ſettlement, and a ſum out of the ſinking fund; on which occaſions Lord Carteret diſplayed his uſual energy and eloquence (h). Concerning the affair of the South-Sea Directors, he ſpoke no leſs than ſix different times. In the ſeſſion which began on the 17th of January, 1733-34, his Lordſhip, beſides enlarging on the other topics of oppoſition, made the motion for an addreſs to the King, to know who had adviſed the removal of the Duke of Bolton and Lord Cobham from their regiments; and took the lead in the memorable debate which aroſe upon that queſtion (i). In the following year, he was the propoſer of an amendment to the Lords addreſs; but he doth not appear to have engaged in the grand conteſt, concerning the complaint of undue influence in the election for the ſixteen Peers of Scotland. Lord Carteret aſſumed an active part in the other matters that were agitated during the ſeſſion (k). The next ſeſſion was not remarkably diſtinguiſhed by the occaſions that called forth the exertions of his Lordſhip's eloquence. He ſupported, as uſual, the amendment propoſed in the Lords addreſs, and ſpoke in favour of the commitment of the Quaker's tythe bill (l). It is obſervable that, about this time, Dr. Swift had ſome doubts concerning Lord Carteret's ſteadineſs in the cauſe of oppoſition. In a letter written to Mr. Pulteney, the Dean ſays, "Will you engage your friend Carteret to oppoſe any ſtep towards arbi"trary power? He hath promiſed me, under a penalty, that he will continue firm;
"and yet ſome reports go here of him, that have a little diſconcerted me. Learning
"and good ſenſe he hath, to a great degree, if the love of riches and power do not
"overbalance (m)." Dr. Swift's ſuſpicions were groundleſs; for in the ſeſſion of Parliament which opened on the firſt of February, 1736-7, his Lordſhip diſtinguiſhed himſelf greatly in the ſeveral queſtions concerning the riots at Edinburgh, and the affair of Captain Porteous; and he was the mover, in the Houſe of Peers, for the ſettlement of an hundred thouſand pounds a year, out of the Civil Liſt, upon the Prince of Wales; a matter which excited a very long and violent debate (n). Lord Carteret was equally active in the warm debates of the ſubſequent ſeſſion, concerning the army, and the Spaniſh depredations (o). But there was no occaſion upon which he more eminently diſplayed his parliamentary abilities, than in all the tranſactions relative to the convention with Spain. When that treaty was laid before the Houſe, on the fifth of February, 1738-9, his Lordſhip began the debate upon it; and he ſuſtained it, in various replies, with the greateſt energy and ſpirit. He exerciſed the ſame vigour with regard to all the motions and queſtions of that buſy ſeſſion; and it is evident, from the records of the times, that he was the prime leader of oppoſition, in the upper Houſe (p). This character was preſerved by Lord Carteret in the Parliament which met on the 15th of November, 1739, and ended on the 29th of April, 1740 (q); and it eminently appeared, in the following ſeſſion, when the Minority exerted their whole ſtrength to overturn the Adminiſtration; and with the more flattering hopes of ſucceſs, as all the abilities and addreſs of the Prime Miniſter had not enabled him to prevent a war from breaking out with Spain. Beſides various other attacks upon him, it was, at length, agreed upon by the Minority, that a motion ſhould be made to addreſs his Majeſty, that he would graciouſly be pleaſed to remove Sir Robert Walpole from his preſence and councils for ever. The motion took place on the ſame day, being February the 13th, 1740-41, in both Houſes of Parliament. In the Houſe of Peers the matter was opened by Lord Carteret, who ſummoned up all his eloquence on the occaſion, and prefaced his propoſal with the longeſt, as well as the ableſt ſpeech, that he ever appears to have delivered. The debate, which is eminently famous in our Parliamentary Hiſtory, laſted two

(f) Lords Debates, vol. iv. p. 38. 44. 49.

(g) Ibid. p. 55—57. 66—74. 88, 89.

(h) Ibid. p. 111—119. 133—135. 136—138. 143, 144. 155—157. 160—164. 170, 171. 175, 176.

(i) Ibid. p. 207. 220. 222. 234. 252—257. 276, 277.

(k) Ibid. p. 360. 443. 448. 460. 477.

(l) Lords Debates, vol. v. p. 14. 92. 134.

(m) Swift's works, vol. xxi. p. 225, 226.

(n) Lords Debates, ubi ſupra, p. 136—143. 153, 154. 158. 161. 165. 168. 179.

(o) Ibid. p. 238. 253. 326. 335, 336.

(p) Ibid. vol. v. p. 402. vol. vi. p. 1. 5. 7, 8, 9. 19. 37. 40—42. 55—71. 106—115. 189, 190. 199—207. 230—232.

(q) Ibid. p. 256—266. 346, 347. 350—356. 366—372. 401—408.

two days (r). A year after this celebrated motion, the views of oppoſition were attained, ſo far as related to the diſplacing of Sir Robert Walpole, and the acquiſition of Court preferments; for as to any advantages to be gained on the part of the people, or to the removal of the evils which ſo long had been the ſubject of complaint, they do not ſeem to have been thought of, or entertained. On the 11th of February, 1741-42, that great Miniſter, who had been created Earl of Orford, reſigned all his places; and, among the other changes which attended that event, Lord Carteret, on the following day, was appointed one of his Majeſty's principal Secretaries of State. His Lordſhip had been a very little while in this employment before we find him changing his parliamentary language. On the 25th of March, he oppoſed the motion for the commitment of the penſion bill, and did not ſlightly contribute towards its being rejected. In the caſe, likewiſe, of the bill to indemnify evidences againſt Robert Earl of Orford, he ſpoke againſt it at large; not conſiſtently, perhaps, with his former conduct, but, however, with ſome good appearance of reaſon (s). In September, 1742, Lord Carteret was ſent to the States General, to concert meaſures with them, in that critical juncture, for the maintenance of the liberties of the United Provinces, and the benefit of the common cauſe (t). Soon after his return, in the ſeſſion of Parliament which began on the 16th of November, he ſupported the addreſs of thanks for his Majeſty's ſpeech, and oppoſed the motion for diſcharging the Hanoverian troops in Britiſh pay. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf, alſo, in favour of the bill for retailing ſpirituous liquors, through the ſeveral debates which aroſe during the progreſs of that bill (u). In 1743, he waited upon his Majeſty at Hanover, who, before his leaving St. James's, had appointed him one of the Lords Juſtices of the kingdom. His Lordſhip attended his royal Maſter through the whole intereſting campaign of that year, in which the battle of Dettingen was fought; and the King placed the greateſt confidence in his counſels. To this confidence Lord Carteret was the more entitled, as it is generally allowed that he was eminently ſkilled in foreign affairs. On the death of his mother, upon the 18th of October, 1744, he ſucceeded to the titles of Viſcount Carteret and Earl Granville. A few weeks after this event (w), he reſigned the ſeals as Secretary of State. He had engroſſed the royal favour ſo much, that the Duke of Newcaſtle and Mr. Henry Pelham are thought to have taken umbrage at his influence and greatneſs. He had, alſo, incurred the reſentment of the patriotic party, whom he had ſuddenly forſaken, ſo that he had entirely loſt his popularity. The two brothers, who were very powerful by their parliamentary intereſt, engaged in a political alliance, with the leading men in the oppoſition, againſt the Prime Miniſter (for ſuch he now was) and his meaſures. Earl Granville, perceiving the gathering ſtorm, and being ſenſible of the impoſſibility of withſtanding ſuch a combination in Parliament, wiſely avoided the impending danger and diſgrace, by a voluntary reſignation of his employments (x). King George the Second, with reluctance, parted with a Miniſter, who had gained his perſonal affection by his great knowledge of the affairs of Europe, by his enterprizing genius, and, above all, by his ready compliance with the favourite views and prejudices of his royal Maſter (y). In the beginning of the year 1746, his Lordſhip made an effort to retrieve his influence in the Cabinet, and his pretenſions were highly favoured by his Sovereign. The Duke of Newcaſtle, however, and Mr. Pelham, who knew his aſpiring diſpoſition, and dreaded his ſuperior talents, refuſed to admit ſuch a colleague into Adminiſtration. To avoid an event ſo diſagreeable to them, they reſolved to ſtrengthen their party, by introducing freſh auxiliaries into the offices of State. The meaſure they purſued did not at firſt anſwer their purpoſe. Some of the perſons propoſed by them were ſo diſagreeable to his Majeſty in their private capacity, that he rejected the ſuit by which they were recommended. Upon this, the two Pelhams, the Earl of Harrington, and all the adherents of the Newcaſtle party, immediately reſigned their employments. Earl Granville was appointed Secretary of State, and reſumed the reins of Adminiſtration. This was on the 10th of February, 1745-46; but his power was of a very ſhort continuance. Finding that he could not counteract the accumulated oppoſition that preponderated againſt him; foreſeeing that he ſhould not be able to ſecure the ſupplies in Parliament; and dreading the conſequences of that confuſion which his reſtoration had already produced, he voluntarily quitted the helm; reſigning the ſeals on the 14th of February, four days after they had been put into his hands. The King, as well as the Miniſter, was obliged abſolutely to ſubmit to ſo formidable a confederacy. The Duke of Newcaſtle and the Earl of Harrington reſumed their poſts, as principal Secretaries of State; Mr. Pelham was again appointed firſt Lord of the Treaſury; other preferments took place according to the recommendation of the reſtored party; and ſeveral perſons were introduced into office, who had never before been in the ſervice of government (z). This hath ever been conſidered as one of the moſt remarkable inſtances, recorded in our Hiſtory, in which the Sovereign hath been ſurrounded, controlled, and even dictated to, by a particular ſet of men. The fact hath often been inſiſted upon, and held out as a leſſon of caution to future Princes. The terror of the example may poſſibly

(r) Lords Debates, vol. vii. p. 425—437. 470—476. 497—506. 597—604. 616, 617. 627—630. 641—662. 733. Vol. viii. p. 29—35.

(s) Ibid. p. 106. 119—129.

(t) Collins's Peerage, ubi ſupra.

(u) Lords Debates, ubi ſupra, p. 228—230. 250—253. 403—408. 421—424. 462, 463. 473—476.

(w) On the 24th of November.

(x) Collins, ubi ſupra. Britiſh Biography, ubi ſupra, p. 48.

(y) Maty's Life of Lord Cheſterfield, vol. i. p. 110.

(z) Britiſh Biography, ubi ſupra.

have been productive of great effects in the ſucceeding policy of government; effects which, perhaps, it is as little in the power, as it is in the inclination, of the writer of the preſent article fully to develope. Though Lord Granville was forcibly excluded from Adminiſtration by his political antagoniſts, they were not able to prevent his receiving perſonal marks of favour from the royal hand. On the 22d of June, 1749, he was elected, at Kenſington, one of the Knights Companions of the moſt noble order of the Garter, together with his preſent Majeſty, the Margrave of Anſpach, the Duke of Leeds, the Duke of Bedford, and the Earl of Albemarle; and he was inſtalled with them at Windſor, on the 12th of July, 1750. In the next year, his Lordſhip was again brought into the Miniſtry, in connection with the very men by whom he had been ſo long and ſo warmly oppoſed. He was then (a) conſtituted Preſident of the King's moſt honourable Privy Council; an office for which he was admirably fitted by his eminent abilities, his diſtinguiſhed eloquence, and his large experience in public buſineſs. It was probably from a ſenſe of theſe qualifications, that, notwithſtanding the various revolutions of Adminiſtration, he was continued in this high poſt till his deceaſe. When his Majeſty went to Hanover, in 1752, Earl Granville was appointed one of the Lords Juſtices of the kingdom; and he was in the commiſſions for opening and concluding the ſeſſion of Parliament, which began on the thirty-firſt of May, 1754, and ended on the fifth of June following (b). If we are rightly informed, the laſt time in which he ſpoke in the Houſe of Peers, was in the famous debate at the third reading of the militia bill, on the 24th of May, 1756. He had requeſted the Lords to be ſummoned upon the occaſion, and declared that he had very powerful reaſons to urge againſt the bill. That his ſpeech, however, did not anſwer to his Lordſhip's own promiſes, or to the expectation of the public, is not only the opinion of the writer of this article, who heard the debate, but, it is apprehended, of every other perſon who had the ſame entertainment. It was Lord Hardwicke, who, on the ſame ſide of the queſtion, bore away the prize of eloquence in that day's celebrated conteſt. When, in October, 1761, Mr. Pitt propoſed, in council, an immediate declaration of war with Spain, and urged the meaſure with his uſual energy, threatening a reſignation, if his advice ſhould not be adopted, Lord Granville is ſaid to have replied to him in the following terms: "I find the gentleman is determined to leave us; nor can I ſay I am ſorry for it, ſince "he would have certainly compelled us to leave him. But if he be reſolved to "aſſume the right of adviſing his Majeſty, and directing the operations of the war, to "what purpoſe are we called to this council? When he talks of being reſponſible to "the people, he talks the language of the Houſe of Commons; and forgets, that, at "this board, he is only reſponſible to the King. However, though he may poſſibly "have convinced himſelf of his infallibility, ſtill it remains that we ſhould be equally "convinced, before we can reſign our underſtandings to his direction, or join with him "in the meaſure he propoſes (c)." The laſt act of Earl Granville's political life is thus related by Mr. Wood, in the preface to his Eſſay on the original Genius and Writings of Homer. "Being directed to wait upon his Lordſhip, a few days before he died, with the preliminary articles of the Treaty of Paris, I found him ſo languid, that I propoſed poſtponing my buſineſs for another time: but he inſiſted that I ſhould ſtay, ſaying, it could not prolong his life, to neglect his duty; and repeating the following paſſage, out of Sarpedon's ſpeech, he dwelled with particular emphaſis on the third line, which recalled to his mind the diſtinguiſhing part he had taken in public affairs.

(a) June the 17th, 1751.

(b) Collins's Peerage, ubi ſupra.

(c) Annual Regiſter for the year 1761. p. 44.

Ω τεπον, ει μεν γαρ τολεμον τερι τονδε φυγοντες,
Αιει δη μελλοιμεν αγηρω τ' αθαναΐω τε
Εσσεσθ', ΟΥΤΕ ΚΕΝ ΑΥΤΟΣ ΕΝΙ ΠΡΩΤΟΙΣΙ ΜΑΧΟΙΜΗΝ,
Ουτε κε σε ξελλοιμι μαχην ες κυδιανειραν·
Νυν δ', εμπης γαρ κηρες εφεξασιν Θανατοιο
Μυριαι, ας κ εξι φυγειν βροτον, ουδ' υπαλυξαι.
Ιομεν· Il. xii. 322.

Could all our care elude the gloomy grave,
Which claims no leſs the fearful than the brave,
For luſt of fame, I ſhould not vainly dare
In fighting fields, nor urge thy ſoul to war.
But ſince, alas! ignoble age muſt come,
Diſeaſe, and death's inexorable doom;
The life, which others pay, let us beſtow,
And give to Fame, what we to Nature owe.

POPE'S HOM. Il. xii. 387.

"His Lordſhip repeated the laſt word ſeveral times with a calm and determinate reſignation: and after a ſerious pauſe of ſome minutes, he deſired to hear the Treaty read; to which he liſtened with great attention: and recovered ſpirits enough to declare the approbation approbation of a dying Stateſman (I uſe his own words) on the moſt glorious War, and moſt honourable Peace, this nation ever ſaw (d)." In other reſpects Lord Granville ſo much retained his vivacity to the cloſe of his life, as to be able to break out into ſallies of wit and humour. Having, in his laſt illneſs, ſaluted a fair Lady who viſited him, he ſaid, "Madam, I know that your gin is good; I can tell it by the ſmack of your lips." His Lordſhip's deceaſe was on the ſecond of January, 1763, in the ſeventy-third year of his age. He was twice married; firſt, at Long-Leat, on the 17th of October, 1710, to Frances, only daughter of Sir Robert Worſley, Bart. and ſecondly, on the 14th of April, 1744, to Lady Sophia, daughter of Thomas Earl of Pomfret. By his former wife he had three ſons and five daughters; by the latter only one daughter [B]. His firſt lady, who is mentioned by Dr. Swift, as being poſſeſſed of great goodneſs and beauty (e), died at Hanover, on the 9th of June, 1743. His ſecond lady was carried off by a fever, on the 7th of October, 1745, a few weeks after the birth of her daughter.

(d) Preface to the Eſſay, p. viii. note.

(e) Swift's works, vol. xvi. p. 22.

Lord Granville's character hath been drawn as follows, by the late Earl of Cheſterfield. "Lord Granville had great parts, and a moſt uncommon ſhare of learning for a man of quality. He was one of the beſt ſpeakers in the Houſe of Lords, both in the declamatory and the argumentative way. He had a wonderful quickneſs and preciſion in ſeizing the ſtreſs of a queſtion, which no art, no ſophiſtry, could diſguiſe in him. In buſineſs he was bold, enterprizing, and overbearing. He had been bred up in high monarchical, that is, tyrannical principles of government, which his ardent and imperious temper made him think were the only rational and practicable ones. He would have been a great firſt Miniſter in France, little inferior, perhaps, to Richelieu; in this government, which is yet free, he would have been a dangerous one, little leſs ſo, perhaps, than Lord Strafford. He was neither ill-natured nor vindictive, and had a great contempt for money. His ideas were all above it. In ſocial life he was an agreeable, good-humoured, and inſtructive companion; a great but entertaining talker. He degraded himſelf by the vice of drinking, which, together with a great ſtock of Greek and Latin, he brought away with him from Oxford, and retained and practiſed ever afterwards. By his own induſtry, he had made himſelf maſter of all the modern languages, and had acquired a great knowledge of the law. His political knowledge of the intereſt of Princes and of commerce was extenſive, and his notions were juſt and great. His character may be ſummed up, in nice preciſion, quick deciſion, and unbounded preſumption (f)." We ſhall add a ſpirited portrait of his Lordſhip, in verſe, which hath been aſcribed to the Honourable Mr. Horace Walpole.

(f) Cheſterfield's Characters, quarto edition, p. 36.

"Commanding beauty, ſmooth'd by chearful grace,
Sat on the open features of his face:
Bold was his language, rapid, glowing, ſtrong,
And ſcience flow'd ſpontaneous from his tongue.
A genius, ſeizing ſyſtems, ſlighting rules,
And void of gall, with boundleſs ſcorn of fools.
Ambition dealt her flambeau to his hand,
And Bacchus ſprinkled fuel on the brand.
His wiſh—to counſel Monarchs, or controul;
His means—th' impetuous ardour of his ſoul:
For, while his views outſtript a mortal ſpan,
Nor prudence drew, nor craft purſu'd the plan.

[B] By his former wife he had three ſons and five daughters; by the latter only one daughter.] Of the three ſons, the two eldeſt died young. Robert, the third ſon, ſucceeded his father in title and eſtate; but departed this life, unmarried, ſome years ſince, by which means the honours of the family became extinct. Beſides his paternal poſſeſſions in England, and thoſe of his grandfather, Sir Robert Worſley, he was entitled to an eighth part of the Provinces of North and South Carolina. His great anceſtor, Sir George Carteret, had been one of the eight original proprietors of theſe Colonies, and the family had not given up their right, when the heirs of the other ſeven proprietors, for certain valuable conſiderations, ſurrendered their reſpective ſhares to the Crown. John Lord Carteret, in 1742, being then Secretary of State, brought, by petition, his claim before the Privy Council, which was allowed of and approved; and Commiſſioners were appointed to allot to the ſaid Lord Carteret one full eighth part of the Provinces of Carolina. This was accordingly done, and the land ſet out for him was an entire ſeparate diſtrict in the Province of North Carolina, next adjoining, and contiguous to the Province of Virginia. So large an inheritance, if duly attended to, might at that time have become a great object; but being neglected both by John and Robert Earl Granville, it hath not, we believe, been ever of much advantage to the family; and in the preſent ſtate of America, it may probably be conſidered as totally loſt.

Of Lord Granville's five daughters, the firſt died in her infancy. The ſecond married the Earl of Dyſert; the third Lord Viſcount Weymouth; the fourth the Honourable John Spencer, and, after his deceaſe, Earl Cowper; and the fifth the Marquis of Tweedale. Lord Granville's daughter, by his ſecond lady, married the Earl of Shelburne (4).

(4) Collins's Peerage, ubi ſupra, p. 406—416.

There is a circumſtance relative te Sir George Carteret, omitted in the Peerages, which never record any thing but what is thought to redound to the honour of the perſons they deſcribe: it is, that he was expelled the Houſe of Commons, in 1669, for being deeply concerned, as Vice Chamberlain, in the receiving of money out of the Exchequer, by the authority of the Privy Seal, without ſpecifying any of the particular ſervices for which the ſums were to be employed (5).

(5) Mrs. Macaulay Graham's Hiſtory of England, vol. vi. p. 281.

Swift fell the ſcaffold of his airy pride,
But, ſlightly built, diffus'd no ruin wide.
Unhurt, undaunted, undiſturb'd he fell,
Could laugh the ſame, and the ſame ſtories tell:
And more a ſage than he, who bade await
His revels, till his conqueſts were complete,
Our jovial Stateſman either ſail unfurl'd,
And drank his bottle, tho' he miſs'd the world (g) !"

(g) Annual Regiſter for 1762, p. 225, ſecond part.

The late Duke of Newcaſtle uſed to ſay of Lord Granville, that he was a man who never doubted (h). From his Lordſhip's acknowledged literature, it may naturally be ſuppoſed that he patronized learned men, and learned undertakings. His regard to Dr. Swift, and his attention to the Dean's recommendations, we have already mentioned. He aſſiſted and encouraged Mr. Lye, in his edition of Junius's Etymologicon. Of Dr. Taylor, the celebrated Grecian, he was the particular patron. The Doctor owed his principal preferments to Lord Granville; and he hath teſtified his gratitude, in the dedication of his Demoſthenes, by warmly celebrating his Lordſhip's excellencies, and eſpecially his eloquence, and his eminent ſkill in the ancient and modern languages. Our learned Peer engaged Dr. Bentley to undertake an edition of Homer, and was very active in procuring the Doctor the uſe of manuſcripts, and other neceſſary aids, for that purpoſe (i). Dr. Bentley, when he came to town, was accuſtomed, in his viſits to Lord Carteret, ſometimes to ſpend the evenings with his Lordſhip. One day old Lady Granville reproached her ſon with keeping the country Clergyman, who was with him the night before, till he was intoxicated. Lord Carteret denied the charge; upon which the lady replied, that the Clergyman could not have ſung in ſo ridiculous a manner, unleſs he had been in liquor. The truth of the caſe was, that the ſinging thus miſtaken by her Ladyſhip, was Dr. Bentley's endeavour to inſtruct and entertain his noble friend, by reciting Terence according to the true cantilena of the ancients.] K.

(h) From the information of Dr. Salter.

(i) Gent. Mag. vol. xlix. p. 283, 284.

 [CARTWRIGHT (THOMAS), a Puritan Divine of great learning and eminence, was born in Hertfordſhire, about the year 1535 (a). Having been kept at a Grammar-ſchool till he was fit for the Univerſity, he was ſent to Cambridge, where he was admitted into St. John's College in 1550. He applied himſelf to his ſtudies with uncommon aſſiduity; and being poſſeſſed of excellent natural parts, he made a great proficiency in learning. It is ſaid, that he allowed himſelf no more than five hours ſleep in the night, and that he adhered to this cuſtom to the end of his life (b). Upon the death of King Edward VI. when he had been about three years at the Univerſity, he quitted that ſeat of learning, and became Clerk to a Counſellor at Law. But this did not prevent him from continuing to proſecute his former ſtudies, in which he took more delight than in the profeſſion of the Law. He remained in this ſituation till the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the gentleman under whom he was placed as a Clerk, having met with Dr. Pilkington, maſter of St. John's College in Cambridge, he made him acquainted with his ſtrong attachment to the purſuits of literature. In conſequence of this, the Doctor deſired to have ſome converſation with Mr. Cartwright; when being convinced of his great abilities and attainments, he offered to take him back again to St. John's College, to which his maſter conſented. He accordingly returned to the Univerſity; and in the year 1560, was choſen Fellow of St. John's College. About three years after he was removed to a Fellowſhip in Trinity College, where, on account of his great merit, he was ſhortly after made one of the eight ſenior Fellows (c).

(a) Clarke's Lives of thirty-two Engliſh Divines, famous in their generations for learning and piety, p. 16. third edit.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid.

In 1564, Queen Elizabeth viſited the Univerſity of Cambridge, and remained there five days, viewing the ſeveral Colleges, and hearing public ſpeeches and diſputations. Mr. Strype ſays, that "the ripeſt and moſt learned men were ſelected for the diſputants (d);" Mr. Cartwright was one of theſe; and appears on this occaſion to have greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf (e). In 1567, he commenced Batchelor of Divinity; and, three years after, was choſen to be Lady Margaret's Divinity-reader. It is particularly mentioned, that he read upon the firſt and ſecond chapters of the Acts of the Apoſtles, and performed it with ſuch acuteneſs of wit, and ſuch ſolidity of judgment, as excited the admiration of his hearers. He alſo became ſo famous as a preacher, that when it came to his turn to preach at St. Mary's Church, the Sexton was obliged to take down the windows, on account of the multitudes that came to hear him (f).

(d) Annals of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 403.

(e) Clarke, ut ſupra.

(f) Id. ibid.

Mr. Cartwright took occaſion, in his lectures, to deliver his ſentiments concerning Church-diſcipline, which being unfavourable to the eſtabliſhed hierarchy, public accuſations were ſoon exhibited againſt him: though Mr. Strype ſays, that "he had, indeed, "a great party in the Univerſity, and ſome of them men of learning, who ſtuck cloſe "to him, exceedingly admiring him; though ſome of them, better informed, fell off "afterwards (g)." Archbiſhop Grindal wrote a letter to Sir William Cecil, Chancellor of the Univerſity, on the 23d of June, 1570, requeſting him to take ſome ſpeedy courſe againſt Mr. Cartwright; alledging, that in his readings, he daily made invectives againſt the external policy, and diſtinction of States, in the eccleſiaſtical government; in conſequence of which the youth of the Univerſity, who frequented his lectures in great numbers, "were in danger to be poiſoned with a love of contention, and a liking "of novelty (b)." He therefore recommended, that the Chancellor ſhould write to the Vice-Chancellor, to enjoin ſilence upon Cartwright and all his adherents, both in ſchools and pulpits; and afterwards, upon examination, and hearing of the matters before him, and ſome of the heads of houſes, to reduce the offenders to conformity, or to expel them out of the Colleges, or the Univerſity, as the cauſe ſhould require; and alſo that the Vice-Chancellor ſhould not ſuffer Mr. Cartwright to take his degree of Doctor of Divinity at the approaching commencement, for which he had applied (i). Dr. Whitgift alſo zealouſly oppoſed Cartwright, and wrote another letter to the Chancellor upon the occaſion, communicating to him not only what Cartwright had "openly "taught," but alſo "what he had uttered to him in private conference [A]."

(g) Strype's Annals of the Reformation, vol. ii. p. 2.

(b) Strype, ubi ſupra, vol. i. p. 584, 585.

(i) Id. ibid.

Mr. Cartwright vindicated his conduct in a letter to Sir William Cecil, dated the 9th of July; in which he declared his extreme averſion to every thing that was ſeditious and contentious; and affirmed that he had taught nothing, but what naturally flowed from the text concerning which he had treated. He obſerved, that when an occaſion offered itſelf of ſpeaking concerning the habits, he had waved it: though he acknowledged that he had taught, that the Miniſtry of the Church of England had declined from the Miniſtry of the antient and apoſtolical Church, and that he wiſhed it to be reſtored to greater purity. But theſe ſentiments, he ſaid, he had delivered calmly and ſedately, and in ſuch a manner as could give offence to none but the ignorant or the malignant, and thoſe who were eager to catch at ſomething to calumniate him. He aſſerted, that he had the utmoſt reaſon to believe, that he ſhould have obtained the teſtimony of the Univerſity in favour of his innocence, had not the Vice-Chancellor denied him a congregation. He ſolicited the protection of the Chancellor, ſo far as his cauſe was juſt; and tranſmitted to him a teſtimonial of his innocence, ſigned by ſeveral learned members of the Univerſity, and in which his abilities, learning, and integrity, were ſpoken of in very high terms (k).

(k) Strype's Annals, vol. ii. p. 2, 3. and Appendix, p. 1, 2, 3.

Sir William Cecil ſeems to have been inclined to treat Mr. Cartwright with candour and moderation: but his opponents continued to proſecute him with great animoſity. He was cited to appear before Dr. Mey, the Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity, and ſome of the heads of houſes, and examined upon ſundry articles of doctrine, ſaid to be delivered by him in his public lectures; and which were affirmed to be contrary to the religion received, and allowed, by public authority, in the realm of England: and it was demanded of him, whether he would ſtand to thoſe opinions and doctrines, or whether he would renounce them (l). Mr. Cartwright deſired, that he might be permitted to commit to writing what his judgment was upon the points in controverſy: which being aſſented to, he drew up ſix propoſitions to the following purport, and which he ſubſcribed with his own hand:

(l) Clarke, ubi ſupra, p. 17.

'I. The names and functions of Archbiſhops and Archdeacons ought to be abo-'liſhed.

'II. The offices of the lawful Miniſters of the Church, viz. Biſhops and Deacons, 'ought to be reduced to the apoſtolical inſtitution: Biſhops to preach the word of God 'and pray, and Deacons to be employed in taking care of the poor.

'III. The government of the Church ought not to be entruſted to Biſhops Chancel-'lors, or the officials of Archdeacons; but every Church ſhould be governed by its 'own Miniſter and Preſbyters.

'IV. Miniſters ought not to be at large, but every one ſhould have the charge of a 'certain flock.

'V. No man ſhould ſolicit, or ſtand as a candidate for the Miniſtry.

'VI. Biſhops ſhould not be created by civil authority, but ought to be openly and 'fairly choſen by the church (m).'

(m) Strype, ubi ſupra, vol. i. p. 588. Clarke, ut ſupra; and Neal's Hiſt. of the Puritans, vol. i. p. 176. 4to edit.

[A] What he had uttered to him in private conference.] Mr. Strype ſays, that Whitgift and Cartwright 'had often debates together, living in the 'ſame College: ſo the Doctor preſented in writing 'to the ſaid Chancellor, what Cartwright had uttered 'to him in private conference, and what he had alſo 'openly taught, viz. Firſt, that there ought not to 'be in the Church of Chriſt either Archbiſhops, 'Archdeacons, Deans, Chancellors, or any other, 'whereof mention is not expreſsly made in the 'Scripture. Secondly, that the office of the Biſhop 'and Deacon, as they were then in the Church of 'England, was not allowable. Thirdly, that there 'ought to be an equality of all Miniſters: and every 'one to be chief in his own cure. Fourthly, that 'miniſters ought to be choſen by the people, as they 'were in the Apoſtles time. Fifthly, that none 'ought to be a miniſter unleſs he have a cure. 'Sixthly, that a man muſt not preach out of his own 'cure. Seventhly, that the order of calling and 'making of miniſters now uſed in the Church of 'England, is extraordinary, and to be altered. And 'divers others depended on theſe, as he, the Chan-'cellor, might eaſily conjecture; which would breed 'a mere confuſion, if they ſhould take place (1).'

(1) Strype's Annals, vol. i. p. 588.

Some other propoſitions, which were ſaid to be dangerous and ſeditious [B], were alſo collected out of Mr. Cartwright's lectures, and ſent to court by Dr. Whitgift, to incenſe the Queen and Chancellor againſt him (n): and he was forbidden, by the Vice-Chancellor, and heads of the Univerſity, to read any more lectures, till they ſhould receive ſome ſatisfaction, that he would not continue to propagate the ſame opinions (o). He was alſo prevented from taking his Doctor's degree, by the authority of the Vice-Chancellor: which appears to have given great umbrage to many in the Univerſity, and to have occaſioned a conſiderable diſturbance (p).

(n) Neal, ut ſupra.

(o) Strype's Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift, p. 19.

(p) Strype's Annals, vol. i. p. 585.

In 1571, Dr. Whitgift became Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity; and by his influence more rigorous ſtatutes were procured [C] for its government (q): and Mr. Cartwright was deprived of his place of Margaret-profeſſor (r). But he ſtill continued ſenior Fellow of Trinity College; though the following year he was alſo deprived of his Fellowſhip, it being alledged, that he had forfeited it, by not entering into Prieſt's orders in due time, in conformity to the ſtatutes (s) [D]. Being thus driven from the Univerſity, (q) Strype's Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift, p. 18, 19.

(r) Strype's Annals, ubi ſupra, p. 589.

(s) Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift, p. 47.

[B] Some other propoſition, &c.] Theſe were the following:

'1. In reforming the Church, it is neceſſary to 'reduce all things to the apoſtolical inſtitution.

'2. No man ought to be admitted into the miniſtry, who is incapable of preaching.

'3. None but ſuch a miniſter of the word ought 'to pray publicly in the Church, or adminiſter the 'Sacraments.

'4. Popiſh ordinations are not valid.

'5. Only canonical Scripture ought to be read 'publicly in the Church.

'6. The public liturgy ſhould be ſo framed, that 'there be no private praying or reading in the 'Church, but that all the people attend to the 'prayers of the miniſter.

'7. The care of burying the dead does not belong 'more to the miniſterial office, than to the reſt of 'the Church.

'8. Equal reverence is due to all canonical Scripture, and to all the names of God: there is, therefore, no reaſon why the people ſhould ſtand at the 'reading of the goſpel, or bow at the name of Jeſus.

'9. It is as lawful to ſit at the Lord's Table, as 'to kneel or ſtand.

'10. The Lord's Supper ought not to be adminiſtered in private; nor ſhould baptiſm be adminiſtered by women or lay perſons.

'11. The ſign of the croſs in baptiſm is ſuperſtitious.

'12. It is reaſonable and proper, that the parent 'ſhould offer his own child to baptiſm, making a 'confeſſion of that faith he intends to educate it in, 'without being obliged to anſwer in the child's 'name, I will, I will not, I believe, &c. nor ought it 'to be allowed, that women or perſons under age 'ſhould be ſponſors.

'13. In giving names to children, it is convenient 'to avoid Paganiſm, as well as the names and offices 'of Chriſt, Angels, &c.

'14. It is Papiſtical to forbid marriages at certain 'times of the year; and to give licences in thoſe 'times is intolerable.

'15. Private marriages, that is, ſuch as are not 'publiſhed before the congregation, are highly inconvenient.

'16. The obſervation of Lent, and faſting on 'Fridays and Saturdays, is ſuperſtitious.

'17. The obſervation of feſtivals is unlawful.

'18. Trading, or keeping markets on the Lord's 'Day, is unlawful.

'19. In ordaining of miniſters, the pronouncing 'thoſe words, Receive thou the Holy Ghoſt, is both 'ridiculous and wicked.

'20. Kings and Biſhops ſhould not be anointed (2).'

(2) Neal's Hiſtory of the Puritans, vol. i. p. 176, 177.

[C] More rigorous ſtatutes were procured.] Strype ſays, 'the heads had now more power given them to 'correct and remedy diſorders in the members. 'Whereby they were enabled the better to proceed 'with this unreclaimable reader (Cartwright): as 'they had already made uſe of theſe ſtatutes with 'good ſucceſs againſt ſome followers of Cartwright: 'however, the younger ſort, for the reſtraining of 'their liberty, murmured, and grudged much at 'them. But the heads let the Chancellor know, 'that without them they could hardly have been 'able to keep the Univerſity in good order; the 'ſtomachs of ſome were ſo great, and the common 'ſort ſo inclined to novelties and contentious dealings (3).'

(3) Annals of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 588, 589.

[D] He was alſo deprived of his Fellowſhip, &c.] Mr. Neal ſays, 'Thus Dr. Whitgift routed his adverſary: he had already deprived him of his Profeſſor's chair, and of his degree of Doctor of Divinity, and being now Vice Chancellor of Cambridge, 'he got him expelled the Univerſity upon the following pretence: Mr. Cartwright being Senior-fellow of his College, was only in Deacon's orders; 'the Doctor being informed of this, and that the 'ſtatute, requiring ſuch to take upon them the office 'of Prieſthood, might be interpreted to Prieſt's orders, 'concluded he was perjured: upon which he ſummoned the Heads of Colleges together, and declared, that Mr. Cartwright had broken his oath; 'and, without any farther admonition, puſhed his 'intereſt among the maſters, to rid the College of a 'man, whoſe popularity was too great for his ambition, inſomuch that he declared he could not eſtabliſh order in the Univerſity, while a perſon of his 'principles was amongſt them (4).'

(4) Hiſt. of the Puritans, vol. i. p. 198.

Mr. Cartwright himſelf aſſerted, that the reaſon aſſigned for depriving him of his Fellowſhip, was "a mere cavil." "For," ſaid he, "the meaning "of the ſtatute of the houſe is, to provide that men "ſhould not turn their ſtudies to other profeſſions of "law, &c. but that there ſhould be to furniſh the "College of a number of preachers, of which I was "one, as ſoon as I entered. Neither was there any "duty of miniſtry, which the College could require "of me, that I was not enabled to do according to "the laws of the Church of England, by virtue of "that miniſtry which I had received. So that the "law itſelf (as that whoſe meaning was fulfilled "even with my entry) did not require it (5)."

(5) Epiſtle to the Church of England, prefixed to Cartwright's ſecond Reply againſt Whitgift.

Mr. Strype takes notice, that 'Whitgift, after 'Cartwright was put out of the College, accuſed 'him for going up and down idly, doing no good, 'but living at other men's tables (6).' Upon which Mr. Neal ſays, "How ungenerous was this! After "the Doctor had taken away his bread, and ſtopt "his mouth, that he might not preach, to reproach "him with doing no good, and being beholden to "his friends for a dinner (7)."

(6) Life of Whitgift, p. 64.

(7) Hiſt. of the Puritans, ubi ſupra, p. 200.

Mr. Cartwright himſelf ſays, "After he had "thruſt me out of the College, he accuſeth me for "going up and down, doing no good, and living "at other men's tables. That I was not idle, I "ſuppoſe he knoweth too well. Whether well occupied, or no, let it be judged. I lived indeed at "other men's tables, having no houſe nor wife of "mine own: but not without their deſire, and with "ſmall delight of mine, for fear of evil tongues. "And although I were not able to requite it, yet "towards ſome I went about it, inſtructing their "children partly in the principles of religion, partly "in other learning (8)."

(8) Cartwright's Epiſtle to the Church of England, prefixed to his ſecond Reply.

Though Mr. Cartwright was not married at this time, it appears that he ſoon after married the ſiſter of John Stubb, whoſe right hand was cut off for writing a book againſt the propoſed marriage of Queen Elizabeth with the Duke of Anjou, brother to Univerſity, and out of all employment, he travelled beyond ſea, where he became acquainted with the moſt celebrated Divines in the ſeveral Proteſtant Univerſities of Europe, with many of whom he eſtabliſhed a correſpondence (t). They appear to have entertained a very high eſteem for him; and the celebrated Beza, in a letter to one of his Engliſh correſpondents, expreſſed himſelf thus concerning him: "Here is now "with us your countryman, Thomas Cartwright, than whom, I think, the ſun doth "not ſee a more learned man (u)." While he was abroad, he was choſen Miniſter to the Engliſh Merchants at Antwerp, and afterwards at Middleburgh, where he continued two years, with little or no profit to himſelf [E]; though his labours as a preacher are ſaid to have been extremely acceptable and ſucceſsful (w). But the importunity of his friends in England, at length prevailed on him to return again to his native country (x).

(t) Neal, ubi ſupra, p. 177. Clarke, ut ſupra.

(u) Clarke, ut ſupra.

(w) Clarke, ut ſupra.

(x) Clarke and Neal, ut ſupra.

A very ſevere perſecution had now taken place for ſeveral years againſt the Puritans; on whoſe behalf a piece was publiſhed, intitled, "An Admonition to the Parliament [F];" to which were annexed, a letter from Beza to the Earl of Leiceſter, and another from Gualter to Biſhop Parkhurſt, recommending a reformation of Church diſcipline. This work contained what was called "the platform of a Church;" the manner of electing Miniſters; their ſeveral duties; and arguments to prove their equality in government (y). It alſo attacked the corruptions of the hierarchy, and the proceedings of the Biſhops, with much ſeverity of language. The admonition was concluded with a petition to the two houſes, that a diſcipline more conſonant to the word of God, and agreeing with the foreign reformed Churches, might be eſtabliſhed by law. For the Puritans, though labouring under the weight of perſecution, were not zealous to promote liberty of conſcience, but only anxious for the eſtabliſhment of that mode of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, which they thought to be the beſt, and the moſt apoſtolical. Neither the Epiſcopalians, nor the Puritans, of that age, had any juſt ſentiments of toleration [G]. Mr. Field and Mr. Wilcox, authors of the Admonition, and who attempted to preſent it to the Parliament, were committed to Newgate [H] on the 2d of October, 1572. Notwithſtanding which, Mr. Cartwright, after his return to England, wrote "A ſecond Admonition to the Parliament," with an humble petition to the two to the French King (9). In a letter, written by Mr. Stubb in 1577, is the following paſſage: 'We have 'no news here, but that Mr. Cartwright hath married my ſiſter. And if with you alſo it be publicly 'known, and any miſtike mine act in providing ſo 'for my ſiſter, tell him on my behalf, that I contented 'myſelf to take a huſband for her, whoſe livelihood 'was learning; who would endue his wife with 'wiſdom; and who might leave to his children the 'rich portion of godlineſs by Chriſtian careful education. And if this apology will not defend me, 'let him not marvel, if I, eſteeming theſe things as 'precious ſtones, while he rather chuſeth the worldly, 'commended things, riches, favour, &c. which I 'eſteem leſs worth than a barley-corn (10).'

(y) Neal, ubi ſupra, p. 191.

(9) Strype's Annals, vol. ii. p. 512.

(10) Id. ibid.

[E] With little or no profit, &c.] Mr. Clarke ſays, that 'when he underſtood that the merchants, by 'whom he was maintained, through their great 'loſſes, decayed in their eſtates, he returned his 'ſalary to them again (11).'

(11) Lives, ubi ſupra, p. 18.

[F] An admonition to the Parliament.] Mr. Pierce obſerves, that 'the ſtyle of the admonition was 'ſomewhat ſharp and ſevere: but then it muſt be 'conſidered what provocation had been given before. 'The Biſhops had, for five or ſix years, been perſecuting poor miniſters for diſcharging their conſciences; and let the expreſſions uſed be ever ſo hard, 'yet they are nothing, if compared with what the 'miniſters had endured: and beſides, the corruptions 'they ſpake againſt were ſo very great, that ſome 'ſeverity in expoſing them was no more than they 'deſerved; and the Biſhops themſelves had ſet them 'an example, having before uſed them with the 'coarſeſt language (12).'

(12) Vindication of the Diſſenters, ſecond edit. p. 83, 84.

[G] Neither the Epiſcopalians, nor the Puritans, had any juſt ſentiments of toleration.] Mr. Neal obſerves, that, 'both parties agreed too well, in aſſerting the 'neceſſity of uniformity in public worſhip, and of 'uſing the ſword of the magiſtrate, for the ſupport 'and defence of their reſpective principles, which 'they made an ill uſe of in their turns, whenever 'they could graſp the power into their hands. The 'ſtandard of uniformity, according to the Biſhops, 'was the Queen's ſupremacy, and the laws of the 'land; according to the Puritans, the decrees of 'provincial and national ſynods, allowed and enforced by the civil magiſtrate: but neither party were 'for admitting that liberty of conſcience, and freedom of profeſſion, which is every man's right, as 'far as is conſiſtent with the peace of the civil 'government he lives under (13).'

(13) Hiſt. of the Puritans, vol. i. p. 97.

[H] Mr. Field, and Mr. Wilcox, authors of the Admonition, and who attempted to preſent it to the Parliament, were committed to Newgate.] They drew up a Latin apology to the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, in which they confeſſed their writing the admonition, but alledged, that they had not attempted to correct or change any thing in the hierarchy of themſelves, but had referred all to the Parliament, hoping that by this means all differences might be compoſed in a legal way. It appears, that they were proſecuted upon the act of uniformity: for in a petition addreſſed by them to the Earl of Leiceſter, they repreſented, "that they had been condemned, according to the "act of uniformity, to a year's impriſonment, which "they had now ſuffered patiently in the common "gaol of Newgate, beſides four months cloſe impriſonment before their conviction, which they apprehended to be contrary to law: that by this means, "they and their poor wives and children were utterly impoveriſhed; their health very much impaired, by the unwholeſome ſavour of the place, "and the cold weather; and that they were like to "ſuffer yet greater extremities. They, therefore, "humbly beſought his Lordſhip, for the tender "mercies of God, and in conſideration of their "poor wives and children, to be a means to the "moſt honourable Privy Council, that they might be "enlarged; or if that could not be obtained, that they "might be confined in a leſs unhealthy priſon (14)." But this application was not complied with: the Biſhops thought theſe men had not ſuffered enough; and that the continuance of ſuch wholeſome ſeverities was neceſſary for the ſecurity of the Church.

(14) Neal, ut ſupra, p. 192.

When Cartwright and his friends afterwards pleaded for ſome indulgence becauſe they were brethren, Whitgift replied, 'What ſignifies their being 'brethren? Anabaptiſts, Arians, and other heretics, 'would be accounted brethren; their haughty ſpirits 'will not ſuffer them to ſee their error; they deſerve 'as great puniſhment as Papiſts, becauſe both conſpire againſt the Church. If they are ſhut up in 'Newgate, it is a meet reward of their diſorderly 'doings; for ignorance may not excuſe libels againſt 'a private man, much leſs when they ſlander the 'whole church (15).'

(15) Neal, ut ſupra, p. 197.

Houſes, for relief againſt the ſubſcription required by the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners (z). The ſame year Dr. Whitgift publiſhed an anſwer to the Admonition (a): to which Mr. Cartwright publiſhed a reply [I] in 1573; and about this time a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending him (b). In 1574, Dr. Whitgift publiſhed, in folio, a "Defence "of the Anſwer to the Admonition, againſt the Reply of T. C." In 1575, Mr. Cartwright publiſhed a "Second Reply" againſt Dr. Whitgift [K]; and in 1577, appeared

(z) Neal, ut ſupra.

(a) Strype's Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift, p. 28.

(b) Neal, p. 207.

[I] Mr. Cartwright publiſhed a reply, &c.] Mr. Neal, ſpeaking of the controverſy between Cartwright and Whitgift, ſays, 'It was impoſſible for 'theſe Divines to ſettle the controverſy, becauſe they 'were not agreed upon one and the ſame ſtandard, 'or rule of judgment. Mr. Cartwright maintained, 'that "the Holy Scriptures were not only a ſtandard "of doctrine, but of diſcipline and government; "and that the Church of Chriſt, in all ages, was to "be regulated by them." He was, therefore, for 'conſulting his Bible only, and for reducing all 'things as nearly as poſſible to the apoſtolical ſtandard. 'Dr. Whitgift went upon a different principle, and 'maintained,' "That though the Holy Scriptures "were a perfect rule of faith, they were not deſigned "as a ſtandard of Church diſcipline or government; "but that this was changeable, and might be ac-"commodated to the civil government we live "under; that the apoſtolical government was adapt-"ed to the Church in its infancy, and under perſe-"cution, but was to be enlarged and altered, as "the Church grew to maturity, and had the civil "magiſtrate on its ſide (16)."

(16) Hiſt. of the Puritans, ubi ſupra, p. 196, 197.

Mr. Strype remarks, that Whitgift maintained, 'that the external government of the Church had 'both a ſubſtance and a matter, about which it was 'occupied, and alſo a form to attain the ſame; con-'ſiſting in certain offices and functions, and in the 'number and titles of them. That the ſubſtance and 'matter of government muſt indeed be taken out of 'the word of God; and that it conſiſted in theſe 'points, that the word be truly taught, the ſacra-'ments rightly adminiſtered, virtue furthered, vice 'repreſſed, and the church kept in quietneſs and 'order. But that the offices in the Church, whereby 'this government was wrought, were not namely 'and particularly expreſſed in the Scripture; but in 'ſome points left to the liberty and diſcretion of 'the Church, to be diſpoſed according to the ſtate 'of times, places, and perſons (17).' In this controverſy both parties complained of the mode of writing made uſe of by the other. Thus Whitgift ſays to Cartwright, 'If you ſhould have written 'againſt the verieſt Papiſt in the world, the vileſt 'perſon, the ignoranteſt dolt, you could not have 'uſed a more ſpiteful and malicious, more ſlanderous 'and reproachful, more contemptuous and diſdain-'ful kind of writing, than you uſe throughout your 'whole book (18).' On the other hand, Cartwright ſays to Whitgift; 'If peace had been ſo precious 'unto you (as you pretend) you would not have 'brought ſo many hard words, bitter reproaches, 'enemy-like ſpeeches, (as it were ſticks and coals) 'to double and treble the heat of contention (19).'

(17) Life of Whitgift, p. 51.

(18) Defence of the Anſwer to the Admonition, p. 1.

(19) Cartwright's Reply, p. 8.

Mr. Strype, ſpeaking of Cartwright's reply, ſays, 'Great was the opinion, both of the man and of his 'book, at this time in London, as well as at Cam-'bridge: many of the Aldermen of London openly 'countenanced him. He was ſecretly harboured in 'the city, and had a great many admirers and 'viſitors there, and wanted not for preſents and 'gratuities. And though the Queen had iſſued out 'her proclamation to bring to the Biſhop of London 'the admonition, the ground of all the preſent 'ſedition and diſturbance, and the book writ in 'favour of it, yet it took no effect; not one book 'being brought in; as that Biſhop wrote to the 'Lord-Treaſurer (20).'

(20) Ibid. p. 53.

In a letter from that prelate, Dr. Sandys, to the Lord-treaſurer Burleigh, and the Earl of Leiceſter, are the following paſſages: 'One Crick, Chaplain 'to the Biſhop of Norwich, much commended unto 'me for learning and ſobriety, of late called to the 'croſs [St. Paul's Croſs,] there moſt ſpitefully in-'veighed againſt the eccleſiſtical policy, now by law 'eſtabliſhed; confirming Mr. Cartwright's book, as 'the true platform of the ſincere and apoſtolical 'Church. So ſoon as I heard of this Tragedy, I 'ſent a meſſenger to apprehend him. My Lord of 'Canterbury joined me therein. And although he 'was conveyed away, yet we have taken ſuch order, 'as we doubt not but that he will be ſhortly met 'withal.

'On Sunday laſt, Mr. Wake, of Chriſt's Church in 'Oxford, who this laſt year made a good ſermon at 'the croſs, and now called to do the like; he made 'no anſwer of the receipt of my letters, as he was 'required, until he came himſelf on the Saturday; 'and Sunday in the morning being conferred 'withal, both by Dr. Walker, and my Chancellor 'Dr. Hammond, to have conſideration of theſe 'troubled times; and forſomuch as her Majeſty was 'in progreſs, far from her city of London, that he 'would ſpeak nothing that ſhould turn to ſedition: 'whereunto he anſwered, Well, well. Notwith-'ſtanding being ſet on, and provoked thereunto, as 'was Crook before him, by ſuch as are authors and 'maintainers of theſe new and ſeditious fancies; his 'whole ſermon was conſumed in railing againſt this 'preſent ſtate; and affirming to be good whatever 'Mr. Cartwright in writing hath ſet down. On 'Monday I repaired to the city; and ſo ſoon as I 'heard thereof, I ſent a meſſenger to ſeek him: but 'he was gone out of town on his way towards Ox-'ford. This man I cannot deal withal by reaſon of 'the privileges of that Univerſity. Therefore muſt 'defer it to your Lordſhips wiſdoms to conſider of.

'Such men muſt be reformed, if the ſtate ſhall 'ſtand ſafe. Truly, my Lords, I have dealt ſo care-'fully as I can, to keep ſuch fanatical ſpirits from 'the croſs: but the deceitful devil, enemy to reli-'gion, hath ſo poured out the poiſon of ſedition, 'and ſo ſuddenly changed theſe wavering minds, 'that it is hard to tell whom a man may truſt. But 'by God's help, I will foreſee that hereafter the like 'fall not out: praying, that I may have authority 'from her Majeſty, (as ſome of my predeceſſors have 'had) in her name to require ſuch as are fitteſt for 'that place (moſt part refuſe) to come thither. Hard 'it is to get any.

'There is a conventicle, or rather a conſpiracy, 'breeding in London. Certain men of ſundry call-'ings are, as it were, in commiſſion together, to 'procure hands for Mr. Cartwright's book, and 'promiſe to ſtand in defence thereof unto death. 'They came to Mr. Squire, Maſter of Baliol Col-'lege in Oxford, and required his hand: who refuſ-'ed to give conſent thereto. If your Lordſhips 'would call him, he would fully inform you hereof. 'If theſe ſeditious and tumultuous beginnings be 'not met withal in time, they will in ſhort ſpace 'grow to great inconvenience. The city will never 'be quiet, until theſe authors of ſedition, who are 'now eſteemed as gods, as Field, Wilcox, Cart-'wright, and others, be far removed from the city. 'The people reſort unto them, as in popery they 'were wont to run on pilgrimage. If theſe idols, 'who are honoured for ſaints, and greatly enriched 'with gifts, were removed from hence, their honour 'would fall into the duſt. And they would be taken 'for blocks as they are (21).'

(21) Appendix to the Life of Whitgift, p. 19, 20.

[K] A ſecond Reply againſt Dr. Whitgift.] Mr. Strype remarks, that "it was printed in quarto, in "ſuch a kind of black letter, as might make one "judge it done in Holland, unleſs it were by ſome "ſecret preſs in England. For ſuch the diſciplina-"rians now had, for the better uttering and ſpread-"ing their principles (22)." If the Puritans choſe to defend their opinions, it was neceſſary that they ſhould print privately, for the moſt arbitrary reſtraints were now laid upon the preſs. Whitgift himſelf, Cartwright's opponent, was a great enemy to the liberty of the preſs (23).

(22) Life of Whitgift, p. 63.

(23) Strype's Life of Whitgift, p. 151, 223.

" The reſt of the ſecond Reply of Thomas Cartwright, againſt Maſter Doctor Whit-
" gift's Anſwer, touching the Church-diſcipline." This ſeems to have been printed in Scotland; and, it is certain, that, before its publication, Mr. Cartwright had found it neceſſary to leave the kingdom (c); whilſt his opponent was raiſed to the biſhopric of Worceſter.

(c) Neal, ubi ſupra, p. 200.

Mr. Cartwright continued abroad about five years; during which time he officiated as a Miniſter to ſome of the Engliſh factories (d). About the year 1580, James VI. King of Scotland, having an high opinion of his learning and abilities, ſent to him, and offered him a Profeſſorſhip in the Univerſity of St. Andrew's (e) [L]; but this he thought proper to decline. Upon his return to England, officers were ſent to apprehend him, as a promoter of ſedition, and he was thrown into priſon (f). He probably obtained his liberty through the intereſt of the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, and the Earl of Leiceſter, by both of whom he was favoured: and the latter conferred on him the poſt of Maſter of the Hoſpital which he had founded in Warwick [M]. In 1583, he was earneſtly perſuaded, by ſeveral learned Proteſtant Divines, to write againſt the Rhemiſh tranſlation of the New Teſtament. He was likewiſe encouraged in this deſign by the Earl of Leiceſter and Sir Francis Walſingham: and the latter ſent him an hundred pounds towards the expences of the work (g). He accordingly engaged in it: but after ſome time, received an arbitrary and unjuſt mandate from Archbiſhop Whitgift, prohibiting him from proſecuting the work any farther (h). Though he was much diſcouraged by this, he nearly completed the performance: but it was not publiſhed till many years after his death [N]. It is ſaid, that Queen Elizabeth ſent to Beza, requeſting him to undertake a work of this kind; but he declined it, declaring, that Cartwright was much more capable of the taſk than himſelf (i).

(d) Strype's Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift, p. 225.

(e) Clarke, ubi ſupra, p. 19.

(f) Strype's Life of Whitgift, ut ſupra.

(g) Clarke, ut ſupra, p. 19, 20. Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 200. Life of Whitgift, p. 253.

(h) Strype's Life of Whitgift, ut ſupra.

(i) Clarke, ut ſupra.

Notwithſtanding the high eſtimation in which he was held, and his many admirers, in the year 1585, he was again committed to priſon by Dr. Aylmer, Biſhop of London: and that Prelate gave ſome offence to the Queen, by making uſe of her Majeſty's name on the occaſion [O]. When he obtained his liberty is not mentioned: but we find that in 1590, when he was at Warwick, he received a citation to appear in the Star-chamber, together with Edmund Snape, and ſome other Puritan Miniſters, being charged with ſetting up a new diſcipline, and a new form of worſhip, and ſubſcribing their names

[L] Offered him a Profeſſorſhip in the Univerſity of St. Andrew's.] Mr. Cartwright takes notice of this offer, in his dedication of his Commentary upon Eccleſiaſtes to King James, which was publiſhed after that Prince was raiſed to the throne of England.

[M] Conferred on him the poſt of Maſter of the Hoſpital which he had founded at Warwick.] Mr. Clarke ſays, that this 'place was worth to him about one 'hundred pounds per annum. His employment 'was, to pray with the poor men twice a day, to 'catechiſe twice a week, and to preach once on the 'Lord's Day at the pariſh Church. This place he 'willingly and thankfully accepted of, becauſe he 'was therein exempted from the juriſdiction of the 'prelates. His carriage and deportment were ſuch, 'that there was not a nobleman or gentleman of 'quality in all the country, that looked heavenward, or was of any account for religion and learning, but they ſought to enjoy his company, and 'found much pleaſure and content therein; for his 'converſation was ſuch, that ſcarcely a word came 'from his mouth that was not of ſome good uſe and 'concernment. He was of a very laborious and 'indefatigable ſpirit; it was his meat and drink to 'be doing the will of his heavenly Father; ſo that 'beſides all his pains in writing, and in the hoſpital, 'he preached every ſabbath-day in the morning, 'about ſeven o'clock, in the lower pariſh of Warwick; and, when he could be ſuffered, in the upper Church in the afternoon. Beſides which, he 'preached a lecture on Saturdays in the afternoon, 'in the upper Church, in which he went over a 'great part of the Proverbs, and Eccleſiaſtes, with 'ſingular judgment and profit: and this he did of 'his own free will, without demanding or receiving 'one penny for his pains. And whereas he was 'ſometimes ſuſpended by the Biſhops from preaching 'in the Churches, his manner was at thoſe times to 'preach in the hoſpital, whither many reſorted to 'hear him, though they were ſure to be brought 'into the Biſhop's court for the ſame (24).'

(24) Lives, ubi ſupra, p. 19.

The ſame writer informs us, that the Earl of Leiceſter alſo offered Mr. Cartwright the Provoſtſhip of Eton College, ſaying, that it was an hundred pounds a year more than enough, beſides the conveniency of the place: to which Mr. Cartwright replied, " That the hundred pounds more than enough " was enough for him (25)." But this offer appears to have been made before his acceptance of the Maſterſhip of the Hoſpital.

(25) Id. ibid.

[N] It was not publiſhed till after his death.] It was publiſhed in 1618, in folio, under the title of " A Confutation of the Rhemiſts Tranſlation, Gloſſes and Annotations on the New Teſtament. By " that reverend, learned, and judicious Divine " Thomas Cartwright, ſome time Divinity Reader of " Cambridge." Mr. Strype obſerves, that " it " came forth privately without licence," and that it " ſeems to have been printed abroad (26)."

(26) Annals, vol. iii. p. 200.

[O] That Prelate gave ſome offence to the Queen, by making uſe of her Majeſty's name on the occaſion.] Mr. Strype, ſpeaking of Cartwright, ſays, 'this man 'Biſhop Aylmer had lately taken, and committed to 'priſon. Which, according to his conſtant practice, 'he acquainted the Lords with by the Clerk of the 'Council. And thinking to decline thereby diſ'pleaſure from himſelf or the commiſſion, he took 'him up by warrant from the Queen, who in truth 'was incenſed againſt him. And he ſent the Lords 'word that he did it by her order. But the Queen 'took this in evil part, and was very angry that he 'uſed her name to the Lords. This the good Biſhop 'took to heart, and thus made his complaint to the 'Lord-Treaſurer his conſtant friend, expoſtulating 'with him for what he had done, and begging his 'endeavours to appeaſe the Queen's indignation.'

" I underſtand myſelf to be in ſome diſpleaſure
" with her Majeſty about Mr. Cartwright, becauſe
" I ſent word to your Lordſhips by the Clerk of the " council, that I committed him by her Majeſty's
" commandment. Alas! my Lord, in what a di" lemma ſtood I, that if I had not ſhewed that war" rant, I ſhould have had all your diſpleaſures,
" which I was not able to bear: and uſing it for my " ſhield, (being not forbidden by her Majeſty) I am " blamed for not taking upon me a matter wherein " ſhe herſelf would not be ſeen. Well, I leave it to " God, and to your wiſdom, to conſider in what a " dangerous place of ſervice I am (27)."

(27) Life of Biſhop Aylmer, p. 117.

to ſtand to it. This was interpreted an oppoſition and diſobedience to the eſtabliſhed laws. Mr. Cartwright was alſo called upon to take the oath ex officio; but this he refuſed (k), and was committed to the Fleet (l). In May, 1591, he was ſent for by Biſhop Aylmer, to appear before him, and ſome others of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners, at that Prelate's houſe. He had no previous notice given him, to prevent any concourſe of his adherents upon the occaſion (m). The Biſhop threw out ſome reproaches againſt him, and again required him to take the oath ex officio. The Attorney-general did the ſame; and repreſented to him, "how dangerous a thing it was, that men ſhould, "upon the conceits of their own heads, and yet under colour of conſcience, refuſe the "things that had been received for laws of a long time (n)." Mr. Cartwright aſſigned ſundry reaſons for refuſing to take the oath; and afterwards deſired to be permitted to vindicate himſelf from ſome reflections that had been thrown out againſt him by the Biſhop [P], and the Attorney-general. But to this Biſhop Aylmer would not conſent, alledging, "that he had no leiſure to hear his anſwer (o)." The good Prelate had found time to accuſe Cartwright, but had no time to ſpare for hearing his vindication; though he informed him, that he might defend himſelf from the public charges that he had brought againſt him, by a private letter to his Lordſhip.

(k) Harleian MSS. N° 7042. p. 106.

(l) Strype's Life of Biſhop Aylmer, p. 160.

(m) Ibid. p. 309.

(n) Ibid. p. 310.

(o) Ibid. p. 319.

With this kind of juſtice Mr. Cartwright was obliged to be contented, and was immediately after again committed to the Fleet, and kept in a very cloſe and rigorous confinement. In Auguſt, 1591, he wrote a letter to Lady Ruſſel, ſtating ſome of the grievances under whhich he laboured [Q], and ſoliciting her intereſt with Lord Burleigh to procure him better treatment (p). The ſame year, King James wrote a letter to Queen Elizabeth, requeſting her Majeſty to ſhew favour to Mr. Cartwright and his brethren, on account of their great learning, and faithful labours in the goſpel (q). But he did not obtain his liberty till about the middle of the year 1592, when he was reſtored to his hoſpital at Warwick, and was again permitted to preach [R]. But his health appears to have been much impaired by his long confinement, and cloſe application to ſtudy [S]. He died on the 27th of December, 1603, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, having preached a ſermon on mortality but two days before (r). He was buried in the hoſpital at Warwick (s). He was pious, learned, and laborious; an acute diſputant, and an admired preacher; of a diſintereſted diſpoſition, generous and charitable [T], and particularly liberal to poor ſcholars (t). The treatment which he received on account of his opinions was extremely unjuſt and cruel, and reflects great diſhonour on thoſe prelates who were active in the perſecution of him. Beſides the pieces already mentioned, Mr. Cartwright was author of the following works: I. "Com-"mentaria practica in totam Hiſtoriam Evangelicam, ex quatuor Evangeliſtis harmo-"nicè concinnatam," 4to. 1630. An elegant edition of this was printed at Amſterdam, in 4to. by Lewis Elzevir, in 1647, under the following title: "Harmonia Evan-"gelica, Commentario, analytico, metaphraſtico, practico, illuſtrata," &c. II. "Com-"mentarii ſuccincti & dilucidi in Proverbia Salomonis," 4to. Amſt. 1638. III. "Me-"taphraſis & Homiliæ in librum Salomonis qui inſcribitur Eccleſiaſtes," 4to. Amſt.

(p) Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 49, 50, 51.

(q) Neal, ubi ſupra, p. 351.

(r) Id. ibid.

(s) Neal, ubi ſupra, p. 421.

(t) Clarke, ubi ſupra.

[P] Reflections that had been thrown out againſt him by the Biſhop.] One of theſe reflections of Biſhop Aylmer againſt Mr. Cartwright was, that he had deceived the Privy-Council, by informing them that he was afflicted with the gout and ſciatica, when that was not the caſe. Cartwright proved by a written teſtimonial of his phyſician, that this accuſation was falſe. But the teſtimonial of the phyſician was taken by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury from Cartwright's wife, and he refuſed to reſtore it again (28).

(28) Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 51.

[Q] Stating ſome of the grievances under which he laboured.] In this letter he ſays, 'Beſides the common calamity of us all, mine hath ſomething by 'itſelf. For all the other priſoners for this cauſe, 'having acceſs to them from all their friends, the 'warrant of the High-commiſſion reſtraineth me 'from all, ſaving my wife, and ſuch as have neceſ-'ſary buſineſs with me. Which thing I would be 'well contented with, if it were afforded me accord-'ingly. For if I might, I would not, for divers 'cauſes, have many come unto me. But the war-'den, whether eſteeming thereby to gratify the 'Biſhops, and others whom he thinketh this will be 'pleaſing to, or of his own hard diſpoſition towards 'me, conſtrueth it more ſtictly againſt me, than 'the meaning of the High-commiſſion was. 'For I take that upon experience of the multitudes 'that viſited me, the laſt time I was in priſon, (as 'much to my miſliking as theirs) they ſent the 'warrant of this reſtraint. Yet dare I not complain 'of the hard uſage of me more than other keepers 'to their priſoners, leſt he might uſe that for a mean 'to cauſe the Biſhops to reſtrain them alſo of the 'acceſs of their friends.'

He takes notice in this letter, that his gout increaſed, and that he had been afflicted with the ſciatica many years (29).

(29) Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 51.

[R] Was again permitted to preach.] Mr. Clarke ſays, that 'after long diſcontinuance, Mr. Cart-'wright coming to Cambridge, was importuned to 'preach on a week-day in St. Mary's, where there 'was a great confluence of all ſorts to hear him: 'grave men ran like boys in the ſtreets to get places 'in the Church. After ſermon he dined at maſter 'Chadderton's, and many went to the houſe to ſee 'and hear him ſpeak (30).'

(30) Lives, ubi ſupra, p. 22.

[S] His health appears to have been much impaired by his long confinement, &c.] Mr. Clarke ſays, that 'he continued his diligence and aſſiduity in his ſtu-'dies even in his old age; and his uſual manner was 'to riſe at two, three, and four o'clock in the morn-'ing at the lateſt, both ſummer and winter; not-'withſtanding that his bodily infirmities were ſuch, 'that he was forced to ſtudy continually upon his 'knees (31).'

(31) Id. ibid.

[T] Generous and charitable.] Mr. Clarke ſays, 'His manner was, not to keep any more money in 'his purſe, but what might ſerve for charitable uſes. 'He was very bountiful to poor ſcholars. He diſ-'tributed money every ſabbath-day among the poor 'of the town of Warwick, beſides what he gave to 'the priſoners, and upon other occaſions both at 'home and abroad (32).'

(32) Lives, ut ſupra.

1647. IV. "A Directory of Church-government [U]," 4to. 1644. V. "A Body "of Divinity," 4to. Lond. 1616.] T.

[U] A Directory of Church-government.] It is manifeſt, from the following paſſage in this piece, that Mr. Cartwright, like moſt of his contemporaries, was not a friend to true liberty of conſcience, or to free inquiry. 'In the examination of miniſters, the 'teſtimony of the place from whence they come is 'to be demanded, whereby it may be underſtood 'what life and converſation he hath been of, and 'whether he hath been addicted to any hereſy, or to 'the reading of any heretical books, or to curious and 'ſtrange queſtions and idle ſpeculations; or rather, 'whether he be accounted ſound, and conſenting in all 'things to the doctrine received in the Church. 'Whereunto if he agree, he is alſo to expound ſome 'part of the Holy Scriptures twice or oftener, as it 'ſhall ſeem meet to the examiners, and that before 'the conference, and that Church which is intereſt-'ed. Let him alſo be demanded of the principal 'heads of Divinity: and whether he will diligently 'execute and diſcharge his Miniſtry, and in the 'execution thereof propound unto himſelf not his own 'defires and commodities, but the glory of God and 'edification of the Church. Laſtly, whether he will 'be ſtudious and careful to maintain and preſerve 'wholeſome doctrine, and eccleſiaſtical diſcipline '(33).'

(33) Directory, p. 5.

 [The writer of the article of Whitgift, in the Biographia, informs us, upon the authority of Sir Henry Yelverton, in his epiſtle to the reader, prefixed to Biſhop Moreton's "Epiſcopacy juſtified," that the laſt words of Thomas Cartwright, on his death-bed, were, that he ſorely lamented the unneceſſary troubles he had cauſed in the Church, by the ſchiſm of which he had been the great fomenter; and that he wiſhed he was to begin his life again, that he might teſtify to the world the diſlike he had of his former ways. In this opinion, ſays Sir Henry, he died (34). Whether there be any other authority for ſo remarkable a fact, we are not able to ſay; but it appears certain, that Mr. Cartwright abated ſomething of the warmth of his ſpirit, towards the cloſe of his days. When he had obtained his pardon of the Queen, which, as Sir George Paule aſſerts, was at the inſtance of Archbiſhop Whitgift, Cartwright, in his letters of acknowledgment to that Prelate, vouchſafed to ſtile him a Right Reverend Father in God, and his Lord the Archbiſhop's Grace of Canterbury. This title of Grace he often yielded to Whitgift, in the courſe of their correſpondence. Nay, the Archbiſhop was heard to ſay, that if Mr. Cartwright had not ſo far engaged himſelf as he did in the beginning, he verily thought that he would, in his latter time, have been drawn to conformity. For when he was freed from his troubles, he often repaired to the Archbiſhop, who uſed him kindly, and was contented to tolerate his preaching at Warwick for ſeveral years, upon his promiſe that he would not impugn the laws, orders, and government of the Church of England, but perſuade and procure, as much as he could, both publicly and privately, the eſtimation and peace of the ſame. With theſe terms he complied; notwithſtanding which, when Queen Elizabeth underſtood that he preached again, though in the temperate manner which had been preſcribed, ſhe would not permit him to do it any longer without ſubſcription; and was not a little diſpleaſed with the Archbiſhop, for his having connived at his ſo doing. Sir George Paule farther adds, that, by the benevolence and bounty of his followers, Mr. Cartwright was ſaid to have died rich (35). Dr. Thomas Cartwright, Biſhop of Cheſter in King James the Second's reign, and who went the moſt infamous lengths in ſupport of that Monarch's meaſures, is thought, with ſome appearance of probability, to have been the grandſon of our famous Puritan.

(34) Biographia Britannica, firſt edition, vol. vi. part 2d. p. 4253. note [KKK].

(35) Paule's Life of Whitgift, p. 70—72.

Sir John Hawkins, in his Hiſtory of Muſic, after giving an abridged account of the life of Cartwright, recites a paſſage from him, in proof of the unlawfulneſs and impropriety of choral and antiphonal ſinging in the worſhip of God, together with a fine anſwer to it by Mr. Hooker, in his Eccleſiaſtical Polity. Cartwright ſarcaſtically calls this mode of ſinging, "the toſſing the Pſalms from one ſide to the "other;" and, abſurdly enough, ſuppoſes that the devil was inſtrumental of getting it authority in the Church (36).

(36) Hiſtory of Muſic, vol. iii. p. 491—498.

Mr. Warton, in the third volume of his excellent Hiſtory of Poetry, frequently reprobates the bad taſte of the Puritans, their fondneſs for pſalm-ſinging, and their attachment to Sternhold and Hopkins. Every candid Nonconformiſt muſt acknowledge, that the Puritans in general, though not deficient in the ſcholaſtic literature of the times, were no great proficients in polite learning. It was not, however, to them alone, that the love of pſalm-ſinging, and a devotedneſs to Sternhold and Hopkins were confined. Many Prelates and Dignitaries of the Church might be included in the ſame predicament, if it were worth while to enter into ſo trifling a controverſy. It is to the credit of the taſte of the modern Diſſenters, that they have long ſince excluded from their congregations the old barbarous verſion of the Pſalms, for the more poetical one of Dr. Watts.] K.

CARTWRIGHT (WILLIAM), an eminent Divine and Poet of the XVIIth Century, was born at Northway, near Tewkſbury, in Gloceſterſhire, in September 1611, and baptized the 26th of the ſame month. His father, Mr. William Cartwright, having run out a fair eſtate, was obliged, for a ſubſiſtence, to keep a public inn at Cirenceſter in the ſame county; where living in a middling condition, he cauſed this his ſon, a youth of great hopes, to be educated under Mr. William Topp, Maſter of the Free-School in that town. From thence he was removed to Weſtminſter-School, being choſen a King's Scholar; where compleating his former learning under the care of Mr. Lambert Oſbaldeſton (a), he was elected a Student of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, in 1628, under the tuition of Mr. Jerumael Terrent. Having gone through the claſſes of Logic and Philoſophy, with unwearied diligence, he took the degrees in Arts, that of Maſter being compleated in 1635. Afterwards he went into holy orders, and became (as my author expreſſes it) a moſt florid and ſeraphical Preacher [A] in the Univerſity. In 1642,

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 34.

[A] A florid and ſeraphical Preacher.] Hear how Dr. Jaſper Mayne celebrates Mr. Cartwright's preaching (1).

(1) Among the Copies of Verſes prefixed to Mr. Cartwright's Works.

But theſe thy looſer raptures muſt ſubmit
To thy rare ſermons and much holier wit;
In whoſe rich web ſuch eloquence is ſeen,
As if the Roman Orator had been Sent forth to preach the Goſpel, and had ſtood
In our aſſemblies pouring out his flood.
Thou wert a Poet, but thy ſermons do
Shew thee to be the beſt of preachers too;
Who to thy rhetoric didſt ſuch ſkill impart,
As if thou heir to ſome Apoſtle wert,
Who, taking wing for Heav'n, behind him left
His fiery tongue to thee, and that tongue cleft
Into as many ways to ſave, as they
Who are worſt ſinners uſe to err and ſtray.
What holy craft did in thy pulpit move?
How was the ſerpent mingled with the dove?
How have I ſeen thee caſt thy net, and then
With holy cozenage catch the ſouls of men!
Preach'd ſin out of their boſoms, made them ſee
Both what they were, and what they ought to be?

1642, he had the place of Succentor in the Church of Salisbury conferred on him by Bishop Duppa (b); and, in 1643, was chosen junior Proctor of the University (c). He was also metaphysical Reader [B] to the University; and it was generally said, those lectures were never performed better than by Mr. Cartwright and his predecessor Mr. Thomas Barlow (d) of Queen's College (e). This ingenious gentleman died, the 23d of December, 1643, in the thirty-third year of his age, of a malignant fever, called the Camp Disease, which then reigned in Oxford, and was fatal to many of his contemporaries; and was buried, December the 1st, towards the upper end of the south isle of the cathedral of Christ-Church. His death was generally lamented, and particularly by the King and Queen, then at Oxford, who anxiously enquired after him all the time of his sickness (f). Mr. Cartwright was extremely remarkable for both external and internal endowments, his body (as Langbaine expresses it) being as handsome as his soul. He was an expert linguist, understanding not only Greek and Latin, but French and Italian as perfectly as his mother tongue: an excellent Orator, and at the same time an admirable Poet [C]; a quality (my author observes) which Cicero, with all his pains, could never attain to (g). The editor of his works (h) applies to him the saying of Aristotle concerning Æschron the Poet, that he could not tell what Æschron could not do; and Dr. Fell, Bishop of Oxford, said of him, Cartwright is the utmost man can come to. Ben Jonson had such an opinion of his genius, that he said, my son Cartwright writes all like a man (i). There are extant of this author's four Plays, besides other

(b) Ibid. col. 35.

(c) Langbaine's Account of the English Dramatic Poets, in 8vo. Lond. 1691, p. 52.

(d) Afterwards Bishop of Lincoln.

(e) Preface to Mr. Cartwright's Plays and Poems, in 8vo. Lond. 1651.

(f) Wood, ubi supra.

(g) Langbaine, ubi supra, p. 52.

(h) In the Preface.

(i) Preface to his Works.

Made them confess the strait way, by thee strow'd
With flow'rs, was far more pleasant than the broad.
Indeed, we scripture-wonders oft did spy,
Camels by thee drawn thro' a needle's eye.

(2) Ibid. Mr. John Fell wrote these lines (2):

Or view him, when his riper thoughts did bear
His studies into a diviner sphere.
When that his voice did charm th'attentive throng,
And every ear was link'd unto his tongue,
The numerous press, closing their souls in one,
Stood all transformed into his passion.

I shall only add, under this remark, the following lines

(3) Ibid. by Mr. Ralph Bathurst (3):

But who cou'd hear without an extasy,
When, with a graceful conquering presence, He Stood forth, and, like Almighty Thunder, flung
His numerous strains among th' amazed throng?
A pleasing horror struck thro' ev'ry limb,
And ev'ry ear was close chain'd up to him:
Such masculine vigour ravish'd our assent,
What he persuaded, was commandement:
A sweeter plenty Rhetoric ne'er knew
In Chrysostom's pulpit, nor in Tully's pew.

[B] Metaphysical Reader.] His Panegyrists have not failed to celebrate his lectures in the Metaphysics.

(4) Ibid. Mr. Ralph Bathurst has these lines (4):

How may we then admire his serious time,
That wrote so well, yet drove no trade in rhime!
If from the scene and walks such praise he share,
What must he from his Metaphysic Chair?
There he unriddled that mysterious book,
Which Aristotle made to be mistook;
And his deep sense did so exactly tell,
Great Alexander knew't not half so well:
So were those oracles utter'd clear and good,
Which rude interpreters make less understood.

Mr. Thomas Vaughan gives us the following encomi-

(5) Ibid. um (5):

When he did read, how did we flock to hear?
Sure some Professors became pupils there.
He wou'd refine Abstractions: it was He
That gave the text all it's authority;
As if the Stagyrite resign'd his pen,
And took his censure, not his comment, then.
And tho' with some the science goes for pelf,
His Lectures made it to transcend itself.

Mr. Francis Palmer, these lines (6):

(6) Ibid.

He Aristotle has unbent,
Made music, what he riddles meant;
Cloath'd his own reason like his Plays:
His Metaphysics claim the Bays.

[C] An admirable Poet.] We shall select a few only of the numerous attestations of our author's poetical merit (7). The first shall be that of Sir Robert Stapylton.

(7) See the copies of Verses prefixed to his Works.

If time be measur'd by an Hour-glass run,
He may be Jonson's grand-child, Fletcher's son;
If by desert, a Muse might be his mother,
He Homer's heir, and Hesiod's elder brother.

Dr. Jasper Mayne addresses the deceased author thus:

For thou to nature had'st join'd art and skill:
In thee Ben Jonson still held Shakespear's quill;
A quill ruled by sharp judgment, and such laws,
As a well-studied mind and reason draws.
Thy lamp was cherish'd with supplies of oil
Fetch'd from the Roman and the Grecian soil——
Hence twin perfections, in thy writings knit,
Present us with strange contraries of wit:
Strength mix'd with sweetness, vigorous with fair,
Lucan's bold heights match'd with staid Virgil's care;
Martial's quick salt joined to Musæus' tongue;
Soft thorns of fancy, which from roses sprung.

John Leigh, Esq; in a copy of verses to the Stationer Mr. Mosely, on his printing Mr. Cartwright's poems, after mentioning other poets, whose works he had published, has these lines:

But after all thou bring'st up in the rear
One that fills ev'ry eye, and ev'ry ear;
Cartwright, rare Cartwright, to whom all must bow,
That was best preacher and best poet too;
Whose learned fancy never was at rest,
But always labouring, yet labour'd least.
His wit's immortal, and shall honour have,
While there's or slavish Lord, or Royal Slave.

We shall only add here, as to Mr. Cartwright's poetical character in general, what Mr. Ralph Bathurst says of his style.

His Style so pleases the judicious Gown,
As that there's something too for Wits o' th' town:
Rough-handed Critics do approve, and yet
'Tis treasure for the Ladies cabinet.

Poems [D]; all which were printed together in 1651, accompanied by above fifty copies of commendatory verſes by the moſt eminent Wits of the Univerſity. There are alſo ſome other pieces, mentioned by Anthony Wood [E].

[D] Four Plays, beſides other Poems.] The firſt of his Plays is The Lady Errant, a Tragi-Comedy. We are told, it was eſteemed to be a good Comedy; but where acted, is not known (8). The ſecond is The Royal Slave. A Tragi-Comedy. Preſented to the King and Queen by the Students of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, Aug. 30, 1636. Preſented ſince to both their Majeſties, at Hampton-Court, by the King's ſervants. This Play, Mr. Langbine tells us (9), gave ſuch content to their Majeſties and the whole Court, as well for the ſtately ſcenes, the richneſs of the Perſian habits, the excellency of the ſongs (which were ſet to muſic by that admirable Compoſer Mr. Henry Lawes) as for the noble ſtyle of the Play itſelf, and the ready addreſs, and graceful carriage, of the actors (among whom Dr. Buſby, the famous Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, approved himſelf a ſecond Roſcius) that they unanimouſly acknowledged that it did exceed all things of that nature which they had ever ſeen. The Queen in particular ſo much admired it, that in November following ſhe ſent for the habits and ſcenes to Hampton-Court; ſhe being deſirous to ſee her own ſervants repreſent the ſame Play (whoſe profeſſion it was) that ſhe might the better judge of the ſeveral performances, and to whom the preference was due. The ſentence was univerſally given, by all the ſpectators, in favour of the Gown, though nothing was wanting on Mr. Cartwright's ſide to inform the players as well as the ſcholars, in what belonged to the action and delivery of each part. This play is particularly celebrated by Dr. Jaſper Mayne (10), in theſe lines:

(8) Langbaine's Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, in 8vo. Lond. 1691, p. 53.

(9) Ibid. p. 54. See alſo Wood's Hiſt. Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. i. p. 344, 345.

(10) Among the commendatory Verſes.

> Witneſs thy Royal Captive, where we do
> Read thee a poet, but ſad prophet too:
> A Play, where virtue ſo well-languag'd ſhines,
> That Slaves are there made Princes by thy lines.

Mr. Cartwright's third Play is The Ordinary. A Comedy. When, and where acted, is not ſaid. Part of the ſecond Scene of the Firſt Act, between the widow Potluck, Slicer, and Hearſay, is tranſcribed by the author of Wit's Interpreter, in his Love-dialogues, under the title of The Old Widow (11). The fourth and laſt is The Siege, or Love's Convert. A Tragi-Comedy. When, and where acted, not ſaid. It is dedicated to King Charles I. by an epiſtle in verſe. The ſtory of Miſander and Leucaſia is founded upon that of Pauſania and Cleonice in Plutarch's life of Cymon. The injunction, which the rich widow Pyle lays upon her lovers, is borrowed from Boccace's Novels. Day 9. Nov. 1. This Play is humouroufly commended by Mr. Joſ. Howe, in a copy of verſes (12), in which are theſe lines:

(11) Langbaine, ib. p. 53.

(12) Among the commendatory Verſes.

> Had this Scene-wit not met an age
> That frowneth down the mourning Stage,
> That all Dramatic Laws confutes,
> And maketh all the actors mutes;
> How had it crackt the rooms, and made
> Play-ſeeing th' only London trade?
> When if ſome cloſe laned citizen,
> Zealous for his labouring hen,
> Had panting for a midwife run,
> To help into th' dark his coming ſon,
> Theſe Bills had made him ſtop, and ſend
> To bid her groan till th' Siege did end,
> Tho' of a Boy he loſt the hope,
> To heir his prunes and Caſtile-ſoap.

[E] Some other pieces, mentioned by Anthony Wood.] That author tells us (13), Mr. Cartwright wrote alſo, I. Poëmata Græca & Latina, i. e. 'Greek and Latin 'Poems.' II. An Offspring of Mercy iſſuing out of the Womb of Cruelty. A Paſſion Sermon, preached at Chriſt-Church in Oxford, on Acts ii. 23. Lond. 1652. 8vo. III. On the ſignal days in the month of November, in relation to the Crown and Royal Family. A Poem. Lond. 1671, in one ſheet 4to. IV. Poems and Verſes, containing Airs for ſeveral voices (14), ſet by Mr. Henry Lawes. B.

(13) Ubi ſupra.

(14) See a book intituled, Ayres and Dialogues for one, two, and three Voices. Lond. 1653, fol. compoſed by Mr. Henry Lawes. Alſo another intituled, Select Ayres and Dialogues to ſing to the Theorbo, Lute, and Baſs Viol. Lond. 1669, fol. compoſed alſo by the ſaid Henry Lawes.

 [There are ſome characters, occurring in biographical writings, that are tranſmitted down to poſterity with a ſurprizing luſtre, and which, when we critically examine the matter, we find it difficult to account for. They acquire a wonderful reputation in their own age, and are ſpoken of in ſuch high terms of applauſe, that future times look back upon their memories with an enthuſiaſm of reverence and affection. This was very eminently the caſe with regard to William Cartwright. It is impoſſible to avoid being powerfully ſtruck with the prodigious encomiums which have been beſtowed upon him. So high was the eſtimation in which he was held, that the King appeared in black on the day of his burial; and being aſked the reaſon of it, his Majeſty anſwered, that ſince the Muſes had mourned ſo much, for the loſs of ſuch a ſon, it would be a ſhame for him not to appear in mourning, for the loſs of ſuch a ſubject. As a Poet, an Orator, and a Philoſopher, he ſeems to have been conſidered as almoſt unparalleled; and it may juſtly be doubted, whether even Shakſpeare himſelf had, at that period, an equal reputation. Nevertheleſs, when we enquire into Mr. Cartwright's works, we do not find thoſe excellencies in them, which will juſtify our entertaining ſo exalted an opinion of him as a writer. He was the author of only four Plays, and three of theſe are Tragi-Comedies, no legitimate mode of compoſition. The fourth, the Comedy of the "Ordinary," we have lately read, but cannot beſtow upon it any profuſion of praiſe. It abounds in wit, that luxuriant wit which was the faſhion of the time, and which was very forced and unnatural. The plot is abſurd, and the characters are drawn more from fancy than from the knowledge and obſervation of real life. This, indeed, is his own confeſſion at the end of his Prologue, where he ſays,

> "Think then, if here you find nought can delight,
> He hath not yet ſeen vice enough to write."

Mr. Cartwright doth not, like Shakſpeare, excel in painting general nature; and the "Ordinary," unlike the productions of that wonderful genius, hath ſcarcely any of thoſe ſublime, affecting, or moral paſſages that are conſtantly quoted, and which will be the objects of eternal admiration. The following deſcription of a Miſer is almoſt the only ſpecimen we meet with in it of natural character and humour.

> "That griping Knight Sir Thomas muſt be call'd
> With the ſame lure: he knows to a crum how much > Loſs is in twenty dozen of bread, between
> That which is broke by th' hand, and that is cut.
> Which way beſt keeps his candles, bran or ſtraw.
> What tallow's loſt in putting of 'em out
> By ſpittle, what by foot, what by the puff.
> What by the holding downwards, and what by
> The extinguiſher; which wick will longeſt be
> In lighting, which ſpend faſteſt. He muſt hear > Nothing but moieties, and lives, and farms,
> Copies and tenures; he is deaf to the reſt (15)."

(15) Select Collection of old Plays, ſecond edition, vol. x. p. 200. 202. 225.

But, notwithſtanding theſe deductions from the value of Mr. Cartwright's writings, it muſt be allowed, that unleſs his abilities and merit had been remarkably ſhining, he could not have excited in ſo extraordinary a manner the admiration of his contemporaries. It ought, likewiſe, to be remembered that he died young. If his life had been protracted, he would probably have ariſen to much ſuperior excellence. Cartwright's Poems, though accompanied with ſuch a multitude of eulogiums, do not appear, after his deceaſe, to have had many readers; for we have met but one edition of his works, and that, we believe, is at preſent very little known.] K.

CARY (Henry), afterwards created Viſcount Falkland, and deſcended from the family of the Cary's, of Cockington, in Devonſhire [A], was the ſon of Sir Edward Cary, of Berkhamſted and Aldenham, in the county of Hertford, Knight, Maſter of the Jewel-office to Queen Elizabeth and King James I. (a) by Catherine his wife, daughter of Sir Henry Knevet, Knight, and widow of Henry Lord Paget (b). He was born at Aldenham juſt now mentioned (c); and, when about ſixteen years of age, was ſent to Exeter-College in Oxford, where, by the help of a good tutor, and extraordinary parts, he became a moſt accompliſhed gentleman (d). It doth not appear he took any degree [B]: but, however, when he quitted the Univerſity, he left behind a celebrated name (e). Soon after, he was introduced to Court (f); and, in the year 1608, made one of the Knights of the Bath at the creation of Henry Prince of Wales (g). In 1617, he was ſworn in Comptroller of his Majeſty's Houſhold [C], and one of his Privy-Council (h): and on the 10th of November, 1620, was created Viſcount of Falkland, in the county of Fife, in Scotland (i). King James I. knowing his great abilities and experience, conſtituted him Lord Deputy of Ireland; into which high office he was ſworn, September 18, 1622 (k); and continued in it till the year 1629 (l). During his adminiſtration, he kept a ſtrict hand over the Roman Catholics in that kingdom [D]; which gave them occaſion to ſend complaints to the Court of England againſt him. And though he proceeded as honourably, juſtly, and nobly, as any man could do (m); though the Council did, on the 28th of April, 1629, write a kind and true letter in vindication of his innocence (n); yet by the clamour of the Iriſh, and the prevailing power of his Popiſh enemies, he was removed in diſgrace. But his innocence being afterwards vindicated, this affront was in ſome meaſure atoned for by the ſubſequent favour of the King (o). At his return to England, he lived in honour and eſteem, till the year 1633; when having the misfortune to break one of his legs, on a ſtand in Theobald's-park, he died of that unhappy accident, in September (p); and was buried at Aldenham [E]. He married Elizabeth, ſole daughter and heir of Sir Laurence Tanfield, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, with whom he had the manor of Great Tew, Burford, and other eſtates in Oxfordſhire (q). He wrote ſeveral things, which were not publiſhed [F]. With reſpect to his character, he was a moſt accompliſhed gentleman, and a compleat courtier (r).

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, vol. i. col. 585. Peerage of Engl. by Arth. Collins, Eſq; Lond. 1735, 8vo. vol. iii. p. 170.

(b) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 397. Wood, ubi ſupra.

(c) State Worthies, by David Lloyd, edit. 1679, 8vo. p. 938; from Fuller's Worthies, in Hertfordſhire, p. 23.

(d) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ibid.

(g) Stow's Annales, edit. 1631, p. 991. The Scottiſh Compendium, &c. by F. Nicholls, 3d edit. 1729, p. 383. It was not at the Creation of Charles Prince of Wales; as Wood ſays by miſtake.

(h) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(i) Crawfurd's Peerage of Scotland; and the Scottiſh Compend. ubi ſupra.

(k) Ibid. and Hiſt. of Ireland, by R. Cox, P. ii. fol. Lond. 1690, p. 39.

(l) Ibid. p. 53.

(m) As was atteſted by his ſucceſſor the Earl of Strafford. See his Trial by Ruſhworth, p. 160.

(n) R. Cox, as above, p. 52.

(o) Idem. Preface to Part ii. of his Hiſtory. N. B. It is not paged.

(p) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 586 Fuller and Lloyd, ubi ſupra. Theſe two laſt by miſtake, ſay, that it was in 1620.

(q) Wood, col. 586.

(r) Fuller and Lloyd, ibid.

[A] Deſcended from the Cary's of Cockington in Devonſhire.] Sir Philip (1) Cary of Cockington, living in the firſt of Henry VI. married to his firſt wife, Anne daughter of Sir William Poulet, Knight, from whom the family of Cockington deſcended (2). His ſecond wife was Alice, daughter of Sir Baldwin Fulford of Fulford in Devonſhire, Knight, by whom he had iſſue Thomas, who married Margaret, younger daughter, and coheir, of Sir Rober Spencer of Spencer-combe in the county of Devon, by Eleanor, ſiſter and coheir to Henry Beaufort, Duke of Somerſet (3). By this Lady, Thomas Cary had two ſons, John anceſtor of the Lords Falkland; and William, of the Lords Hunſdon. John was made a Knight of the Carpet, February 22, 1546. And by Joice his wife, daughter of —— Denny, Eſq; and ſiſter to Sir Anthony Denny, had iſſue Sir Edward Cary, Knight, father of Sir Henry, who is the ſubject of this article. Sir Edward died July 16, 1618 (4).

(1) Prince calls him Sir William, Worthies, p. 153.

(2) Dugdale, ubi ſupra, p. 397.

(3) See Genealog. Hiſt. of the Kings of England, &c. by Fr. Sandford and S. Stebbing. edit. 1707, p. 334.

(4) Collins, ubi ſupra; and Prince's Worthies of Devon. Exon. 1701, p. 153.

'[B] It doth not appear he took any degree.] We are told (5), that during his ſtay in the Univerſity, his chamber was the rendezvous of all the eminent Wits, Divines, Philoſophers, Lawyers, Hiſtorians, and Politicians of that time. But, ſays Mr. Wood (6), 'How 'true it is, ſeeing he was then a young man and not 'graduated, I cannot in the leaſt perceive. Had 'thoſe things been ſpoken of Lucius Cary his ſon, who 'retired ſeveral times to, and took commons in Exeter-'College, while his brother Lorenzo ſtudied there, 'in 1628, and after, I ſhould have rather believed 'it.'

(5) Worthies of England, by T. Fuller; as quoted by Mr. Wood, ubi ſupra.

(6) Col. 585.

[C] He was ſworn in Comptroller of his Majeſty's Houſhold.] But he was not, one of the Gentlemen of his Majeſty's bed-chamber: neither was he, the firſt who carried into Scotland the news of Queen Elizabeth's death: as the author of the Scottiſh Compendium falſely aſſerts (7). For he that carried that account, was Robert Cary, fourth ſon of Henry Lord Hunſdon, created afterwards Lord Lepington, and earl of Monmouth (8).

(7) Page 383, edit. 1729.

(8) See Court and Character of King James, by Sir A. Welden, p. 2. and Mr. Oſborne's Traditional Memoirs of King James, Lond. 1658, 12mo. p. 5.

[D] He kept a ſtrict hand over the Roman Catholics in Ireland.] For, in his time, ſeveral Popiſh magiſtrates that had refuſed the oath of ſupremacy, contrary to the Statute of 2 Eliz. c. 1. were cenſured in the Star-Chamber on the 22d of November 1622; at which time Biſhop Uſher made that excellent ſpeech about the lawfulneſs of that oath, which is publiſhed in his anſwer to Malone the Jeſuit: and on the 21ſt of January 1623, there was iſſued out a Proclamation againſt the Popiſh Clergy, Secular and Regular, ordering them to depart the kingdom within forty days; after which all perſons were prohibited to converſe with them (9).

(9) R. Cox, ubi ſupra, p. 39.

[E] And was buried at Aldenham.] Where, in the church, there is the following memorial of him, and his father. 'Edward Cary, Eſq; Lord of the manor 'of Aldenham, and Patron of this Church, afterwards 'Sir Edward Cary, Knight, whoſe body was invaulted in the Chancel of this Church, Auguſt 6, 1618. 'Father of Henry I. Viſcount of Falkland in Scotland, 'whoſe body was alſo invaulted in the Chancel of this 'Church, September 25, 1633 (10).'

(10) The Hiſtory of Hertfordſhire, by N. Salmon, London, 1728, fol. p. 98.

[F] He wrote ſeveral things which were not publiſhed.] This we learn from Mr. Wood (11), who farther informs us, That there was found among his papers, and publiſhed as his, the following book, 'The Hiſtory of the moſt unfortunate Prince, King 'Edward II; with choice political Obſervations on 'him and his unhappy Favourites, Gaveſton and 'Spencer: containing ſeveral paſſages of thoſe times 'not found in other Hiſtorians.' Lond. 1680, fol. and 8vo. Wood ſays, it was publiſhed, when the preſs was open for all books that could make any thing againſt the then government, with a Preface to the reader patched up from very inconſiderable authors, by Sir James Harrington.—— The Lord Clarendon informs us (12), That this Lord Falkland, inſtead of enriching himſelf by his great places, waſted a full fortune at Court, in thoſe offices and employments by which other men uſe to obtain a greater. M.

(11) Ubi ſupra, col. 586.

(12) Hiſt. of the Rebellion, edit. 1731, 8vo. vol. ii. P. i. p. 353.

 [It appears from Dr. Leland, that when Lord Falkland was appointed Governor of Ireland, he had many difficulties to ſtruggle with. "It was "mortifying, ſays that judicious Hiſtorian, to the "King's Deputy, to be ſent to adminiſter a govern-"ment, unſupported, expoſed to the inſults of its "enemies, perpetually alarmed, and totally deſti-"tute of the neceſſary reſources." In this ſituation, Lord Falkland made repeated repreſentations of his diſtreſs, to James and his Engliſh Council; enlarged on every circumſtance which diſcovered the malignity of the diſaffected; urged the danger to be apprehended from the recuſants; and earneſtly enforced the the neceſſity of a ſpeedy augmentation of the army in the kingdom; but all to no purpoſe. The propriety of the meaſure was apparent: but an improvident Prince, who laviſhed his treaſure, careleſsly and capriciouſly; whoſe Exchequer was empty, and even his credit exhauſted; whoſe Parliament was frugal, cautious, and ſuſpicious of the King, could not, without a natural reluctance, liſten to any ſcheme that muſt increaſe his expence (13). The ſame Hiſtorian hath drawn the following character of the Deputy's general adminiſtration: "Lord Falkland "ſeems to have been more diſtinguiſhed by his rec-"titude than abilities. In a government which re-"quired vigour and auſterity, he was indolent and "gentle; courting, rather than terrifying the fac-"tious. He was harraſſed by the intrigues and cla-"mours of the King's Miniſters, whom he could "not always gratify to the full extent of their de-"ſires; his actions were ſeverely maligned at the "Court of England; his adminiſtration of conſe-"quence was cautious and embarraſſed. Such a "governor was little qualified to awe the numerous "and powerful body of recuſants, relying on their "merits, and ſtimulated by their eccleſiaſtics to the "moſt imprudent exceſſes (14)."

(13) Leland's Hiſtory of Ireland, vol. ii. p. 474, 475.

(14) Ibid. vol. iii. p. 3.

Mr. Walpole, ſpeaking of the Carys, ſays, that Scotland and England have each pretenſions to this conſpicuous line, of which four ſucceſſively were authors. England gave them origin, Scotland their title. We learn from the ſame ingenious writer, that Henry Lord Falkland is remarkable for an invention to prevent his name being counterfeited, by artfully concealing in it the ſucceſſive year of his age, and by that means detecting a man who had not obſerved ſo nice a particularity (15).] K.

(15) Royal and noble Authors, vol. i. p. 213, 214.

CARY (Lucius), eldeſt ſon of Henry Lord Viſcount of Falkland, mentioned in the laſt article, was born, as is ſuppoſed, at Burford in Oxfordſhire (a), about the year 1610[A]. His education for ſome years was in Ireland, where his father carried him, when he was appointed Lord Deputy of that kingdom in 1622 (b). He received particularly his academical learning in Trinity-College in Dublin (c); and in St. John's-College in Cambridge [B]. At firſt he proved but a wild youth [C]; but being ſent to travel under the care of a diſcreet tutor, he ſoon ſhook off all levity and extravagance, and became a wiſe, ſober, and prudent perſon (d). Before he came to be twenty years of age, he was maſter of a noble fortune, which deſcended to him by the gift of a grandfather, without paſſing through his father or mother, who were then both alive (e). Shortly after that, and before he was of age, being in his natural inclination a great lover of a military life, he went into the Low-Countries, with a reſolution of procuring a command, and to give himſelf up to it; but he was diverted from it by the compleat inactivity of that ſummer. So he returned to England, and being a man of fine genius, ſoon entered upon a very ſtrict courſe of ſtudy (f). At firſt, he applied himſelf to polite Literature; and to Poetry (g), in which he made ſuch ſucceſsful attempts, that he gained the eſteem and admiration of the moſt eminent Poets of his time [D]. But afterwards giv-

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, vol. i. col. 586.

(b) The Hiſtory of the Rebellion, &c. by Edward Earl of Clarendon, edit. 1731, 8vo. vol. ii. Part i. p. 351.

(c) Wood, ibid.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Clarendon, ubi ſupra.

(f) Ibid. p. 357.

(g) Wood, ubi ſupra.

[A] Was born at Burford —— about the year 1610.] It is not quite certain, that he was born in that town; for the regiſter-book of that place, which commences about the beginning of the reign of King James I. takes no notice of it. However, Mr. Wood tells us, he was informed, That he was moſtly nurſed, and therefore very probably alſo born, at Burford (1). He was in the thirty-fourth year of his age, September 20, 1643, when he was killed (2), and conſequently muſt have been born about the year 1610.

(1) Wood, Ath. col. 586.

(2) Clarendon, Hiſtory, vol. ii. Part i. p. 359.

[B] And in St. John's College in Cambridge.] This appears from a letter of his to Dr. Beale, Maſter of St. John's, which is as follows. 'I received lately a 'letter from yourſelf and others of your noble So-'ciety; wherein, as many titles were given me, to 'which I had none, ſo that, which I ſhould moſt 'willingly have acknowledged, and might with moſt 'juſtice claim, you were not pleaſed to vouchſafe me, 'that is, that of a St. John's man. I confeſs, I am 'both proud and aſhamed of that, and the latter, in 'reſpect that the fruits are unproportionable to the 'Seed-plot: yet, Sir, as little learning as I brought 'from you, and as little as I have ſince increaſed and 'watered; what I did bring, I am ſure, I carry 'about me, an indelible character of affection and 'duty to that Society, and an extraordinary longing 'for ſome occaſion of expreſſing that affection and that 'duty. I ſhall deſire you to expreſs this to them, and 'to add this, that as I ſhall never forget myſelf to be 'a Member of your Body; ſo ſhall I be ready to catch 'at all means of declaring myſelf to be, not only to 'the Body, but every Member of it,

'A very Humble Servant,

'FALKLAND (3).'

(3) Life of Dr. John Barwick, in Engliſh, Lond. 1724, 8vo. Appendix, p. 551, 552.

However, there is no account of his admittance in St. John's-College-Regiſter.

[C] At firſt he proved but a wild youth.] And for ſome error or indiſcretion was thrown into the Fleet, as is evident from the following petition of his father to the King.

The Lord Falkland's petition to the King,

'MOST humbly ſhewing, that I had a ſonne, 'until I loſt him, in your Highneſs diſpleaſure, 'where I cannot ſeek him, becauſe I have not will to 'find him there. Men ſay, there is a wild young 'man now priſoner in the Fleet, for meaſuring his ac-'tions by his own private ſence. But now that for the 'ſame your Majeſties hand hath appeared in his pu-'niſhment, he bows and humbles himſelf before, and 'to it: whether he be mine, or not, I can diſcern by 'no light, but that of your royal clemency; for only 'in your forgiveneſs can I own him for mine. For-'giveneſs is the glory of the ſupremeſt powers, and 'this the operation, that when it is extended in the 'greateſt meaſure, it converts the greateſt offenders 'into the greateſt lovers, and ſo makes purchaſe of 'the heart, an eſpecial priviledge peculiar and due to 'Sovereign Princes. If now your Majeſty will vouch-'ſafe, out of your own benignity, to become a ſecond 'nature, and reſtore that unto me which the firſt gave 'me, and vanity deprived me of, I ſhall keep my 'reckoning of the full number of my ſons with com-'fort, and render the tribute of my moſt humble 'thankfulneſs, elſe my weak old memory muſt forget 'one (4).'

(4) Cabala, edit. 1663, fol. p. 238.

[D] He applied himſelf —— to Poetry, —— and gained the eſteem of the moſt eminent Poets.] Particularly of Ben Jonſon, who celebrates him in his Underwoods, in a Poem, To the immortal Memory and Friendſhip of that noble Pair, Sir Lucius Cary, and Sir H. Morriſon (5). Sir John Suckling pays him alſo a fine compliment, in his Seſſion of the Poets, as follows.

(5) See Ben Jonſon's Works, edit. fol. 1692, p. 571.

He was of late ſo gone with Divinity,
That he had almoſt forgot his Poetry,
Though to ſay the truth (and Apollo did know it)
He might have been both his Prieſt and his Poet.

ing

ing himſelf up to the more ſolid parts of learning, he frequently retired, for the ſake of books and converſation, to Oxford, and to his ſeat at Great Tew, near that Univerſity (b). There he contracted a familiarity and friendſhip with the moſt polite and accurate men [E]; who found ſuch immenſeneſs of wit, and ſuch a ſolidity of judgment in him, ſo infinite a fancy, bound in by moſt exact reaſoning, ſuch a vaſt knowledge, that he was not ignorant in any thing, yet ſuch an exceſſive humility, as if he had known nothing; that they frequently reſorted, and dwelt with him, as in a College ſituated in a purer air. So that his houſe was an Univerſity in a leſſer volume, whither they came not ſo much for repoſe as ſtudy (i). Among other things, he made himſelf, in a very ſhort time, a perfect maſter of the Greek tongue [F], and accurately read all the Greek Hiſtorians (k). Before he was twenty-three years of age, he had peruſed and read over all the Greek and Latin Fathers, and was indefatigable in looking over all books, which with great expence he cauſed to be tranſmitted to him from all parts (l). He alſo diligently ſtudied the controverſies; and had a memory ſo ſtupendous, that he remembered, on all occaſions, whatſoever he read (m). About the time of his father's death, in 1633, he was made one of the Gentlemen of his Majeſty's Privy-Chamber (n). Notwithſtanding this, he continued frequently to retire to Great Tew, and Oxford, for the ſake of the company and converſation of learned and ingenious men (o); and was a member of the moſt polite clubs (p). In 1639, he was in the expedition againſt the Scots; and though he received ſome repulſe in the command of a troop of horſe, of which he had a promiſe, he went a volunteer with the Earl of Eſſex (q). Upon his going to this expedition, he was complimented with fine copies of verſes, both by Mr. Waller [G], and Mr. Cowley [H]. He was choſen, in 1640, a Member of the Houſe of Commons, for Newport in the Iſle of Wight, in the Parliament which began at Weſtminſter the 13th of April the ſame year (r); and, from the debates which were managed with all imaginable gravity and ſobriety, he contracted ſuch a reverence to Parliaments, that he thought it really impoſſible they could ever produce miſchief or inconvenience to the kingdom, or that the kingdom could be tolerably happy in the intermiſſion of them. And from the unhappy and unſeaſonable diſſolution of that Parliament, he harboured ſome jealouſy and prejudice to the Court, towards which he was not before immoderately inclined. He was choſen again for the ſame place, in the Parliament which began the 3d of November following; and in the beginning of it, declared himſelf very ſharply and ſeverely againſt thoſe exorbitances of the Court, which had been thought moſt grievous to the State (s). For he was ſo rigid an obſerver of eſtabliſhed laws and rules, that he could not endure the leaſt breach or deviation from them: and thought no miſchief ſo intolerable, as the preſumption of Miniſters of State, to break poſitive rules for reaſons of State; or Judges to tranſgreſs known laws, upon the title of conveniency or neceſſity (t). This made him ſo ſevere againſt the Lord Finch [I], and

(b) Ibid.

(i) Clarendon, ubi ſupra, p. 351.

(k) Ibid.

(l) Lord Clarendon's Animadverſions upon a book intituled, Fanaticiſm fanatically imputed to the Catholic Church, by Dr. Stilling fleet, &c. by S. C. Lond. 1674, p. 185.

(m) Idem. Hiſt. as above, p. 352.

(n) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Account of the Life of Mr. Edm. Waller, prefixed to his Poems, p. xi. edit. 1711, 8vo.

(q) Clarendon, ubi ſupra, p. 357.

(r) Ruſhworth's Hiſt. Collections, vol. iii. p. 1112.

(s) Clarendon, p. 353.

(t) Ibid.

[E] He contracted a familiarity and friendſhip with the moſt polite and accurate men.] Among the reſt, with William Chillingworth of Trinity-college; John Earle, and Hugh Creſſy, of Merton; George Aglionby, and Tho. Triplet, of Chriſt-church; Charles Gataker of Pembroke-college, ſon of the learned Thomas Gataker of Redrith; George Sandys the poet, &c. (6).

(6) Wood, Ath. col. 587.

[F] He made himſelf, in a very ſhort time, a perfect maſter of the Greek tongue.] When he undertook to learn it, he reſolved not to ſee London, which he loved above all places, till he had perfectly learned it; and, accordingly going to his own houſe in the country, he there purſued the ſtudy of that language with ſuch indefatigable induſtry, that he became maſter of it in a very ſhort time (7).

(7) Clarendon, vol. ii. part ii. p. 351.

[G] He was complimented with copies of verſes, by Mr. Waller, &c.] Mr. Waller's begin thus: To my Lord of Falkland. In the year 1638.

Brave Holland leads, and with him Falkland goes;
Who hears this told, and does not ſtraight ſuppoſe
We ſend the Graces and the Muſes forth,
To civilize, and to inſtruct the North?

And a little after.

Ah, noble Friend with what impatience all
That know thy worth, and know how prodigal
Of thy great Soul thou art, longing to twiſt
Bays with that Ivy, which ſo early kiſt
Thy youthful temples, with what horror we Think on the blind events of war and thee?
To Fate expoſing that all-knowing breaſt
Among the throng, as cheaply as the reſt, &c (8).

(8) Poems, &c. by Edm. Waller, Eſq; 8th edit. 1711, p. 81.

[H] And Mr. Cowley.] In his poem, To the Lord Falkland. For his ſafe return from the Northern Expedition againſt the Scots. The firſt lines of which run thus:

Great is thy charge, O North; be wiſe and juſt,
England commits her Falkland to thy truſt;
Return him ſafe: Learning would rather chuſe
Her Bodley, or her Vatican to loſe.
All things that are but writ or printed there,
In his unbounded breaſt engraven are.
There all the Sciences together meet,
And every Art does all her kindred greet.

And near the end.

He is too good for war, and ought to be
As far from danger, as from fear he is free (9).

(9) The Works of Mr. Abraham Cowley, 7th edit. 1681, fol. p. 415.

[I] This made him ſo ſevere againſt the Lord Finch.] John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, and Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, was, on the 14th of January 1640-1, impeached by the Lord Falkland, in the name of the Houſe of Commons, of having traiterouſly and wickedly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental laws and eſtabliſhed government of the realm; on account, of his having hindered, when he was Speaker, the reading of ſome things in the Houſe; of his having endeavoured to enlarge the bounds of the foreſt in Eſſex; and chiefly for being an adviſer and promoter of Ship-money, &c (10). After the reading of the articles, the Lord Falkland made a ſevere ſpeech againſt him, in which he obſerves,—— 'That his life 'appeared a perpetual warfare, by mines, and by bat'tery,

(10) Nelſon's Collections, vol. i. p. 722, 723.

and the Earl of Strafford [K], contrary to his natural gentleneſs and temper. But in both caſes he only followed the authority of thoſe, who, he believed, underſtood the laws perfectly, of which he himſelf was utterly ignorant (u). For, though he was ſe- (u) Ibid.
vere, ſo far was he from being violent againſt thoſe two noble Peers, that when it was moved in the Houſe of Commons, That the Earl of Strafford might forthwith (at the time he was firſt accuſed) be impeached of High-Treaſon, the Lord Falkland, though he was very well known not to have any kindneſs for him, modeſtly deſired the Houſe to conſider, 'Whether it would not ſuit better with the gravity of their proceedings, firſt 'to digeſt many of thoſe particulars which had been mentioned, by a Committee, be- 'fore they ſent up to the Houſe of Lords to accuſe him? declaring himſelf, however, 'to be abundantly ſatisfied that there was enough to charge him (w).' He had con- (w) Clarendon, vol. i. Part i. p. 173, 174.
tracted a diſlike to Archbiſhop Laud, and ſome others of the Biſhops [L], which in-

'tery, by battle, and by ſtratagem, againſt our fun- 'damental laws.' Then, after having inſtanced in the particulars above-mentioned, he adds,——'That his 'crimes were in the higheſt degree of Parliamentary 'Treaſon,——a Treaſon as well againſt the King, 'as againſt the kingdom; for whatſoever is againſt 'the whole, is undoubtedly againſt the head; which 'takes from his Majeſty the ground of his rule, the 'laws, (for if foundations be deſtroyed, the pinacles 'are moſt endangered;) which takes from his Maje- 'ſty the principal honour of his rule, the ruling over 'freemen, a power as much nobler than over villeins, 'as that is which is over beaſts; which endeavoured 'to take from his Majeſty the principal ſupport of his 'rule, their hearts and affections over whom he rules, 'a better and ſurer ſtrength and wall to the King, 'than the ſea is to the kingdom; and by begetting a 'mutual diſtruſt, and by that a mutual diſaffection 'between them, to hazard the danger even of the de- (11) Ibid. p. 725, 726. 'ſtruction of both (11).' He had, on the 5th of December before, made another Speech againſt the Lord Finch, and the Judges, wherein he obſerves, 'That 'the cauſe of all the miſeries they [the nation] had 'ſuffered, and the cauſe of all the jealouſies they had 'that they ſhould yet ſuffer, was, That a moſt excel- 'lent Prince had been moſt infinitely abuſed, by his 'Judges telling him, That by policy he might do 'what he pleaſed.'——And, afterwards aſſerts, 'That common fame was ground enough for the Houſe (12) Ibid. p. 654—656. 'of Commons to accuſe upon (12).'

[K] And the Earl of Strafford.] He hints at him, in the following paſſage which occurs in the laſt-mentioned ſpeech.——'I will only ſay we have accuſed a 'great perſon of High-Treaſon, for intending to ſub- 'vert our fundamental laws, and to introduce arbi- 'trary government, which we ſuppoſe he meant to (13) Hiſt. vol. ii. Part i. p. 353. 'do.'——The Lord Clarendon obſerves (13), That they who did not know his compoſition to be as free from revenge as it was from pride, thought that his ſharpneſs againſt the Earl of Strafford, might proceed from the memory of ſome unkindneſſes, not without a mixture of injuſtice from him towards his father.

[L] He had contracted a diſlike to Archbiſhop Laud, &c.] Having obſerved the Archbiſhop's paſſion, when it may be multiplicity of buſineſs, or other indiſpoſition had poſſeſſed him, he therefore wiſhed him leſs entangled and engaged in the buſineſs of the Court, or State.—Two reaſons induced his Lordſhip to give his conſent to the firſt bill for diſplacing the Biſhops. Firſt, His not underſtanding then the original of their right and ſuffrage there. Secondly, An opinion, that the combination againſt the whole government of the Church by Biſhops, was ſo violent and furious, that a leſs compoſition than the diſpenſing with their intermeddling in ſecular affairs, would not preſerve the or- (14) Ib. p. 336. der (14). However, what reaſons or inducements ſoever he might be acted by, he made, on the 9th of February 1640, as violent and bitter a ſpeech againſt the Biſhops, as any of their moſt inveterate enemies. Some paſſages in it, are as follow.——'This king- 'dom hath long laboured under many and great op- 'preſſions, both in Religion and Liberty; and a man's 'acquaintance here is not great, or his ingenuity leſs, 'who doth not both know and acknowledge, that a 'great, if not a principal, cauſe of both theſe have 'been ſome Biſhops, and their adherents. A little 'ſearch will ſerve to find them to have been the de- 'ſtruction of unity, under pretence of uniformity, to 'have brought in ſuperſtition and ſcandal, under the titles of reverence and decency, to have defiled 'our Church, by adorning our Churches, to have 'ſlackened the ſtrictneſs of that union which was for- 'merly between us and thoſe of our Religion beyond 'the ſea; an action as unpolitick as ungodly. We 'ſhall find them to have tithed mint and aniſe, and 'have left undone the weightier works of the law; 'to have been leſs eager upon thoſe who damn our 'Church, than upon thoſe, who, upon weak con- 'ſcience, and perhaps as weak reaſons, (the diſlike of 'ſome commanded garment, or ſome uncommanded 'poſture,) only abſtained from it.—We ſhall find them 'to have reſembled the dog in the manger; to have 'neither preached themſelves, nor employed thoſe 'that ſhould, nor ſuffered thoſe that would: to have 'brought in catechiſing only to thruſt out preaching; 'cried down lectures by the name of factions.—— 'To go yet farther, ſome of them have ſo induſtri- 'ouſly laboured to deduce themſelves from Rome, 'that they have given great ſuſpicion that in grati- 'tude they deſire to return thither, or at leaſt to meet 'it half way: Some have evidently laboured to bring 'in an Engliſh, though not a Roman Popery; I mean 'not only the outſide and dreſs of it, but equally ab- 'ſolute; a blind dependance of the people upon the 'Clergy, and of the Clergy upon themſelves.—— 'We ſhall find ſome of them to have laboured to ex- 'clude both all perſons, and all cauſes of the Clergy, 'from the ordinary juriſdiction of the Temporal Ma- 'giſtrate, and by hindring prohibitions, to have taken 'away the only legal bound to their arbitrary power.— 'We ſhall find ſome of them to have both kindled and 'blown the common fire of both nations,——and 'to have been the almoſt ſole abettors of my Lord of 'Strafford.'——All this he ſums up, by laying the faults of the men upon the order of the Biſhops, upon Epiſcopacy.——But afterwards he ſoftens the ſharpneſs of what he had advanced, in the following manner.——'If we conſider, that if not the firſt planters, 'yet the firſt ſpreaders of Chriſtianity, and the firſt 'and chief defenders of Chriſtianity againſt Hereſies 'within, and Paganiſm without, both with their ink 'and with their blood; and the main conducers to the 'reſurrection of Chriſtianity, at leaſt here in the refor- 'mation (and we owe the light of the Goſpel we now 'enjoy, to the fire they then endured for it) were all 'Biſhops: and that even now in the greateſt perfection 'of that order, there are yet ſome who have conduced 'in nothing to our late innovations, but in their ſi- 'lence; ſome, who in an unexpected and mighty 'place and power, have expreſſed an equal moderation 'and humility, being neither ambitious before, nor 'proud after, either of the Corſier's Staff, or White 'Staff: Some who have been learned oppoſers of Po- 'pery, and zealous oppoſers of Arminianiſm; be- 'tween whom and their inferior Clergy, in frequency 'of preaching hath been no diſtinction; whoſe lives 'are untouched, not only by guilt, but by malice; 'ſcarcely to be equalled by thoſe of any condition, or 'to be excelled by thoſe in any Calendar.——If we 'conſider this, this conſideration will bring forth this 'concluſion, That Biſhops may be good men (15).' (15) Nalſon, ubi ſupra, p. 768, &c. Ruſhworth's Hiſt. Collect. Part iii. vol. i. p. 184.
By what his Lordſhip ſays of Arminianiſm, 'tis plain, that notwithſtanding his great learning, he had never ſtudied the Predeſtinarian Controverſy; of which Arminianiſm gives a rational and conſiſtent notion, agreeable to God's infinite Wiſdom and Goodneſs; whereas rigid Calviniſm repreſents God, the fountain of Goodneſs and Perfection, as the moſt cruel, arbitrary, and tyrannical Being in the world.

fluenced his judgment ſo far, as to make him concur in the firſt bill to take away the votes of Biſhops in the Houſe of Lords (x), though he refuſed to be one of the Committee to draw up reaſons for it (y). This concurrence of his gave occaſion for ſome to believe, and opportunity to others to conclude, that he was no friend to the Church, or the eſtabliſhed government of the ſame (z): and it cauſed many in the Houſe of Commons to imagine, and hope, that he might be brought to a farther compliance with their deſigns (a). Indeed the great opinion he had of the uprightneſs and integrity of thoſe perſons who appeared moſt active againſt the Court, eſpecially of Mr. Hamden, kept him for ſome time from ſuſpecting any deſign againſt the peace of the kingdom; and though he differed from them commonly in concluſion, he believed long their purpoſes were honeſt. But when he grew better informed what was law, and diſcerned in them a deſire to controul that law by a vote of one, or both Houſes, no man oppoſed more thoſe attempts, and gave the adverſe party more trouble by reaſon and argumentation (b). Accordingly, about ſix months after paſſing the above-mentioned bill for taking away the Biſhops votes, when the ſame argument came again into debate, he changed his opinion, and gave the Houſe all the oppoſition he could; nor was he reſerved in acknowledging, that Mr. Hamden had aſſured him, if that bill might paſs, there would be nothing more attempted to the prejudice of the Church (c). Though he thus voted againſt the Biſhops, yet we are aſſured, that he had the order itſelf in perfect reverence, and thought too great encouragement could not poſſibly be given to learning, nor too great rewards to learned men (d). For ſome time he continued averſe to the Court, and was ſo jealous of the leaſt imagination of his inclining to preferment, that he affected even a moroſeneſs to the Court, and the Courtiers; and left nothing undone which might prevent, or divert the King's or Queen's favour towards him (e). And therefore, when he heard that he was to be made a Privy-Counſellor, and Secretary of State, he reſolved to decline the one, and refuſe the other. But, at length, for certain reaſons [M], he ſubmitted to the King's pleaſure (f); and ſerved his Majeſty in thoſe employments, with great ability, being well verſed in languages; and with the utmoſt integrity, being above corruption of any kind: though, at firſt, he was ſo totally unacquainted with buſineſs, and the forms of it, that he did believe he could not execute the office with any ſufficiency. He was employed by the King, to demand from the Earls of Eſſex and Holland, the badges of their offices of Lord Chamberlain, and Groom of the Stole (g); and alſo to require the Seal from the Lord Keeper Littleton (h). June 15, 1642, he was one of the Lords who ſigned a Declaration, wherein they profeſſed, they were fully perſuaded that his Majeſty had no intention to raiſe war upon his Parliament (i). About the ſame time, he ſubſcribed to levy twenty horſe for his Majeſty's ſervice (k). Upon this, and other accounts, he was excepted from the Parliament's favour, in the inſtructions given by the two Houſes to their General, the Earl of Eſſex (l). He attended the King to Edgehill-fight, where, after the enemy was routed, he was near incurring great danger, by interpoſing to ſave thoſe who had thrown away their arms (m). He was alſo with his Majeſty at Oxford [N], and (x) Ibid. p. 235. and vol. ii. Part i. p. 356.

(y) Idem, vol. i. Part ii. p. 303.

(z) Vol. ii. P. i. p. 356.

(a) Vol. i. P. i. p. 236.

(b) Idem, vol. ii. Part i. p. 353.

(c) Idem, vol. i. Part. i. p. 236.

(d) Id. vol. ii. P. i. p. 357.

(e) Ib. p. 353, 354.

(f) Ibid, p. 355. and vol. i. P. ii. p. 340, 366.

(g) Ibid. vol. i. P. ii. p. 477. This harſh office might have been more naturally and as effectually performed, by a Gentleman-Uſher; and therefore the Lord Falkland was a little troubled at receiving the command, but however would make no excuſe, ibid.

(h) Ibid. p. 573.

(i) Ib p. 655, 656.

(k) Liſt, at the end of the King's Anſwer to the Petition of the Lords and Commons preſented to him at York, June 17, 1642. Lond. 4to.

(l) Id. vol. ii. Part i. p. 28.

(m) Ibid. p. 357.

[M] For certain reaſons.] His reaſons for accepting of the Seals, were theſe two. Firſt, The conſideration that his refuſal might bring ſome blemiſh upon the King's affairs, and that men would think he had refuſed ſo great an honour and truſt, becauſe he muſt with it have been obliged to do ſomewhat elſe not juſtifiable. The other was, Leſt he might be thought to avoid it out of fear to do an ungracious thing to the Houſe of Commons, who were very much troubled at the diſplacing of Sir Henry Vane. For, as he had a full deſire of fame by juſt and generous actions, ſo he had an equal contempt of it by any ſervile expedients.——Whilſt he continued in his office, there were two things he could never bring himſelf to. The one was, employing of ſpies, or giving any countenance or entertainment to them; namely, to ſuch perſons, who by communication of guilt, or diſſimulation of manners, wind themſelves into ſuch truſts, and ſecrets, as enable them to make diſcoveries. The other, The liberty of opening letters, upon a ſuſpicion, that they might contain matter of dangerous conſequence. For the firſt, he would ſay, ſuch inſtruments muſt be void of all ingenuity, and common honeſty, before they could be of uſe; and afterwards they could never be fit to be credited: and that no ſingle preſervation could be worth ſo general a wound, and corruption of human ſociety, as the cheriſhing ſuch perſons would carry with it. The laſt, he thought, ſuch a violation of the law of nature, that no qualification by office could juſtify him in the treſpaſs; and tho' he was convinced by the neceſſity, and iniquity of the time, that thoſe advantages of information were not to be declined, and were neceſſary to be practiſed, he found means to put it off from himſelf (16).

(16) Clarendon, vol. ii. Part i. p. 355.

[N] He was alſo with his Majeſty at Oxford.] During their reſidence there, his Majeſty went one day to ſee the public library, where he was ſhewed among other books a Virgil nobly printed, and exquiſitely bound. The Lord Falkland, to divert the King, would have his Majeſty make a trial of his fortune by the Sortes Virgilianæ, an uſual kind of divination in ages paſt, made by opening a Virgil. Whereupon, the King opening the book, the period which happened to come up, was that part of Dido's imprecation againſt Æneas, Æneid. lib. iv. ver. 615, &c. part of which is thus tranſlated by Mr. Dryden.

> Oppreſs'd with numbers in th' unequal field,
> His men diſcourag'd, and himſelf expell'd,
> Let him for ſuccour ſue from place to place,
> Torn from his ſubjects, and his ſon's embrace, &c.

King Charles ſeeming concerned at this accident, the Lord Falkland, who obſerved it, would likewiſe try his own fortune in the ſame manner; hoping he might fall upon ſome paſſage that could have no relation to his caſe, and thereby divert the King's thoughts from any impreſſion the other might make upon him: but the place Lord Falkland ſtumbled upon, was yet more ſuited to his deſtiny than the other had been to the King's; being the following expreſſions of Evander, and at the ſiege of Glouceſter, where he expoſed himſelf to danger (n). From the beginning of the Civil War, his natural chearfulneſs and vivacity grew clouded, and a kind of ſadneſs and dejection of ſpirit ſtole upon him, which he had never been uſed to. After the reſolution of the two Houſes not to admit any treaty for peace, thoſe indiſpoſitions, which had before touched him, grew into a perfect habit of unchearfulneſs; and he, who had been exactly eaſy and affable to all men, became on a ſudden leſs communicable, and very ſad, pale, and extremely affected with the ſpleen. In his cloaths and habit, which he had before always minded with more neatneſs, induſtry, and expence, than are uſual to ſo great a ſoul, he became not only incurious, but too negligent; and in his reception of ſuitors, ſo quick, ſharp, and ſevere, that it made him be looked upon as proud and imperious. When there was any overture, or hope for peace, he would be more erect and vigorous, and exceedingly ſolicitous to preſs any thing which he thought might promote it. And ſitting among his friends, often, after a deep ſilence, and frequent ſighs, he would, with a ſhrill and ſad accent, repeat the word peace, peace; and would paſſionately profeſs, that the very agony of the war, and the view of the calamities and deſolation, the kingdom did and muſt endure, took his ſleep from him, and would ſhortly break his heart (o). This extreme uneaſineſs ſeems to have hurried him on to his deſtruction. For, the morning before the firſt battle of Newbury, he called for a clean ſhirt, and being aſked the reaſon of it, anſwered, That 'if he were 'ſlain in the battle, they ſhould not find his body in foul linen.' Being diſſuaded by his friends to go into the fight, as having no call to it, and being no military officer, he ſaid, 'he was weary of the times, and foreſaw much miſery to his own country, and 'did believe he ſhould be out of it ere night (p).' Putting himſelf therefore into the firſt rank of the Lord Byron's regiment, he was ſhot with a muſquet, in the lower part of the belly, on the 20th of September, 1643, and in the inſtant falling from his horſe, his body was not found till the next morning (q). Thus fell that incomparable young man (r), much lamented by all that knew him, or heard of him (s), in the thirty-fourth year of his age; having ſo much diſpatched the true buſineſs of his life, that the eldeſt rarely attain to that immenſe knowledge, and the youngeſt enter not into the world with more innocency (t). His contemporaries have agreed to beſtow upon him the higheſt commendations imaginable. They aſſure us, that he was a man of excellent, nay of exceeding great and prodigious parts, both natural and acquired (u); of a wit ſo ſharp, and a nature ſo ſincere, that nothing could be more lovely (w); of great ingenuity and honour (x); of the moſt exemplary manners, and ſingular good-nature, and of the moſt unblemiſhed integrity (y); of that inimitable ſweetneſs and delight in converſation, of ſo flowing and obliging a humanity and goodneſs to mankind, and of that primitive ſimplicity and innocency of life, as could hardly be equalled (z). His anſwers were quick and ſudden; and though he had a great deal of true worth, yet he was withal very modeſt (a). His familiarity and friendſhip, for the moſt part, were with men of the moſt eminent and ſublime parts, and of untouched reputation in point of integrity. He was a great cheriſher of wit, and fancy, and good parts, in any man; and, if he found them clouded with poverty or want, a moſt liberal and bountiful patron towards them, even above his fortune (b). He was ſo great an enemy to that paſſion and uncharitableneſs, which he ſaw produced by difference of opinion in matters of Religion, that in all his diſputes with Prieſts, and others of the Roman Communion, he affected to manifeſt all poſſible civility to their perſons, and eſteem of their learning or ingenuity (c). As his parts were great, ſo alſo were his knowledge and learning very conſiderable. Of this he hath left ſignal proofs in his learned writings [O], and in the aſſiſtance

(n) Ibid. p. 359.

(o) Ibid. p. 357, 358, 359.

(p) Whitelock's Memorials, edit. 1732, p. 73, 74.

(q) Clarendon, ubi ſupra, p. 359.

(r) Ibid.

(s) Whitelock, p. 74.

(t) Clarendon, p. 359.

(u) Idem, vol. i. P. ii. p. 340. and Biſhop Barlow's Genuine Remains, edit. 1693, p. 328.

(w) Clarendon, in the place laſt cited.

(x) Whitelock, ubi ſupra.

(y) Clarendon's Animadverſions on Fanaticiſm fanatically imputed to the Catholic Church, by S. Cradly, &c. p. 185.

(z) Clarendon, vol. ii. Part i. p. 350.

(a) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra, from Dr. Triplet's Preface to Lord Falkland's Diſcourſe of Infallibility.

(b) Clarendon, ibid. p. 351.

(c) Ibid. p. 352.

Evander, upon the untimely death of his ſon Pallas, Æneid. lib. xi. ver. 152, &c.

Non hæc, O Palla, dederas promiſſa parenti, &c. thus tranſlated by Mr. Dryden.

O Pallas! thou haſt fail'd thy plighted word,
To fight with caution, not to tempt the ſword:
I warn'd thee, but in vain; for well I knew,
What perils youthful ardour would purſue:
That boiling blood would carry thee too far;
Young as thou wert in dangers, raw to war!
O curſt eſſay of arms, diſaſtrous doom,
Prelude of bloody fields, and fights to come (17)!

(17) Memoirs, &c. by J. Welwood, M.D. edit. 1718, 12mo. p. 90—92.

[O] His learned writings.] They are, firſt Poems. Next, beſides thoſe Speeches of his mentioned above, I. A Speech, 'Of Uniformity,' as we are informed by Mr. Wood (18): but if he means the ſame which is in Ruſhworth (19), under that title, it is no more than the beginning of his Lordſhip's Speech againſt the Biſhops and Epiſcopacy, of which we have given an extract. II. A Speech, 'Of ill Counſellors about the 'King: in 1640 (20).' III. As for the 'Speech 'about Ship-money, December 5, 1640.' And, the 'Speech concerning John Lord Finch, and the Judges.' mentioned as two diſtinct ones by Mr. Wood (21), they are one and the ſame: namely, that mentioned under the note [I]. IV. 'A Draught of a Speech, con-'cerning Epiſcopacy, found amongſt the Lord Falk-'land's papers ſince his death, written with his own 'hand.' Oxford, one ſheet, 4*to*. 1644. V. 'A Diſ-'courſe concerning Epiſcopacy.' Lond. 1660, 4*to*. VI. 'A Diſcourſe of the Infallibility of the Church 'of Rome.' Oxford 1645, 4*to*. George Holland, a Cambridge Scholar, and afterwards a Romiſh Prieſt, having written an Anſwer to this Diſcourſe of the Infallibility, &c. the Lord Falkland made a Reply to it, intituled, VII. 'A View of ſome Exceptions made 'againſt The Diſcourſe of the Infallibility of the 'Church of Rome.' Printed at Oxford 1646, 4*to*. The Diſcourſe of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome; and the Reply to the Anſwer made thereto by G. Holland; were afterwards printed together, with a Preface ſigned J. P. ſuppoſed to be John Pearſon (22). They were reprinted again in 1651, with this title, 'Sir Lucius Cary, late Lord Viſcount of Falk-land,

(18) Ath. vol. i. col. 587.

(19) Hiſtorical Collections, P. ii. vol. ii. p. 1342.

(20) Ibid. p. 1351.

(21) Ubi ſupra.

(22) Wood, ubi ſupra.

assistance he gave the immortal Chillingworth, in his book of The Religion of Protestants, &c [P]. To his honour be it spoken, he was also a sincere Christian (d), and a true son of (d) Dr. Tripler, in Wood, ubi supra, col. 587.

'land, his Discourse of Infallibility; with an Answer 'to it, and his Lordship's Reply, never before pub-'lished; together with Mr. Walter Montague's Let-'ter concerning the changing his Religion, Answered 'by my Lord Falkland.' This Letter of Mr. W. Montague is dated from Paris, November 21, 1635. VIII. The Lord Falkland was also author of 'A Let-'ter to Mr. F. M. anno. 1636,' printed at the end of Mr. Charles Gataker's Answer to Five captious Questions propounded by a Factor for the Papacy, by parallel Questions and positive Resolutions. Lond. 1673, 4*to*. This Factor for the Papacy was the same Fr. M. to whom the Lord Falkland's letter is addressed.

[P] He assisted Mr. Chillingworth in his book of The Religion of Protestants, &c.] This particular we learn from Bishop Barlow (23), who says, That 'when Mr. 'Chillingworth undertook the defence of Dr. Potter's 'book against the Jesuit, he was almost continually at 'Tew with my Lord, examining the reasons of both 'parties, pro and con, and their invalidility or con-'sequence; where Mr. Chillingworth had the benefit 'of my Lord's company, and his good library. The 'benefit he had by my Lord's company, and rational 'discourse, was very great, as Mr. Chillingworth would 'modestly and truly confess. And so was also that 'which he received from his library, which was well 'furnished with choice books, such as Mr. Chilling-'worth neither had, nor ever heard of many of them, 'till my Lord shewed him the books and the passages 'in them, which were significant and pertinent to the 'purpose. So that it is certain, most of those ancient 'authorities which Mr. Chillingworth makes use of, 'he owes, first to my Lord of Falkland's learning, 'that he would give so good directions; and next 'to his civility and kindness, that he would direct 'him.' M.

(23) See his Genuine Remains, &c. Lond. 1693, 8vo. p. 329.

 [The remark which is made, by our ingenious predecessor, at the end of note [L], doth not seem to be sufficiently candid. It by no means necessarily follows, on account of Lord Falkland's speaking against arminianism, that he had never studied the predestinarian controversy. All who are well versed in theological writings must know, that many able and learned men, who have paid great attention to the subject, have embraced the doctrine of predestination. This we do not say from any attachment or affection to calvinism, but merely to assert a fact, which it becomes every scholar to acknowledge. Though numbers may think that the calvinistical opinions represent God as a cruel, arbitrary, and tyrannical Being, it is certain that the persons who adopt these opinions view the matter in a different light. It is their intention, however unfortunate they may be in the execution of their purpose, to maintain and vindicate what they esteem to be the glory of the divine perfections. Besides, it ought to be remembered, that predestination hath often most ably been defended on the footing of reason and philosophy. It is undoubtedly included in the scheme of necessity, though in that scheme it is differently modified, and founded upon different principles from what the generality of Calvinists admit.

It is more curious to observe, that Lord Falkland, in his speech against the Bishops, joins Popery and Arminianism together, as having a connection with each other, and that this was the common language of the Patriots of that age. In the protestation which was made in the House of Commons, on the second of March, 1728-29, whilst the Speaker was forcibly detained in the chair, the first article was as follows: "That whosoever should bring in innovation in "religion, or by favour seek to extend or introduce "Popery or Arminianism, or other opinions, disagree-"ing from the truth, or orthodox Church, should be "reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and com-"mon-wealth (24.)" As it may appear strange to any man who is not accurately acquainted with the history of these times, that Arminianism should thus be obnoxiously joined with Popery, it may not be amiss to enquire a little particularly into the cause of this union. The Puritan ministers were almost universally very zealous Calvinists. Having been much persecuted during the preceding reigns, and deprived of the liberty of preaching, they were obliged to betake themselves to different employments, or to seek for shelter in the houses of pious and beneficent persons, who approved of their principles, or esteemed their characters. Many of them were taken by the nobility and gentry into their families, with the purpose of educating their children. To this they were induced not only by the learning of the Puritan ministers, in which they shared with the rest of the Clergy, but by their severity of manners. The Puritan ministers, having gotten so important a business into their hands, would not, we may be assured, neglect the opportunity of inspiring their pupils with their own views of things; and this they did with regard to theological as well as political subjects. They were especially careful to lead the young men under their tuition into a great aversion to Arminianism. There were two circumstances, which, at that period contributed to render Arminianism peculiarly hateful. One of these was, its imagined conformity to Popery in the article of justification. It is not, indeed, true that the Arminians, as such, could reasonably be considered as entertaining any opinions which favoured the absurd doctrines of the Papists concerning merit, and works of supererogation. It was, however, then generally believed that they did; and Popery, with the greatest reason, was looked upon in so dangerous a light, that it is not surprizing that every thing which was thought to come near it excited a similar alarm and aversion.

Another circumstance, which contributed still more to a dislike of Arminianism, was the real character of most of the Arminian Clergy, and especially the dignified part of them, during the reigns of King James and King Charles the First. The Arminian Clergy of that time were, in fact, the Clergy who approached the nearest to the Church of Rome, in their fondness for ecclesiastical power, ostentatious ceremonies, and other things which wore a popish aspect. They were the men who appeared the most desirous of accomplishing some kind of union with that Church. Besides this, they were the great asserters of regal prerogative. Several of them went even so far as to ascribe to the Prince an absolute uncontrollable authority; an authority by Divine right, which set him above all parliaments, and all law. This was the case with Laud, Manwaring, Sibthorp, and others. The Arminian Clergy, therefore, being actually of this stamp, jealousy and dislike were naturally conceived with respect to their theological principles; though their theological principles, so far as related to the particular doctrinal tenets of Arminius or Episcopius, had no real tendency to promote Popery and arbitrary power. There are some Authors, indeed, who appear to be of a different opinion; but without good reason. The sentiments which a person may entertain concerning election, grace, universal redemption, perseverance, and matters of a similar nature, whether on the Calvinistical, or Arminian side of the question, cannot, in themselves, be considered as favourable either to ecclesiastical, or to civil tyranny. The connexion which, at the period we are speaking of, and in this kingdom, subsisted between Arminianism and arbitrary principles in Church and State, was owing to peculiar circumstances. It arose partly from Laud and his friends happening to be Arminians, whilst, in other respects, they were abetters of the absolute power of the Prince; and partly from the critical situation of the Arminian Clergy. These Clergy were supposed to have the established articles of the Church of England against them, and it is certain that the stream of the people did not run in their favour. They betook themselves, therefore, to the protection of the Sovereign; and, in order the more fully to obtain that protection, zealously fell in with all his prejudices; which was the easier to them, in consequence of having been themselves educated in narrow views both of religious and civil polity. They had of the Church of England (e). Some indeed have charged him with being a Socinian (f), but all that knew him have cleared him from that imputation (g). And it is well known,

(24) Parliamentary History, vol. viii. p. 332.

(e) Barlow's Genuine Remains, p. 328.

(f) See Wood, col. 587.

(g) S. Creſſy in his Epiſtle Apologetical, printed 1674, § 7. and Dr. Triplet in his Epiſt. Dedicat. before the Lord Falkland's book of Infallibility.

had reaſon, likewiſe, to apprehend, from the averſion which the patriots had conceived againſt them, that they would be brought into a ſtate of perſecution, if the oppoſition to the Crown ſhould prevail; and this apprehenſion would almoſt unavoidably throw them ſtill farther on the other ſide.

The ſituation of things in the United Provinces was directly the reverſe. There the Arminians were the Patriots, and oppoſed the arbitrary deſigns of the Houſe of Orange; while the Calviniſts were zealouſly devoted to the Princes of that family, and too much favoured them even in their unjuſtifiable purpoſes. This happened at the very period in which the Arminians in England were peculiarly obnoxious to their countrymen, on account of their attachment to regal prerogative and prieſtly dominion; and it is a deciſive proof that Arminianiſm has no neceſſary, or natural connexion with tyranny or with Popery. It cannot be doubted that there were ſeveral of the Arminian Clergy of this country who were far from entertaining principles which were hoſtile to the privileges of their fellow ſubjects. Mr. John Hales of Eaton, and Dr. Jeremy Taylor, had ſuch enlarged ſentiments with regard to religious liberty, that we cannot eaſily ſuppoſe them to have been enemies to civil freedom. It is a fact worthy of particular notice, that Mr. John Goodwin, who was a bigoted Arminian, was, at the ſame time, a moſt zealous republican, and wrote a treatiſe in vindication of the beheading of King Charles the Firſt.

But it is ſufficient to appeal to our own times, as a deciſive proof that there is nothing in Arminianiſm which leads a perſon to be a favourer either of Popery, or of abſolute Monarchy. The accidental connexion between theſe things, which took place in the reign of King Charles the Firſt, is now broken. We cannot but be ſenſible, that, whether a man be a Calviniſt, or an Arminian, it is of no importance to his political ſentiments. It is a plain fact, that Arminians, in perfect conſiſtence with their peculiar theological opinions, not only may be, but actually are as averſe to the Roman Catholic religion, and to arbitrary power, as any perſons whatſoever.

It ſeems plain, from all the account which is given in the text, of Lord Falkland's ſtate of mind, after the beginning of the civil war, and his entering into his Majeſty's ſervice, that he was not ſatisfied with his ſtation. Upon a nearer acceſs to the King, he probably ſaw more of Charles the Firſt's arbitrary principles, and that he was not, as his Lordſhip had before imagined, a friend to Parliaments. The extreme anxiety under which Lord Falkland laboured, and his almoſt voluntarily throwing away his life, can ſcarcely be accounted for but upon ſuch a ſuppoſition.

If his Lordſhip had any doubts concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, they do not redound greatly to his diſhonour. Doubts of this kind were entertained by his friend Chillingworth; and it is well known, that ſome others of the beſt and ableſt men which England hath produced have withheld their aſſent from the Athanaſian opinions.

We ſhould not do full juſtice to Lord Falkland's merit and virtues, if we did not inſert the freſh character of him which hath lately been given to the public, in the Earl of Clarendon's life; and though the quotation be long, and ſome few particulars in it may be repeated that have already been mentioned, it will, nevertheleſs, come recommended by the maſterly manner with which it is written, and by the new circumſtances it relates concerning the ſubject of the preſent article. "With Sir Lucius Carey he (Mr. Hyde) had a moſt entire friendſhip without reſerve, from his age of twenty years, to the hour of his death, near twenty years after; upon which there will be occaſion to enlarge when we come to ſpeak of that time, and often before, and therefore we ſhall ſay no more of him in this place, than to ſhew his condition, and qualifications, which were the firſt ingredients into that friendſhip, which was afterwards cultivated, and improved by a conſtant converſation and familiarity, and by many accidents which contributed thereto. He had the advantage of a noble extraction, and of being born his father's eldeſt ſon, when there was a greater fortune in proſpect to be inherited (beſides what he might reaſonably expect by his mother) than came afterwards to his poſſeſſion. His education was equal to his birth, at leaſt in the care, if not in the climate; for his father being Deputy of Ireland, before he was of age fit to be ſent abroad, his breeding was in the Court, and in the Univerſity of Dublin; but under the care, vigilance, and direction of ſuch governors and tutors, that he learned all thoſe exerciſes and languages, better than moſt men do in more celebrated places; inſomuch as when he came into England, which was when he was about the age of eighteen years, he was not only maſter of the Latin tongue, and had read all the Poets, and other of the beſt Authors with notable judgment for that age, but he underſtood, and ſpake, and writ French, as if he had ſpent many years in France.

"He had another advantage, which was a great ornament to the reſt, that was, a good, a plentiful eſtate, of which he had the early poſſeſſion. His mother was the ſole daughter and heir of the Lord Chief Baron Tanfield, who having given a fair portion with his daughter in marriage, had kept himſelf free to diſpoſe of his land, and his other eſtate, in ſuch manner as he ſhould think fit; and he ſettled it in ſuch manner upon his grandſon Sir Lucius Carey, without taking notice of his father or mother, that upon his grandmother's death, which fell out about the time that he was nineteen years of age, all the land, with two very good houſes very well furniſhed (worth above two thouſand pounds per annum) in a moſt pleaſant country, and the two moſt pleaſant places in that country, with a very plentiful perſonal eſtate, fell into his hands and poſſeſſion, and to his entire diſpoſal.

"With theſe advantages, he had one great diſadvantage (which in the firſt entrance into the world is attended with too much prejudice) in his perſon and preſence, which was in no degree attractive or promiſing: his ſtature was low, and ſmaller than moſt men; his motion not graceful; and his aſpect ſo far from inviting, that it had ſomewhat in it of ſimplicity; and his voice the worſt of the three, and ſo untuned, that inſtead of reconciling, it offended the ear, ſo that nobody would have expected muſic from that tongue; and ſure no man was leſs beholden to nature for its recommendation into the world; but then no man ſooner, or more diſappointed this general and cuſtomary prejudice: that little perſon and ſmall ſtature was quickly found to contain a great heart, a courage ſo keen, and a nature ſo fearleſs, that no compoſition of the ſtrongeſt limbs, and moſt harmonious and proportioned preſence and ſtrength, ever more diſpoſed any man to the greateſt enterprize; it being his greateſt weakneſs to be too ſolicitous for ſuch adventures; and that untuned tongue and voice eaſily diſcovered itſelf to be ſupplied, and governed, by a mind and underſtanding ſo excellent, that the wit and weight of all he ſaid, carried another kind of luſtre and admiration in it, and even another kind of acceptation from the perſons preſent, than any ornament of delivery could reaſonably promiſe itſelf, or is uſually attended with; and his diſpoſition and nature was ſo gentle and obliging, ſo much delighted in courteſy, kindneſs, and generoſity, that all mankind could not but admire, and love him.

"In a ſhort time after he had poſſeſſion of the eſtate his grandfather had left him, and before he was of age, he committed a fault againſt his father, in marrying a young lady, whom he paſſionately loved, without any conſiderable portion, which exceedingly offended him: and diſappointed all his reaſonable hopes and expectation, of redeeming and repairing his own broken fortune, and deſperate hopes in Court, by ſome advantageous marriage of his ſon; about which he had then ſome probable treaty. Sir Lucius Cary was very conſcious to himſelf of his offence and tranſgreſſion, and the conſequence of it, which though he could not repent, having married a lady known, how ready, violent, and paſſionate men are, to charge thoſe that any way differ from them, with the damnable ſin, as they think it, of hereſy. Upon the whole, therefore, of a moſt extraordinary wit and judgment, and of the moſt ſignal virtue and exemplary life, that the age produced, and who brought him many hopeful children, in which he took great delight; yet he confeſſed it, with the moſt ſincere and dutiful applications to his father for his pardon, that could be made; and for the prejudice he had brought upon his fortune by bringing no portion to him, he offered to repair it, by reſigning his whole eſtate to his diſpoſal, and to rely wholly upon his kindneſs for his own maintenance and ſupport; and to that purpoſe, he had cauſed conveyances to be drawn by Counſel, which he brought ready engroſſed to his father, and was willing to ſeal, and execute them, that they might be valid; but his father's paſſion and indignation ſo far tranſported him (though he was a gentleman of excellent parts), that he refuſed any reconciliation, and rejected all the offers that were made him of the eſtate; ſo that his ſon remained ſtill in the poſſeſſion of his eſtate againſt his will; for which he found great reaſon afterwards to rejoice; but he was for the preſent, ſo much afflicted with his father's diſpleaſure, that he tranſported himſelf and his wife into Holland, reſolving to buy ſome military command, and to ſpend the remainder of his life in that profeſſion; but being diſappointed in the treaty he expected, and finding no opportunity to accommodate himſelf with ſuch a command, he returned again into England, reſolving to retire to a country life, and to his books; that ſince he was not like to improve himſelf in arms, he might advance in letters.

" In this reſolution he was ſo ſevere (as he was always naturally very intent upon what he was inclined to) that he declared, he would not ſee London in many years, which was the place he loved of all the world; and that in his ſtudies, he would firſt apply himſelf to the Greek, and purſue it without intermiſſion, till he ſhould attain to the full underſtanding of that tongue; and it is hardly to be credited, what induſtry he uſed, and what ſucceſs attended that induſtry; for though his father's death, by an unhappy accident, made his repair to London abſolutely neceſſary, in fewer years than he had propoſed for his abſence; yet he had firſt made himſelf maſter of the Greek tongue (in the Latin he was very well verſed before), and had read not only the Greek Hiſtorians, but Homer likewiſe, and ſuch of the Poets as were worthy to be peruſed.

" Though his father's death brought no other convenience to him, but a title to redeem an eſtate, mortgaged for as much as it was worth, and for which he was compelled to ſell a finer ſeat of his own; yet it impoſed a burthen upon him, of the title of a Viſcount, and an increaſe of expence, in which he was not in his nature too provident, or reſtrained; having naturally ſuch a generoſity and bounty in him, that he ſeemed to have his eſtate in truſt, for all worthy perſons who ſtood in want of ſupplies and encouragement, as Ben Jonſon, and many others of that time, whoſe fortunes required, and whoſe ſpirits made them ſuperior to, ordinary obligations; which yet they were contented to receive from him, becauſe his bounties were ſo generouſly diſtributed, and ſo much without vanity and oſtentation, that except from thoſe few perſons, from whom he ſometimes received the characters of fit objects for his benefits, or whom he intruſted for the more ſecret deriving them to them, he did all he could, that the perſons themſelves who received them ſhould not know from what fountain they flowed; and when that could not be concealed, he ſuſtained any acknowledgment from the perſons obliged, with ſo much trouble and baſhfulneſs, that they might well perceive, that he was even aſhamed of the little he had given, and to receive ſo large a recompence for it.

" As ſoon as he had finiſhed all thoſe tranſactions, which the death of his father had made neceſſary to be done, he retired again to his country life, and to his ſevere courſe of ſtudy, which was very delightful to him, as ſoon as he was engaged in it; but he was wont to ſay, that he never found reluctancy in any thing he reſolved to do, but in his quitting London, and departing from the converſation of thoſe he enjoyed there; which was in ſome degree preſerved, and continued by frequent letters, and often viſits, which were made by his friends from thence, whilſt he continued wedded to the country; and which were ſo grateful to him, that during their ſtay with him, he looked upon no book, except their very converſation made an appeal to ſome book; and truly his whole converſation was one continued Convivium Philoſophicum, or Convivium Theologicum, enlivened and refreſhed with all the facetiouſneſs of wit, and good-humour, and pleaſantneſs of diſcourſe, which made the gravity of the argument itſelf (whatever it was) very delectable. His houſe where he uſually reſided (Tew, or Burford in Oxfordſhire) being within ten or twelve miles of the Univerſity, looked like the Univerſity itſelf, by the company that was always found there. There were Dr. Sheldon, Dr. Morley, Dr. Hammond, Dr. Earles, Mr. Chillingworth, and indeed all men of eminent parts and faculties in Oxford, beſides thoſe who reſorted thither from London; who all found their lodgings there, as ready as in the Colleges; nor did the lord of the houſe know of their coming, or going, nor who were in his houſe, till he came to dinner, or ſupper, where all ſtill met; otherwiſe, there was no troubleſome ceremony, or conſtraint to forbid men to come to the houſe, or to make them weary of ſtaying there; ſo that many came thither to ſtudy in a better air, finding all the books they could deſire, in his library, and all the perſons together, whoſe company they could wiſh, and not find, in any other ſociety. Here Mr. Chillingworth wrote, and formed, and modelled his excellent book againſt the learned Jeſuit Mr. Nott, after frequent debates upon the moſt important particulars; in many of which, he ſuffered himſelf to be over-ruled by the judgment of his friends, though in others he ſtill adhered to his own fancy, which was ſceptical enough, even in the higheſt points.

" In this happy and delightful converſation and reſtraint, he remained in the country many years, and until he had made ſo prodigious a progreſs in learning, that there were very few claſſic authors in the Greek or Latin tongue, that he had not read with great exactneſs: he had read all the Greek and Latin Fathers; all the moſt allowed and authentic eccleſiaſtical writers; and all the councils, with wonderful care and obſervation; for in religion he thought too careful and too curious an enquiry could not be made, amongſt thoſe, whoſe purity was not queſtioned, and whoſe authority was conſtantly and confidently urged by men who were furtheſt from being of one mind amongſt themſelves; and for the mutual ſupport of their ſeveral opinions, in which they moſt contradicted each other; and in all thoſe controverſies, he had ſo diſpaſſioned a conſideration, ſuch a candour in his nature, and ſo profound a charity in his conſcience, that in thoſe points, in which he was in his own judgment moſt clear, he never thought the worſe, or in any degree declined the familiarity, of thoſe who were of another mind; which, without queſtion, is an excellent temper for the propagation and advancement of Chriſtianity. With theſe great advantages of induſtry, he had a memory retentive of all that he had ever read, and an underſtanding and judgment to apply it ſeaſonably and appoſitely, with the moſt dexterity and addreſs, and the leaſt pedantry and affectation, that ever man, who knew ſo much, was poſſeſſed with, of what quality ſoever: it is not a trivial evidence of his learning, his wit, and his candour, that may be found in that diſcourſe of his againſt the infallibility of the Church of Rome, publiſhed ſince his death, and from a copy under his own hand, though not prepared and digeſted by him for the preſs, and to which he would have given ſome caſtigations.

" But all his parts, abilities, and faculties, by art and induſtry, were not to be valued, or mentioned, in compariſon of his moſt accompliſhed mind and manners: his gentleneſs and affability was ſo tranſcendent fore, he was the envy and the wonder of his time, and the greateſt ornament to this nation, that the laſt age, nay that any age hath ever produced (b). As to his perſon, he was little, and of no great ſtrength; his hair was blackiſh, and ſomewhat flaggy; and his eye black and lively (i). His body was buried in the Church of Great Tew (k). His uſual ſaying was, 'I pity unlearned Gentlemen, in a rainy day (l).'

(i) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra.

(b) Dr. Tri le's ibid. and Clarendon, in his Animadverſions, ubi ſupra.

(k) Ibid.

(l) D. Lloyd's State Worthies, edit. 1679, p. 941.

dent and obliging, that it drew reverence, and ſome kind of compliance from the roughеſt, and moſt unpoliſhed, and ſtubborn conſtitutions; and made them of another temper in debate, in his preſence, than they were in other places: he was in his nature ſo ſevere a lover of juſtice, and ſo preciſe a lover of truth, that he was ſuperior to all poſſible temptations for the violation of either; indeed ſo rigid an exacter of perfection, in all thoſe things which ſeemed but to border upon either of them, and by the common practice of men were not thought to border upon either, that many who knew him very well, and loved and admired his virtue (as all who did know him muſt love and admire it) did believe, that he was of a temper and compoſition fitter to live in Republicâ Platonis, than in Fæce Romuli; but this rigidneſs was only exerciſed towards himſelf; towards his friend's infirmities no man was more indulgent. In his converſation, which was the moſt cheerful and pleaſant that can be imagined, though he was young (for all I have yet ſpoken of him doth not exceed his age of twenty-five or twenty-ſix years), and of great gaiety in his humour, with a flowing delightfulneſs of language, he had ſo chaſte a tongue and ear, that there was never known a profane or looſe word to fall from him, nor in truth in his company; the integrity and cleanlineſs of the wit of that time not exerciſing itſelf in that licence, before perſons for whom they had any eſteem (25)."

(25) Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, vol. i. p. 37—45. third edition.

Notwithſtanding the high encomiums beſtowed upon Lord Falkland by the Earl of Clarendon, and, indeed, by almoſt every Writer of that age, Mr. Walpole is by no means carried away with theſe applauſes. "There never, ſays that ingenious and lively Biographer, was a ſtronger inſtance of what the magic of words and the art of an Hiſtorian can effect, than in the character of this Lord, who ſeems to have been a virtuous well-meaning man with a moderate underſtanding, who got knocked on the head early in the civil war, becauſe it boded ill: And yet by the happy ſolemnity of my Lord Clarendon's diction, Lord Falkland is the favourite perſonage of that noble work. We admire the pious Æneas, who, with all his unjuſt and uſurping pretenſions, we are taught to believe was the ſent of Heaven; but it is the amiable Pallas we regret, though he was killed before he had performed any action of conſequence.

"That Lord Falkland was a weak man, to me appears indubitable. We are told he acted with Hampden and the Patriots, till he grew better informed what was law. It is certain that the ingenious Mr. Hume has ſhown that both King James and King Charles acted upon precedents of prerogative which they found eſtabliſhed.——Yet will this neither juſtify them nor Lord Falkland. If it would, where ever tyranny is eſtabliſhed by law, it ought to be ſacred and perpetual. Thoſe Patriots did not attack King Charles ſo much for violation of the law, as to oblige him to ſubmit to the amendment of it: and I muſt repeat, that it was great weakneſs to oppoſe a Prince for breaking the law, and yet ſcruple to oppoſe him when he obſtructed the correction of it. My Lord Falkland was a ſincere Proteſtant: would he not have taken up arms againſt Henry the Eighth for adding new nonſenſe to eſtabliſhed Popery, and would he not have fought to obtain the reformation? Again:—— When he abandoned Hampden and that party, becauſe he miſtruſted the extent of their deſigns, did it juſtify his going over to the King? with what——I will not ſay, conſcience——but with what reaſon could he, who had been ſo ſenſible of grievances, lend his hand to reſtore the authority from whence thoſe grievances flowed! Did the uſurpation of Cromwell prove that Laud had been a meek Paſtor? If Hampden and Pym were bad men and ambitious, could not Lord Falkland have done more ſervice to the State by remaining with them, and checking their attempts and moderating their Councils, than by offering his ſword and abilities to the King? His Lordſhip had felt the tyranny; did not he know, that, if authorized by victory, neither the King's temper nor Government were likely to become more gentle? Did he think that loſs of liberty or loſs of property are not evils but when the law of the lands allow them to be ſo? Not to deſcant too long; it is evident to me, that this Lord had much debility of mind and a kind of ſuperſtitious ſcruples, that might flow from an excellent heart, but by no means from a ſolid underſtanding. His refuſing to entertain ſpies or to open letters, when Secretary of State, were the punctilios of the former, not of the latter; and his putting on a clean ſhirt to be killed in, is no proof of ſenſe either in his Lordſhip, or in the Hiſtorian, who thought it worth relating. Falkland's ſigning the declaration that he did not believe the King intended to make war on the Parliament, and at the ſame time ſubſcribing to levy twenty horſe for his Majeſty's ſervice, comes under a deſcription, which, for the ſake of the reſt of his character, I am willing to call great infatuation (26)."

(26) Walpole's royal and noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 216—219. ſecond edition.

Though there is juſtneſs, as well as acuteneſs, in ſome of theſe obſervations, we cannot help thinking that Mr. Walpole has carried his prejudices againſt Lord Falkland to too great a height. Unleſs his Lordſhip's abilities, as well as virtues, had been eminent in a very conſiderable degree, it is ſcarcely poſſible that he ſhould have been ſpoken of in ſuch high terms by thoſe who had the beſt opportunities of knowing what were his real qualifications. From whom are we to learn the characters of men, but from ſuch of their contemporaries as had the neareſt acceſs to them, and ſaw into every part of their conduct? Such perſons may, indeed, be ſomewhat miſled by admiration and affection; but the uniform teſtimony, in any man's favour, of the age in which he lives, cannot be groſsly miſtaken. We do not, however, think that ſtrength of mind was Lord Falkland's diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic. His ſcruples, concerning the liberty of opening letters were inconſiſtent, as well as weak. He thought it ſuch a violation of the law of nature, that it could not be juſtified by any qualification of office; and yet he was convinced by the neceſſity, and iniquity of the time, that theſe advantages of information were not to be declined, and were neceſſary to be practiſed.

Mr. Walpole hath added two other Lord Falklands, in his Catalogue of Noble Authors. Henry Lucius, the only ſon of the preceding Nobleman, is ſaid to have inherited the virtues of his father; having rendered himſelf eminent and greatly reſpectable, at Court, in the Senate, and in the County of Oxford, of which he was Lord Lieutenant. Being brought early into the Houſe of Commons, and a grave Senator objecting to his youth, "and to his not looking "as if he had ſowed his wild oats;" he replied with great quickneſs, "If I have not, I may ſow them in "the Houſe, where there are geeſe enow to pick them "up." He was cut off in the prime of his years. One Play was written by him, entitled, "the Mar-"riage Night." Mr. Walpole ſtiles it a Comedy; but Langbaine, the "Poetical Regiſter," and the "Companion to the Playhouſe," repreſent it as a Tragedy; and yet, at the ſame time, the Authors of the two laſt publications ſay, that it contains a great deal of true wit and ſatire (27.)

(27) Walpole, ubi ſupra, p. 221, 222. Poetical Regiſter, vol i. p. 99. Companion to the Playhouſe, vol. i. p. 56. ſecond edition. Langbaine's Account of the Dramatic Poets, p. 197.

Anthony Cary, the fourth Lord Falkland, was the Author of a Prologue, "intended for the Old "Batchelor;" but which ſeems to have had too little delicacy even for that play, and that age. He wrote likewiſe, a Prologue to Otway's "Soldier's "Fortune (28.)"] K.

(28) Walpole, ubi ſupra.

CARY (ROBERT), a learned Chronologer in the XVIIth Century, and great nephew of Sir George Cary, Knt. Lord Deputy of Ireland in Queen Elizabeth's reign (a), was born at Cockinton (b), in the county of Devon, about the year 1615 (c); being the ſecond ſon of George Cary, Eſquire [A]; and Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Edward Seymour, of Berry-caſtle, Baronet (d). When he was well grounded in School-learning, he went to Oxford, and was admitted Sojourner of Exeter-College, on the 4th of October 1631, aged ſixteen. Having continued there about three years, he was, in October 1634, choſen Scholar of Corpus-Chriſti-College in the ſame Univerſity (e). The next year, on December the 3d, he was admitted Bachelor of Arts (f); and the 23d of February 1638-9, proceeded Maſter of Arts (g): and it is probable, that he was alſo choſen Fellow of his College, though Mr. Wood profeſſes, he did not know (h). On November 4, 1644, he was created Doctor of Laws, by virtue of mandatory letters from the Chancellor, William Marquis of Hertford, who was his kinſman (i). Some time after, he travelled into France, the Low-Countries, and other foreign parts. At his return, he was preſented, by the Marquis of Hertford, to the Rectory of Portlemouth, near Kingſbridge, in Devonſhire, a living of very good value (k). There he ſettled, and lived in good repute: and being diſtinguiſhed by his birth, degrees, and learning, the Preſbyterian Miniſters of thoſe times never left him, till they had drawn him over to their party. For his greater encouragement, they made him Moderator of that part of the ſecond diviſion of the county of Devon, which was appointed to meet at Kingſbridge (l). However, he was never zealous in their intereſt: for, upon the Reſtoration of King Charles II. he was one of the firſt that congratulated that King upon his return. For this, he was ſoon after preferred to the Archdeaconry of Exeter, which he was inſtalled into Auguſt 18, 1662 (m). But he was, in a little while, namely, in 1664, affrighted and ejected out of it, by ſome great men then in power: who taking advantage of ſome infirmities, or perhaps imprudences, of his, reſolved to throw him out, in order to raiſe a favourite upon his ruins (n). Being thus deprived of his Archdeaconry, he retired to his Rectory at Portlemouth, where he ſpent the remainder of his days, in a private, chearful, and contented condition; in good repute with his neighbours; and as much above content, as he was below envy. Having lived to a good old age of ſeventy-three years, he departed this life, at the parſonage-houſe of Portlemouth, and was buried in his own Church there, on the 19th of September 1688, without any funeral monument (o). He was a man very perfect in curious and critical learning (p), particularly in Chronology: of which he gave a full teſtimony, in the excellent book he publiſhed, intituled, Palælogia Chronica. A Chronological Account of ancient Time, in three Parts. 1. Didactical. 2. Apodeictical. 3. Canonical. Lond. 1677, folio [B]. He was alſo, in his younger years, pretty well ſkilled in Poetry, as well Latin as Engliſh: though he publiſhed nothing in this kind, but thoſe Hymns of our Church, that are appointed to be read after the Leſſons, together with the Creed, &c. Theſe being tranſlated by him into Latin verſe, were printed on the flat ſides of two ſheets in folio. As to his perſon; he was of a middle ſtature, ſanguine of complexion, and in his elder years ſomewhat corpulent. In his carriage and behaviour, he was as much a gentleman, as he was in his birth and extraction: free and generous, courteous and obliging, and very critical in all the arts of complaiſance and addreſs (q).

(a) The Worthies of Devon. &c. by J. Prince, fol. Exeter, 1701, p. 197, 198.

(b) Wood ſays, it was at Berry Pomeroy, Athen. vol. ii col. 825; but we chaſe to follow Mr. Prince.

(c) Wood ſays, ibid. that he was aged 16 in 1631, and conſequently muſt have been born in 1615.

(d) Prince, ubi ſupra, p. 197.

(e) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, vol. ii. col. 825.

(f) Idem, Faſti, vol. i. col. 261.

(g) Ibid. col. 276.

(h) Athenæ. See Prince, ubi ſupra, p. 198.

(i) Prince, ibid. and Wood, Faſti, vol. ii. col. 42.

(k) Prince; and Wood's Athen. ubi ſupra.

(l) Prince, ubi ſupra.

(m) Kennet's Regiſter and Chronicle, &c. edit. 1728, p. 744; and Le Neve's Faſti, p. 93.

(n) Ibid.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra.

(q) Prince, ubi ſupra.

[A] Being the ſecond ſon of George Cary, Eſq;] Sir George Cary, Knt. above-mentioned, formerly Lord Deputy of Ireland, dying in 1615, without iſſue, adopted George of whom we ſpeak here; who was the third ſon of his ſecond brother Robert, according to one author (1), or, according to another (2), fifth ſon of his fourth brother John. This George Cary, Eſq; had ſeveral ſons and daughters; of whom the eldeſt, Sir Henry Cary, Knt. was entirely ruined by the civil wars. The ſecond ſon was Dr. Robert Cary, who is the ſubject of this article. Sir George Cary, Lord Deputy of Ireland, was his great uncle.

(1) Sir W. Pole in Cock.

(2) Weſtc. Ped. quoted by Mr. Prince, p. 197.

[B] Palælogia. A Chronological Account, &c.] 'The deſign of that work (as the author himſelf ſays 'in the beginning of it) is to determine the juſt interval of time, between the great Epoch of the creation of the world, and another of the deſtruction of 'Jeruſalem by Titus Veſpaſian, in order to the aſſignment of ſuch particular time, wherein perſons and 'affairs of old had their exiſtence. The deſign of it 'was laid in the days of Cromwell's uſurpation, and 'came, in proceſs of time, to be quickened by a ſurvenient occaſion from ſome learned gentlemen of his 'acquaintance after the Reſtauration (3); who agreeing together in ſome appointed meetings, to diſcourſe 'of the abſtruſer parts of the Holy Scriptures, having 'charged themſelves with the ſeveral ſubjects, it was 'recommended to him, as his province, to account 'for the Chronology thereof.' In part I. He treats of time, as divided into hours, minutes, weeks, and years: and of the ſeveral ſorts of years, the Chaldæan, and Ægyptian, Grecian, Roman, and Jewiſh; of all which he exhibits the calendars. Part II. Treats of the ſeveral epochs of time, and of the ancient monarchies and kingdom; containing alſo liſts, of the Kings of Sicyon, Argos, and Athens; of the Ptolemies; Syro-Macedonian, Median, Lydian, Aſſyrian, Chaldæan, Arabian, Ægyptian, Chineſe, Lacedæmonian, Corinthian, and Latin, Kings or Monarchs: a liſt of the Roman Conſuls; a ſcheme of the Athenian Magiſtrates, &c. Then follows a connexion of Sacred and Prophane Hiſtory; a ſcheme of concurrent ſucceſſions from Nabopolaſſar to the death of Alexander the Great; a ſcheme of the Jewiſh High-Prieſts; of the Kings of Judah and Iſrael; Kings of Tyre; Syria, Damaſcena, &c. the time of Chriſt's nativity; the Hiſtory of the Acts of the Apoſtles timed; and many other curious particulars relating to the Bible. Part III. Conſiſting of 97 pages, is entirely Canonical; being drawn up after the pattern of Helvicus. There is an account of this book in The Philoſophical Tranſactions (4). M.

(3) Theſe are the author's own words, in his Preface.

(4) No. 132, p. 808.

CASAUBON

CASAUBON (Isaac), one of the moſt learned Critics in the end of the XVIth, and beginning of the XVIIth century, was born at Geneva, February 18, 1559, being the ſon of Arnold Caſaubon and Jane Roſſeau (a) [A]. He was educated at firſt by his father, and being a youth of excellent parts, made ſo quick a progreſs in his ſtudies, that at the age of nine years he could ſpeak and write Latin with great eaſe and correctneſs. But his father being obliged, for three years together, to be always abſent from home, on account of buſineſs, he came thereby to be neglected, and entirely forgot what he had learned before. At twelve years of age he was forced to begin his ſtudies again, and to learn as it were by himſelf; his father's frequent abſence, and many avocations, hindering his teaching of him, excepting at vacant times. But as he could not in this method make any conſiderable progreſs, he was ſent, in 1578, to Geneva, to compleat his ſtudies under the Profeſſors there. By his indefatigable application, he quickly recovered the time he had loſt. He learned the Greek tongue of Francis Portus the Cretan, and ſoon became ſo great a maſter of that language, that this famous man thought him worthy to be his ſucceſſor in the Profeſſor's chair, in 1582, when he was but three and twenty years of age. In 1586, Feb. 1, he had the misfortune to loſe his father [B.] The 28th of April following, he married Florence, daughter of Henry Stephens the celebrated Printer [C], by whom he had twenty children. For fourteen years he continued Profeſſor of the Greek tongue at Geneva; and in that time ſtudied Philoſophy and the Civil Law under Julius Pacius. He alſo learned Hebrew, and ſome other of the Oriental Languages, but not enough to be able to make uſe of them afterwards [D]. In the mean time he began to be weary of Geneva; either becauſe he could not agree with his father-in-law, Henry Stephens, a moroſe and peeviſh man; or that his ſalary was not ſufficient for his maintenance; or becauſe he was of a rambling and unſettled diſpoſition. He reſolved therefore, after a great deal of uncertainty, to accept the place of Profeſſor of the Greek tongue and polite literature, which was offered him at Montpelier, with a more conſiderable ſalary than he had at Geneva. To Montpelier he removed about the end of the year 1596, and began his Lectures in the February following. About the ſame time, the city of Niſmes invited him to come and reſtore their univerſity, but he excuſed himſelf. 'Tis alſo ſaid, he had an invitation from the univerſity of Franeker, but that is not ſo certain. At his firſt coming to Montpelier, he was much eſteemed and followed, and ſeemed to be pleaſed with his ſtation. But this pleaſure did not laſt long; for what had been promiſed him was not performed; abatements were made in his ſalary; which alſo was not regularly paid: in a word, he met there with ſo much uneaſineſs, that he was juſt upon the point of returning to Geneva. But a journey he took to Lyons in 1598, gave him an opportunity of taking another, that proved extremely advantageous to him. Having been recommended by ſome gentlemen of Montpelier (b) to M. de Vicq, a conſiderable man at Lyons; this gentleman took him into his houſe, and carried him along with him to Paris, where he cauſed him to be introduced to the Firſt-Preſident de Harlay, the Preſident de Thou, Mr. Gillot, and Nicolas le Fevre, by whom he was very civilly received. He was alſo preſented to King Henry IV. who being informed of his merit, would have him leave Montpelier for a Profeſſor's place at Paris. Caſaubon having remained for ſome time in ſuſpence which courſe to take, went back to Montpelier, and reſumed his Lectures. Not long after, he received a letter from the King, dated January 3, 1599, by which he was invited to Paris, in order to be Profeſſor of Polite Literature. He ſet out for that city the 26th of February following. When he came to Lyons, M. de Vicq adviſed him to ſtay there till the King's coming, who was expected in that place. In the mean while, ſome domeſtic affairs obliged him to take a turn to Geneva, where he complains that juſtice was not done him with regard to the eſtate of his father-in-law. Upon his return to Lyons, having waited a long while in vain for the King's arrival, he took a ſecond journey to Geneva, and then went to Paris; though he foreſaw, as M. de Vicq and Scaliger had told him, he ſhould not meet there with all the ſatisfaction he at firſt imagined. The King gave him, indeed, a gracious reception; but the jealouſy of ſome

(a) If. Caſauboni Vita, inter ejus Epiſtolas, edit. Theod. Janſon ab Almeloveen Roter. 1709. Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſt. tom. xviii. 8vo. p. 118, &c. and Bernard, Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Juillet 1710, Artic. 1. p. 5, 6, &c.

(b) Viz. Philip de Canaye, Lord of Freſne, Firſt Preſident of the Chamber of the Edict at Caſtres; and Mr. Gillet.

[A] Being the ſon of Arnold Caſaubon.] This Arnold was a native, and Miniſter, of Bourdeaux, a village of Diois in Dauphiné, but was obliged, on account of the perſecution for Religion, to fly to Geneva. When that ceaſed, he was choſen Miniſter of Creſt in Dauphiné; and here it was, that his ſon Iſaac learned the firſt rudiments of Grammar. That he was born at Geneva, he informs us himſelf (1); and therefore Moreri confounds the father with the ſon, when he ſays, that the latter was born at Bourdeaux.

(1) In his 879th Letter, of Theod. Janſon of Almeloveen's edition.

[B] Had the misfortune to loſe his father.] He died at Die, aged 63. Charles Bonarſcius, and Andr. Eudæmon-Joannes, have affirmed, that he was hanged. But his ſon hath fully confuted that falſe and ſcandalous ſtory (2).

(2) Niceron, ubi ſupra, p. 123.

[C] He married Florence, daughter of Henry Stephens, the celebrated Printer.] Who had withdrawn from Paris to Geneva. There had been a long intimacy between him and Caſaubon; and that, probably, is what gave the enemies of the latter occaſion to aſſert, that he had ſpent his youth in correcting the books printed by H. Stephens: which indeed is falſe, though no blemiſh to his reputation, if it had been true (3).

(3) Idem. p. 120.

[D] But not enough to be able to make uſe of them afterwards.] About the year 1591, he fell into great trouble, of which he complains extremely in his letters, by being bound in a great ſum for Mr. Wotton, an Engliſhman, which he was obliged to pay. This ſtraitened him, till he was reimburſed by the care of his friends, and particularly of Joſeph Scaliger, about a year after (4).

(4) Bernard, as above, p. 8.

of the other Profeſſors, and his being a Proteſtant, procured him a great deal of trouble and vexation, and were the cauſe of his loſing the profeſſorſhip, of which he had the promiſe. Some time after, he was appointed one of the Judges on the Proteſtants ſide, at the conference between James Davy du Perron, Biſhop of Evreux, afterwards Cardinal, and Philip du Pleſſis-Mornay [E]. As Caſaubon was not favourable to the latter, who, as we are aſſured, did not acquit himſelf well in that conference; it was reported, that he (†) would ſoon change his religion; but the event ſhowed that this report was groundleſs. When Caſaubon came back to Paris, he found it very difficult to get his penſion paid, and the charges of removing from Lyons to Paris, becauſe M. de Roſny was not his friend; ſo that, it was not without an expreſs order from the King, that he obtained the payment even of three hundred crowns. The 30th of May 1600, he returned to Lyons, to haſten the impreſſion of his Athenæus which was printing there; but he had the misfortune of incurring the diſpleaſure of his great friend M. de Vicq, who had all along entertained him and his whole family in his own houſe, when they were in that city, becauſe he refuſed to accompany him into Switzerland. The reaſon of this refuſal was, his being afraid of loſing in the mean time the place of Library-Keeper to the King, of which he had a promiſe, and that was likely ſoon to become vacant, on account of the Librarian's illneſs. He returned to Paris with his wife and family the September following, and was well received by the King, and by many perſons of diſtinction. There he read private Lectures, publiſhed ſeveral works of the Ancients, and learned Arabic; in which he made ſo great a progreſs, that he undertook to compile a Dictionary, and tranſlated ſome books of that language into Latin. In 1601 he was obliged, as he tells us himſelf (c), to write againſt his will to James VI. King of Scotland, afterwards King of England, but does not mention the occaſion of it. That Prince anſwered him with great civility, which obliged our author to write to him a ſecond time. In the mean time, the many affronts and uneaſineſſes he received from time to time at Paris, made him think of leaving that city, and retiring to ſome quieter place. But King Henry IV. would never permit him; and, in order to fix him, made an augmentation of two hundred crowns to his penſion: and granted him the reverſion of the place of his Library-Keeper, after the death of John Goſſelin, the then Librarian. He took a journey to Dauphiné in May 1603, and from thence to Geneva about his private affairs; returning to Paris on the 12th of July. Towards the end of the ſame year, he came into poſſeſſion of the place of King's Library-Keeper, vacant by the death of Goſſelin [F]. His friends of the Roman Catholic perſuaſion made now frequent attempts, to induce him to forſake the Proteſtant religion. Cardinal du Perron, in particular, had ſeveral diſputes with him upon that point: after one of which a report was ſpread, that he had then promiſed the Cardinal he would turn Roman Catholic: ſo that, in order to ſtifle that rumour, the Miniſters of Charenton, who were alarmed at it, obliged him to write a letter to the Cardinal to contradict what was ſo confidently reported, and took care to have it printed. About this time, the Magiſtrates of Niſmes gave him a ſecond invitation to their city, offering him a houſe, and a ſalary of ſix hundred crowns of gold a year, but he durſt not accept of it for fear of offending the King. In 1609, he had, by that Prince's order, who was deſirous of gaining him over to the Catholic religion, a conference with Cardinal du Perron upon the controverted points; but it had no effect upon him, and he died a Proteſtant. The next year two things happened that afflicted him extremely; one was the murder of King Henry IV. which deprived him of all hopes of keeping his place; the other, his eldeſt ſon's embracing Popery [G]. The loſs of the King, his patron and protector, made him reſolve to come over into England, where he had often been invited by King James I. So, having obtained leave of the Queen-Regent of France, to be abſent for a while out of that kingdom, he came to England in October 1610, along with Sir Henry Wotton, Embaſſador-Extraordinary from King James I. He was received in England with the utmoſt civility, by moſt perſons of learning and diſtinction [H]. He waited upon the King who took great pleaſure in diſcourſing with him, and (†) Viz. Caſaubon.

(c) See Bernard, as above, p. 14.

[E] At the conference between James D. du Perron, and Philip du Pleſſis-Mornay.] This conference was held at Fontainebleau May 4, 1600. It was at firſt deſigned, that it ſhould continue ſeveral days, but the indiſpoſition of Mr. du Pleſſis-Mornay was the cauſe of its laſting but one. The other judge on the Proteſtants ſide, was Mr. Canaye, who convinced, as he pretended, by the arguments that were then uſed, became a convert to Popery. He uſed his utmoſt endeavours, to perſuade Caſaubon to follow his example; but not being able to prevail, he grew very cool towards him, and ceaſed to have the ſame regard and friendſhip for him, as he had, till then, expreſſed. As for Caſaubon, he clears himſelf, in ſeveral of his letters, of the imputations thrown upon him, of his favouring Popery (5).

(5) See Letters, 319, 348.

[F] He came into poſſeſſion of the place of King's Library-keeper, vacant by the death of Goſſelin.] His being poſſeſſed of that place, was a great advantage to him; not only on account of the ſalary, but becauſe he had then free acceſs to the books in that valuable library, which Goſſelin would not permit him to have, as much as he deſired or wanted (6).

(6) Niceron, as above, p. 127.

[G] His eldeſt ſon's embracing Popery.] This laſt accident gave him a great deal of affliction and uneaſineſs; and the more, becauſe a report was ſpread, that he himſelf had charged George Strauchan, a Scotchman, who taught his ſon the Mathematicks, to inſtruct him at the ſame time in the Popiſh Religion (7).

(7) Niceron, as above, p. 129.

[H] He was received in England with the utmoſt civility, by moſt perſons of learning and diſtinction.] But it ſeems he did not meet with the like treatment from the inferior ſort of people. For he complains in one of his letters (8), that he was more inſulted at London,

(8) In the 1056th of Almeloveen's edition.

and even did him the honour of admitting him ſeveral times to eat at his own table. His Majeſty likewiſe made him a preſent of a hundred and fifty pounds, to enable him to viſit the Univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge (d). The 3d of January 1611, he was made a Denizon; and the 19th of the ſame month, the King granted him a penſion of three hundred pounds (e): as alſo two Prebends, one at Canterbury (f), and the other at Weſtminſter. He likewiſe wrote to the Queen-Regent of France, to deſire Caſaubon might ſtay longer in England than ſhe had at firſt allowed him. But Caſaubon did not long enjoy theſe great advantages. For a painful diſtemper, occaſioned by his having a double bladder (g), ſoon laid him in his grave. He died July 1, 1614, in the 55th year of his age; and was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey [I]. He had, as is already hinted above, twenty children [K]. We ſhall give an account of his writings, and of the books he publiſhed, in the note [L]. This great man received the higheſt encomiums from perſons

(d) Niceron, as above, p. 130.

(e) Conventiones Fœdera, &c. publiſhed by T. Rymer, vol. xvii. p. 707, 710.

(f) J. le Neve ſays, that he was made Prebendary of Canterbury in the 8th ſtall, in 1609, which certainly muſt be a miſtake. Faſti, p. 17. edit. 1716.

(g) See Dr. Thorius's Letter, de Iſaaci Caſauberi morbi mortiſque cauſa, printed among Caſaubon's Letters.

don, than he had ever been at Paris in the midſt of the Papiſts; that ſtones were thrown at his windows night and day; that he received a great wound as he went to court; that his children were affronted in the ſtreets; and he and his family were ſometimes pelted with ſtones.——He doth not mention, what were the grounds of thoſe many incivilities, to himſelf and family.

[I] And was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey.] Where there is a monument erected to his memory, with the following inſcription.

Iſaacus Caſaubonus,
(O Doctiorum quicquid eſt, aſſurgite Huic tam colendo Nomini.)

Quem Gallia Reip. literariæ bono peperit, Henricus IV. Francorum rex invictiſſimus Lutetiam literis ſuis evocavit, Bibliothecæ ſuæ præfecit, charumque deinceps dum vixit habuit; eoque terris erepto Jacobus Mag. Brit. monarcha, Regum doctiſſimus, doctis indulgentiſſ. in Angliam accivit, munifice fovit, poſteritaſque ob doctrinam æternum mirabitur, H. S. E. invidia major. Obiit ætern. in Chriſto vitam anhelans, Kal. Julii 1614. Ætat. 55.

Viro opt. immortalitate digniſſ. Thomas Mortonus Epiſc. Dunelm. jucundiſſimæ quoad frui licuit conſuetudinis memor. Pr. S. P. Cu. 163.

Qui noſſe vult Caſaubonum,
Non Saxa ſed Chartas legat
Superfuturas marmori,
Et profuturas poſteris.

[K] He had——twenty children.] John, the eldeſt, turned Roman Catholick, as hath been mentioned above. Another, named Auguſtin, did the like, and became a Capuchin at Calais, where he was poiſoned, with eleven others of the ſame order (9). Mr. Du Pin relates of him the following particular, upon the authority of Mr. Cotelier: Before he took the vow of Capuchin, he went to aſk his father's bleſſing, which the father readily granted him; adding, 'My ſon, I 'do not condemn thee; nor do thou condemn me; 'we ſhall both appear before the tribunal of Jeſus 'Chriſt (10).' What became of the reſt of his children, (except Meric, mentioned in the next article,) is not known. In 1612 he had a ſon born in England, to which the King and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury were godfathers, and Sir George Cary's Lady godmother (11).

(9) Ogier, in his Travels.

(10) Niceron, as above, p. 132.

(11) Memorials of Affairs of State, &c. publiſhed by Edm. Sawyer, Eſq; vol. iii. p. 407.

[L] We ſhall give an account of his writings, and of the books he publiſhed.] They are as follows, I. In Diogenem Laërtium Notæ Iſaaci Hortiboni. Morgiis 1583. 8vo. He was but twenty-five years old when he made theſe notes, and intended to have enlarged them afterwards, but was hindered. He dedicated them to his father, who commended him, but told him at the ſame time, 'He ſhould like better one note of 'his upon the Holy Scriptures, than all the pains he 'could beſtow upon profane authors.' Theſe notes of Caſaubon were inſerted in the editions of Diogenes Laërtius, printed by H. Stephens in 1594 and 1598 in 8vo. and have been put in all other editions publiſhed ſince. The name of Hortibonus, which Caſaubon took, is of the ſame import as Caſaubonus, i. e. a good Garden; Caſau, in the language of Dauphiné, ſignifying a Garden, and bon, good. II. Iſaaci Hortiboni Lectiones Theocriticæ; in Criſpinus's edition of Theocritus, Genev. 1584, 12mo. reprinted ſeveral times ſince. III. Strabonis Geographiæ Libri XVII. Græce & Latine, ex Guil. Xylandri Interpretatione, edente cum Commentariis Iſaaco Caſaubono. Genevæ 1587. fol. Caſaubon's notes were reprinted, with additions, in the Paris edition of Strabo in 1620, and have been inſerted in all other editions ſince. IV. Novum Teſtamentum Græcum, cum Notis Iſaaci Caſauboni in quatuor Evangelia & Actus Apoſtolorum. Genevæ 1587, 16to. Theſe notes were reprinted afterwards at the end of Whitaker's edition of the New Teſtament, Lond. and inſerted in the Critici Sacri. V. Animadverſiones in Dionyſium Halicarnaſſenſem, in the edition of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis, publiſhed by our author with Æmilius Portus's Latin verſion. Genev. 1588, fol. Theſe were written in haſte, and of no great value. VI. Polyæni Strategematum, Libri VIII. Græce & Latine, edente cum Notis Iſaaco Caſaubono. Lugduni 1589, 16to. Caſaubon was the firſt who publiſhed the Greek text of this author. The Latin verſion, joined to it, was done by Juſtus Vulteius, and firſt publiſhed in 1550. VII. Dicæarchi Geographica quædam, ſive de Statu Græciæ; Ejuſdem deſcriptio Græciæ verſibus Græcis jambicis, ad Theophraſtum; cum Iſaaci Caſauboni & Henrici Stephani notis. Genevæ 1589, 8vo. VIII. Ariſtotelis Opera Græce, cum variorum Interpretatione Latina, & variis Lectionibus & Caſtigationibus Iſaaci Caſauboni. Lugduni 1590, fol. Genevæ 1605, fol. Theſe notes are only marginal, and were compoſed at leiſure hours. IX. C. Plinii Cæc. Sec. Epiſt. Lib. IX. Ejuſdem & Trajani imp. Epiſt. amoebææ. Ejuſdem Pl. & Pacati, Mamertini, Nazarii Panegyrici. Item Claudiani Panegyrici. Adjunctæ ſunt Iſaaci Caſauboni Notæ in Epiſt. Genevæ 1591, 12mo. Ibid. 1599, 1605, 1610, and 1611, 12mo. Theſe notes are but very ſhort. X. Theophraſti Characteres Ethici Græce & Latine, ex verſione & cum commentario Iſaaci Caſauboni. Lugduni 1592, 12mo. and 1612, 12mo. This latter edition is the moſt exact of the two, being reviſed by the author. Caſaubon's edition of Theophraſtus is ſtill highly eſteemed, and was one of thoſe works which procured him moſt reputation. Joſeph Scaliger highly extols it (12). XI. L. Apuleii Apologia, cum Iſaaci Caſauboni Caſtigationibus. Typis Commelini 1593, 4to. In this edition he ſhewed himſelf as able a critic in the Latin, as he had done before in the Greek tongue. It is dedicated to Joſeph Scaliger. XII. C. Suetonii Tranquilli Opera cum Iſaaci Caſauboni Animadverſionibus. Genevæ 1595, 4to. Item editio altera emendata & aucta. Paris 1610. This ſecond edition is enlarged. XIII. Publii Syri Mimi, ſive ſententiæ ſelectæ, Latine, Græcè verſæ, & Notis illuſtratæ per Joſ. Scaligerum; cum præfatione Iſaaci Caſauboni. Lugd. Batav. 1598, 8vo. XIV. Athenæi Deipnoſophiſtarum, Libri XV. Græce & Latine, Interprete Jacobo Dalechampio, cum Iſaaci Caſauboni Animadverſionum, Libris XV. Lugduni 1600, 2 vol. fol. Ibid 1612, 2 vol. fol. Caſaubon's notes take up the ſecond volume, and are very large, and full of great learning. XV. Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ Scriptores, cum commentario Iſaaci Caſauboni. Paris 1603, 4to. reprinted at Paris in 1620, with Salmaſius's Commentaries on the ſame authors, fol. and at Leiden, in 1670, 2 vol. 8vo. XVI. Diatriba ad Dionis Chryſoſtomi Orationes, publiſhed in the edition of that author by Frederick Morel persons of learning in his time; and he really deserved them, not only on account of his extensive knowledge, but likewise of his modesty, sincerity, and probity. Some writers

(12) Speaking of the pleaſure he received upon the peruſal of it, he ſays, de poteſtate mei exivi, neque me continere potui, quin ea de te prædicarem quæ & meritum tuum & amor meus poſtulabant, quanquam quicquid de te dixero, omne infra virtutes ingenii tui fuerit.

Morel at Paris 1604, fol. XVII. Persii Satyræ ex recensione & cum Commentar. Isaac Casauboni. Paris 1605, 8*vo.* Lond. 1647, 8*vo.* These notes upon Persius, are Lectures he had formerly read at Geneva. They were enlarged in the edition of 1647. Scaliger used to say of them, 'That the sauce was better than the 'fish.' i. e. The commentary better than the next (13). XVIII. De Satyrica Græcorum Poësi, & Romanorum Satyra Libri duo. Paris 1605, 8*vo.* In this work Casaubon affirms, That the Satyr of the Latins was very different from that of the Greeks. Wherein he is contradicted by Daniel Heinsius, in his two books, De Satyra Horatiana. Lugd. Batava. 1629, 12*mo.* But the learned Ezekiel Spanheim (14), after having examined the arguments of these two learned men, hath declared for Casaubon. Crenius hath inserted this tract of Casaubon, in his Musæum Philologicum & Historicum. Ludg. Batav. 1699, 8*vo.* and also the following piece, which was published by our author, at the end of his two books, De Satyrica poësi, &c. XIX. Cyclops Euripidis Latinitate donata à Q. Septimio Florente. XX. Gregorii Nysseni Epistola ad Eustathiam, Ambrosiam, & Basilissam, Græce, & Latine, cum notis I. Casauboni. Paris 1601, 8*vo. Hanoviæ* 1607, 8*vo.* This letter was first published by Casaubon. XXI. De Libertate Ecclesiastica Liber 1607, 8*vo.* pages 264. This book was composed by the author during the disputes between Pope Paul V. and the Republic of Venice; and contained a Vindication of the Rights of Sovereigns against the incroachments of the Court of Rome. But those differences being adjusted while the book was printing, King Henry IV. caused it to be suppressed. However, Casaubon having sent the sheets, as they came out of the press, to some of his friends, by that means some of the copies came to be preserved. Melchior Goldast inserted that fragment in his Collectanea de Monarchia S. Imperii, Tom. I. pag. 674. and Almeloveen reprinted it in his edition of our author's letters. XXII. Inscriptio vetus dedicationem fundi continens, ab Herode Rege facta, cum Notis Isaaci Casauboni. This small piece, published in 1607, hath been inserted by T. Crenius in his Musæum Philologicum. Casaubon's notes are short, but learned: however, he appears to have been mistaken, in ascribing the inscription on which they were made to Herod, King of Judæa, instead of Herodes the Athenian. XXIII. Polybii Opera Græce & Latine ex versione Isaaci Casauboni. Accedit Æneas Tacticus de toleranda obsidione, Græce & Latine. Paris 1609, fol. & Hanoviæ 1609, fol. The Latin version of these two authors was done by Casaubon; who intended to write a commentary upon them, but went no farther than the first book of Polybius, being hindered by death. What he did of that, was published after his decease (15). The great Thuanus, and Fronto Ducæus the Jesuit, were so pleased with that Latin version, that they believed it was not easy to determine, whether Casaubon had translated Polybius, or Polybius Casaubon——ut non facile dici posse crederent, Polybiumne Casaubonus, an Casaubonum Polybius convertisset (16). At the head of this edition there is a Dedication to King Henry IV. which passes for a master-piece of the kind. And, indeed, Casaubon had a talent for such pieces, as well as for Prefaces. In the former, he praises without low servility, and in a manner remote from flattery: In the latter, he lays open the design and excellencies of the books he publishes, without ostentation, and with an air of modesty. So that he may serve as a model for such performances. XXIV. He published, Josephi Scaligeri Opuscula varia. Paris 1610, 4*to. Et Francofurti* 1612, 8*vo.* with a preface of his own. XXV. Ad Frontonem Ducæum Epistola, de Apologiâ, Jesuitarum nomine, Parisis edita. Londini 1611, 4*to.* Casaubon, after his coming to England, was forced to alter the course of his studies, and to write against the Papists, in order to please his patron King James I. who affected to be a great Controversist. He began with this Letter, dated July 2, 1611, which is the 730th in Almeloveen's collection, and for which King James made him a considerable present. It is a confutation of la Reponse Apologetique à l'Anti-coton, par Francois Bonald. Au Pont. 1611, 8*vo.* XXVI. Epistola ad Georgium Michaelem Lingelsheimium de quodam libello Sciopii, 1612, 4*to.* This letter is dated Aug. 9, 1612, and is the 828th of Almeloveen's collection. XXVII. Epistola ad Cardinalem Perronium. Londini 1612, 4*to.* This letter, which is the 838th in Almeloveen's collection, is dated Novemb. 9, 1612. It is not so much Casaubon's own composition, as an exact account of the sentiments of King James I. whose, and the Church of England's Secretary, he was, as he tells us, with regard to some points of Religion. Accordingly, it was inserted in the edition of that King's Works, published in 1619 by Dr. Montague Bishop of Winchester. It is written with moderation. Cardinal du Perron undertook to give an Answer to it, which was left unfinished at his death. It has been likewise animadverted upon by Valentine Smalcius, the Socinian, in his Ad Isaacum Casaubonum Paræneses. Racoviæ, 1614, 4*to.* publish'd under the name of Anton. Reuchlin. XXVIII. De Rebus sacris & Ecclesiasticis Exercitationes xvi. Ad Cardinalis Baronii Prolegomena in Annales, & primam eorum partem, de Domini nostri Jesu Christi Nativitate, Vita, Passione, Assumtione. Londini 1614, fol. Francofurti 1615, 4*to. Genevæ* 1655 & 1663, 4*to.* What was the occasion of this work we learn from Mr. Bernard (17): Namely, That soon after Casaubon's arrival in England, Peter du Moulin wrote to Dr. James Montague, then Bishop of Bath and Wells, to inform him, that Casaubon had a great inclination to Popery; that there were only a few Articles, which kept him among the Protestants; and that if he returned to France, he would change his Religion, as he had promised. Therefore, he desired him to endeavour to keep him in England, and to engage him in writing against the Annals of Baronius, since he knew that he had materials ready for that purpose. Accordingly, King James employed him in that work, which was finished in eighteen months time. Niceron thinks (18), that Casaubon was not equal to this work, because he had not sufficiently studied Divinity, Chronology, and History, and was not conversant enough in the Fathers. So that he is charged with having committed more errors than Baronius in a less compass. Besides, as he comes no lower than the year 34 after Christ, he is said to have pulled down only the pinnacles of Baronius's great building. It appears from letter 1059th of our author, that Dr. Richard Montague, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, had undertaken to write against Baronius at the same time with himself; and he threatens to complain of him to the King, who had engaged him in that work. XXIX. Ad Polybii Historiarum Librum primum Commentarius. Paris 1617, 8*vo.* See above, N° XXIII. XXX. Isaaci Casauboni Epistolæ. Hagæ Comin. 1638, 4*to.* published by John Frederick Gronovius. A second edition —— Octoginta duabus Epistolis auctior, & juxta seriem temporum digesta —— was published afterwards by John George Grævius; at Magdeburgh, and Helmstadt, 1656, 4*to.* These editions are eclipsed by the following one; intitled, Is. Casauboni Epistolæ, insertis ad easdem responsionibus, quotquot hactenus reperiri potuerunt, secundum seriem temporis accurate digestæ. Accedunt huic Editioni, præter trecentas ineditas Epistolas, Is. Casauboni vita, ejusdem Dedicationes, Præfationes, Prolegomena, Poëmata, Fragmentum de Libertate Ecclesiastica. Item Merici Casauboni Epistolæ, Dedicationes, Præfationes, Prolegomena, & Tractatus quidam rariores. Curante Theodoro Janson ab Almeloveen. Roterodami, 1709, fol. The letters in this volume are 1059 in number, placed according to the order of time in which they were written; and 51 without dates. A certain writer finds in them neither elegancy of Style, nor fineness of Thoughts; and censures, as very disagreeable, the mixture of Greek words and expressions that are dispersed throughout; affirming besides, that they contain no particulars tending to the advancement of Learning, or that are of any great importance (19). Another owns, that there is in them, the History of a man of probity and learning; but nothing

(13) Scaligerana.

(14) In the Preface to his translation of the Emperor Julian's Cæsar.

(15) See below, N° 29.

(16) Huetius de optimo interpretandi genere, ap. Blount Censura celebriorum authorum, p. 884. edit. Genevæ, 1694, 4to.

(17) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Juil. et 1710, Artic. 1.

(18) Memoires, &c. as above, p. 145.

(19) Niceron, as above, p. 146.

writers indeed, even of the Reformed Religion (b), have undervalued him, and called him a Half-Divine. But the reaſon they did not like him was, becauſe he did not entirely agree thing otherwiſe very remarkable, excepting the purity of the language, and the marks of a frank and ſincere mind (20). One author, on the other hand, aſſures us (21), that they are all perfectly beautiful; and makes no ſcruple, to compare them to thoſe of Grotius and Scaliger with regard to learning; and to aſſert, that they exceed them for the eaſineſs and purity of the ſtyle, which is entirely epiſtolary, and not at all affected. XXXI. In 1710 were publiſhed, Caſauboniana, ſive Iſaaci Caſauboni varia de Scriptoribus Libriſque judicia, Obſervationes ſacræ in utriuſque Foederis Loca, Philologicæ item Eccleſiaſticæ, ut & Animadverſiones in Annales Baronii Eccleſiaſticos ineditæ, ex variis Caſauboni MSS. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana reconditis nunc primum erutæ à Jo. Chriſtophoro Wolfio, &c. Accedunt duæ Caſauboni Epiſtolæ ineditæ, & Præfatio ad Librum de Libertate Eccleſiaſtica, cum Notis Editoris in Caſauboniana, ac Prefatio, qua de hujus generis Libris diſſeritur. Hamburgi, 1710, 8*vo*. There is nothing very material in this collection. M.

(b) Particularly Mr. Colomies: See Niceron, p. 133.

(20) Sorberiana, p. 50.

(21) Melanges d'Hiſtoire & de Literature, publiſhed under the name of Vigneul-Marville. See Bernard, ubi ſupra.

 [In Sir William Muſgrave's Collection, there is a citation from the Hiſtory of Europe, Vol. I. p. 163, which aſſerts that Iſaac Caſaubon was born at Bourdeaux, in 1555, and died in 1613. This account is erroneous in three reſpects; in the place of his birth, in the time of it, and in the year of his death. The ſame Hiſtory, with manifeſt inconſiſtency, repreſents Caſaubon as dying when fifty-five years old, though that was in fact the caſe: for if he was born in 1555, he muſt, in 1613, have, at leaſt, been in the 58th year of his age.

When Iſaac Caſaubon formed, in 1610, the deſign of reſiding in this country, Dr. Richard Bancroft, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, wrote the following Letter to Sir Thomas Edmondes, the Engliſh Embaſſador at the Court of France.

" My very good Lord,

" Monſ. Caſaubon purpoſeth (as I take it) to " come over into England with his wife and family.
" His Majeſty hath already beſtowed upon him a " Prebend in Canterbury; and ſomewhat elſe will be " ſhortly thought upon for his better maintenance. I " pray your Lordſhip, when he ſhall repair unto you
" for that purpoſe, deliver unto him thirty pounds
" towards his charges of tranſporting, which my Lady
" Edmondes your wife hath received from me, as by " her Letter here incloſed may appear. And ſo,
" with my hearty commendations, I commit your
" Lordſhip to the tuition of Almighty God.

" At Lambeth the 26th of June, 1610."

Your Lordſhip's aſſured loving friend,

R. Cant.

" This muſt be kept cloſe, leſt he be prevented
" or murdered in his journey."

Tuus. R. C. (22).

(22) Birch's Hiſtorical View of the Negotiations between the Courts of England, France, and Bruſſels, p. 322.

On the Chriſtmas day after Caſaubon arrived in England, he received the Communion in the King's Chapel, though he did not underſtand the language. This circumſtance is mentioned in his Diary, in which he declares, that he had carefully conſidered the office for the Sacrament the day before; that he highly approved of it; and that he greatly preferred it to the manner of receiving in other Churches. Gratias tibi Domine, quod hodie ad ſacram menſam ſum admiſſus, & corporis ſanguiniſque factus ſum particeps in eccleſiâ Anglicanâ, cujus formulam heri diligenter meditatus ad modum probavi, & ordinem agendi mire laudavi præ receptâ apud alios conſuetudine (23).

(23) Ibid. p. 333, 334.

From the whole article of Caſaubon it may be collected, that he was ſomewhat of a reſtleſs diſpoſition; and it appears, that though he met with ſuch encouragement in England, he was not ſatisfied with his new ſituation. This occaſioned Sir Dudley Carleton to write ſeverely concerning him, in a letter to Sir Thomas Edmondes. " I am ſorry, ſays Sir Dudley, " Mr. Caſaubon, or rather his wife, doth not know " when ſhe is well. The conditions he hath in Eng- " land are ſuch, that ſome principal ſcholars of Ger- " many, who are as well and better at home than " he in France, would think themſelves happy to " have; and ſo I have underſtood from them ſince " my coming hither (24). If ever he turn his reli- " gion, we ſhall ſee him a wretched contemptible " fellow, or elſe I am a falſe prophet." It is certain, that Caſaubon was not pleaſed with the manners of the Engliſh; and, in a letter to Thuanus, he complains, that thoſe who were acquainted with him before he came to England, now treated him as a perfect ſtranger, and took not the leaſt notice of him by converſation or otherwiſe. Ego mores Anglicanos non capio: quoſcunque ipſe habui notos priuſquam huc venirem, jam ego illis ſum ignotus, verè peregrinus, barbarus: nemo illorum me vel verbulo appellat, appellatus ſilet (25).

(24) Venice.

(25) Birch, ubi ſupra, p. 340, 341.

The ingenious writer of the Confeſſional owns, that he is one of thoſe who do not rate Caſaubon's integrity ſo high as his knowledge (26); whilſt, Burigny, on the other hand, ſays that he joined the moſt profound erudition with the moſt perfect probity.

(26) Confeſſional, p. 289. note. Third edition.

Iſaac Caſaubon is to be ranked amongſt thoſe learned men who, in the beginning of the laſt century, were very ſolicitous to have an union formed between the Popiſh and Proteſtant religions. This is expreſsly aſſerted by Burigny, in his life of Grotius. According to that Biographer, Caſaubon, who wiſhed to ſee all Chriſtians united in one faith, ardently deſired a re-union of the Proteſtants with the Roman Catholics, and would have ſet about it, had he lived longer in France. He greatly reſpected the opinions of the ancient Church, and was perſuaded that its ſentiments were more ſound than thoſe of the Miniſters of Charenton. Grotius and he had imparted their ſentiments to each other before the voyage to England; and Arminius had a project of the ſame kind, which he communicated to Caſaubon, by whom it was approved. Several Divines, at that period, looked upon a ſcheme of this nature as practicable, and, among the reſt, Huetius did not think it to be abſolutely chimerical. Bayle, with much ſuperior ſagacity, entertained the oppoſite opinion. He believed that the attempt to unite the different religions was as great a chimera as the Philoſopher's ſtone, or the quadrature of the circle. Indeed, from what Burigny obſerves, nothing of the kind could ever take place: for that writer treats it as abſolutely ridiculous to ſuppoſe, that the Church of Rome, though ſhe might remit ſome point of her diſcipline, would extend her indulgence ſo far as to give up tranſubſtantiation, or any other of her doctrines (27). It is well known how zealouſly Grotius engaged in this idle project; on which account it is not ſtrange that he could not find out Popery in the propheſies of Scripture. Though, therefore, he was, in general, ſo excellent a Commentator, little regard is to be paid to his authority where the Roman Catholic religion is concerned. The peculiar bias of his mind prevented him from diſcerning what, we apprehend, could not have eſcaped an impartial Critic.

(27) Burigny's Life of Grotius, p. 32, 33. 302, 303. 307.

It may, at preſent, appear ſurprizing, that ſeveral learned men ſhould formerly have been ſo much captivated with the idea of effecting an union between the Proteſtants and the Papiſts. But we ſhall the leſs wonder at this circumſtance, when we conſider the ſtate of men's minds at that time. Numbers, even of the profeſſed Proteſtants, had not ſhaken off all reverence for the apparent dignity and antiquity of the Church of Rome. The extravagances, likewiſe, and bigotry of ſome of the reformed, gave diſguſt to many perſons of a peaceable temper. A much higher opinion, alſo, was then entertained of the importance and neceſſity of an unity in religion than now prevails. It was not, at that period, ſuffiagree with their ſentiments in every point. For though he was a Proteſtant, he diſapproved of ſome of Calvin's notions: and whoever doth ſo, is ſure to be branded, by ſome zealot or other, with the odious name of Heretic, if not worſe.

ciently diſcerned, that the only deſireable, as well as practicable union, is the union of mutual charity amidſt diſcordant ſentiments, and the union of mutual toleration and liberty amidſt different forms of worſhip. On theſe accounts, we ought the leſs to be ſurprized at the conduct of Caſaubon, Grotius, and and other Scholars and Divines of the laſt age. But it may juſtly be thought ſtrange, that any Proteſtants of the preſent century ſhould have been ſeduced into the ſupport of ſo viſionary a ſcheme. They ought to have known that it was not only impracticable, but of ſuch a nature as ſhould never have been attempted.] K.

CASAUBON (MERIC) ſon of Iſaac recorded in the foregoing article, and the only one of his ſons whoſe name deſerves to be tranſmitted to poſterity, was born at Geneva, Auguſt 14, 1599 (a). He had the name of Meric given him from Meric de Vicq, a great friend and benefactor to his father (b). His firſt education he received at Sedan, but coming to England with his father, in the year 1610, he was inſtructed by a private maſter till 1614 (c), when he was ſent to Chriſt-Church-College in Oxford; and being put there under a moſt careful Tutor, Dr. Edward Meetkirk, (made, in 1620, the King's Hebrew Profeſſor) was ſoon after elected a Student of that houſe. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, May 8, 1618 (d), and that of Maſter, June 14, 1621 (e), being even at that time eminent for his extenſive learning. For, the ſame year, though he was but two and twenty, he publiſhed a book in defence of his father, againſt the calumnies of certain Roman Catholicks [A]. This book made him known to King James I. who ever after entertained a good opinion of him. It alſo brought him into reputation abroad, eſpecially in France, whither he was invited with offers of promotion, his godfather Meric de Vicq, been then, or ſoon after, Keeper of the Great Seal of that kingdom. Three years after, he publiſhed another vindication of his father [B], written by the command of King James I. About that time he was collated by Dr. Lancelot Andrews Biſhop of Wincheſter, to the Rectory of Bledon in Somerſetſhire (f); and on the 14th of June 1628, took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (g). He had now formed the deſign of continuing his father's Exercitations againſt Baronius's Annals, but was diverted by ſome accident. At length, when he came to maturity of years for ſuch a work, and had acquainted Archbiſhop Laud, his great friend and patron, with his deſign, who was very ready to place him conveniently in Oxford or London, accord-

(a) Niceron Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres dans la Republique des Lettres, tom. xviii. Paris 1732, p. 148. A. Wood ſays, by miſtake, that he was born in September. Athenæ Oxon. edit. 1721, vol. ii. col. 485.

(b) Niceron, ibid. See the laſt article.

(c) Wood, ibid.

(d) Idem. Faſti, vol. i. col. 209.

(e) Ibid. col. 218. Niceron is miſtaken, when he ſays, he was admitted at Oxford in 1616; for if ſo, he could not have been Maſter of Arts till 1623. But probably he was led into this miſtake by an erratum in Wood's Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 281.

(f) Wood, Ath. vol. ii. col. 485. Of this he takes notice in his 1ſt part Of Credulity and Incredulity, &c. edit. 1668, 8vo. p. 115.

(g) Wood, Faſti, vol. i. col. 242.

[A] He publiſhed a book in defence of his father, againſt the calumnies of certain Roman Catholicks.] The title of it, is, Pietas contra maledicos patris nominis & religionis hoſtes. Londini 1621, 8*vo.* In this book he mentions ſeveral particulars of his father's life, and vindicates him againſt the calumnies of Caſpar Scioppius, Julius Cæſar Boulanger, Andreas Eudæmon-Joannes, Heribert Roſwed, and others, who had caſt odious imputations upon his morals and religion (1).

(1) Niceron, as above, p. 150. and Fuller's Church Hiſt. B. x. p. 90.

[B] Three years after, he publiſhed another vindication of his father.] It was intitled, Vindicatio patris adverſus Impoſtores, qui librum ineptum & impium de origine Idololatriæ nuper ſub Iſaaci Caſauboni nomine publicarunt. Londini 1624, 4*to* (2). It is inſerted, as well as the foregoing, in Mr. Almeloveen's edition of Caſaubon's letters. The occaſion of this book was as follows. In 1624, there was publiſhed at London a treatiſe, intitled, 'The Original of Idolatries, or the 'Birth of Hereſies. Firſt faithfully gathered out of 'ſundry Greek and Latin authors, as alſo out of 'divers learned Fathers, by that famous and learned 'Iſaac Caſaubon, and by him publiſhed in French for 'the good of God's Church, and was tranſlated into 'Engliſh for the benefit of this monarchy, by Abra-'ham Darcie.' It was dedicated to Prince Charles, and preſented to King James I. and all the Lords of the Council. The end of it was to prove, 'That 'the Maſs, (a word of great extent and antiquity, 'which made the authors of the Auguſtane Confeſſion, 'ſubſcribed by Calvin, ſay Falsè accuſantur Eccleſiæ 'noſtræ, quod Miſſam aboleant, retinetur enim Miſſa 'apud nos, & ſummâ reverentiâ celebratur) or rather 'indeed the whole Liturgy, antient and late, and 'every part of it, was derived from ancient Heathens, 'Numa Pompilius, &c. and ſome part alſo taken 'out of the Alcoran; which to prove, his authors 'for the moſt part are ſome late collectors of Roman 'Antiquities, as Blondus, Alexander ab Alexandro, 'and the like, who ſay no ſuch thing; but from 'what they ſay of the Romans, he makes his wrong 'inferences and applications (3).' Meric Caſaubon thinking his father much injured by the publication of that book, wrote a letter, which he got one of the Biſhops to ſhew to the King: his Majeſty diſcovering thereby the fraud, ordered Nath. Butter the Bookſeller, and Abraham Darcie to be committed to priſon; and it was with great difficulty, that Dr. Mountaine, Biſhop of London made his Chaplain's peace on account of his licenſing it (4). Soon after, a French book, the original of the Engliſh tranſlation, being produced, it was found, continues our author (5). 'That an old 'title page had been by art and cunning transformed, 'the years altered, and the name of Iſaac Caſaubon 'inſerted; and thus the world for mere gain and lucre '(for I do not believe there was any farther myſtery 'in it at firſt) ſhamefully abuſed. Other editions or 'copies of the ſame book were found, and ſhewed to 'the King; yea, tranſlations of it, that had been 'made, when my father was yet ſcarcely born, &c.' Upon this, Meric Caſaubon, publiſhed his Vindicatio patris, which, by the King's command, was tranſlated in French and Engliſh. And yet, ſome years after, the ſame Engliſh tranſlation was reprinted at Amſterdam, as is ſuppoſed, with this title, 'The Original 'of Popiſh Idolatry; or the Birth of Hereſies. Pub-'liſhed under the name of Caſaubon, and called in, 'the ſame year, upon miſinformation. But now upon 'better conſideration reprinted with Allowance; 'being a true and exact Deſcription, &c.' Printed ——1630. A Preface alſo was added in juſtification of the book and the firſt editors of it, where, among other things, it is ſaid, 'That they that did ſup-'preſs, were either Papiſts in their hearts, or ſuch as 'hold with Papiſts. That ignorance is the mother of 'devotion, that the Goſpel of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt 'was departing from the land, &c.' Since that, a Pamphlet came out, much to the ſame purpoſe, in the very front of which Caſaubon's name was placed (6): if it was that, intituled, Iſaaci Caſauboni Corona Regia, the true author was Caſpar Scioppius (7).

(2) Containing eight ſheets.

(3) This account Meric Caſaubon himſelf gives us, in his Neceſſity of Reformation, in and before Luther's time, &c. Lond. 1664, 4to. p. 157, 158.

(4) Fuller's Ch. Hiſt. B. x. p. 112.

(5) Neceſſity of Reformation, &c. as above, p. 159.

(6) Ibid. p. 160.

(7) Niceron, p. 151.

ing

ing to his desire, that he might be furnished with books necessary for such a purpose, the troubles and divisions began in England: so that having no fixed habitation, he was forced to sell a good part of his books; and, in the end, after about twenty years sufferings, was grown so old and infirm, that he could not expect to live many years, and thereupon was forced to give over that project (h). On the 19th of June 1628, he was made Prebendary of Canterbury, through the interest and recommendation of Bishop Laud (i). When that Prelate was promoted to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, he farther preferred him; for on the 4th of October 1634, he collated him to the Vicarage of Minster in the Isle of Thanet, and the 25th of the same month, he was inducted into the Vicarage of Monckton in the same island (k). The 31st of August 1636, he was created Doctor in Divinity, by order of King Charles I. who was entertained at the same time, with his Queen, by the University (l). About the year 1644, during the heat of the Civil Wars, he was deprived of his preferments, abused, fined, and imprisoned (m). In 1649, one Mr. Greaves of Gray's-inn, an intimate acquaintance of his, brought him a message from Oliver Cromwell, then Lieutenant-General of the Parliament forces, desiring him to come to Whitehall, on purpose to confer with him about matters of moment; but his wife being lately dead, and not, as he said, buried, he desired to be excused. Greaves came again afterwards, and Dr. Casaubon being under some uneasiness, least some evil should follow, desired him to tell him the meaning of the matter; but Greaves refusing, went away the second time. At length he returned again, and told him, that the Lieutenant-General intended his good and advancement; and his particular errand was, That he would make use of his pen to write the History of the late war; desiring withal, that nothing but matters of fact should be impartially set down. The Doctor answered, that he desired his humble service and hearty thanks should be returned for the great honour done unto him: but, that he was uncapable in several respects for such an employment, and could not so impartially engage in it, but his subject would force him to make such reflections as would be ungrateful, if not injurious, to his Lordship. Notwithstanding this answer, Cromwell seemed so sensible of his worth, that though he could not gain him to do what he desired, yet he acknowledged a great respect for him, and, as a testimony of it, ordered, that upon the first demand there should be delivered to him three or four hundred pounds, by a Bookseller in London, whose name was Cromwell, whenever his occasions should require, without acknowledging, at the receipt of it, who was his benefactor. But this offer he rejected, though his condition was then mean. At the same time, it was proposed by Mr. Greaves, who belonged to the Library at St. James's, that if our author would gratify him in the foregoing request, Cromwell would restore unto him all his father's books, which were then in the Royal Library, having been purchased by King James; and withal give him a patent for three hundred pounds a year, to be paid to the family as long as the youngest son of Dr. Casaubon (n) should live, but this also was refused. Not long after, a proposal was made to him by the Embassador of Christiana Queen of Sweden, whereby, he was invited by that Queen into her country, to have the government of one, or inspection of all her Universities; and for an encouragement, she proposed not only an honourable salary for himself, but offered to settle three hundred pounds a year upon his eldest son during life: but this also he waved, being fully determined to spend the remainder of his days in England (o). At the Restoration of King Charles II. he recovered his preferments; namely, his Prebend of Canterbury on the 13th of July 1660, and his Vicarages of Monckton, and Minster the same year (p). But, two years after, he exchanged this last for the Rectory of Ickham, near Canterbury, to which he was admitted, October 4, 1662 (q). He had a design, in the latter part of his days, of writing his own life; and would often confess, that he thought himself obliged to do it out of gratitude to the Divine Providence, which had preserved and delivered him from more hazardous occurrences, than ever any man (as he thought) besides himself had encountered with: Particularly, in his escape from a fire in the night-time, which happened in the house where he lived, at Geneva, while he was a boy: in his recovery from a sickness at Christ-Church in Oxford, when he was given over for dead, by a chymical preparation administered to him by a young Physician (r): in his wonderful preservation from drowning, when overset in a boat on the Thames near London, the two watermen being drowned, and himself buoyed up by his Priest's coat: and in his bearing several abuses, fines, imprisonments, &c. laid upon him by the fanaticks in the time of his sequestration. But deferring it from time to time, he did not live to do it (s). He died on the 14th of July 1671, in the seventy-second year of his age; and was buried in the south part of the first south cross-isle of Canterbury-Cathedral (t). Over his grave was soon after erected a handsome monument, with an inscription. He left by will a great number of manuscripts to the University of Oxford (u), and was author of several learned works [C]. His character is (h) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(i) Wood, ib. and Wharton. Collectan. MS. fol. p. 77.

(k) Wharton, ib.

(l) Wood, Fast. vol. i. col. 270.

(m) Wharton, ib. an Attempt towards recovering the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy, &c. by J. Walker, P. ii. p. 8.

(n) Wood, by mistake, calls here Dr. Casaubon Isaac.

(o) Wood, Ath. as above, col. 485, 486.

(p) Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728, fol. p. 264. 645. 727.

(q) Wharton, Collectan. as above, p. 77.

(r) See his Treatise of Credulity and Incredulity, &c. P. i. p. 16, 17. edit. 1668.

(s) Wood, Athen. col. 488.

(t) Wood, Ath. col. 488; and Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 282.

(u) Hist. & Antiq. ibid.

[C] And was author of several learned works.] They are, besides his two vindications already mentioned, these that follow. I. Optati Libri vii. de Schismate Donatistarum, cum Merici Casauboni Notis & Emendationibus. Londini 1632, 8*vo.* II. A translation from Greek into English of 'M. Aurelius Antoninus's 'Meditations is thus represented. He was a general Scholar, but not extraordinary in any one sort, unless in criticism, wherein probably he was assisted by his father's notes and papers (w). According to the ill custom of the times he lived in, he mixes too much Greek and Latin in his writings: but, however, that shows his very extensive reading. He was wont to ascribe

(w) Id. Athen. col. 486.

'Meditations concerning himself, with notes,' Lond. 1634, and 1635, 4*to*. again with additions and corrections. Lond. 1664, 8*vo*. III. 'A Treatise of Use 'and Custom.' This is the whole title; but, as the author himself observes (8), there might be added, 'in things Natural, Civil, and Divine.' Lond. 1638, 8*vo*. The occasion of this treatise, as he tells us in the same place, was, 'His being at that time much 'troubled, and as he thought injured, by what in the 'law of this realm, goes under the name of Custom; 'to him before little known.' IV. 'The Use of 'daily publick Prayers in three Positions.' Lond. 1641, 4*to*. V. Marci Antonini Imperatoris de Seipso & ad Seipsum Libri xii. Guil. Xylander Augustanus Græcè & Latinè primus edidit: nunc verò, Xylandri versionem locis plurimis emendavit, & novam fecit: in Antonini libros Notas & Emendationes adjacit Mericus Casaubonus, Is. F. In eosdem Xylandri Annotationes. Lond. 1643, 8*vo*. There are in the beginning learned Prolegomena of our author; and at the end his notes; then those of Xylander follow. It is a neat and accurate edition. VI. 'The original of temporal Evils; The 'Opinions of the most ancient Heathens concerning 'it examined by the Sacred Scriptures, and referred 'unto them, as unto the source and fountain, from 'whence they spring.' Lond. 1645, 4*to*. VII. 'A 'Discourse concerning Christ his Incarnation and Ex-'inanition. With an Introduction, Concerning the 'Principles of Christianity and Divinity.' Lond. 1646. 4*to*. VIII. De verborum usu, & accuratæ eorum cognitionis utilitate Diatriba. Londini 1647, 8*vo*. IX. This same year, he published a more complete edition of his father's notes upon Persius, than was that of 1605. The title of this second edition runs thus, Persii Satyræ cum notis Isaaci Casaubon. Londini 1647, 8*vo*. X. De quatuor Linguis Commentationis, Pars I. Quæ de Lingua Hebraica & de Lingua Saxonica. Accesserunt Gulielmi Somneri ad verba vetera Germanica Lipsiana Notæ. Londini 1650, 8*vo*. He had not an opportunity of finishing the two other languages, Greek and Latin. XI. Terentius, cum notis Thomæ Farnabii in quatuor priores Comoedias, & Merici Casauboni in Phormionem & Hecyram. Londini 1651, 12*mo*. Farnaby dying before he had finished his notes upon Terence, the Bookseller engaged Casaubon to write notes upon the two last Comedies, the Phormio and the Hecyra, which the other had not done. XII. 'Some 'Annotations on the Psalms and Proverbs.' He tells us (9), that these observations were extorted from him, by the importunity of Printers, when he was not very well furnished either with books or leisure; but, worst of all, of will, when nothing could be expected to be acceptable and welcome, but what relished of schism and rebellion. These Annotations were inserted in one of the latter editions of the Assembly's Annotations on the Bible. XIII. In Hieroclis commentarium de Providentia & Fato, Notæ & Emendationes. Lond. 1655, 8*vo*. and 1673, 8*vo*. Our author designed at first, to have corrected the Latin translation of Hierocles, which abounded with faults; but not knowing that the work was printing till it was almost entirely finished, he contented himself with adding a few grammatical and critical notes at the end. XIV. 'A Treatise concern-'ing Enthusiasm, as it is an effect of Nature; but is 'mistaken by many for either divine Inspiration, or 'diabolical possession.' Lond. 1655, 8*vo*. In this book, which is divided into six chapters, he treats, 1. Of Enthusiasme in general. 2. Of Divinatory Enthusiasme. 3. Of contemplative and philosophical Enthusiasme. 4. Of rhetorical Enthusiasme. 5. Of poeticall Enthusiasme. 6. Of precatory Enthusiasme. XV. De nupera Homeri editione Lugduno-Batavica Hackiana, cum Latina versione, & Didymi Scholiis; sed & Eustathio, & locis aliquot insignioribus ad Odysseam pertinentibus. Item super loco Homerico dubiæ apud Antiquos Interpretationis, quo Dei in hominum tam mentes quam fortunas imperium asseritur, binæ Dissertationes. Londini 1659, 8*vo*. reprinted in Almeloveen's edition of Casaubon's Letters. XVI. Epicteti enchiridion, Græcè & Latinè, cum notis Merici Casauboni; & Cebetis Tabula cum notis ejusdem. Lond. 1659, 8*vo*. The Latin translation in this edition is that of Jerom Wolfius. XVII. An English translation of, and notes on, 'Lucius Florus's History of the Romans.' Lond. 1659, 8*vo*. XVIII. He published, 'A true and 'faithful relation of what passed for many years be-'tween Dr. John Dee and some Spirits, &c.' And put in the beginning a long Preface, to confirm the truth of what is said in that relation concerning Spirits. Lond. 1659, fol. XIX. He was author of, 'A Vin-'dication of the Lord's Prayer as a formal Prayer, and 'by Christ's Institution to be used by Christians as a 'Prayer. Against the Antichristian practice and opinion 'of some men. Wherein also their private and un-'grounded zeal is discovered, who are so strict for the 'observation of the Lord's-day, and make so light of 'the Lord's prayer.' Lond. 1660. The first occasion of this treatise, as the author tells us in the Preface, was the relation of a strange affront done publickly unto Christ; or, if you will more punctually, to the Lord's prayer, in St. Mary's Church in Oxford, by Dr. John Owen, Dean of Christ-Church, who had the chief government of that University from 1652 to 1657; namely, His putting on his Hat, when the Lord's prayer was repeating by the preacher. This, Dr. Owen denied afterwards (10); 'But therein, saith Mr. Wood '(11), he doth much err, for several now living in Oxon '(i. e. in Wood's time) knew it well enough.' XX. 'A King and his Subjects unhappily fallen out, and 'happily reconciled, in a Sermon preached at Canter-'bury, on Hosea iii. ver. 4, 5.' Lond. 1660, 4*to*. XXI. 'The Question to whom it belonged anciently 'to preach? And whether all Priests might or did? 'Discussed out of Antiquity. Occasioned by the late 'Directions concerning Preachers.' Lond. 1663, 4*to*. These directions were set forth by the King, October 14, 1662, to restrain the abuses and extravagances of Preachers (12). XXII. Notæ & Emendationes in Diogenem Laërtium de Vitis, &c. Philosophorum. These notes were added to those of his father, in the editions of Laërtius printed at London 1664, fol. and Amsterdam in 1692, 4*to*. XXIII. 'Of the necessity of Re-'formation in and before Luther's time, and what 'visibly hath most hindred the progress of it. Occa-'sioned by some late virulent books written by Papists, 'but especially by that, intituled, Labyrinthus Can-'tuariensis. Here, besides some other points, the 'grand business of these times, Infallibility, is fully 'discussed.' Lond. 1664, 4*to*. This is chiefly an answer to Labyrinthus Cantuariensis, printed at Paris in 1658; which pretends to confute 'Archbishop Laud's 'Relation of a Conference with Fisher the Jesuit:' and in the 11th, 13th, and 14th Chapters of which, it is asserted, 'That Protestants are Schismaticks, and no 'part of the Catholick Church.' XXIV. 'An An-'swer concerning the new way of Infallibility lately 'devised to uphold the Roman cause; the ancient 'Fathers and Councils laid aside, against J. S. (the 'author of Sure-footing) his Letter lately published.' Lond. 1665, 8*vo*. This Letter of J. S. (i. e. John Sarjeant, the author of Sure-footing, &c. so learnedly confuted by Archbishop Tillotson) was a sort of an answer to some passages in Dr. Casaubon's book 'Of 'the Necessity of Reformation, &c.' and was printed at the end of Sarjeant's Sure-footing in Christianity. XXV. 'A Letter of Meric Casaubon, D. D. &c. to 'Peter du Moulin, D. D. &c. concerning Natural 'Experimental Philosophy, and some books lately set 'out about it.' Cambridge 1669, 4*to*. five sheets. XXVI. 'Of Credulity and Incredulity in things Na-'tural, Civil, and Divine; wherein, among other 'things, the Sadducism of these times in denying 'Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations, by 'pregnant instances and evidences is fully confuted; 'Epicurus his cause discussed, and the juggling and 'false dealing lately used to bring him and Atheism 'into credit, clearly discovered; the use and necessity 'of ancient Learning against the innovating humour

'all

(8) Of Credulity and Incredulity, &c. P. i. p. 15.

(9) Of Credulity and Incredulity, Part i. p. 106.

(10) In a Letter to Dr. Lewis du Moulin. See Dr. John Durel's Vindiciæ Eccles. Angl. c.iii. p.33.

(11) Athen. vol. ii. col. 487.

(12) They are extant in Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728, fol. p. 794, &c.

aſcribe to Deſcartes's philoſophy, the little inclination people had in his time for polite learning (x). He was eminent for his piety, charity to the poor, and his courteous and affable diſpoſition towards Scholars (y). He had ſeveral children, but none made any figure in the learned world: one, named John, was a Surgeon at Canterbury (z).

(x) Bernard, Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, tom. xxxv. Juillet 1710. Artic. 1. p. 28.

(z) Niceron, as above, p. 149. Wood, Athen. p. 486.

(y) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 282.

'all along proved and aſſerted.' Lond. 1668, 8*vo*. containing two parts. The third part was printed at London 1670, 8*vo*. under the following title, 'Of 'Credulity and Incredulity, in things Divine and 'Spiritual: wherein (among other things) a true and 'faithful account is given of the Platonick Philoſophy, 'as it hath reference to Chriſtianity: as alſo the buſi-'neſs of Witches and Witchcraft, againſt a late 'writer, fully argued and diſputed.' The late writer, attacked only in the two laſt ſheets of this book, was Mr. John Wagſtaff, who publiſhed, 'The queſtion 'of Witchcraft debated; or, a diſcourſe againſt their 'opinion, that affirm Witches.' Lond. 1669, 8*vo*. But theſe two parts of Dr. Caſaubon's book lying dead on the Bookſeller's hands, he printed a new title to them, running thus, 'A Treatiſe, proving Spirits, 'Witches, and Supernatural Operations by pregnant 'inſtances and evidences, &c.' Lond. 1672 (13). XXVII. Notæ in Polybium, printed for the firſt time in the edition of that author, publiſhed by James Gronovius at Amſterdam in 1670, 8*vo*. XXVIII. Epiſtolæ, Dedicationes, Præfationes, Prolegomena, & Tractatus quidam rariores. Curante Theodoro Janſon ab Almeloveen; printed at the end of Iſaac Caſaubon's Letters. Roteacodami 1709. XXIX. De Jure concionandi apud antiquos (14). This ſeems to be the ſame as the Treatiſe mentioned above No 22. or perhaps it was a Latin tranſlation of it (15). M.

(13) Wood, Ath. col. 488.

(14) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 282.

(15) This Catalogue of Caſaubon's Works is taken from Niceron, as above, p. 150, &c. and from Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 282. and Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 486, 487, 488.

 [Sir William Temple, in his Eſſay on Poetry, ſpeaks in high terms of Meric Caſaubon's abilities and literature. "I am ſorry, ſays Sir William, the "natural hiſtory or account of faſcination has not "employed the pen of ſome perſon of ſuch excel-"lent wit and deep thought and learning as Caſau-"bon, who wrote that curious and uſeful treatiſe "on Enthuſiaſm, and by it diſcovered the hidden "or miſtaken ſources of that deluſion, ſo frequent "in all regions and religions of the world, and "which had ſo fatally ſpread over our country in "that age in which this treatiſe was ſo ſeaſonably "publiſhed. 'Tis much to be lamented, that he "lived not to compleat that work in the ſecond part "he promiſed; or that his friends neglected the "publiſhing it, if it were left in papers, though "looſe and unfiniſhed. I think a clear account of "enthuſiaſm and faſcination from their natural "cauſes, would very much deſerve from mankind in "general, as well as from the commonwealth of "learning; might perhaps prevent ſo many public "diſorders, and ſave the lives of many innocent, "deluded, or deluding people, who ſuffer ſo fre-"quently upon account of witches and wizards (16)." However well qualified Meric Caſaubon was to treat concerning enthuſiaſm, it is certain that his mind was not ſufficiently enlarged to diſcuſs rationally the ſubject of faſcination; ſince it is plain, from his writings on credulity and incredulity, that he was a zealous aſſertor of the reality of apparitions and witchcraft. With regard to his treatiſe on Enthuſiaſm, the praiſes of it muſt be adopted with ſome abatement. There are undoubtedly ſome curious obſervations in it, and it abounds with learning. But the language of the book is remarkably embarraſſed and confuſed; ſo that the author's meaning is often loſt in the multiplicity of words, and the perplexity of parentheſes. This is not our own opinion only, but the opinion of a reſpectable gentleman, who hath favoured us with many obſervations relative to the Biographia.

(16) Sir William Temple's works, vol. i. p. 234. Folio edition.

We are informed, by the ſame gentleman, that the letter, mentioned in note [B], which was written by Mr. Caſaubon to be ſhewn to the King, is in the Advocate's library at Edinburgh.] K.

 [CASLON (WILLIAM), * eminent in an art of the greateſt conſequence to Literature, the art of Letter-Founding, was born in 1692, in that part of the town of Hales Owen which is ſituated in Shropſhire. Though he juſtly attained the character of being the Coryphæus in that employment, he was not brought up to the buſineſs; and it is obſerved by Mr. Mores, that this handy work is ſo concealed among the artificers of it, that he could not diſcover that any one had taught it to another; but every perſon who had uſed it had learned it of his own genuine inclination. Mr. Caſlon ſerved a regular apprenticeſhip to an Engraver of Ornaments on Gun Barrels, and after the expiration of his term, carried on this trade in Vine-Street, near the Minories. He did not, however, ſolely confine his ingenuity to that inſtrument, but employed himſelf likewiſe in making tools for the Book-binders, and for the chaſing of ſilver plate. Whilſt he was engaged in this buſineſs, the elder Mr. Bowyer accidentally ſaw, in a Bookſeller's ſhop, the lettering of a book uncommonly neat; and enquiring who the Artiſt was by whom the letters were made, was hence induced to ſeek an acquaintance with Mr. Caſlon. Not long after, Mr. Bowyer took Mr. Caſlon to Mr. James's Foundery, in Bartholomew Cloſe. Caſlon had never before that time ſeen any part of the buſineſs; and being aſked by his friend, if he thought he could undertake to cut types, he requeſted a ſingle day to conſider the matter, and then replied, that he had no doubt but he could. Upon this anſwer, Mr. Bowyer, Mr. Bettenham, and Mr. Watts had ſuch a confidence in his abilities, that they lent him five hundred pounds to begin the undertaking, and he applied himſelf to it with equal aſſiduity and ſucceſs. In 1720, the Society for promoting Chriſtian Knowledge, in conſequence of a repreſentation from Mr. Solomon Negri, a native of Damaſcus in Syria, who was well ſkilled in the Oriental Tongues, and had been Profeſſor of Arabic in places of note, deemed it expedient to print, for the uſe of the Eaſtern Churches, the New Teſtament and Pſalter in the Arabic Language. Theſe were intended for the benefit of the poor Chriſtians in Paleſtine, Syria, Meſopotamia, Arabia, and Egypt, the conſtitution of which countries did not permit the exerciſe of the Art of Printing. Upon this occaſion, Mr. Caſlon was pitched upon to cut the Fount; in his ſpecimens of which he diſtinguiſhed it by the name of Engliſh Arabic. After he had finiſhed this Fount, he cut the letters of his own name in Pica Roman, and placed them at the bottom of one of the Arabic Specimens. The name being ſeen by Mr. Palmer, (the reputed author of a "Hiſtory of Printing," which was, in fact, written by Pſalmanazar) he adviſed our Artiſt to cut the whole Fount of Pica. This was accordingly done, and the performance exceeded the letter of the other Founders of the time. But Mr. Palmer, whoſe circumſtances required credit with thoſe whoſe buſineſs would have been hurt by Mr. Caſlon's ſuperior execution, repented of the advice he had given him, and endeavoured to diſcourage him from any farther progreſs. Mr. Caſlon, being juſtly diſguſted at ſuch treatment, applied to Mr. Bowyer, under whoſe inſpection he cut, in 1722, the beautiful Fount of Engliſh which was uſed in printing Selden's Works (a), and the Coptic types that were made uſe of for Dr. Wilkins's edition of the Pentateuch. Under the farther encouragement of Mr. Bowyer, Mr. Bettenham, and Mr. Watts, he proceeded with vigour in his employment; and the laſt gentleman was always acknowledged by him to be his maſter, from whom he had learned his art. In this art he arrived at length to ſuch perfection, that he not only freed us from the neceſſity of importing types from Holland, but in the beauty and elegance of thoſe made by him, he ſo far exceeded the productions of the beſt Artificers, that his workmanſhip was frequently exported to the Continent. Indeed, it may with great juſtice and confidence be aſſerted, that a more beautiful ſpecimen than his is not to be found in any part of the world. Mr. Caſlon's firſt Foundery was in a ſmall houſe in Helmet-Row, Old-Street. He afterwards removed into Ironmonger-Row; and about the year 1735 into Chiſwell-Street, where his Foundery became, in proceſs of time, the moſt capital one that exiſts in this or in foreign countries. Having acquired opulence in the courſe of his employment, he was put into the Commiſſion of the Peace for the County of Middleſex (b). Towards the latter end of his life, his eldeſt ſon William being in partnerſhip with him, he retired, in a great meaſure, from the active execution of buſineſs. His laſt country reſidence was at Bethnal-Green, where he departed this life on the 23d of January, 1766, at the age of ſeventy-four. He was interred in the Church-yard of St. Luke, Middleſex, in which pariſh all his different Founderies were ſituated, and where they are ſtill carried on by his family. Mr. Caſlon was univerſally eſteemed as a firſt-rate Artiſt, a tender Maſter, and an honeſt, friendly, and benevolent Man: and Sir John Hawkins (c) has particularly celebrated his hoſpitality, his ſocial qualities, and his love of muſic.] K.

* For the materials of this article we are entirely indebted to Mr. Nichols, who favoured us with the inedited ſheets of his Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer.

(a) In 1726.

(b) In or about the year 1750.

(c) Hiſtory of Muſic, vol. v. p. 127, 128.

 [CASTELL (EDMUND), a Divine of the laſt century, who deſerves to be recorded as a remarkable example of literary generoſity, joined to literary induſtry, was born, in 1606, at Hatley in Cambridgeſhire. After going through a courſe of grammatical education, he became a Member, in 1621, of Emanuel College, in Cambridge, at which College he continued many years. Afterwards, he removed to St. John's College for the convenience of the library there, which was of great ſervice to him in compiling his grand work, his "Lexicon Heptaglotton (a)." In due courſe, he took the ſeveral degrees of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts, and of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity; and the fame of his learning occaſioned his being choſen a Member of the Royal Society. His "Lexicon Heptaglotton" coſt him the aſſiduous labour of ſeventeen years. The unwearied diligence which he employed in this undertaking, injured his health, and impaired his conſtitution. Beſides this, the work was the entire ruin of his fortune; for he ſpent upon it upwards of twelve thouſand pounds. The truth of the fact is poſitively aſſerted by Mr. Hearne, whoſe authority for it was a letter which he had under Dr. Caſtell's own hand. Mr. Hearne pathetically and juſtly complains, that our author ſhould meet with ſo very poor a reward for his incredible and indeed Herculean labours (b). The Doctor, in 1666, having waſted his patrimony, and incurred heavy debts, was reduced to extreme diſtreſs; when, probably in conſideration of his learned labours, and diſintereſted generoſity, the royal favour began to ſmile upon him. In that year, he was made King's Chaplain, and Arabic Profeſſor at Cambridge; and, in 1668, he obtained a Prebend of Canterbury (c). In the next year, he publiſhed his "Lexicon Heptaglotton;" but the publication procured him no compenſation for his large expences, and his indefatigable diligence. The copies of the book lay almoſt entirely unſold upon his hands (d). He received, indeed, ſome additional preferments; but they were by no means ſufficient to recompenſe him for his great loſſes. The ſmall Vicarage of Hatfield Peverell, in Eſſex, was beſtowed upon him; and he was afterwards preſented to the Rectory of Wodeham Walter, in the ſame county. His laſt preferment, which was towards the cloſe of his life, was the Rectory of Higham Gobion, in Bedfordſhire (e).

(a) Granger's Biographical Hiſt. vol. iii. p. 277. Nichols's Supplement to the Origin of Printing, p. 289.

(b) Granger, and Supplement to the Origin of Printing, ubi ſupra. Leland's Collectanea, vol. vi. p. 80.

(c) Granger, and Supplement to the Origin of Printing.

(d) Hearne, in Leland's Collectanea, ubi ſupra.

(e) Granger, as before; and Supplement to the Origin of Printing, p. 291.

Dr. Caſtell's induſtry and liberality were not confined to his Lexicon. He was eminently aſſiſtant to Dr. Walton, in the celebrated edition of the Polyglott Bible. This is acknowledged by Walton, who, after complimenting our author's erudition and modeſty, mentions the diligence he employed upon the Samaritan, the Syriac, the Arabic, and the Ethiopic verſions; his having given a Latin tranſlation of the Canticles, under the laſt verſion; and his adding to all of them learned notes. Theſe acknowledgments, however, were by no means equal to Caſtell's merit and ſervices; for he tranſlated ſeveral books of the New Teſtament, and the Syriac verſion of Job where it differs from from the Arabic (f). Greater juſtice ought, likewiſe, to have been done to his generoſity. Dr. Walton mentions the gratuities which he beſtowed on the learned men who aſſiſted him in his undertaking. But he forgot to mention that Caſtell not only ſpent his whole gratuity upon the work, but a thouſand pounds beſides; partly from his own private fortune, and partly from money which he had ſolicited from others (g). We know of nothing farther publiſhed by Dr. Caſtell, excepting a thin quarto pamphlet, in 1660, entitled "Sol Angliæ Oriens Auſpiciis Caroli II. Regum Glorioſiſſimi," and adorned with an admirable head of that Monarch [A]. From a letter of our author's, which is ſtill extant, and was written in 1674, it appears, that the many diſcouragements he had met with, had not extinguiſhed his ardour for the promotion of Oriental literature [B]. The ſame letter ſhews, that, in his application to the learned languages, he had forgotten the cultivation of his native tongue; and that even his orthography did not keep pace with the improvements of the time. Dr. Caſtell died at Higham Gobion, in 1685, being about ſeventy-nine years of age. All his Oriental manuſcripts were bequeathed by him to the Univerſity of Cambridge, on condition that his name ſhould be written on every copy in the collection (b). It is ſuppoſed, that about five hundred of his Lexicons were unſold at the time of his death. Theſe were placed by Mrs. Criſp, Dr. Caſtell's niece and executrix, in a room of one of her tenant's houſes at Martin, in Surry, where, for many years, they lay at the mercy of the rats, who made ſuch havock among them, that when they came into the poſſeſſion of this lady's executors, ſcarcely one compleat volume could be formed out of the remainder, and the whole load of learned rags ſold only for ſeven pounds. Dr. Caſtell was buried in the Church of Higham Gobion, where, in his life-time, he erected a monument, being a tablet of black marble in a white ſtone frame, on which there is an inſcription, that, neither by its Latinity nor by its execution, reflects much honour on his taſte (i) [C].] K.

(f) Id. ibid. Wood's Athenæ, vol. ii. Faſti, col. 48.

(g) Supplement to the Origin of Printing, ubi ſupra.

(b) Granger, and Supplement to the Origin of Printing, ubi ſupra.

(i) Supplement, ubi ſupra, p. 292, 293.

[A] With an admirable head of that Monarch.] The inſcription of this pamphlet to the King, which ſhews the nature of the publication, is as follows: "Sereniſſimo & Potentiſſimo Principi ac Domino Domino Carolo, ejus nominis Secundo, Auguſtiſſimo Britanniarum, Franc. &c. &c. Monarchæ, Fidei Defenſori, &c. Regi Clementiſſimo, Soteria ſuper Sacratiſſ. ejus Majeſtatis incolumitate apud exteros; Gratulatoria de ejuſdem reditu ad ſuos; Votiva pro omnigena Animæ, Corporis ac Regiminis Felicitate, Carmina ſua, illis Linguis, quæ in Lexico, quod ſub prelo eſt, Polyglotto Orientali, exhibentur, humillime offert, ſuo & Sociorum nomine, Edmundus Caſtell, S. T. B. (1)."

(1) Supplement to the Origin of Printing, p. 290, 291.

[B] Had not extinguiſhed his ardour for the promotion of Oriental literature.] The letter was written to Dr. Spencer, and is preſerved in the Manuſcript Library at Lambeth. It was communicated to Mr. Nichols by Dr. Ducarel.

"Reverend and moſt highly honoured Sir,

"ON Saturday the 9th inſtant, I received a letter from Dr. Marſhall, rector of Lincoln College, Oxford: that very day, the generality hereabouts began the harveſt: that much adoe I had, having no hors of my own, to borrow one til Tueſday following: then I ſet forth to carry you the ſaid letter, about the mid way from my hous to Cambridg I met with Mr. Broughton coming to mee with an expres from you, aſſured mee that my journy would bee to no purpoſe in reference to Golius's library; you had told him, there could be notthing at preſent don about it: Wherupon we both returned back to my hous: To him I have deliverid the Letter; requeſting after it is read, that he may receive it again of you.

"Sir, It is now about, or above ſix years ſince I began to intermedle in this affair, with no other aim but only to ſerve the Univerſity, in which tho I have ſpent not a few hundred, yea thouſands of pounds, yet from it I never received the leaſt kerm of pecuniary profit; my Profeſſorſhip received from another hand, in ſetling which had I not been active, it is more than probable, it would ſcarce have been effected by our noble Founder; it has put mee to a far greater expens, then the ſtipend amounts to: nevertheles, after the great work of the Bibles and Heptaglot was finiſhed, no one thing has run more in my thoughts, and more than ſo, then how to farther any way our academical intereſt. Formerly I procured towards the purchace of this unparalled ineſtimable treaſure, no leſs than a thouſand pounds, without any charg to the colledges, excepting 3 perſons only, the reſt was promiſed by Biſhops, Deans, and Dignified men. The miſcarriage of the attempt, I have made known. Since, it is no ſmall grief to think, how this once apprized Gem is now depreciated; a diſcouragement to any ſuch kind of Benefacture. However (moſt honoured Sir), tho I have no thanks at al for the precious time, tedious jaunts, and to-mee-no eaſy charg in proſecution of my real intentions, I humbly beſeech you (moſt worthy Sir) that Dr. Marſhall, a Head in Oxford, unto whom, by your appointment, in a letter ſent him from Cambridg, a promiſe was made, that ſome recompence ſhould be given him, for his forwardnes, pains, and charge, againſt the guiſe of the place in which he is, in offering ſo willingly to advance an emulous concern. Sir, This I hope you wil deem very juſt and equitable, that I be not damnified by this ſo reaſonably engaged promiſe.

"Sir, Vouchſafe mee your pardon but this once: if I ſin this offenſe any more, I will crave your ſevereſt puniſhment without any mercy upon

Reverend Sir,
Your verieſt real and Higham Gobin, moſt redevable Servant,
16 Auguſt, 74. EDMUND CASTELL."

Directed thus,
"To my much eſteemed friend
Dr. Spencer Maſter of Corpus Chriſti College in Cambridge
Theſe
"At the Colledge in Ely preſent.
"Poſt paid (2)."

(2) Ibid. p. 293—295.

[C] On which there is an inſcription, &c.] This is the inſcription, excluſively of a line in Arabic, with which it is concluded.

"Edmund' Caſtell' S. T. P. regiæ majeſtati Caroli 2i a ſacris eccleſiæ Chriſti Cantuarienſ Canonicus Linguæ Arabicæ apud Cantabrig Profeſſor. regal Societatis ſocius Authr Lex Heptagl. Necnon Hujus Eccleſiæ Rector Mortalitatis quod reliquum eſt tam ipſi quam lectiſſime ejus Conjugi Dæ Elizab. Betteſworth Petri Betteſworth militis aurati primo relictæ, deinde Johani Herris armig (cuj' fil' Wilhelm' una cum filia ej' Elizab. hic jacent) Anno ætatis Edmundi 68 Dæ Elizab. 64 anno Chriſti 1674 Vivus hic legat humandum (3)."

(3) Ibid. p. 292.

CAVE (WILLIAM) a very learned Divine in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth Century, was born at Pickwell in Leiceſterſhire (a), of which pariſh his father was Rector [A]. On the 9th of May 1653, he was admitted into St. John's-College in Cambridge; where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1656; and commenced Maſter in that faculty in 1660 (b). The 7th of Auguſt 1662, he was admitted to the Vicarage of Iſlington in Middleſex (c); and, ſome time after, became Chaplain in Ordinary to King Charles II. He took the degree of Doctor in Divinity in the year 1672 (d): and on the 16th of September 1679, was collated by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to the Rectory of Alhallows the Great in Thames-ſtreet, London (e).

The 12th of July 1681, he was incorporated Doctor in Divinity at Oxford (f). On the 21ſt of November 1684, he was inſtalled Canon of Windſor, upon the death of Mr. John Roſewell (g); about which time, as Mr. Wood tells us (h), he became Rector of Haſely in Oxfordſhire: but that ſeems to be a miſtake [B]. He reſigned his Rectory of Alhallows in 1689 (i), and the Vicarage of Iſlington in 1691 (k). But on 19th of November before, namely, in 1690, he was admitted to the Vicarage of Iſleworth in Middleſex (l), which being a quiet and retired place, probably ſuited beſt his moſt ſtudious temper. He hath publiſhed the following books. I. 'Primitive Chriſtianity: or the 'Religion of the ancient Chriſtians in the firſt Ages of the Goſpel.' London 1672, reprinted ſeveral times ſince. II. Tabulæ Eccleſiaſticæ, Tables of the eccleſiaſtical writers, Lond. 1674, reprinted at Hamburgh in 1676, without his knowledge (m). III. Antiquitates Apoſtolicæ: 'or the Hiſtory of the Lives, Acts, and Martyrdoms of the holy 'Apoſtles of our Saviour, and the two Evangeliſts S. S. Mark and Luke. To which is 'added an introductory Diſcourſe concerning the three great Diſpenſations of the Church, 'Patriarchal, Moſaical, and Evangelical. Being a Continuation of Antiquitates Chriſtianæ, 'or the Life and Death of holy Jeſus;' written by Jeremy Taylor, afterward Biſhop of Down and Connor (n). Lond. 1676, fol. IV. Apoſtolici: 'or the Hiſtory of the Lives, 'Acts, Deaths, and Martyrdoms of thoſe, who were contemporaries with or immediately 'ſucceeded the Apoſtles. As alſo of the moſt eminent of the primitive Fathers for the 'firſt three hundred years. To which is added, a Chronology of the three firſt Ages of 'the Church.' Lond. 1677, fol. V. 'A Sermon preached before the Right Honourable 'the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of London, at St. Mary-Le-Bow, on the 'fifth of November, M.DC.LXXX.' Lond. 1680, 4*to* [C]. VI. 'A Diſſertation con-'cerning the Government of the Ancient Church, by Biſhops, Metropolitans, and Pa-'triarchs. More particularly, concerning the ancient Power and Juriſdiction of the 'Biſhops of Rome, and the Encroachments of that upon other Sees, eſpecially the See 'of Conſtantinople.' Lond. 1683, 8*vo*. XVII. Eccleſiaſtici: 'or the Hiſtory of the 'Lives, Acts, Deaths, Writings of the moſt eminent Fathers of the Church, that flou-'riſhed in the fourth Century. Wherein among other things an account is given of the 'Riſe, Growth, and Progreſs of Arianiſm, and all other Sects of that age deſcending 'from it. Together with an Introduction, containing an hiſtorical Account of the State 'of Paganiſm under the Firſt Chriſtian Emperor.' Lond. 1682, fol. VIII. 'A Ser-'mon preached before the King at Whitehall on Sunday, January 18, 1684-5,' on Pſalm iv. 7. Publiſhed by his Majeſties Special Command.' Lond. 1685, 4*to*. IX. Chartophylax Eccleſiaſticus [D]: Lond. 1685, 8*vo*. X. Scriptorum Eccleſiaſticorum, Hiſtoria Literaria: i. e. 'A Literary Hiſtory of Eccleſiaſtical Writers [E], in Two Parts,' fol. the firſt printed at Lond. 1688; and the ſecond in 1698. XI. 'A Serious Exhor-'tation, with ſome important Advices relating to the late Caſes about Conformity, re-'commended to the preſent Diſſenters from the Church of England.' It is the twenty-

(a) See an Attempt towards recovering an Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy, &c. by J. Walker, M.A. Lond. 1714. fol. Part ii. p. 220.

(b) From the College-books and Univerſity-regiſters, communicated by the learned Dr. W. Richardſon.

(c) Newcourt Repertorium Eccleſ. &c. Lond. 1708. fol. vol. i. p. 678.

(d) From the Regiſters, as above.

(e) Newcourt, ubi ſupra, p. 249.

(f) Wood, Faſti, edit. 1721. Vol. ii. col. 218.

(g) J. Le Neve, Faſti Eccleſ. Angl. Lond. 1716, p. 387.

(h) Faſti, ubi ſupra.

(i) Newcourt, ubi ſupra, p. 249.

(k) Ibid. p. 678.

(l) Ibid. p. 676.

(m) Meplane ieſcio, ſaith the author, in his Preface to Chartophyl. Eccleſiaſtic. at the beginning.

(n) See Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, vol. ii. col. 404.

[A] Of which pariſh his father was Rector.] His father was John Cave, M. A. third ſon of John Cave, Eſq. He was born at Pickwell, [of which he afterwards became Rector] and educated at Lincoln-College in Oxford, where he was Chamber-fellow with the famous Dr. Saunderſon for eight years. During the unhappy Civil Wars, he was ſeveral times plundered, impriſoned, and many other ways miſerably abuſed; and at laſt diſpoſeſſed of his living, and turned out of doors, with a wife, and ſix children he then had. See a full account of it in Mr. Walker's Attempt towards recovering an Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy, &c (1).

(1) As quoted above, p. 220, 221.

[B] But that ſeems to be a miſtake.] For the Rectory of Haſely is annexed to the Deanry of Windſor (2).

(2) See Liber Valorum & Decimarum, by Mr. Ecton, 3d edit. Lond. 1728, 8vo. p. 270.

[C] A Sermon preached before the Lord-Mayor, &c. on the fifth of November, 1680.] It is dedicated by the Author to Sir Patience Ward, Lord-Mayor of London, and to the Court of Aldermen. His text is Acts xvii. 6. Theſe that have turned the world upſide down, are come hither alſo. Upon which he diſcourſeth under theſe three heads. '1. He ſhews, 'that this has been an old charge upon Religion, and 'the Profeſſors of it, to be diſturbers of the public 'peace. 2. That Chriſtianity is ſo far from being 'juſtly obnoxious to this charge, that of all Reli-'gions it beſt ſecures the intereſts of Civil Authority, 'and the Peace of the world. 3. He enquires, whe-'ther there be any part of the Chriſtian Church at 'this day juſtly guilty of this charge.' And without heſitation he lays the charge at the door of the Church of Rome. It is one of the beſt, and moſt eloquent Sermons, ever preached upon that ſubject. The Author appears by it, to have been a man of prodigious reading, and an univerſal ſcholar.

[D] Chartophylax Eccleſiaſticus.] This book is an improvement of the Tabulæ Eccleſiaſticæ above-mentioned; and a kind of abridgment of the author's Hiſtoria Literaria: It containing a ſhort account of moſt of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers from the birth of Chriſt to the year 1517.

[E] Scriptorum Eccleſiaſticorum Hiſtoria Literaria.] This learned and uſeful work was reprinted at Geneva in 1705 and 1720: and a new edition of it was lately printed at London by ſubſcription, with very large additions and emendations throughout the whole, made by the author during the laſt twelve years of his life; together with the new Prolegomena, compoſed alſo by the author. M.

ſecond

second in the London Cases. This very learned person, died at Windsor on the 4th of August 1713, and was buried in Islington Church, where a monument was erected to his memory (o). He was an excellent and universal Scholar, an elegant and polite Writer, and a florid and very eloquent Preacher. He was thoroughly acquainted with the History and Constitution of the Christian Church. His works, particularly his Lives of the Apostles, Lives of the Fathers, and Primitive Christianity, as they evince his great knowledge of Antiquity, so are they justly esteemed the best books, written upon those important subjects.

(o) Annual List of the Deaths of eminent Persons, at the end of Boyer's History of Queen Anne, fol. Lond. 1735, p. 63.

 [On the monument erected to the memory of Mr. Cave, in Islington Church, is the following inscription.

Juxta heic
Ad imum Pulpiti Gradum
Conditur quod claudi potuit
Gulielmi Cave S. Th. Pr.
Canonici Windesorienſis,
Caroli II. à Sacris Domesticis,
Hujus Ecclesiæ per XXVIII Annos Vicarii.
Natus est Decemb. XXX. An. MDCXXXVII.
Obiit Aug. IV. Ann. MDCCXIII.

IV Filiis & II Filiabus eodem
Circiter loco ex Australi
Latere conditis accessit tandem Anna (Gualt. Stonehouse
S.T.B. Filia Unica) Mater
Pientissima, Conjux Charissima:
quæ quidem obiit Jan. X. MDCXCI.
Quisquis es, Viator, Homo cum sis,
Ossa nostra ne violes, depositi Cineres quiescant in Pace, abi Mortalitatis Memor, nec te incautum rapiat Suprema Dies.]

 [CAVE (EDWARD),* was born at Newton in Warwickshire, on the 29th day of February, in the year 1691. His father was the younger son of Mr. Edward Cave, of Cave's in the Hole, a lone house, on the Street-Road in the same County, which took its name from the occupier; but having concurred with his elder brother in cutting off the intail of a small hereditary estate, by which act it was lost from the family, he was reduced to follow in Rugby the trade of a shoemaker. He was a man of good reputation in his narrow circle, and remarkable for strength and rustick intrepidity. He lived to a great age, and was in his latter years supported by his son.

* This Life, written by Dr. Johnson in the year 1754, is here inserted by his permission.

It was fortunate for Edward Cave, that having a disposition to literary attainments, he was not cut off by the poverty of his parents from opportunities of cultivating his faculties. The school of Rugby, in which he had, by the rules of its foundation, a right to be instructed, was then in high reputation, under the Reverend Mr. Holyock, to whose care most of the neighbouring families, even of the highest rank, entrusted their sons. He had judgment to discover, and, for some time, generosity to encourage the genius of young Cave; and was so well pleased with his quick progress in the school, that he declared his resolution to breed him for the University, and recommend him as a Servitor to some of his scholars of high rank. But prosperity which depends upon the caprice of others, is of short duration. Cave's superiority in literature, exalted him to an invidious familiarity with boys who were far above him in rank and expectations; and, as in unequal associations it always happens, whatever unlucky prank was played, was imputed to Cave. When any mischief, great or small, was done, though perhaps others boasted of the stratagem when it was successful, yet upon detection or miscarriage, the fault was sure to fall upon poor Cave.

At last, his mistress by some invisible means lost a favourite cock; Cave was with little examination stigmatized as the thief or murderer; not because he was more apparently criminal than others, but because he was more easily reached by vindictive justice. From that time Mr. Holyock withdrew his kindness visibly from him, and treated him with harshness, which the crime, in its utmost aggravation, could scarcely deserve; and which surely he would have forborn, had he considered how hardly the habitual influence of birth and fortune is resisted; and how frequently men, not wholly without sense of virtue, are betrayed to acts more atrocious than the robbery of a hen-roost, by a desire of pleasing their superiors.

Those reflections his master never made, or made without effect; for under pretence that Cave obstructed the discipline of the school, by selling clandestine assistance, and supplying exercises to idlers, he was oppressed with unreasonable tasks, that there might be an opportunity of quarrelling with his failure; and when his diligence had surmounted them, no regard was paid to the performance. Cave bore this perſecution a-while, and then left the ſchool, and the hope of a literary education, to ſeek ſome other means of gaining a livelihood.

He was firſt placed with a collector of the exciſe. He uſed to recount with ſome pleaſure a journey or two which he rode with him as his clerk, and relate the victories that he gained over the exciſemen in grammatical diſputations. But the inſolence of his miſtreſs, who employed him in ſervile drudgery, quickly diſguſted him, and he went up to London in queſt of more ſuitable employment.

He was recommended to a timber merchant at the Bank-ſide, and while he was there on liking, is ſaid to have given hopes of great mercantile abilities; but this place he ſoon left, I know not for what reaſon, and was bound apprentice to Mr. Collins, a printer of ſome reputation, and deputy Alderman.

This was a trade for which men were formerly qualified by a literary education, and which was pleaſing to Cave, becauſe it furniſhed ſome employment for his ſcholaſtick attainments. Here therefore he reſolved to ſettle, though his maſter and miſtreſs lived in perpetual diſcord, and their houſe was therefore no comfortable habitation. From the inconveniencies of theſe domeſtick tumults he was ſoon releaſed, having in only two years attained ſo much ſkill in his art, and gained ſo much the confidence of his maſter, that he was ſent without any ſuperintendant to conduct a printing-houſe at Norwich, and publiſh a weekly paper. In this undertaking he met with ſome oppoſition, which produced a public controverſy, and procured young Cave the reputation of a writer.

His maſter died before his apprenticeſhip was expired, and he was not able to bear the perverſeneſs of his miſtreſs. He therefore quitted her houſe upon a ſtipulated allowance, and married a young widow with whom he lived at Bow. When his apprenticeſhip was over, he worked as a journeyman at the printing-houſe of Mr. Barber, a man much diſtinguiſhed and employed by the Tories, whoſe principles had at that time ſo much prevalence with Cave, that he was for ſome years a writer in Miſt's Journal; which, though he afterwards obtained, by his wife's intereſt, a ſmall place in the Poſt-office, he for ſome time continued. But as intereſt is powerful, and converſation, however mean, in time perſuaſive, he by degrees inclined to another party; in which, however, he was always moderate, though ſteady and determined.

When he was admitted into the Poſt-office he ſtill continued, at his intervals of attendance, to exerciſe his trade, or to employ himſelf with ſome typographical buſineſs. He corrected the Gradus ad Parnaſſum; and was liberally rewarded by the Company of Stationers. He wrote an Account of the Criminals, which had for ſome time a conſiderable ſale; and publiſhed many little pamphlets that accident brought into his hands, of which it would be very difficult to recover the memory. By the correſpondence which his place in the Poſt-office facilitated, he procured country news-papers, and ſold their intelligence to a Journaliſt in London, for a guinea a week.

He was afterwards raiſed to the office of clerk of the franks, in which he acted with great ſpirit and firmneſs; and often ſtopped franks, which were given by Members of Parliament to their friends; becauſe he thought ſuch extenſion of a peculiar right illegal. This raiſed many complaints, and having ſtopped, among others, a frank given to the old Dutcheſs of Marlborough by Mr. Walter Plummer, he was cited before the Houſe, as for breach of privilege, and accuſed, I ſuppoſe very unjuſtly, of opening letters to detect them. He was treated with great harſhneſs and ſeverity, but declining their queſtions by pleading his oath of ſecrecy, was at laſt diſmiſſed. And it muſt be recorded to his honour, that when he was ejected from his office, he did not think himſelf diſcharged from his truſt, but continued to refuſe to his neareſt friends any information about the management of the office.

By this conſtancy of diligence and diverſification of employment, he in time collected a ſum ſufficient for the purchaſe of a ſmall printing-office, and began the Gentleman's Magazine, a periodical pamphlet, of which the ſcheme is known wherever the Engliſh language is ſpoken. To this undertaking he owed the affluence in which he paſſed the laſt twenty years of his life; and the fortune which he left behind him, which though large, had been yet larger, had he not raſhly and wantonly impaired it by innumerable projects, of which I know not that ever one ſucceeded.

† In the beginning of the year 1782.

The Gentleman's Magazine, which has now ſubſiſted fifty-one years †, and ſtill continues to enjoy the favour of the world, is one of the moſt ſucceſsful and lucrative pamphlets which literary hiſtory has upon record, and therefore deſerves, in this narrative, particular notice.

Mr. Cave, when he formed the project, was far from expecting the ſucceſs which he found; and others had ſo little proſpect of its conſequence, that though he had for ſeveral years talked of his plan among Printers and Bookſellers, none of them thought it worth the trial. That they were not reſtrained by their virtue from the execution of another man's deſign, was ſufficiently apparent as ſoon as that deſign began to be gainful; for in a few years a multitude of magazines aroſe, and periſhed; only the London Magazine, ſupported by a powerful aſſociation of Bookſellers, and circulated with all the art, and all the cunning of trade, exempted itſelf from the general fate of Cave's invaders, and obtained, though not an equal, yet a conſiderable ſale.

Cave now began to aſpire to popularity; and being a greater lover of Poetry than any other art, he ſometimes offered ſubjects for Poems, and propoſed prizes for the beſt performers. The firſt prize was fifty pounds, for which, being but newly acquainted with wealth, and thinking the influence of fifty pounds extremely great, he expected the firſt authors of the kingdom to appear as competitors; and offered the allotment of the prize to the Univerſities. But when the time came, no name was ſeen among the writers that had been ever ſeen before; the Univerſities and ſeveral private men rejected the province of aſſigning the prize *. At all this Mr. Cave wondered for a while; but his natural judgment, and a wider acquaintance with the world, ſoon cured him of his aſtoniſhment, as of many other prejudices and errors. Nor have many men been ſeen raiſed by accident or induſtry to ſudden riches, that retained leſs of the meanneſs of their former ſtate.

* The determination was left to Dr. Cromwell Mortimer and Dr. Birch; and by the latter the award was made, which may be ſeen in Gent. Mag. vol. vi. p. 59.

He continued to improve his magazine, and had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing its ſucceſs proportionate to his diligence, till in the year 1751 his wife died of an aſthma. He ſeemed not at firſt much affected by her death, but in a few days loſt his ſleep and his appetite, which he never recovered; but after having lingered about two years, with many viciſſitudes of amendment and relapſe, fell by drinking acid liquors into a diarrhœa, and afterwards into a kind of lethargick inſenſibility, in which one of the laſt acts of reaſon which he exerted, was fondly to preſs the hand that is now writing this little narrative. He died on January 10, 1754, having juſt concluded the twenty-third annual collection.

He was a man of a large ſtature, not only tall but bulky, and was, when young, of remarkable ſtrength and activity. He was generally healthful, and capable of much labour and long application; but in the latter years of his life was afflicted with the gout, which he endeavoured to cure or alleviate by a total abſtinence both from ſtrong liquors and animal food. From animal food he abſtained about four years, and from ſtrong liquors much longer; but the gout continued unconquered, perhaps unabated.

His reſolution and perſeverance were very uncommon; in whatever he undertook, neither expence nor fatigue were able to repreſs him: but his conſtancy was calm, and, to thoſe who did not know him, appeared faint and languid, but he always went forward though he moved ſlowly.

The ſame chilneſs of mind was obſervable in his converſation: he was watching the minuteſt accent of thoſe whom he diſguſted by ſeeming inattention; and his viſitant was ſurprized when he came a ſecond time, by preparations to execute the ſcheme which he ſuppoſed never to have been heard.

He was, conſiſtently with this general tranquillity of mind, a tenacious maintainer, though not a clamorous demander of his right. In his youth having ſummoned his fellow journeymen to concert meaſures againſt the oppreſſion of their maſters, he mounted a kind of roſtrum, and harangued them ſo efficaciouſly, that they determined to reſiſt all future invaſions; and when the Stamp Officers demanded to ſtamp the laſt half ſheet of the Magazines, Mr. Cave alone defeated their claim, to which the proprietors of the rival Magazines would meanly have ſubmitted.

He was a friend rather eaſy and conſtant, than zealous and active; yet many inſtances might be given, where both his money and his diligence were employed liberally for others. His enmity was in like manner cool and deliberate; but though cool it was not inſidious, and though deliberate, not pertinacious.

His mental faculties were ſlow. He ſaw little at a time, but that little he ſaw with great exactneſs. He was long in finding the right, but ſeldom failed to find it at laſt. His affections were not eaſily gained, and his opinion not quickly diſcovered. His reſerve, as it might hide his faults, concealed his virtues: but ſuch he was, as they who beſt knew him, have moſt lamented (a).]

(a) Gentleman's Magazine, vol. xxiv. p. 55.

 [Beſides the pleaſure we have in adorning our work with a life written by Dr. Johnſon, we think that Edward Cave was otherwiſe worthy of a place in the Biographia, as the inventor of a new ſpecies of publication, which may be conſidered as ſomething of an epocha in the literary Hiſtory of this Country. The periodical performances before that time were almoſt wholly confined to political tranſactions, and to foreign and domeſtic occurrences. But the monthly Magazines have opened a way for every kind of inquiry and information. The intelligence and diſcuſſion contained in them are very extenſive and various; and they have been the means of diffuſing a general habit of reading through the nation, which, in a certain degree, hath enlarged the public underſtanding. Many young authors, who have afterwards riſen to conſiderable eminence in the literary world, have here made their firſt attempts in compoſition. Here, too, are preſerved a multitude of curious and uſeful hints, obſervations, and facts, which otherwiſe might have never appeared; or, if they had appeared in a more evaneſcent form, would have incurred the danger of being loſt. If it were not an invidious taſk, the hiſtory of them would be no incurious or unentertaining ſubject. The Magazines that unite utility with entertainment, are undoubtedly preferable to thoſe (if there have been any ſuch) which have only a view to idle and frivolous amuſement. It may be obſerved, that two of them, "The Gentleman's" and "The London," which laſt was begun the year after the former, have, amidſt their numerous rivals, preſerved their reputation to the preſent day. They have both of them, in general, joined inſtruction with pleaſure; and this, likewiſe, hath been the caſe with ſome others of a later origin.] K.

CAVEN-

CAVENDISH, or CANDISH (THOMAS), a famous Navigator in the XVIth Century, and the ſecond Engliſhman that ſailed round the world, was the ſon of William Cavendiſh of Trimley St. Martin [A], in the county of Suffolk, Eſquire (a). He was born at Trimley, where he had a fine ſeat, and large poſſeſſions (b): but having in a few years conſumed almoſt his whole eſtate in gallantry and following the Court, he thought to recover his ſinking fortune by a voyage to the South-Sea (c). At that time, the Spaniard, againſt whom England had ſome time before declared war, was looked upon as a formidable enemy, whom it was neceſſary to diſtreſs on every ſide: Mr. Cavendiſh, therefore, choſe to endeavour to do it on the ſide of America. For that purpoſe, he procured three ſhips; namely, The Deſire of one hundred and twenty tons; The Content of ſixty; and the Hugh Gallant, a bark of forty tons: two of them new built from the ſtocks. They carried in all, an hundred and twenty-three perſons of all ſorts; and had victuals ſufficient for two years, with all other neceſſaries, furniſhed by Mr. Cavendiſh himſelf; who was Admiral of this little fleet. They ſailed from Plymouth the 21ſt of July 1586; and, on the 26th of Auguſt, arrived at Sierra Leona, which was nine hundred and thirty leagues from the place of their departure (d). There they landed, and going up to one of the Negroes towns, burnt two or three houſes, and took what ſpoil they would, all the inhabitants being fled into the woods. But a few days after, the Negroes had their revenge, hurting many of the Engliſh, and killing one with a poiſoned arrow. They departed from Sierra Leona the 6th of September, and ſtaid till the 10th, at one of the Cape-Verd iſlands. The laſt day of October, about twenty-four leagues from Cape-Frio in Braſil, they fell in with a great mountain, which had a high round top like a town, with two little iſlands from it. On the 1ſt of November, they went in between the iſland of St. Sebaſtian and the main-land, where carrying their things aſhore, and erecting a forge, they built a pinnace, repaired what was out of order, and took in water; all which detained them till the 23d of that month. The 16th of December, they fell in with the coaſt of America in forty-ſeven degrees $\frac{1}{3}$ South Latitude, and ran along the ſhore till they came into forty-eight degrees, finding it a ſteep beach all along. They came to a harbour the next day, which Mr. Cavendiſh named Port-Deſire; and continued in it until the 28th following (e). On the 3d of January 1586-7, they fell in with a great Cape in fifty-two degrees, forty-five minutes; from which there runneth a low beach about a league to the Southward, that reaches to the opening of the Streights of Magellan. He was paſſing thoſe Streights, from the 6th of January to the 24th of February [B], though they are but about ninety leagues in length (f). Within them, in fifty-three degrees latitude, he named a place Port-Famine [C]; another Muſcle-Cove; and another, Elizabeth-Bay. The 24th of February, they entered into the South-Sea; and the four firſt days of March met with a violent ſtorm: during which, the Hugh Gallant had like to have been loſt, but the two other ſhips rode it out at the iſland of La Mocha. Here, ſome of the men going on ſhore, met with a warm reception from the Indians of (a) The Peerage of England, &c. by Ar. Collins, Eſq; edit. 1735, 8vo. vol. i. p. 121.

(b) Ibid. and Stow's Annales, edit. 1631, p. 809.

(c) The Naval Hiſt. of England, by T. Lediard, edit. p. 229.

(d) Voyages, Navigations, &c. publiſhed by R. Hakluyt, vol. iii. edit. 1600, p. 803.

(e) Ib. p. 804, 805.

(f) Ib. p. 806, 807.

(g) Ibid. p. 809, 810.

[A] Was the ſon of William Cavendiſh of Trimley St. Martin.] That ancient family derives its deſcent from the Gernons, whoſe anceſtor Robert de Gernon came into England with William the Conqueror. Roger de Gernon was ſeated at Grimſton-Hall in Suffolk, and died in 1318, the 11th of Edward II. having had to wife the daughter and heir of John Potton, Lord of Cavendiſh in Suffolk, by whom he left iſſue four ſons, who all took the name of Cavendiſh. Roger the ſecond, married Alice, daughter of Geoffrey de Stratton, with whom he had the manor of Stratton, and from him deſcended Sir Richard Cavendiſh, Captain and Governor of Blackneſs, who was knighted in Scotland by the Earl of Hertford, Sept. 23, 1546, and by inquiſition the 6th of February 1552, the 6th of Edward VI. after the death of Henry Duke of Suffolk, (who died without iſſue, July 14, the 5th of Edward VI.) was found to be ſixty years of age, and was one of his coheirs, viz. ſon of Richard Cavendiſh, ſon of Auguſtine Cavendiſh, who married Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Sir William Brandon, Knight, grandfather of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk. This Sir Richard Cavendiſh had iſſue William Cavendiſh, of Trimley St. Martin, who died in 1572, poſſeſſed of the ancient inheritance of his anceſtors; namely, Grinſton, Stratton, and other manors, leaving Thomas his ſon and heir under age, whom we treat of in this article (1).

(1) Ar. Collins, ubi ſupra; and The Britiſh Compendium, by F. Nicholls, 7th edit. P. i. p. 107, 108.

[B] He was paſſing thoſe Streights, from the 6th of January to the 24th of February.] The mouth of them, both on the eaſtern and weſtern ſides, lies between 52 and 53 degrees of latitude. But they are very winding; the ſouthermoſt point of them, called Cape Froward, ſtanding in near 54 degrees of latitude. The beſt and moſt accurate deſcription of them, is in Sir John Narbrough's Voyages. Lond. 1694, 8*vo.* reprinted ſince.

[C] He named a place Port-Famine.] By reaſon of above three hundred Spaniards having been famiſhed, or ſtarved to death, there. For one Don Sarmiento having paſſed through the Streights of Magellan from the South-Sea, in the year 1579, did, at his return to Spain, perſuade King Philip II. to ſend two Colonies to plant in and fortify the Streights of Magellan, in order to prevent and obſtruct the Navigations, Depredations, or Settlements of the Engliſh and Dutch in thoſe parts (2). Accordingly, four hundred Spaniards were ſent thither in 1584, who built a town, which they called King Philip's city. But during the two years they were there they could not get any thing to grow, or thrive. And, on the other ſide, the Indians oftentimes preyed upon them; ſo that the ſtock of proviſions they brought from Spain growing ſhort, and having no means to renew it, they died for hunger in their houſes, and even in their clothes. At length the whole town being thereby tainted, and rendered unwholſome, the poor remains of the four hundred, which were now reduced to twenty-one men and two women, forſook the place, and taking only a fowling-piece, and what little furniture they could carry, marched along the ſea-ſide, and lived above a year upon muſcles, limpets, roots, leaves, and ſometimes a fowl they killed, or a deer; and in that miſerable condition Mr. Cavendiſh found them (3).

(2) See An Account of ſeveral late Voyages and Diſcoveries to the South and North, &c. by Sir John Narbrough, &c. Introduct. p. vii. edit. 1694, 8vo.

(3) Hakluyt, ubi ſupra, p. 806.

Arauco,

Arauco, a country abounding with gold, and never conquered by the Spaniards. The 16th of the ſame month, they came to St. Mary's iſland, and finding there large quantities of wheat and barley laid up in ſtore-houſes, for the uſe of the Spaniards who are maſters of that place, they took ſome of the corn, and likewiſe hogs, fowls, potatoes, and other proviſions. They left this iſland on the 18th; anchored under another called the Conception on the 19th; and on the 30th, came into the Bay of Quintero, which ſtands in thirty-three degrees, fifty minutes South Latitude. About fifty or ſixty of the men landed the next day, and went up ſeven or eight miles into the country, well armed; but ſaw no human creatures, though there were two hundred Spaniſh horſemen watching for them, who eſpied them out, but durſt not attack them. The day following, being April 1, they took their opportunity, and came pouring down from the hills upon a few unprepared and unarmed Engliſh Sailors, who were filling water. Some they killed, and took a few priſoners, about twelve being loſt in all: the reſt were reſcued by fifteen Soldiers, who obliged the enemy to retire with the loſs of twenty-four men. The 5th day of April, they ſailed from this place, and on the 15th, came to an excellent harbour in twenty-three degrees and a half, called Morro Moreno [D]. Whilſt they remained here, they took a ſmall bark from Arica, which they kept and called the George. They took alſo three other veſſels (one of them laden with wine): two of which they burnt, and ſunk the third (g). On the 13th of May, they made themſelves maſters of a ſhip of three hundred tons; and of two others, loaden with ſugar, and proviſions, of which one was valued at twenty thouſand pounds: they took out what they wanted, and burnt the reſt, with the ſhips. The 20th of the ſame month, they came to Paita, in five degrees, four minutes South Latitude. Having driven the inhabitants up into the mountains, they pillaged the town (where they found twenty-five pounds weight of pieces of eight) and then ſet it on fire; with a bark that was riding in the road. The town contained two hundred houſes. Sailing thence, they arrived on the 25th, at the iſland of Puna, in one degree South Latitude, where moſt of the cables in the South-Sea were made. They found in the harbour a ſhip of two hundred and fifty tons, which they ſunk: and alſo burnt a church that was in that iſland, and brought the bells away. The Governor of the iſland, upon their approach, had ſent his riches upon the Continent; and his furniture and other valuable effects, to a neighbouring iſle; which laſt being diſcovered, the Engliſh took of them what they liked. But, on the 2d of June, they being careleſsly diſperſed about in getting proviſions, a hundred Spaniſh Soldiers and many Indians came down ruſhing upon them, killed five, took three priſoners, and four were otherwiſe deſtroyed; with the loſs, however of forty-ſix Spaniards and Indians (h). Going aſhore again the ſame day, with ſeventy men, they met a hundred Spaniards armed with muſkets, and two hundred Indians with bows and arrows, whom they put to flight; reduced their town to aſhes, which had three hundred houſes; made havock of their fields and gardens; and burnt four great ſhips, which were on the ſtocks. The 5th of June, they quitted this place, and watered at Rio Dolce: and by that time, had loſt ſo many men, that they were obliged to ſink their bark, called the Hugh Gallant, for want of hands to navigate it. They paſſed the Equinoctial Line on the 12th, and continued a northerly courſe all the reſt of that month. The firſt of July, they came within ſight of the coaſt of New Spain, being then in ten degrees Northern Latitude: and, on the 9th of the ſame month, took a new ſhip of one hundred and twenty tons, out of which taking the men, and what elſe they wanted, they ſet it on fire. The next day, they ſeized an advice-boat, which they alſo burnt. On the 26th, they came to an anchor in the river of Copalita, in ſixteen degrees Northern Latitude: whence, the ſame night, thirty of them rowed in the pinnace to Aquapulco, that was two leagues off. Coming there, the next morning, July 27, by break of day, they landed, and burnt the town, with the church, and cuſtom-houſe, in which were ſix hundred bags of anile to dye cloth, each bag worth forty crowns; and four hundred bags of cocoa, valued at ten crowns each. They were joined, the day following, by the reſt of the fleet, which found it difficult to water at Copalita, and therefore proceeded for that purpoſe to the Bay of St. Jago, in nineteen degrees, eighteen minutes Latitude. In the mean time, Mr. Cavendiſh went, on the 24th of Auguſt, in his pinnace, with thirty men, to Puerto de Natividad; and miſſing of a

(g) Ibid. p. 808, 809, 810.

(h) Ibid. p. 811, 812, 813.

[D] Called Morro Moreno.] About thirty of the Engliſh went here on ſhore; and, at their landing, the natives of the place came down from the rocks to meet them, with freſh water and wood on their backs. The account they give of their cuſtoms and manners, is as follows, and may ſerve for a ſample of the manners of ſeveral American nations. 'They are in 'great awe of the Spaniards, and very ſimple people, 'and live in an extremely ſavage manner. They 'brought us to their abodes, about two miles from 'the harbour, where we ſaw their women and lodging, which is nothing but the ſkin of ſome beaſt 'laid upon the ground; and over them, inſtead of 'houſes, is nothing but five or ſix ſticks laid acroſs, 'which ſtand upon two forks with ſticks on the 'ground, and a few boughs laid on. Their diet is 'raw fiſh, which ſtinketh moſt vilely. And when 'any of them die, they bury their bows and arrows 'with them, with their canoe, and all that they 'have: for we opened one of their graves, and ſaw 'the order of them (4).'

(4) Hakluyt, ubi ſupra, p. 809.

prize he expected to find there, he burnt the town, and two new ſhips of two hundred tons each. The 3d of September, they came into the Bay of Malacca, and going up into the country, burnt the town of Acatlan, which conſiſted of about thirty houſes. Thence they proceeded to Chaccalla, and the iſle of St. Andrew; and, on the 24th, arrived at Maſſatlan, which ſtands under the Tropic of Cancer. The 27th, they went to an iſland near it, where they refitted, and furniſhed themſelves with neceſſaries. Having ſtaid there till the 9th of October, they departed for the Cape of St. Lucar, on the South of the iſland of California; with which they fell in, on the 14th, and lay near it till the 4th of November. On that day, they met the St. Anne, a ſhip of ſeven hundred tons, being the Spaniſh Admiral of the South-Sea; which, after three ſharp engagements, they made themſelves maſters of. It had in it an hundred and twenty thouſand pezo's, or pieces of gold, each worth eight ſhillings, and great quantities of rich ſilks, and other valuable commodities, the chief of which they ſhared amongſt themſelves. After having put on ſhore (at Puerto Seguro) the whole crew, conſiſting of an hundred and ninety perſons, they ſet fire to the ſhip, having five hundred tons of goods in it, and ſaw it burnt down to the water, on the 19th of November (i). Thus did Mr. Cavendiſh, and his company, ravage the coaſts of Chili, Peru, and New Spain, from the middle of February to the middle of November 1587. But after his laſt great booty, he began to think of returning back to England, by the way of the Eaſt-Indies. Accordingly, he ſet ſail from Puerto Seguro in California, November the 19th; and in forty-five days, namely, on the 3d of January 1587-8, came within ſight of Guana, one of the Ladrones iſland, in thirteen degrees $\frac{2}{3}$ of Northern Latitude. The 14th of the ſame month, they fell in with Cabo del Spirito Santo, a promontory of one of the Philippine iſlands, three hundred and ten leagues from Guana; and, the next day, arrived at Capul, where Mr. Cavendiſh ſtaid nine days: during which, he exacted a tribute of proviſions from the Caciques of this, and a hundred iſlands more. But, after having acquainted them, that he and his company were Engliſhmen, and enemies to the Spaniards; and made them promiſe, That they, and all the neighbouring iſlands, would aſſiſt him, whenever he ſhould come again, to overcome the Spaniards, he returned them the value of their tribute in money (k). The 24th, they left this place, and ſailing between the iſlands of Panama (or Panay) and Negros, they coaſted along Gilolo, and the adjoining cluſters of iſlands, till the 1ſt of March; when having paſſed the Streights of Java, they anchored South of that place, and took in freſh proviſions. On the 16th of March, they ſailed from hence for the Cape of Good Hope, which they made the 16th of May; having in nine weeks run about eighteen hundred and fifty leagues. They arrived at St. Helena the 19th of June, where having refreſhed themſelves, and taken in neceſſaries, they ſet ſail, on the 20th, for England. The 24th of Auguſt, they came within ſight of the Azores; and the 9th of September, after a terrible ſtorm, which carried away moſt of their ſails, arrived at Plymouth, from whence they firſt ſet out (l), having ſpent two years, one month, and nineteen days, in ſailing round the globe. Mr. Cavendiſh had been ſo fortunate in this voyage, that he undertook another in 1591, but with very different ſucceſs. He ſet ſail from Plymouth the 26th of Auguſt, with three tall ſhips, and two barks [E]; and in about a month, came within ſight of the Canary iſlands (m). But, under the Equinoctial Line, he had the misfortune to be becalmed for ſeven and twenty days together, driving to and fro without the leaſt wind; in which time moſt of his men fell ſick of the ſcurvy. At length, a North-weſt wind brought them, in twenty days (n), namely, on the 29th of November, to the Bay of Salvador, on the coaſt of Braſil. Here they took a ſmall bark, laden with negroes, ſugar, and haberdaſhers-wares. A few days after, they came to Placentia, or Ilha Grande, where they rifled ſome houſes inhabited by Portugueſe; which they afterwards ſet on fire, together with a new ſhip: and left on ſhore the negroes they had taken in the Bay of Salvador (o). But the pleaſure, or advantage, of having taken this place, was ſpoiled by unreaſonable quarrels amongſt Mr. Cavendiſh's men [F]. The 11th of December, they quitted this place, and on the 14th, arrived at the iſle of Sebaſtian, five leagues from Santos; which laſt place they reſolved to make themſelves maſters of, as being very proper to ſupply all their wants. Having agreed, that their long boat, with one ſloop, and a hundred men, were ſufficient for the taking it, they accordingly watched their opportunity, early in the morning on the 24th of December, when the chief of the (k) Ib. p. 816—819.

(i) Ibid. p. 814, 815, 816. They burnt and ſunk nineteen ſhips in all, ſmall and great. Ibid. p. 837.

(l) Ib. p. 819—825.

(m) Purchas's Pilgrimes, P. iv. edit. 1625, p. 1202.

(n) Ibid. and Hakluyt, ubi ſupra, p. 842.

(o) Purchas, ubi ſupra.

[E] With three tall ſhips, and two barks.] Namely, The Galeon, wherein Mr. Cavendiſh himſelf went as Admiral: The Roe-buck, Vice-Admiral, Capt. Cocke: The Deſire, Rear-Admiral, Capt. John Davis: The Black Pinnace: And a Bark of Mr. Adrian Gilbert, commanded by Capt. Randolph Cotton (5). To which add, The Dainty, that went volunteer, and returned to England, after the taking of Santos.

(5) Hakluyt, as above, 842.

(6) A. Knivet, in Purchas's Pilgrimes, Part iv. p. 1202.

[F] By unreaſonable quarrels amongſt Mr. Cavendiſh's men.] One of them gives us this account (6). 'Here we had ſuch diſorder amongſt ourſelves, that 'if the Portugueze had been of any courage, they 'might have killed many of us; for our men would 'fight for their victuals as if they had been no Chriſ-'tians but Jews; and they that got the beſt, would 'get them into ſome hole, or into the wilderneſs un-'der ſome tree, and there they would remain as long 'as they had meat. For mine own part, there was 'ſuch ſharking, I could in that place get neither meat 'nor money.'

inhabitants

inhabitants were at high-maſs [G], and with twenty-three men only ſeized the town (p). There they continued too long [H], which proved the ruin of their intended voyage. Nay, ſome were for wintering at that place, but Mr. Cavendiſh would by no means agree to it. So, after having burnt the out-parts of the town, and ſet all the ſhips in the harbour on fire, they marched, on the 22d of January, by land to St. Vincent, which they burnt to the ground (q). On the 24th of the ſame month, they ſet ſail with a fair wind for the Streights of Magellan; but, in about thirty-ſeven degrees of Southern Latitude, they had a moſt violent ſtorm [I], which began the 7th of February and laſted till the 9th, whereby the ſhips were ſeparated and much damaged. The Deſire and the Roebuck, after having ſuffered great hardſhips, arrived together at Port-Deſire, the general rendezvous, on the 6th of March. The 16th of the ſame month, the Black-pinnace came alſo thither; but Mr. Gilbert's Bark, inſtead of proceeding ſo far, returned to England. As for the Galeon, commanded by Mr. Cavendiſh, it did not arrive till the 18th (r); the Captain having in his paſſage been in continual danger from his ſhip's crew, which never ceaſed to mutiny againſt him (s). For that reaſon, he quitted his own ſhip, the Galeon, and went into the Deſire. The 20th of March, they departed from Port-Deſire; and on the 8th of April fell in with the Streights of Magellan, having ſuffered much by ſeveral violent ſtorms. The 14th, they paſſed the firſt Streight; and on the 16th, the ſecond, which was ten leagues diſtant from the firſt. The 18th, they doubled Cape Froward; but, three days after, were forced by the violence of the weather to put into a ſmall bay, upon the South ſhore, where they remained till the 15th of May (t). In this place they endured inexpreſſible hardſhips, as well for want of proviſions, as by the exceſſive cold [K]: and Mr. Cavendiſh not being able to provide for the many ſick men he had in the Galeon, ordered them to be put on ſhore; where they miſerably periſhed with cold and famine. Having now not above fifty men in that ſhip fit for ſervice (for forty died in ſeven or eight days, and ſeventy fell ſick) and perceiving that the froſt and ſnow decayed his tackling, and was likely to laſt two months more, he found it abſolutely impoſſible to ſtay longer in that miſerable place, without utter ruin. Whereupon he acquainted his company, That, finding it impracticable to purſue his voyage to China, as he intended, through the Streights of Magellan, he would go thither by the Cape of Good Hope. But they prevailed upon him to return to the coaſts of Braſil, till a more favourable ſeaſon; which he the more readily complied with, as he had not above four months proviſions left, and wanted both ropes and ſails (u). The 15th of May they ſet ſail, and on the 18th were out of the ſtreights. The 20th, being over-againſt Port-Deſire, in forty-ſeven degrees

(p) Purchas, p. 1202, 1203; and Hakluyt, ubi ſupra.

(q) Purchas, p. 1203, 1204; and Hakluyt, ubi ſupra.

(r) Hakluyt, ubi ſupra; and Purchas, p. 1192, 1193.

(s) Purchas, p. 1192.

(t) Hakluyt, as above, p. 843.

(u) Purchas, ubi ſupra, p. 1181.

[G] They watched their opportunity,——when the chief of the inhabitants were at high-maſs, and with twenty-three men only ſeized the town.] Upon their landing, they marched directly to the Church; where, beſides women and children, there were three hundred men, whoſe ſwords they took from them without reſiſtance. They kept them priſoners there, till the long boat could come with more men, to their aſſiſtance. And then they plundered the town, where they found great ſtore of gold, ſugar, and caſſavy-meal, of which they made very good bread. One of the ſailors in particular met with a little cheſt, in a friar's cell, in which there were 1700 rials of eight, worth four ſhillings a piece. The conductor in this expedition was Captain Cocke: and as for the moſt convenient time for landing, they had the direction of a Portugueze pilot which they had on board. But by not watching carefully enough the inhabitants, moſt of them removed, with their beſt effects, up into the country. So that Mr. Cavendiſh, and his company, did not make ſo much advantage by the taking of this place, as, with due care, they might otherwiſe have done (7).

(7) Purchas, as above, p. 1203; and Hakluyt, ubi ſupra, p. 842.

[H] There they continued too long.] Ant. Knivet ſays, that they continued two months at Santos (8): But by the journal of this voyage, written by John Jane (9), it appears, that they continued at Santos, only from the 15th of December to the 22d of January. However, by this unneceſſary delay they loſt the proper ſeaſon for purſuing their voyage into the South-ſea.

(8) See in Purchas, ubi ſupra, p. 1203.

(9) Publiſhed by Hakluyt, ubi ſupra, vol. iii. p. 842.

[I] They had a moſt violent ſtorm.] 'Which indeed, 'to uſe his own words (10)] I think to be ſuch, as 'worſer might not be indured.——Such was the furie 'of the weſt-ſouth-weſt, and ſouth-weſt windes, as 'wee were driven from the ſhore foure hundred 'leagues, and conſtrained to beate from fiftie de-'grees to the ſouthward into fortie to the northward 'again, before we could recover nere the ſhore. In 'which time, we had a new ſhift of ſailes cleane 'blowne away, and our ſhip in danger to ſinke in the 'ſea three times: which with extremitie of mens 'labour we recovered. In this weakneſſe wee de-'parted for the Straits, being from that harbour eight 'leagues, and in eighteene days wee got the Straits. '——And now we had been almoſt foure moneths 'betweene the coaſt of Braſile and the Straits, being 'in diſtance not above ſix hundred leagues, which is 'commonly run in twentie or thirtie days: but ſuch 'was the adverſeneſſe of our fortunes, that in com-'ing thither wee ſpent the ſummer, and found in the 'Straits the beginning of a moſt extreme winter, 'not durable for Chriſtians (11).' In this ſtorm Mr. Cavendiſh loſt his boat with three men: the Roebuck likewiſe loſt her boat with two men: and the Crow, a boat of twenty ton, ſunk with twelve men and a boy (12).

(10) In his Letter to Sir Triſtram Gorges. See Purchas, ubi ſupra, p. 1192.

(11) Purchas, ibi p. 1192, 1193.

(12) Ib. p. 1204.

[K] They endured inexpreſſible hardſhips, as well for want of proviſions, as by the exceſſive cold.] After the month of May was come in, there was 'nothing 'but ſuch flights of ſnow, and extremities of froſts, as '(ſaith he) in all the time of my life, I never ſaw any 'to be compared with them (13). The men were 'well in the morning, and by night frozen to death.' One of them, in particular, named Antony Knivet, going a ſhore to get ſome food, (for the allowance of their ſhip was little) and coming aboard again with his feet wet, and wanting ſhift of clothes, the next morning he was numbed, ſo that he could not ſtir his legs. All his feet were as black as ſoot: he had no feeling in them; and when he pulled off his ſtockings his toes came with them. Another——Harris, a goldſmith, loſt his noſe; for going to blow it with his fingers, he caſt it into the fire. In a word, out of Mr. Cavendiſh's ſhip, there died eight or nine men with the cold every day. And as to proviſions, they had not more than for four months; ſo that, to ſave their victuals, they were forced in a great meaſure to live upon ſea-weeds, muſcles, penguins, and the fruits of the country (14).

(13) See Purchas, p. 1193. When it is ſummer with us, it is winter in thoſe parts where Mr. Cavendiſh then was.

(14) Purchas, as above, p. 1181. 1204, 1205. 'Many of the 'men died with 'curſed famine, 'and miſerable 'cold, not having 'wherewith to 'cover their bo-'dies, nor to fill 'their bellies.' Jane's Journal, in Hakluyt, as above, p. 843.

Southern

Southern Latitude, the Deſire and the Black-Pinnace left him [L] which proved the chief cauſe of his enſuing misfortunes (w). However, he held on his courſe for Braſil, together with the Roe-buck; which in Latitude thirty-ſix, was parted from him by a moſt violent ſtorm [M]. Mr. Cavendiſh arrived at length, with extreme difficulty and great danger, at Santos, and came to an anchor in the Bay of St. Vincent. Here, twenty-five of his men going on ſhore to refreſh themſelves, got drunk, and were all cut to pieces by the Indians and Portugueſe. To be revenged on the Portugueſe, Mr. Cavendiſh firmly reſolved to go and beat Santos to the ground (having the Roebuck in his company, which was now come in) but the river being too narrow, he only landed a little above the town, and plundered ſome farm-houſes. He intended to have gone from thence to a ſmall iſland, twenty leagues off, in order to furniſh himſelf with neceſſaries; and then caſting off the Roebuck, whoſe wants he could not ſupply, to have returned again at a ſeaſonable time for the Streights of Magellan (x). In the mean time, being adviſed by a Portugueſe pilot to go to Spirito Santo, he raſhly ſent and attacked that place, before which he loſt fourſcore men, and forty were ſorely wounded. When he ſaw he could do no good there, he determined to go to the iſland of St. Sebaſtian; and, after having burnt one of his ſhips for want of hands, to go back to the Streights of Magellan. But the Roebuck's crew hearing of this his intention, ran away from him in the night [N], carrying off all his Surgeons, and leaving him full of ſick men, and in a diſtreſſed condition (y). Thus forſaken he made for St. Sebaſtian's iſland, then two hundred leagues diſtant, where he arrived when he had but one caſk of water left. There he ſet twenty ſick men on ſhore. Having refitted and refreſhed himſelf, he would fain have ſailed back again for the Streights of Magellan: but his mutinous crew obliged him to ſail for England, 'Though he rather deſired to die in going forward than baſely in returning 'back again (z).' Several attempts he made to reach the iſle of St. Helena, and all to no purpoſe, being perpetually croſſed by his own men, who were bent upon returning to England, though entirely againſt his own inclination (a). At length he died of a broken heart, and continual labour and vexation; but whether at ſea or land, is uncertain [O]. Such (w) Hakluyt, ubi ſupra, p. 843, 844. Purchas, p. 1194.

(x) Purchas, as above, p. 1194, 1195, 1196, 1197. 1205, 1206.

(y) Ibid. p. 1198. 1206.

(z) Ibid. p. 1198. 1200.

(a) Ibid. p. 1199, 1200.

[L] The Deſire and the Black-Pinnace left him.] This, Mr. Cavendiſh imputed to the treachery of Capt. John Davis, commander of the Deſire, of whom he ſpeaks in the ſevereſt terms. 'And now, ſaith 'he, to come to that villaine that hath beene the 'death of me, and the decay of this wholè action, I 'meane Davis, whoſe only treacherie in running 'from me, hath beene an utter ruine of all.——As 'I ſince underſtood Davis his intention was ever to 'run away. This is God's will, that I ſhould put 'him in truſt, that ſhould be the end of my life, and 'the decay of the whole action. For had not theſe 'two ſmall ſhips parted from us, we would not have 'miſcarried on the coaſt of Braſile; for the only de'cay of us was, that we could not get into their 'barred harbours.——The ſhort of all is this, Da'vis his only intent was to overthrow me, which he 'hath well perform'd (15.)' In Hakluyt (16), there is a teſtimonial of the company of the Deſire, touching their loſing of their General, Mr. Cavendiſh; wherein they declare, that it was utterly againſt their will. It is dated in Port-Deſire, 2 June, 1592, and therein they 'proteſt they know not, whether they 'loſt the others, or they them.' However, they were as unfortunate as their General. Thrice they paſſed through the Straights of Magellan, and entered the South-Sea, and yet were forced back each time by bad weather. At length, after numberleſs misfortunes and diſtreſſes, their men being reduced to ſixteen, and of them only five fit for ſervice, they arrived the 11th of June 1593, at Bear-haven in Ireland. The Black-Pinnace was loſt in the South-Sea (17).

(15) Purchas, ib. p. 1192, 1194.

(16) Vol. iii. p. 845.

(17) Ibid. p. 846—852.

[M] Was parted from him by a moſt violent ſtorm.] 'The moſt grievous ſtorm (as he ſaith himſelf) that 'ever any Chriſtian endured upon the ſeas, to live '(18).'

(18) Purchas, p. 1194.

[N] But the Roebuck's crew hearing of this his intention, ran away from him in the night.] Of which he gives the following account. 'They inſtantly de'ſired nothing more, than to return home; all affirm'ing, that it was pity ſuch a ſhip [as the Roebuck] 'ſhould be caſt off. But in truth, it was not of any 'care of the ſhip, but only of a moſt cowardly mind 'of the maſter, and the chiefeſt of the company to 'return home. Now you ſhall underſtand, that the 'captain was very ſick, and ſince the time that the 'ſhip loſt her maſts, ſhe became the moſt labourſome 'ſhip that ever did ſwim on the ſea, ſo as he was not 'able to endure in her, and at that preſent he lay 'aboard my ſhip, ſo as there was none of any truſt, 'or account, left in her. But ſuch was the caſe of 'that ſhip, being without ſails, maſts, or any man'ner of tackle, as in the ſenſe and judgment of any 'man living, there did not live that deſperate minded 'man in the world, which, in that caſe ſhe was 'then in, would have ventur'd to have ſailed in her, 'half ſo far as England.——Theſe villains, having 'left in my ſhip all their hurt men, and having 'aboard of them both my ſurgeons, I having not 'one in mine own ſhip which knew how to lay a 'plaiſter to a wound, much leſs to cure any by 'ſalves; and farther, having in their ſhip three 'times the proportion of my victuals,——as having 'in them, at their departure, but ſix and forty men, 'and carrying away with them the proportion for ſix 'months victual of one hundred and twenty men at 'large; I leave you to conſider of this part of theirs, 'and the miſerable caſe I was left in (19).'

(19) Ibid. p. 1198.

[O] But whether at ſea or land, is uncertain.] We know for certain, that he came as far as eight degrees northern latitude in his way towards England: But that he came nearer, there is no evidence. He ſent an account of his misfortunes to Sir Triſtram Gorges, whom he appointed his executor: but doth not mention when, nor at what place, he wrote it. Nor is it known how it was conveyed to England (20). By ſome paſſages therein, it appears, that he was very near death; for it begins thus. 'Moſt loving friend, 'There is nothing in this world, that makes a truer 'triall of friendſhip, than at death, to ſhew mindful'neſſe of love and friendſhip, which now you ſhall 'make a perfect experience of: deſiring you to hold 'my love as deare, dying poore, as if I had beene 'moſt infinitely rich. The ſucceſſe of this moſt unfor'tunate action, the bitter torments thereof lye ſo hea'vie upon mee, as with much paine am I able to write 'theſe few lines, much leſſe to make diſcoverie unto 'you of all the adverſe haps, that have befallen me 'in this voyage, the leaſt whereof is my death (21).' And lower, he hath theſe expreſſions:—'But now I 'am growne ſo weake and faint, as I am ſcarcely able 'to hold the penne in my hand; wherefore I muſt 'leave you to inquire of the reſt of our moſt unhappy 'proceedings (22).'——'And now by this, what 'with griefe for him, [the loſs of his couſin John 'Lock],

(20) It is inſerted in Purchas's Pilgrimes, P. iv. edit. 1625, P. 1192.

(21) Ibid. P. 1192.

(22) Ibid. P. 1200.

Such was the end of the unfortunate Thomas Cavendiſh: his firſt voyage was as full of glory, as this of unhappineſs. No man before him ever compaſſed the globe in ſo little time; no man ever did greater things abroad, and returned to his country in greater pomp and triumph than he: and it is not unlikely, that he might have ſhone this laſt time as brightly as he did the firſt, had not the ill humours of a company of baſe fellows interpoſed and eclipſed him (b). We are informed, that 'he was of a delicate wit and perſonage (c).'

(b) See Harris's Collection of Voyages, &c. edit. 1705, fol. vol. i. p. 698.

(c) Stowe's Annales, ubi ſupra.

'Lock], and the continuall trouble I indured among 'ſuch hel-hounds [his ſhip's crew], my ſpirits were 'cleane ſpent; wiſhing myſelf upon any deſart place 'in the world, there to dye, rather than thus baſely 'to returne home againe: which courſe I had put in 'execution, had I found an iſland, which the charts 'make to be in eight degrees to the ſouthward of the 'Line. I ſweare to you, I ſought it with all dili-'gence, meaning (if I had found it) to have there 'ended my unfortunate life. But God ſuffered not 'ſuch happineſſe to light upon me, for I could by no 'meanes find it, ſo as I was forced to go towards Eng-'land; and having gotten eight degrees by north the 'Line, I loſt my moſt deareſt couſin.' He concludes the whole thus, 'Beare with this ſcribling: for I 'proteſt, I am ſcant able to hold a pen in my hand (23)'. It is likely that he died at ſea; and that this letter was brought by his ſhip, the Galeon, which, in all probability, reached England. M.

(23) Ibid. p. 1200, 1201.

CAVENDISH (Sir WILLIAM) a great favourite and Privy-Counſellor of three Princes, viz. Henry VIII. Edward VI. and Queen Mary. He was the ſecond ſon of Thomas Cavendiſh, of Cavendiſh in the county of Suffolk, Clerk of the Pipe in the reign of Henry VIII (a), and was born about the year 1505, being deſcended of very ancient and honourable families both by his father and mother, as appears by unqueſtionable authorities [A]. He had a liberal education given him by his father, who ſettled upon him alſo certain lands in the county of Suffolk, but made a much better proviſion for him, by procuring him to be admitted into the family of the great Cardinal Wolſey, upon whoſe perſon he waited in quality of Gentleman-Uſher of his chamber, at a time when he lived with all the ſtate and dignity of a Prince, having a retinue of no leſs than eight hundred perſons, and amongſt them nine or ten Lords, who had each of them two at leaſt if not three ſervants allowed them at the Cardinal's coſt, and the Earl of Derby had no leſs than five (b). As Mr. Cavendiſh was the Cardinal's countryman, and the Cardinal had a great kindneſs for his father, he took him early into his confidence, and ſhewed him, upon all occaſions, very particular marks of kindneſs and reſpect. In 1527, he attended his maſter in his ſplendid embaſſy to France, where he arrived at Amiens in the month of Auguſt, and was preſent at that moſt magnificent entertainment, which was given by the French King to the Cardinal, and at all the following feaſts that laſted for fourteen days (c). He was from thence diſpatched to Compeigne to prepare his maſter's lodgings, where one ſide of the caſtle was entirely aſſigned to the uſe of the Cardinal, and the other reſerved for the King; and in like manner, the gallery which united the apartments was divided between them (d). He returned with that great Prelate into England, and ſerved him with the utmoſt zeal and fidelity, as well in his diſgrace as when in the higheſt favour; and was one of the few ſervants that ſtuck cloſe to him, when he had neither office nor ſalary to beſtow upon them (e). This was ſo far from prejudicing him in the opinion of his Sovereign, that on this very account he took particular notice of him, and gave him ſingular intimations of his grace and favour; and after the Cardinal's death, upon whom Mr. Cavendiſh waited to the laſt, and delayed going to Court till he had ſeen his body interred, the King took him into his own family

(a) Madox, Baron. Angl. p. 105. Weaver's Funeral Monuments, p. 693.

(b) Life of Cardinal Wolſey, by our author, p. 19, 20.

(c) Stowe's Annals, p. 532. Cavendiſh's Life of Wolſey, p. 49.

(d) Herbert's Hiſt. of the Reign of Henry VIII. p. 84. Cavendiſh's Life of Wolſey, p. 58.

(e) Ibid. in the Prologue; or, as it ſtands in the printed edition, the Dedication.

[A] As appears by unqueſtionable authorities.] The ſurname of this family was originally Gernon, and they deſcended lineally from Robert de Gernon, a Norman, who came over with the Conqueror (1); and whoſe deſcendant Roger Gernon of Grimſton-Hall in the county of Suffolk, marrying the daughter and ſole heireſs of John Potton, Lord of Cavendiſh, or as it was anciently written Caundiſh, in the ſame county, in the reign of Edward II. had by her four ſons, John, Roger, Stephen, and Richard, who all took the name of Cavendiſh, as was uſual enough in thoſe times (2). From the eldeſt of theſe ſons, John Cavendiſh, who was Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench (3), our Sir William Cavendiſh deſcended in a direct line; for the ſon of this Judge, Sir John Cavendiſh, who was knighted for killing Wat Tyler (4), had three ſons, William, Robert, and Walter. William, the eldeſt of theſe, left behind him an only ſon, Thomas, who inherited both his father's and his uncle Robert's eſtate, who was a Serjeant at Law (5): he married Catherine Scudamore, and was ſtiled Thomas Cavendiſh of Cavendiſh and Poſlingford in the county of Suffolk. He departed this life in 1477, and left behind him an only ſon, Thomas Cavendiſh of Cavendiſh, the father of our Sir William (6). He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Laws, and by the intereſt of the Howard family, was brought into the Exchequer (7), where he became Clerk of the Pipe, as is mentioned in the text: he married Alice, the daughter and coheireſs of John Smith of Padbrook-Hall, an old family, and in which there was a good eſtate (8). He had iſſue by her three ſons, George, William, and Thomas. It appears by his laſt will, which is dated April 13, 1523, that he lived in the pariſh of St. Alban's Wood-ſtreet, and that he had acquired an eſtate in Kent. It alſo appears by this will, that his two younger ſons, Thomas and William were under age (9); and from his naming Thomas before William, one would have judged he was the ſecond ſon; but all the old genealogies of this family agree in making him the youngeſt: he became afterwards a Knight of Malta, and conſequently left no family (10). As for the eldeſt ſon, George Cavendiſh, he was ſeated at Glemſford in Suffolk, and left iſſue William Cavendiſh, Eſq; who had two ſons, William and Ralph, who both died without iſſue; ſo that Sir William Cavendiſh of whom we are ſpeaking, and his deſcendants, inherited all the eſtates of the family (11).

(1) Lib. Domeſday, fol. 137, 138.

(2) MS. in Bibl. Cotton. ſub Effig. Julii, F. 11.

(3) Dugdale's Chron. Series, p. 48. 50.

(4) Stow's Annals, p. 289, 290.

(5) Dugdale's Chron. Series, p. 61.

(6) Vincent's MS. Baron. in Offic. Arms, Numb. 20. Weaver's Funeral Monuments, p. 693.

(7) Madox, Bar. Angl. p. 105.

(8) Weaver's Funeral Monum. p. 693.

(9) Ex Regiſt. Bedfeld qu. 23. not. 21. in Cur. Prerog. Cant.

(10) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. i. p. 168.

(11) From an ancient Genealogy of the line of Cavendiſh.

and ſervice [B]. He was alſo conſtituted one of the Commiſſioners for viſiting and taking the ſurrenders of ſeveral religious houſes; and in 1531, he took ſeveral ſurrenders in that capacity (g). In 1540 he was appointed one of the Auditors of the Court of Augmentation (h), and ſoon after had a very conſiderable grant made him, of ſeveral lordſhips in the county of Hertford (i). In 1546 he was made Treaſurer of the Chamber to his Majeſty, and on Eaſter-day the ſame year he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him, and was ſoon after ſworn of the Privy-Council (k). He continued to enjoy both theſe honours for the ſpace of eleven years, in which time his eſtate was much increaſed, by the grants (l) he received from King Edward VI. in ſeven ſeveral counties; nor does it appear that he was in leſs credit or favour with Queen Mary, under whoſe reign he died in the year 1557 (m). He married three wives, the firſt was Anne, daughter of Edmund Boſtock of Cheſhire, Eſq (n); by whom he had a ſon who died young, and two daughters. His ſecond wife was Margaret, daughter to Thomas Parker of Poſlingford in the county of Suffolk, Eſq; who died June 16, 1540 (o). His third and laſt wife, who ſurvived him, was the widow of Robert Barley, Eſq; and was very juſtly conſidered as one of the moſt famous women of her time, and of whom therefore it is requiſite that we ſhould take particular notice (p) [C]. By her he had iſſue three ſons, and as many

(f) Ibid. p. 156, 157.

(g) Rymer's Fœd. vol. xiv. p. 437. Stowe's Annals, p. 576. Weaver's Funeral Monuments, p. 112.

(h) Pat. 31 Hen. VIII. m. 2.

(i) Chauncey's Hiſt. and Antiq. of Hertfordſhire, p. 163.

(k) Pat. 37 Hen. VIII. m. 2. MS. Not. Claudius, c. iii. p. 149. in Bibl. Cotton. Rafe Brooke's Catal. of the Nobility, under the title of Devon.

(l) Chauncey's Hiſt. of Hertfordſhire, p. 501. Thoroton's Antiq. of Nottinghamſhire, p. 186.

(n) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 186.

(m) From an ancient Pedigree of the Family.

(o) Weaver's Funeral Monuments, p. 693.

(p) Thoroton's Antiq. of Nottinghamſhire, p. 187.

[B] The King took him into his own family and ſervice.] It was on the fourth of November 1530, that the Cardinal was arreſted in his own palace at Cawood (12); and at that time, Sir Walter Welch told Mr. Cavendiſh how good an opinion the King had of him, and that it was his Majeſty's command he ſhould remain about the perſon of the Cardinal, and have the chief direction of every thing, giving him certain directions in writing, which, when Mr. Cavendiſh had read, he undertook to obey, and was thereupon ſworn to the performance of them (13). In conſequence of this, he went with his maſter to the Earl of Shrewſbury's at Sheffield-Park, where, when Sir William Kingſton, whom the Cardinal always dreaded and hated, came to receive him in his cuſtody, the Earl ſent for Mr. Cavendiſh, and addreſſed him thus: 'Foraſmuch, as I 'have always perceived you to be a man in whom 'my Lord putteth great affiance, and I myſelf know-'ing you to be a man very honeſt (with many other 'words of commendations and praiſe) ſaid farther, 'Your Lord hath often deſired me to write to the 'King, that he might anſwer his accuſations before 'his enemies. And this day I have received letters 'from his Majeſty, by Sir William Kingſton, whereby 'I perceive, that the King hath him in good opinion, 'and upon my requeſt hath ſent for him by the ſaid 'Sir William Kingſton. Therefore, now I would 'have you play your part wiſely with him, in ſuch ſort 'as he may take it quietly and in good part; for he is 'alway full of ſorrow and much heavineſs at my be-'ing with him, that I fear he would take it ill if I 'bring him tidings thereof: and therein doth he not 'well, for I aſſure you, that the King is his very good 'Lord, and hath given me moſt hearty thanks for 'his entertainment: and therefore go your way to 'him, and perſuade him I may find him in quiet at my 'coming, for I will not tarry long after you (14).' He performed this commiſſion the beſt he could; but the ſending of Sir William Kingſton proved the death of the Cardinal, who was carried as far as Leiceſter, and there he finiſhed his days (15). When Mr. Cavendiſh came to Court, he was introduced to the King by Sir Henry Norris, at that time Groom of the Stole, and after a long conference, his Majeſty was pleaſed to tell him, that for his honeſty and fidelity he ſhould be ſervant in his chamber, in the ſame manner as he had been with his late maſter; adding at parting, 'Therefore, go your ways to Sir John Gage, our Vice-'Chamberlain, to whom we have ſpoken already, to 'admit you our ſervant in our chamber; and then go 'to the Lord of Norfolk, and he ſhall pay you your 'whole year's wages, and a reward beſides (16).' It is very remarkable, that of all the dependents upon the Cardinal, there were two that particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves by a ſteady and cloſe adherence to him: the firſt was Mr. Thomas Cromwell, whom the King made afterwards Lord Cromwell, Earl of Eſſex, Knight of the Garter, and Prime Miniſter; the other was Mr. William Cavendiſh, whom he immediately took into his own ſervice, knighted him afterwards, made him Treaſurer of his Chamber, and a Privy-Counſellor (17). What the nature of his office in the Houſhold was at that time, will beſt appear by the following clauſe from an act of Parliament, which is very remarkable. This Act relates to the receivers of the King's revenue; and it is therein declared (18), 'That every perſon whom the King hereafter ſhall 'name and appoint to the room and office of Trea-'ſurer of his Chamber, be not accomptable in the Ex-'chequer, for any ſuch his or their receipt, or any 'part or parcel of the premiſes, but to the King's 'Highneſs or his heirs, or before ſuch as his Grace 'ſhall thereunto limit and appoint. Alſo, that all 'ſuch perſons as have paid, or hereafter ſhall pay, 'any ſum or ſums of money to the King's uſe, to the 'hands of the Treaſurer of his Chamber for the time 'being, and for the proof of the which payment, the 'ſaid perſon or perſons bring, or cauſed to be 'brought, the ſaid bills into the King's Receipt of 'the Exchequer, that then immediately, upon ſight 'of the ſaid bill or bills, the Treaſurer and Cham-'berlains of the ſaid Exchequer ſhall ſtrike or cauſe 'to be ſtriken a tally or tallies for the diſcharge of 'the ſaid perſon or perſons, that ſo have paid their 'money to the ſaid Treaſurer of the King's Chamber, 'as if they had paid the ſaid ſum or ſums of money 'in the Receipt before ſaid, without any other war-'rant in that behalf to be obtained, and without any 'fine, fee, or reward, therefore to be taken.'

(12) Herbert's Life of Henry VIII. p. 147.

(13) Cavendiſh's Life of Wolſey, p. 55, 56.

(14) Ib. p. 137, 138.

(15) Chauncey's Hiſt. of Hertfordſhire, p. 450.

(16) Cavendiſh's Life of Wolſey, p. 156, 157.

(17) Remarks on the Life of Cardinal Wolſey, p. 95.

(18) Rot. Parl. 6 Hen. VIII.

[C] That we ſhould take particular notice.] This Lady, as ſhe was certainly one of the moſt remarkable perſons of her time, ſo her memory is celebrated, and the moſt memorable paſſages of her life preſerved, by ſeveral of our ableſt Antiquaries, moſt conſiderable Hiſtorians, and moſt eminent Divines. Yet we hope, in the compaſs of this note, to give more remarkable facts relating to this wonderful woman, and that too with greater exactneſs than are any where to be met with in ſo narrow a compaſs. Elizabeth Hardwick, for ſuch was this Lady's name, was the daughter of John Hardwick of Hardwick in the county of Derby, Eſq; by Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Leeke of Loaſland in the ſame county, Eſq; and in proceſs of time became coheireſs of his fortune, by the death of her brother John Hardwick, Eſq; without children (19). It is not eaſy to ſay in what year ſhe was born, though the date of her death, and her age, both appear on her magnificent tomb-ſtone (20). The former indeed is certain, but the latter not ſo; for if it were, ſhe would have been hardly twelve years old when her firſt huſband died: by comparing of circumſtances, however, it is highly probable, that ſhe was born in 1516, and being extremely beautiful, and having the advantage of an excellent education, ſhe captivated the heart of Robert Barley of Barley in the county of Derby, Eſq; a young gentleman of a large eſtate, all of which he ſettled abſolutely upon her on their marriage; which was celebrated when ſhe was ſcarcely fourteen. By this gentleman ſhe had no iſſue; but by his death, which happened February 2, 1532 (21), ſhe became a very rich widow, and remained ſo for about twelve years; when many daughters, of whom we ſhall ſay ſomewhat in the notes [D]. It was in the latter part of his life, at the inſtance of the lady he laſt married, that Sir William Cavendiſh when ſhe married Mr. Cavendiſh, by whom ſhe had Henry Cavendiſh, Eſq; who ſettled at Tutbury in Staffordſhire, but had alſo conſiderable eſtates in Derbyſhire; William Cavendiſh, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the next article; and Charles Cavendiſh, who was the anceſtor of the Dukes of Newcaſtle of that name; and three daughters, Frances, who married Sir Henry Pierpoint of Holm Pierpoint in the county of Nottingham, from whom the Dukes of Kingſton are deſcended (22); Elizabeth, who eſpouſed Charles Stuart, Earl of Lenox, younger brother of Henry King of Scots, father of King James I. (23); and Mary, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak afterwards. Some years after ſhe, by his death, was a ſecond time a widow, ſhe conſented to become a third time a wife; and accordingly married Sir William St. Lowe, Captain of the Guard to Queen Elizabeth, who was a man of plentiful fortune, and had a large eſtate in Glouceſterſhire; all which he ſettled upon her, excluding as well his brothers who were heirs male, as his own female iſſue by a former Lady (24). We are in the dark as to the time of this marriage, and of the death of this Sir William St. Lowe: but it is certain, that the charms of this Lady's perſon and mind were of ſo laſting a nature, that in her third widowhood they made ſuch an impreſſion on the heart of George Talbot, Earl of Shrewſbury, then one of the greateſt ſubjects in the Engliſh nation, that he was very deſirous of engaging her to alter the ſtate of life ſhe led for the fourth time: but before he could perſuade her thereto, he was obliged to conſent unto terms that were very advantageous for her family (25). Her Ladyſhip could not indeed inſiſt that the eſtates of the family ſhould be ſettled upon her; but ſhe took care that they ſhould be at all events enjoyed by her poſterity, by cauſing the Earl to give his youngeſt daughter, the Lady Grace, to her eldeſt ſon Henry Cavendiſh, Eſq; and at the ſame time, married her youngeſt daughter Mary, to Gilbert the Earl's ſecond ſon, who proved afterwards the heir of his honours and eſtates (26). The felicity of this laſt marriage ſeems to have been ſomewhat troubled by her Lord's having the cuſtody of the Queen of Scots: for we are told by a certain author (27), that the Counteſs being at Court, and Queen Elizabeth demanding how that Princeſs did? She anſwered, Madam, ſhe cannot do ill while ſhe is with my huſband; and I begin to grow jealous, they are ſo great together. We are likewiſe told by Mr. Camden, that it was conſidered as a very high proof of the Earl's wiſdom, that in ſuch ambiguous times (this is our author's own word) he ſhould be able to maintain his credit, notwithſtanding the practices of his enemies, Court calumnies, and the diſturbances given him by his ſecond wife (28). All this taken together, roſe ſo high as to become the ſubject of a public proſecution (29). And in the inſcription upon the Earl's tomb (30) it is aſſerted, that notwithſtanding the ſcandalous report ſpread by malicious people, of his familiarity with the captive Queen, his conduct was entirely honourable and innocent. But theſe rumours gave occaſion to the removing that unhappy Princeſs into the cuſtody of Sir Amias Pawlet, with whom ſhe remained till the time of her deplorable death (31.) This noble Peer dying November 18th, 1590 (32), the Counteſs became a widow for the fourth time, and ſo continued for the remainder of her days. As her whole life was, with a very few interruptions, a continued ſeries of proſperity, ſhe was at liberty to diſcover the nobleneſs and magnificence of her nature, which ſhe did in monuments as laſting as it was in the power of ſo prudent and diſcreet a perſon to contrive. She built three of the moſt elegant ſeats that were ever raiſed by one hand, within the ſame County, beyond example, Chatſworth, Hardwick, and Oldcotes, all tranſmitted entire to the firſt Duke of Devonſhire (33). At Hardwick ſhe left the ancient ſeat of her family ſtanding, and at a ſmall diſtance, ſtill adjoining to her new fabric, as if ſhe had a mind to preſerve her cradle, and ſet it by her bed of ſtate. Which old houſe has one room in it, of ſuch exact proportion, and ſuch convenient lights, that it has been thought fit for a pattern of meaſure and contrivance, of a room in the Duke of Marlborough's noble houſe at Blenheim (34). Some memorials alſo are ſtill preſerved of the royal gueſt entertained here fifteen years; for the Queen of Scots chamber, and rooms of ſtate, with her arms, and other enſigns of her dignity, are ſtill remaining at Hardwick: Her bed was taken away for plunder in the Civil Wars. At Chatſworth the new lodgings that anſwer the old, are ſtill called the Queen of Scots apartment; and an iſland plat, on the top of a ſquare tower, built in a large pool, is ſtill called the Queen of Scot's garden, and ſome of her own royal work is ſtill preſerved among the treaſures of this family (35): a carpet embroidered with her needle, and particularly a ſuit of hangings now remaining in a chamber at Hardwick, wherein all the Virtues are repreſented in ſymbolical figures and alluſive mottos; an ornament and a lecture. Neither was ſhe unmindful, in the midſt of ſo much abundance, of ſuch of her fellow-creatures, and fellow Chriſtians, as by the permiſſion of the ſame divine Providence, which dealt ſo bountifully with her, were left in all the bitterneſs of want; and therefore ſhe endowed a noble Hoſpital at Derby, for the entertainment of twelve poor people, who have each about ten pounds a year for their ſubſiſtence (36). In this manner lived and died Elizabeth Counteſs Dowager of Shrewſbury, on the 13th of February, 1607, her body lying buried in the ſouth iſle of Allhallows Church in Derby, under a ſtately monument, which ſhe took care to erect in her own life-time, on which her ſtatue, curiouſly wrought, lies at full length (37). On this tomb there is alſo a large inſcription, placed there many years after her death, wherein ſhe is ſaid to have been in her 87th year, which muſt be a miſtake, for reaſons before mentioned, and which plainly ſhow, that ſhe muſt have been at leaſt in the 91ſt year of her age. Her funeral ſermon, with a large encomium on her many ſhining qualities, was preached by Dr. Toby Matthew, Archbiſhop of York, who choſe for his text, Prov. xxxi. 25. to the end of the chapter (38). Her memory was long after celebrated by another eloquent Prelate, who, after running through the principal paſſages of her life, ſums up all in the following terms, 'A change of 'conditions that, perhaps, never fell to any one 'woman, to be four times a creditable and happy 'wife; to riſe by every huſband into greater wealth 'and higher honours; to have an unanimous iſſue by 'one huſband only; to have all thoſe children live; 'and all, by her advice, be honourably and creditably diſpoſed of in her life-time; and after all, to live 'ſeventeen years a widow in abſolute power and 'plenty (39).'

(19) Thoroton's Antiq. of Nottinghamſhire, p. 186, 187.

(20) See that inſcription at large in Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 420.

(21) Life of William Duke of Newcaſtle, by his Ducheſs, p. 154.

[D] We ſhall ſay ſomewhat in the notes.] The names of Sir William Cavendiſh's children, by his laſt lady, we have already mentioned, and therefore here we ſhall take notice only of ſome particulars relating to his eldeſt and youngeſt ſons; and to the youngeſt of his daughters, becauſe they ſeem neceſſary to the right underſtanding of ſeveral paſſages in the ſucceeding articles. Henry Cavendiſh, his eldeſt ſon, was elected one of the Knights of the Shire for the county of Derby, in the Parliament held in the 14th year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and ſerved for the ſame county in five other ſucceeding parliaments (40). In 1578 he went over into the Low-Countries, and ſerved there with great reputation (41). He had no iſſue by his Lady, who was the daughter of the Earl of Shrewſbury; but having lived with univerſal reputation, died at Endſore, near Chatſworth, in Derbyſhire, Oct. 12, 1616, and was buried in the Church there, where we find an inſcription to preſerve his memory (42.) His youngeſt brother, and the third ſon of Sir William Cavendiſh, ſeated himſelf at Welbeck in Nottinghamſhire; and, being knighted, was ſtiled Sir Charles Cavendiſh of Welbeck. He married Catherine, ſecond daughter to Cuthbert Lord Ogle, and by that marriage acquired a large eſtate. He died in the month of June, 1617, and was buried at Boleſover, in the County of Derby (43). Mary, Counteſs of Shrewſbury, youngeſt daughter

(22) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 139.

(23) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 421.

(24) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 420.

(25) Life of William Duke of Newcaſtle, by his Ducheſs, p. 154.

(26) Biſhop Kennet's Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh, p. 517.

(27) Fuller's Worthies in Com. Derby, p. 237.

(28) Camden, Annal. p. 622, 623.

(29) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 216, 217.

(30) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. ii. p. 56.

(31) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 384.

(32) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. i. p. 333.

(33) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Ibid.

(36) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 141.

(37) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 420.

(38) This Sermon, in the Archbiſhop's own hand-writing, was in the curious and copious Collection of Rarities belonging to R. Thoreſby, Eſq; of Leeds.

(39) Biſhop Kennet's Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh, p. 67.

(40) Brown Willis's Notitia Parliament. vol. ii. p. 422.

(41) Annal Camden, p. 320.

(42) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 138.

(43) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 421.

vendiſh ſold moſt of his eſtates in other parts of the kingdom, in order to purchaſe lands in Derbyſhire, where her eſtates lay, and began to build a noble houſe at Chatſworth, which he did not live to finiſh (q). He appears from his writings to have been a man of great honour and integrity, a good ſubject to his Prince, a true lover of his country, and one who preſerved, to the laſt, a very high reverence and eſteem for his old maſter, and firſt patron, Cardinal Wolſey, whoſe life he wrote in the latter part of his own, and there gives him a very high character; affirming, that in his judgment, he never ſaw the kingdom in better obedience and quiet, than during the time of his authority, or juſtice better adminiſtered (r). This work of his remained long in manuſcript, and the original, ſome years ago, was in the hands of the Duke of Kingſton (s). It had been ſeen and conſulted by the Lord Herbert, when he wrote his Hiſtory of the Reign of King Henry VIII. but he was either unacquainted with our author's chriſtian name, or miſtook him for his elder brother, George Cavendiſh, of Glemsford, in the county of Suffolk, Eſq; for by that name his Lordſhip calls him; but it appears plainly from what he ſays, that the Hiſtory he made uſe of was our author's, and that he gave great credit to it, ſince, in his character of Cardinal Wolſey, he agrees entirely with him (t). Biſhop Burnet alſo had ſeen and made uſe of our author's Hiſtory (u), in relation to which there are ſome very curious remarks in a work of Mr. Strype's, which deſerve the reader's notice, and are therefore placed at the bottom of the page [E]. It might be of ſome uſe to the learned world, if, by collating the ſeveral manuſcripts that are ſtill extant of this work, a new and correct edition of it were publiſhed, with notes ſhewing wherein it differs from other Hiſtories of that famous Cardinal.

(q) Life of William Duke of Newcaſtle, by his Ducheſs, p. 154.

(r) In the Prologue or Dedication to the Marquis of Dorcheſter.

(s) Suppoſed to be given by the author to his daughter, who married into that family.

(t) Herbert's Life of Henry VIII. p. 122.

(u) Hiſtory of the Reformat. vol. i. p. 8.

daughter of Sir William Cavendiſh, intereſted herſelf deeply in the affairs of her niece, Lady Arabella Stuart, and thereby brought herſelf into very great troubles, as we have ſhewn in another place (44). And we take notice of it here, only to put the reader in mind, that this lady, who was ſo nearly allied to the Crown, was the grand-daughter of our Sir William Cavendiſh.

(44) See the article of ARABELLA (Lady) in this Dictionary.

[E] At the bottom of the page.] The paſſage referred to in the text runs thus (45); 'Cardinal Wolſey's 'life was long in MS. written by Cavendiſh, his domeſtic. Afterwards printed, Anno 1667, for Dorman Newman, entitled, The Life and Death of THOMAS WOLSEY Cardinal, once Archbiſhop of York and Lord Chancellor of England, containing, I. The Original of his Promotion, and the Way he took to obtain it. II. The Continuance in his Magnificence. III. His Negotiations concerning the Peace with France and the Netherlands. IV. His Fall, Death, and Burial. Wherein are things remarkable for thoſe times. Written by one of his own ſervants, being his Gentleman-Uſher. An ancient MS. of this life, which ſeemed to be original, I once bought of Mr. Woodward: which I afterwards parted with to Secretary Harley, afterwards Lord High-Treaſurer and Earl of Oxford and Mortimer. The printed Book aforeſaid was dedicated to Henry Lord Marquis of Dorſet. By which Dedication, it ſeems, it was now newly reprinted. The Preface is of the author's own writing, having theſe expreſſions: The Cardinal was my lord and maſter, whom, in his life-time, I ſerved: And ſo remained with him in his fall continually, during the time of all his troubles, both in the ſouth and north parts, until he died. In all which time I punctually obſerved all his demeanours, as alſo his great triumphs and glorious eſtate, &c. Nevertheleſs, whatſoever any man hath conceived of him in his life, or ſince his death, thus much I dare ſay, without offence of any, that in my judgment I never ſaw this realm in better obedience, and quiet, than it was in the time of his authority; nor juſtice better adminiſtered, without partiality, as I could juſtly prove, if I ſhould not be taxed with too much affection. 'This Book is miſprinted very much, as I have given 'a Specimen in my marginal Notes in the beginning of 'the Book. In the edition of it Anno 1667, I did 'in the beginning write as followeth. This Book was 'printed again, Anno 1706, with another title, viz. 'Memoirs of the great Favourite Cardinal Wolſey: 'With Remarks on his Riſe and Fall, and other ſecret 'Tranſactions of his Miniſtry. Together with a Memorial preſented to Queen Elizabeth by Will. Cecil 'Lord Burghley, to prevent her Majeſty's being engroſſed by any particular Favourite. But this can be 'none of the Lord Burghley's, as may be concluded 'by divers phraſes and manners of ſpeech that were 'not uſed in thoſe times. Nor would that Lord have 'dared to write ſo plain and bold to the Queen; nor 'would ſhe have borne it. It is plain this diſcourſe was 'levelled at ſome of the Miniſtry in that time of Queen 'Anne, in order to make way for another Miniſtry. 'The original Book is not divided into chapters, as 'this is, but a continued diſcourſe. It hath the very 'faults and miſprintings of the former edition; as 'p. 2. Foreſt for Feaſt, and Sir James Pawlet for 'Sir Amyas. The Preface, which is called the 'Prologue in the Manuſcript, varies and changes 'words, and leaves out, to make the language 'more ſuitable to the preſent age. But indeed, 'rather mars than mends the ſtile.' C.

(45) Strype's Memorials, vol. i. p. 128.

 [A very fair and valuable manuſcript copy of Sir William Cavendiſh's Life of Cardinal Wolſey is preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum, Harleian MSS. N° 428. This ſeems to be the ſame MS. mentioned by Mr. Strype in note [E]. It is larger, and much more correct, than any of the printed copies. It was taken notice of in the account of Cardinal Wolſey publiſhed in the ſecond volume of Britiſh Biography, 8vo. and ſome paſſages were extracted from it, which are not in any of the printed copies (46). As this is an original life of the celebrated Cardinal, written by a contemporary, and one well acquainted with him, it is to be regretted that a correct edition has not yet been publiſhed. The editions hitherto printed abound with groſs errors, and ſundry paſſages are omitted, which might be ſupplied, and the errors corrected, by the aſſiſtance of the above manuſcript.] T.

(46) P. 48, 49, 50, 52, 53.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM), ſecond ſon of the former, and the firſt of this family raiſed to the dignity of Peerage. At the time of his father's deceaſe he was very young, and but a child when his mother married the Earl of Shrewſbury, with whoſe children he was brought up, and by the care of the Earl had an excellent education (a). As he was his mother's favourite, ſhe gave him in her life-time, and left him at her deceaſe, ſo plentifully, that he had a better eſtate than his elder brother (b). He was choſen Member for Newport in the county of Cornwal, in the Parliament held in the thirty-firſt of Elizabeth (c); and it is probable that he ſat in ſucceeding Parliaments, though we are not able to ſay for what place. He was very early, and very much conſidered in the Court of King James, ſo that in the month of May 1605, at the chriſtening of the Princeſs Sophia, when his Majeſty was pleaſed to advance ſome of the Nobility, and to create others, he was honoured with the title of Baron Cavendiſh of Hardwicke, in the county of Derby (d). It does not appear that he was deſirous of places, or of Court preferments: but notwithſtanding this, he was far from leading an inactive life, as is evident from his being among the firſt adventurers for ſettling the Bermuda Iſlands; one of which has the honour to bear his name, as a mark of the concern he had in the eſtabliſhment of that flouriſhing plantation (e) [A]. He received, ſome years after this, a very great acceſſion to his fortune, by the death of his eldeſt brother (f), which was followed on the ſecond of Auguſt 1618, with an augmentation of honour; for being at that time in attendance upon the King on a progreſs, he was pleaſed to declare him, in the Biſhop's palace at Saliſbury, Earl of Devonſhire, though his patent for that honour did not paſs the ſeals till ſome days after (g). He enjoyed this honour about ſeven years, dying at his ſeat at Hardwicke, on the third of March 1625-6, with the character of being one of the worthieſt Noblemen, and trueſt Patriots of his time (h). His Lordſhip was twice married, and had iſſue of both marriages, as the reader will ſee in the notes [B]. His corpſe was removed to the burying-place of the family, at Endſore near Chatſworth, where it was interred, and a monument erected for him with a ſuitable inſcription (i) [C].

(a) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(b) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. i. p. 143.

(c) Willis's Notit. Parliam. vol. ii. p. 164.

(d) Pat. 3 Jac. p. 12. Apparat. Annal. Camden R. Reg. Jac. Primi, p. 4. Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 56.

(e) Continuation of Stowe's Annals, p. 944.

(f) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 421.

(g) Catalogue of Nobili y, by R. Bro ke, p. 64.

(h) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(i) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 144.

[A] Of that flouriſhing plantation.] The Bermudas iſlands are ſuppoſed to receive their name from one John Bermudas (1), a Spaniard, who diſcovered them. They lie in the Latitude of 32 degrees 33 minutes north, and are equally remarkable for their being one of the moſt numerous Archipelago's hitherto diſcovered; and for their lying the fartheſt from any continent. There cannot well be a ſtronger proof of the former, than that their number was never aſcertained. Some make them three, others five hundred, but the beſt writers agree, that there are upwards of four hundred. As to the latter, they lie three hundred leagues from the neareſt point of Carolina, which yet is that part of the continent of America nigheſt them (2). One Henry May, an Engliſhman, was a-ſhore here in 1593, and the account he gave of them firſt made them known in England. Sir George Somers being ſhipwrecked on them in 1609, procured them the name of the Summer Iſlands; and upon the report made by Captain Somers, Sir George's brother, a company was eſtabliſhed for the ſettling of them, by a Grant from King James in 1612, in which this noble Peer, with the Earls of Northampton and Pembroke, the Lords Paget and Harrington, and many others, were concerned (3). They ſent over a veſſel with ſixty perſons the ſame year, and conſtituted Mr. Richard Moor the firſt Governor, who performed his commiſſion very ſucceſsfully; and the ſame good fortune has attended this colony ever ſince; ſo that at preſent, though it be none of the richeſt, yet it is one of the faireſt and moſt flouriſhing; to which we may add, that excepting Barbadoes, it is the beſt peopled of any of it's ſize in America (4). The town of St. George is one of the beſt built in that quarter of the world, the houſes being all cedar, and the fortifications ſtone. The great iſland is divided into eight tribes, and the third in number, and middlemoſt in ſituation, is now called Devonſhire-tribe, though, I apprehend, it was formerly called Cavendiſh. It is one of the two pariſhes, and has a neat church and a good library. There is beſides a very ſmall iſland between St. George's and St. David's, which has a little caſtle well fortified, that bears the name of Cavendiſh Fort, in honour of this noble family (5).

(1) Britiſh Empire in America, vol. ii. p. 440.

(2) A ſhort Deſcription of Bermuda, by Mr. Norwood, p. 31.

(3) Continuat. of Stowe's Annal. p. 944.

(4) Britiſh Empire in America, vol. ii. p. 443.

(5) Deſcription of the Iſlands of Bermuda, p. 41.

[B] As the reader will ſee in the notes.] His Lordſhip married firſt Anne, daughter and heir to Henry Kighly, of Kighly (6) in the county of York, Eſq; by whom he had three ſons and three daughters; firſt Gilbert, who died in his youth, and left a very ingenious work, intituled, Horæ ſubſecivæ; Obſervations and Diſcourſes, &c. It was publiſhed in 1620 (7). Second William, his heir and ſucceſſor; third James, who died in his infancy; fourth Frances, married to Sir William Maynard; fifth and ſixth Mary and Elizabeth, who both died young (8). His ſecond wife was Elizabeth, daughter to Edward Boughton of Cauſton in the county of Warwick, Eſquire, and widow of Sir Richard Wortly, of Wortly in the county of York, Knight, by whom he had iſſue Sir John Cavendiſh, Knight of the Bath, at the creation of Charles Prince of Wales, Anno 1616, who departed this life on the 18th of January 1617 (9).

(6) Vincent's Diſ. of Errors in Brooke's Catal. of the Nobility, p. 165.

(7) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 474.

(8) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 421.

(9) Vincent's Diſcovery of Errors, &c. p. 166.

[C] With a ſuitable inſcription.] The villages of Chatſworth and Endſore ſtand oppoſite to each other, one on the eaſt, the other on the weſt-ſide of the little river Darwent. At Chatſworth is that noble palace, which is conſidered as the chief ſeat of the Devonſhire family. At Endſore many of them lie interred: but, for all this, Hardwicke is conſidered as the origin or birth-place, as it were, of this noble race, as well in conſideration of it's being their firſt Barony, as for it's being the proper eſtate of Elizabeth Counteſs of Shrewſbury, whoſe fame is ſtill freſh in theſe parts (10). It is in this light that we find Mr. Camden conſiders things in his Britannia, where he ſpeaks thus (11). 'On 'the very edge of the county, to the eaſt, upon a 'rough ground ſtands Hardwicke, which has given 'name to a famous family in this county, from whom 'is deſcended Elizabeth the preſent Counteſs of Shrewſ-'bury, who has there laid the foundation of two ſtate-'ly houſes almoſt joining to one another, which at a 'great diſtance appear very fair, by reaſon of their 'high ſituation. At preſent the title of this Barony 'is enjoyed by William Cavendiſh, her ſecond ſon, 'who was lately advanced by King James to the ho-'nour of Baron Cavendiſh of Hardwicke.' C.

(10) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(11) Camden's Britannia in Derbyſhire, p. 494.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM), ſon to the former, and the ſecond Earl of Devonſhire of this family. He was born in 1589, and very carefully educated in the houſe of his father (a), who, when he grew up to the age of nineteen, ſent for Mr. Thomas Hobbes, ſo well known to the world by the name of the Philoſopher of Malmſbury, from Oxford, to be the director of his ſon's ſtudies, though there was but a year's difference in their age (b). Mr. Hobbes, from the time he came into the family, gained ſo much on the affections of his pupil, that he lived with him rather as a friend and companion, than as a tutor, and thereby drew him to have a ſtrong paſſion for Hiſtory, Politics, Antiquities, and other parts of polite learning (c). In the ſpring of the year 1609, Mr. Cavendiſh received the honour of knighthood at Whitehall (d), which was with a view to a match intended for him. After this he viſited France and Italy in the company of Mr. Hobbes, and on his return from his travels, the marriage before-mentioned took effect, and Sir William Cavendiſh was thereupon eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion

(a) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(b) Vita Tho. Hobbes, p. 2.

(c) Vita Hobbesiana Auctariuncula, p. 28, 29.

(d) Manuſcript Cat. of Knights.

of a very conſiderable fortune (e) [A]. The nobleneſs and generoſity of his temper, induced Sir William Cavendiſh to make a great figure at Court, and to live with much luſtre in the country, even while he was a younger brother; but when, by the deceaſe of Gilbert Lord Cavendiſh, he came to be conſidered as the heir apparent of his father's titles and fortunes, he carried his magnificence to ſuch a height, that he was conſidered by King James, as a perſon who did honour to his country, more eſpecially as he was one of the beſt bred, and beſt accompliſhed Noblemen of his time (f). Therefore, Count Swartzenburgh came over in the month of April 1622, in quality of Embaſſador from the Emperor Ferdinand, Lord Cavendiſh was made choice of to conduct him to his public audience (g), and was appointed in like manner to accompany Signior Valerſſio, Embaſſador-Extraordinary from the Republic of Venice, and Monſ. d'Arſennes and Joachimi, Joint-Embaſſadors of the States of the United Provinces (h). His Lordſhip and his Lady, in the year 1625, waited on King Charles I. to Canterbury, by his royal appointment, to be preſent at his nuptials with Maria Henrietta, ſecond daughter to King Henry IV. of France, who arrived at Dover the thirteenth of June, and came the ſame night to Canterbury, where the marriage was conſummated (i). When he became Earl of Devonſhire by the deceaſe of his father, his deſire of keeping up the dignity of the family, and living in a manner ſuitable to his quality both in town and country, brought him into ſuch expence, as even his large fortune could not ſupport; and as he was a perſon of the niceſt honour, and one who had the ſtricteſt regard for juſtice, he made uſe of the favour in which he ſtood with his Prince, and his credit in Parliament, to procure an Act for ſale of part of his eſtates for the payment of his debts, which was in thoſe days a rare thing, and not to be obtained without difficulty (k). In his public character he was truly a Patriot; for his loyalty to his Prince was without any tincture of ambition, and his zeal for the public good had not the ſmalleſt intermixture of factious popularity. In his private life, he had all the qualities requiſite to make him eſteemed and beloved. His learning operated on his conduct, but was ſeldom ſhewn in his diſcourſe. He was a kind huſband, a tender father, a beneficent maſter, a friend to his neighbours, and a father to the poor. In fine, he deſerved, in every reſpect, the character beſtowed upon him by one who was beſt acquainted with him, that from his behaviour it might be eaſily perceived, that honour and honeſty are but the ſame thing, in different degrees, of perſons (l). But this great man, whoſe virtues added luſtre to his titles, and who was juſtly eſteemed the ornament of the Court, and the delight of his country, lived but a very ſhort time to enjoy thoſe honours which became him ſo well; for on the twentieth of June 1628, he departed this life at Devonſhire-houſe, near Biſhopſgate, where the ſquare of the ſame name is now ſeated, in the thirty-ninth year of his age (m), and was buried on the eleventh of July following (n), in the Church of Allhallows at Derby, where a moſt ſtately monument, with his own ſtatue in white marble upright in the midſt of it, is erected to his memory, but without any inſcription (o). This noble Earl was only once married to Chriſtian, daughter of Edward Lord Bruce of Kinloſſe, ſiſter to Thomas Earl of Elgin in Scotland, and aunt to Robert Earl of Ayleſbury in England, a woman, whoſe great qualities, and greater virtues, have tranſmitted her fame with due praiſes to poſterity (p) [B]. By her he left four children, as the

(e) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 145.

(f) Kennet's Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family, p. 74.

(g) Sir John Finnet's Obſervations on Ambaſſadors, p. 95, 96.

(h) Life of Chriſtian Counteſs of Devonſhire, p. 112. 188.

(i) Ruſhworth's Collections, vol. i. P. i. p. 107.

(k) Life of the Counteſs of Devon. p. 27, 28.

(l) See Mr. Hobbes's Dedication of Thucydides in Engliſh, to the ſon of this worthy Nobleman.

(m) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(n) MS. J. P. in Offic. Arm. f. 18.

(o) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 42.

(p) See Pomfret's Life of this Lady.

[A] Of a very conſiderable fortune.] There are ſome who tell us, that the honour of Knighthood was conferred upon Sir William Cavendiſh after his return from his travels (1), and immediately before his marriage: but beſides various other reaſons that might be alledged in diſproof of this, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that it is contradicted by Mr. Hobbes's account of his own life, where he ſays expreſsly, that he did not travel with his pupil till 1610 (2). The match then propoſed, and which afterwards took effect, was with the only daughter of Edward, Lord Bruce of Kinloſſe, for whom King James had a very particular eſteem, as indeed it was very reaſonable he ſhould: for beſides his noble deſcent from the male-line of that Royal family, of which the Stuarts were deſcended by females, he had been highly inſtrumental, by the ſecret correſpondence he held with Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Saliſbury, in procuring the peaceable acceſſion of his Maſter to the throne of England, for which he had been rewarded with a Peerage and a grant of lands in Scotland, and with the office of Maſter of the Rolls for life in England (3). But the King ſhewed his kindneſs chiefly in the pains he took about this marriage, in which he was equally gracious to both parties. He made choice of Sir William Cavendiſh on account of his perſonal accompliſhments as well as of his family; and he beſtowed upon him the Lady as his kinſwoman, with whom he gave a fortune of ten thouſand pounds; and that he might ſtill do greater honour to the marriage, he gave her away with his own hand (4). In return for his Royal condeſcenſion, he ſolicited and prevailed upon the Lord Cavendiſh, of Hardwicke, for he was not then Earl of Devonſhire, or poſſeſſed of his elder brother's fortune, to make a great ſettlement on his ſecond ſon; and his Lordſhip was ſo ſenſible of the honour done him, that he came up fully to his Majeſty's expectations, and perhaps exceeded (5), what in that caſe he would otherwiſe have done.

(1) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 145.

(2) Vita Tho. Hobbes, p. 2.

(3) Crawfurd's Peerage of Scotland, p. 133.

(4) Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

(5) Life of the Counteſs of Devonſhire, p. 23.

[B] With due praiſes to poſterity.] We have already given an account of this Lady's family; and therefore, we ſhall only obſerve, that as ſhe lived in the utmoſt harmony with her Lord, for whom ſhe had the ſincereſt affection; ſo in reſpect to his family ſhe was another Counteſs of Shrewſbury, and employed the great powers veſted in her by her huſband for the benefit of his illuſtrious race, with the utmoſt prudence and fidelity. In the firſt place, ſhe made a proper diſpoſition of the money ariſing by ſale of his eſtate; and in the next, ſhe managed her large jointure of 5000l. a year with ſuch œconomy and circumſpection, that in the courſe of her long life, ſhe added to it 4000 l. a year more of her own acquiring (6). Beſides all this, ſhe extricated the family from ſeveral tedious and perplexed law-ſuits, which ſhe managed with ſuch diligence, decency, and dexterity, and at the ſame time, with ſuch ſufficiency and ſucceſs, that King Charles I. who, as his father King James had done, and his ſon the reader will be informed in the notes [C]; though he had not the happineſs to ſee any of them arrive at the age of diſcretion, and moſt of them, at his death, were in their infancy.

(6) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh. Life of the Counteſs of Devon. p. 26.

King Charles II. did, converſed with her very familiarly, would ſometimes merrily ſay, Madam, you have all my Judges at your diſpoſal (7). There never was a woman more admired for her courtly and polite behaviour, at the ſame time that her virtue and piety made her looked upon as an example for all her ſex. A certain witty writer drew her character in a few lines; The Counteſs of Devonſhire (ſays he) is at once the beſt woman, and the beſt bred woman in the nation; ſhe has all the complaiſance of a Court, without the leaſt affectation; and all the ſtrictneſs of religion in her conduct, without the leaſt pretence to it in her diſcourſe (8). Another writer, from whom we have her life at large, gives us the following picture of her at full length (9). 'Prayers and pious readings were her 'firſt buſineſs; the remainders of the day were deter- 'mined to her friends, in the entertainment of whom 'her converſation was ſo tempered with courtſhip and 'heartineſs, her diſcourſes ſo ſweetened with the de- 'licacies of expreſſion, that ſuch as did not well know 'the expence of her time, would have thought ſhe 'had employed it all in addreſs and dialogue: in 'both which ſhe exceeded moſt Ladies, and yet ne- 'ver affected the title of a wit; carried no ſnares in 'her tongue, nor counterfeited friendſhips; and as 'ſhe was never known to ſpeak evil of any, ſo nei- 'ther would ſhe endure to hear of it from any 'others, reckoning it not only a vice againſt good 'manners, but the greateſt indecency alſo in the en- 'tertainment of friends; and, therefore, always 'kept herſelf within the meaſures of civility and re- 'ligion. Her geſtures correſponded to her ſpeech, 'being of a free, native, genuine, and graceful be- 'haviour, as far from affected and extraordinary mo- 'tions, as they from diſcretion. Theſe admirable 'qualities drew to her houſe all the beſt company, 'towards whom ſhe had ſo eaſy and ſuch obliging 'addreſs, without the leaſt allay of levity or diſdain, 'that every one departed with the higheſt ſatisfac- 'tion; ſhe ever diſtributing her reſpects according 'to the quality and merit of each, ſteering the ſame 'ſteady courſe in the country alſo, between which 'and the town ſhe commonly divided the year.' We ſhall have frequent occaſion to mention this Lady in the ſucceeding articles, and ſhall therefore add nothing farther here of her, except, that, as ſhe was ſteadily loyal to King Charles I. through all his troubles, ſhe was no leſs faithful to the intereſt of his ſon in his exile, and was among the very few people to whom General Monk gave early intelligence of his good intention. Of theſe her conſtant and continual ſervices, King Charles II. was ſo ſenſible, that, after his Reſtoration, he frequently dined with her, ſometimes in the company of the Queens, Dowager and Conſort. She lived to the laſt with all that profuſeneſs of Engliſh generoſity, which was the characteriſtic of that age in which ſhe paſſed her youth; and with all that dignity and magnificence, by which the houſe of Devonſhire has been always diſtinguiſhed; till full of years and of glory, ſhe departed this life on January 16, 1674, and was carried with great funeral pomp down to Derby, where ſhe was interred, as we ſhall have occaſion to mention elſewhere.

(7) Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

(8) MS. Letter of Lord Digby's.

(9) Pomfret's Life of the Counteſs of Devon. p. 36—40.

[C] In the notes.] His iſſue by Chriſtian, Counteſs of Devonſhire, were three ſons and one daughter. 1. William, Lord Cavendiſh, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the next article. 2. Charles, of whom we ſhall likewiſe give an article. 3. Henry, who died young. 4. Lady Anne Cavendiſh, who married Robert, Lord Rich, ſon and heir of Robert, Earl of Warwick. She died early of an ague, and was a Lady of ſuch diſtinguiſhed perfections, that her loſs was deplored by three of the worthieſt men, and greateſt wits, of that age in which there were ſo many, viz. the famous Viſcount Falkland, the celebrated Mr. Waller, and the ingenious Mr. Godolphin, as well as by other writers of an inferior rank (10). This Lady had by the Lord Rich, only one ſon, Robert, who married Frances youngeſt daughter to Oliver Cromwell, and died in his father's life-time without iſſue; which is the rather mentioned, becauſe Sir William Dugdale (11) makes her mother alſo of three daughters; whereas, they were the children of Robert Lord Rich by his ſecond wife, the widow of Mr. Rogers, and the daughter of Sir Thomas Cheeke of Pirgo in Eſſex. C.

(10) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(11) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 888.

 [Robert Johnſton, in his Hiſtoria Rerum Britannicarum, at the end, doth not beſtow ſuch extravagant commendations on this Earl of Devonſhire. That writer gives the following character of his Lordſhip: "Cæterorum procerum ſumptuoſam lautitiam, profuſâ luxuriâ ſuperavit, qui cogitavit ſibi ſe natum & ſuis voluptatibus, itaque ſplendidiſſimo rerum omnium apparatu lautiores hoſpites excepit. Parum abfuit quin ditiſſimæ familiæ, opes, ſapientiâ & moderatione patris amplificatæ conſtitutæque, magnificentiæ ſtudio diſſiparentur; niſi diutino morbo, ex CRAPULA contracto, in medio robore ætatis extinctus fuiſſet." The honourable correſpondent, who hath favoured us with the above extract, obſerves, that this Nobleman is not the only Peer who has hurt his fortune, and ruined his health, by what the vulgar and the diſſolute abſurdly term good houſekeeping. It may be added, that hoſpitality carried to an exceſs was rather the fault of the laſt century than of the preſent. Many of our modern nobility and gentry have found out the means of diſſipating their eſtates, by methods leſs popular and ſplendid.

Our worthy and learned predeceſſor hath ſtretched his candour to the utmoſt, in calling the ſecond Earl of Devonſhire "a great man:" for though his Lordſhip was poſſeſſed of ſome ſhining virtues, there was nothing in his abilities or actions which could entitle him to ſo diſtinguiſhed an appellation.] K.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM), ſon to the former, and third Earl of Devonſhire of this family. He was at the time of his father's deceaſe, as appears from the inquiſition taken in the Court of Wards, ten years, eight months, and ten days old (a); ſo that he muſt have been born November 10, 1617. At the coronation of King Charles I. in February 1625-6, he was made a Knight of the Bath (b). As a mark of his Majeſty's regard for the family, the wardſhip of the young Earl of Devonſhire, upon the demiſe of his father, was granted to his mother the Counteſs Dowager (c), who was equally careful in the management of the family eſtate, and in providing for the education of the young Lord her ſon. It was with a view to this, that when he had reached the age of thirteen, his mother ſent for Mr. Hobbes from Paris, that ſhe might put him under his care; and, accordingly, after having inſtructed him in the learned languages, and the principles of polite literature at home for about three years, he, in 1643, attended his Lordſhip abroad; and having made the tour of Italy and France, and ſpent ſome time in Paris, his Lordſhip returned to England in 1637 (d). At that time, he was eſteemed one of the handſomeſt young Nobleman in his perſon (e); and with reſpect to the qualities of his mind, one of the beſt accompliſhed in the kingdom; ſo that ſeveral noble families had him in their eye, and would willingly have drawn him into their alliance by (a) Cole's Eſc. lib. iii. p. 240, in Bibl. Harley.

(b) Catalogue of Knights, MS.

(c) Pomfret's Life of the Counteſs of Devonſhire, p. 26.

(d) Vit. Thomæ Hobbes, p. 41.

(e) See Mr. Hobbes's Dedication of Thucydides to this noble Peer, printed in 1628.

by marriage. Amongſt the reſt, the Counteſs of Leiceſter, for the Earl was at that time abroad, was inclined to have matched him with her daughter, the Lady Dorothea Sidney (f), whom Mr. Waller has rendered immortal, by the name of Sachariſſa; but however, that deſign did not take effect. When he came of age, his mother delivered up to him all the great houſes in Derbyſhire, compleatly furniſhed; and ſoon after, he married the Lady Elizabeth Cecil, ſecond daughter to William Earl of Saliſbury (g). His Lordſhip diſcovered early, as he retained to the laſt, the loyal and virtuous principles of his illuſtrious anceſtors. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Houſe of Lords, by a noble and generous oppoſition to the bill for attainting the Earl of Strafford (h), and very ſteadily adhered to the royal cauſe. When the King withdrew into the North, his Lordſhip followed him, and was one of the noble Peers that in June 1642 (i), ſubſcribed the famous Declaration at York, which was ſo ill reliſhed at Weſtminſter, that by a reſolution of the Houſe of Lords, bearing date the 20th of July following, himſelf and eight other Peers were deprived of their right to ſit or vote, excluded from all privilege of Parliament, and ordered to ſtand committed to the Tower (k). Theſe and other acts did not hinder him from ſupplying the King with all the money in his power, though his horror of the Civil War (l) was ſuch, that he choſe to retire out of the kingdom. This receſs, however, gave him little repoſe; for he was thruſt into the number of the delinquents, his great eſtate ſequeſtered, and when, by the mediation of his friends, an ordinance was depending for his compoſition, an order was made October 23, 1645, for his return from beyond the ſeas by a day aſſigned, with which, by the perſuaſion, or rather at the command of his mother, he complied (m). He lived, after his return, for the moſt part, at his ſeat called Latimers in Buckinghamſhire, where he was with the Counteſs Dowager, when the army which hurried King Charles from place to place, ſuffered him to reſt for a night or two there, when his Majeſty had much private conſultation with them on the ſtate of his affairs, and at the ſame time expreſſed to them both, the grateful ſenſe he had of the many faithful ſervices they had done him (n). The ſuſpicions and dangers of the ſucceeding times, obliged the Earl to maintain a privacy, or rather obſcurity, very little ſuited to the nobleneſs and generoſity of his nature; which, however, contributed very much to the reſtoring his private affairs, and to the making up thoſe breaches in his fortune, which the ſeverities he had formally experienced had produced (o). But when better days came on, and the Houſe of Lords was again permitted to ſit, one of the firſt things they did, was, by an order of the 4th of May 1660, to reverſe the judgment formally given againſt him, as has been before mentioned (p). It being thought neceſſary, to preſerve the public peace, that a declaration ſhould be made by the Nobility and Gentry that adhered to the Royal cauſe, of their not being implacable, but deſirous of peace and quietneſs, ready to ſubmit to the authority of the approaching Parliament, and willing to bury in oblivion all that was paſſed, as well as all the odious diſtinctions of names and parties, his Lordſhip was the third of twenty Noblemen that ſigned it (q). At his Majeſty's return, he was received with all the kindneſs and reſpect due to his long and conſtant ſervices, as well as his great ſufferings; and Auguſt 20, 1660, he was conſtituted Lord Lieutenant of the county of Derby, as a mark of Royal confidence and eſteem; for as to Court preferments, he never ſought, or received them (r). He lived moſtly in the country, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf there by his hoſpitality and moderation. He was equally eſteemed by his Prince, and beloved by his fellow-ſubjects; for no man's loyalty was clearer; and yet there was no man more firm to the true principles of liberty, than he (s). The religion of the Church of England had not a more ſincere friend; but, at the ſame time, he was an enemy to all perſecution, of which he readily gave teſtimony, when any occaſion fell in his way (t). It was his known character, and a character never called in queſtion, that he was a man of as much conſcience and honour, religion and virtue, prudence and goodneſs, as that age afforded; and as he lived, univerſally honoured and beloved, ſo he died, lamented and regretted, not only by his friends and neighbours, but by all who had the leaſt knowledge of, or acquaintance with him, November 23, 1684, at his ſeat at Roehampton in Surry, from whence his body was removed to Derby, and there interred with his anceſtors (u). His poſterity are taken notice of in the notes (w) [A]. As

(f) Letters and Memorials of State from the Collections of the Sidney Family, vol. ii. p. 472. 495.

(g) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 421.

(h) Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

(i) Clarendon's Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 215.

(k) Collections of Acts of State, &c. p. 375.

(l) Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

(m) Whitelock's Memorials, p. 172. Life of the Counteſs of Devon. p. 46, 47.

(n) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 182. Life of the Counteſs of Devon. p. 55.

(o) Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

(p) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 570, 571, 572.

(q) Kennet's Chron. p. 101.

(r) Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

(s) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 155.

(t) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, vol. ii. p. 233.

(u) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 155.

(w) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 421.

[A] In the notes.] His Lordſhip had only two ſons and one daughter. Of his eldeſt ſon William Lord Cavendiſh, who, upon his deceaſe, became Earl of Devonſhire, and afterwards, by creation, Marquis of Hartington, and Duke of Devonſhire, we ſhall ſpeak in a ſubſequent article. His ſecond ſon was the honourable Charles Cavendiſh, Eſq; born October 5, 1655, and was a gentleman of moſt humane and courteous diſpoſition, much addicted to privacy and retirement; and one, whoſe virtues rendered him as much eſteemed and admired, as his high birth gained him reſpect. He died unmarried, March 3, 1670, and was buried in the family vault at Derby (1). His lordſhip's only daughter, Lady Anne Cavendiſh, was twice married, firſt to Charles Lord Rich, ſon to Charles Earl of Warwick (2), of whom, by the way, there is not the leaſt notice taken in the account of that noble family which is given in the peerage; but, on the contrary, his father, Charles Earl of Warwick, is ſaid to have died without iſſue by his Counteſs, Mary, daughter to the firſt Earl of Cork (3). Her ſecond huſband was John Earl of Exeter, whom ſhe attended in two journies to Rome, and was with him at the village of Iſſy near Paris, where he died, in his return home, Auguſt 29, 1700 (4). It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that ſhe lies buried with her Lord in a vault

(1) Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

(2) Collins's Peerage, vol. ii. p. 143.

(3) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 388.

(4) Collins's Peerage, ubi ſup.

As for his Counteſs, ſhe ſurvived him five years; and dying November 16, 1689, was on the 21ſt of the ſame month, interred in a vault under the eaſt window of King Henry VIIth's Chapel in Weſtminſter-Abbey (x), with great funeral ſolemnity.

(x) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 148.

a vault in St. Martin's Church in Stamford, under a tomb made by the Earl's expreſs directions at Rome, by many ſuppoſed to be the moſt elegant in this kingdom; of which the reader may find a very particular deſcription in the book referred to in the margin (5). And the following character is given of her in the inſcription placed thereon, for preſerving the memory of her Lord, viz. 'He had for wife, and the companion 'of his virtues and travels, and, in a manner, of his 'ſtudies, Anne, of the right noble houſe of Cavendiſh, 'daughter of William Earl of Devon; for the beauty 'of her body, ingenuity of her mind, and all thoſe ac- 'compliſhments which can any ways adorn a lady 'famous; of whom he begat five children; happy in 'his ſpouſe; and happy in his offspring! But, among 'all the things which make life more bleſſed, being 'ever mindful of mortality, when he was in Italy, 'whilſt he thoroughly examined, and as curiouſly col- 'lected, the works of choiceſt art, there he cauſed this 'monument to be made, where it could be moſt ex- 'quiſitely done, for himſelf, and the moſt dear conſort 'of his bed and travels, and of all his cares (6).' She deceaſed (7) July 18, 1703. C.

(5) Peck's Antiquarian Annals of Stamford, lib. xiv. p. 71.

(6) Ibid. p. 74.

(7) Le Neve's Mon. Angl. p. 2.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM), Baron Ogle, Viſcount Mansfield, Earl, Marquis, and Duke of Newcaſtle, one of the moſt accompliſhed perſons, as well as one of the moſt able Generals, and moſt diſtinguiſhed patriots of the age. He was ſon of Sir Charles Cavendiſh, youngeſt ſon of Sir William Cavendiſh, and younger brother of the firſt Earl of Devonſhire, by Catherine, daughter of Cuthbert, Lord Ogle (a). He was born in the year 1592 (b), and diſcovering, even in his infancy, the ſtrongeſt marks of an extraordinary genius, his father was extreamly careful in the cultivation of it, and took all imaginable pains to have him inſtructed, as well in ſciences as in languages; ſo that at an age when moſt young gentlemen are but entering on knowledge, he might be truly ſaid to have acquired a large ſtock of ſolid learning, which was adorned with an eaſy and polite behaviour, that, excepting on proper occaſions, entirely concealed the ſcholar under the more taking appearance of the fine gentleman (c). It was in this light that he appeared and was taken notice of at the Court of King James I. where he was quickly diſtinguiſhed by the King's favour; and in 1610, was made Knight of the Bath, at the creation of Henry, Prince of Wales (d). In 1617, his father died, by which he came to the poſſeſſion of a very large eſtate; and having a great intereſt at Court, he was, by letters-patents, dated November 3, 1620, raiſed to the dignity of a Peer of the Realm, by the ſtile and title of Baron Ogle and (e) Viſcount Mansfield; and having no leſs credit with King Charles I. than with his father King James, was, in the third year of the reign of that Prince, advanced to the higher title of Earl of Newcaſtle upon Tyne, and at the ſame time he was created Baron Cavendiſh of Boleſover (f). Our Genealogiſts and Antiquaries give us but a very obſcure account of theſe honours, or at leaſt, of the Barony of Ogle, to which, in the inſcription upon his own and his grandmother the Counteſs of Shrewſbury's tomb, he is ſaid to have ſucceeded in right of his mother (g), a point, which ſhall be explained in the notes [A]. His attendance on the Court, though it procured him honour, brought him very early into difficulties; and there is ſome reaſon to believe, that he did not ſtand extremely well with the great Duke of Buckingham, who perhaps was apprehenſive of the large ſhare he had in his Maſter's favour (h). However, he did not ſuffer, even by that powerful favourite's diſpleaſure, but remained in full credit with his Maſter; which was, notwithſtanding, ſo far from being beneficial to him, that the ſervices expected from him, and his conſtant waiting upon the King (i), plunged him very deeply in debt, though he had a very large eſtate, of which we find him complaining heavily in his letters, to his firm and ſteady friend, the Lord Viſcount Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford (k). But theſe difficulties, though they ſometimes put him upon thoughts of retirement, never in the leaſt diſcouraged him from doing his duty, or from teſtifying his zeal and loyalty, when the King's ſervice required it. This conduct, though it does not ſeem to have recommended him much to the great Miniſters, yet maintained him ſo effectually in his

(a) Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii. p. 421.

(b) As appears from the inſcription upon his monument in Weſtminſter-Abbey.

(c) Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

(d) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 421.

(e) Pat. 18 Jac. I. p. 13.

(f) Pat. 3 Car. I. p. 11.

(g) See this inſcription in Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 420.

(h) Strafford's Letters, vol. i. p. 43.

(i) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 26.

(k) Strafford's Letters, vol. i. p. 101.

[A] Shall be explained in the notes.] Sir Charles Cavendiſh, this Nobleman's father, married Catherine, the younger daughter of Cuthbert Lord Ogle, her elder ſiſter Jane being married to Edward Earl of Shrewſbury; and during the life-time of that Lady, who was this Nobleman's aunt, as well as during the life-time of his mother, he was raiſed to the rank of a Peer, by the title of Baron Ogle and Viſcount Mansfield, by letters Patent dated the third of November in the 18th year of James I (1). It is true, that his Dutcheſs tells us, he was created Baron of Boleſover and Viſcount Mansfield; but in that ſhe appears to be miſtaken; nor is it the only point of the kind in which there are miſtakes in her book (2). King Charles I. by letters Patents dated the ſeventh of March in the third year of his reign, created him Baron of Boleſover, and, at the ſame time, Earl of Newcaſtle, as is ſet forth in the text. But the year following, his mother's elder ſiſter Jane, Counteſs of Shrewſbury, dying without iſſue, the King was graciouſly pleaſed, by letters Patents dated the fourth of December, to declare Dame Catherine Cavendiſh, Baroneſs of Ogle; and to confirm that title to her and her heirs general (3). This ſhews why the Earl of Newcaſtle choſe to have a new Barony created by Patent, and how he comes to be ſtiled Baron of Ogle, in right of his mother: for it ſeems, that he waved any right that he might have to that Barony by his firſt creation; that he might take it by deſcent, as an old Barony in fee, as he did upon his mother's deceaſe, by which he likewiſe came to the poſſeſſion of the family eſtate of Ogle, which was worth three thouſand pounds a year, beſides a perſonal eſtate of twenty thouſand pounds, that his mother left him (4).

(1) Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii. p. 421.

(2) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 137.

(3) Dugd. Baron. vol. ii. p. 264.

(4) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 94. 98.

Maſter's good opinion, that when, in 1638, it was thought requiſite to take the Prince of Wales, afterwards King Charles II. out of the hands of the women, the King, of his own motive, made choice of the Earl of Newcaſtle, as the perſon in his kingdom moſt fit to have the tuition of his heir-apparent; and accordingly declared him Governor to the Prince, which was certainly as high an act of confidence as a Sovereign could place in a ſubject (l). In the ſpring of the year 1639, the firſt troubles in Scotland broke out, which induced the King to aſſemble an army in the North; ſoon after which, he went down thither to put himſelf at the head of it; and in his way, was moſt ſplendidly entertained by the Earl of Newcaſtle, at his noble ſeat of Welbeck, as he had been ſome years before when he went into that kingdom to be crowned; which though in itſelf a very trivial matter, yet ſuch was the magnificence of this noble Peer, that, from the circumſtances attending them, both theſe entertainments have found a place in General Hiſtories (m) [B]. But this was not the only manner in which he expreſſed his warm affection for his Maſter. Such expeditions require great expences, and the King's treaſury was but indifferently provided, for the ſupply of which, the Earl contributed ten thouſand pounds (n), and alſo raiſed a troop of horſe, conſiſting of about two hundred Knights and Gentlemen, who ſerved at their own charge; and this was honoured with the title of the Prince's troop (o). As much as theſe ſervices might recommend him to the King, they rather heightened than leſſened that envy borne to him by ſome great perſons about the Court, of which the Earl of Holland, having given a ſtronger inſtance than his Lordſhip's patience could bear, he took notice of it in ſuch a manner as contributed equally to ſink his rival's reputation, and to raiſe his own (p) [C]. The choice that had been made of his Lordſhip for the tuition of the Prince, which was at firſt ſo univerſally approved, began now to be called in queſtion by thoſe who meant very ſoon to call every thing in queſtion; but the Earl was no ſooner informed of it, than he very prudently reſolved to do all that was in his power to prevent the King's having any trouble upon his account, and therefore deſired to reſign his office, which he did; and in June 1640 (q), it was given to the Marquis of Hertford. As his Lordſhip took this ſtep from the knowledge he had of the ill-will borne him by the chief perſons amongſt the diſaffected, ſo he thought he could not take a better me-

(l) Dugd. Baron. vol. ii. p. 421.

(m) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 26. Ruſhworth's Hiſtorical Collect. vol. i. p. 178. 283.

(n) Life of William Duke of Newcaſtle, by his Ducheſs, p. 7.

(o) Ruſhworth's Collections, vol. i. p. 929.

(p) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 42. Ruſhworth's Collections, vol. i. p. 930.

(q) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 46.

[B] Theſe entertainments have found a place in General Hiſtories.] The firſt of theſe royal dinners ſeems to have been a thing of mere accident. His Majeſty was going down to Scotland to be crowned, and in his way came to Workſop manor in Nottinghamſhire, which being but two miles from his Lordſhip's houſe at Welbeck in the ſame county, he intreated his Majeſty's viſit to his houſe, and doing him the honour of dining there; which being accepted, he was entertained with ſuch magnificence, that we are told it coſt him between four and five thouſand pounds (5). As to the ſecond of theſe entertainments, there is ſome doubt about it; for we are told very poſitively, that it was given at the time the King marched againſt the rebels in Scotland (6); but in the account his Dutcheſs has given of his life, ſhe is very particular, and fixes it earlier by ſeveral years. For having given an account of the firſt, ſhe ſays (7), 'That the 'King liked it ſo well, that a year after his return out 'of Scotland, he was pleaſed to ſend my Lord word, 'that her Majeſty the Queen was reſolved to make a 'progreſs into the Northern parts, deſiring him to 'prepare the like entertainment for her as he had 'formerly done for him: which my Lord did, and 'endeavoured for it with all poſſible care and induſtry, 'ſparing nothing that might add ſplendour to that 'feaſt, which both their Majeſties were pleaſed to honour with their preſence. Ben Jonſon he employed in fitting ſuch ſcenes and ſpeeches as he could beſt deviſe, and ſent for all the gentry of the country to come and wait on their Majeſties; and, in ſhort, did all that ever he could imagine to render it great and worthy their Royal acceptance. This entertainment he made at Boleſover-caſtle in Derbyſhire, ſome five miles diſtant from Welbeck, and reſigned Welbeck for their Majeſty's lodging. It coſt him in all between fourteen and fifteen thouſand pounds. Beſides theſe two, there was another ſmall entertainment, which my Lord had prepared for his late Majeſty in his own park at Welbeck, when his Majeſty came down with his two nephews, the now Prince Elector Palatine, and his brother Prince Rupert, into the foreſt of Sherwood, which coſt him fifteen hundred pounds. 'And this I mention, not out of a vain glory, but to declare the great love and duty my Lord had for his gracious King and Queen, and to correct the miſtakes committed by ſome Hiſtorians, who not being 'rightly informed of thoſe entertainments, make the 'world believe falſhood for truth.' The noble Hiſtorian alſo takes up this matter in very ſtrong terms, for he repreſents the frequent banquets and feaſtings the King met with on his road to Scotland in 1633, as very detrimental to the manners of the nation; and having taken notice of the entertainment given by the Earl of Newcaſtle on that occaſion, he ſubjoins immediately this very extraordinary remark (8). 'But 'when he paſſed through Nottinghamſhire, both King 'and Court were received and entertained by the Earl 'of Newcaſtle, and at his own proper expence, in ſuch 'a wonderful manner, and in ſuch an exceſs of feaſting, 'as had ſcarce ever before been known in England, 'and would be ſtill thought very prodigious, if the 'ſame noble perſon had not within a year or two after-'wards made the King and Queen a more ſtupendious 'entertainment, which (God be thanked) though poſſi-'bly it might too much whet the appetite of others 'to exceſs, no man ever after in thoſe days imitated.'

(5) Ruſhworth's Collections, vol. ii. P. ii. p. 283.

(6) Hiſtory of the Civil War, p. 157.

(7) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 139.

(8) Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 26.

[C] To ſink his rival's reputation, and to raiſe his own.] The troop which the Earl of Newcaſtle raiſed, was compoſed of about two hundred gentlemen, ſome poſſeſſed of two thouſand pounds a year, ſome of one, and many of five hundred. This troop was ſtiled the Prince's, but the Earl commanded it as Captain (9), and when the army drew near Berwick, he ſent Sir William Carnaby to the Earl of Holland, then General of the Horſe, to know where his troop ſhould march. His anſwer was next after the troops of the general officers. The Earl of Newcaſtle ſent again to repreſent, that having the honour to march with the Prince's colours, he thought it not fit to march under any of the officers of the field (10); upon which the General of the Horſe repeated his orders, and the Earl of Newcaſtle ordered the Prince's colours to be taken from the ſtaff, and marched without any. When the ſervice was over, the Earl ſent Mr. Francis Palmes with a challenge to the Earl of Holland, who conſented to a place and hour of meeting; but when the Earl of Newcaſtle came thither, he found not his adverſary but his ſecond; the buſineſs having been diſcloſed to the King, by whoſe authority, ſays Clarendon, the matter was compoſed; but before that time, the Earl of Holland was never ſuſpected to want courage.

(9) Ruſhworth's Collections, vol. ii. P. ii. p. 929.

(10) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 8.

thod

thod to avoid the effects of their reſentment, than to retire into the country; which accordingly he did, and remained there quietly till he received his Majeſty's orders to viſit Hull; and though theſe came at twelve o'clock at night, his Lordſhip went immediately thither, though forty miles diſtant, and entered the place with only two or three ſervants, early the next morning (r). He offered his Majeſty to have ſecured for him that important fortreſs, and all the magazines that were there: but inſtead of receiving ſuch a command as he expected, his Majeſty ſent him inſtructions to obey whatever directions were ſent him by the Parliament; upon the heels of which, came their order for him to attend the ſervice of the Houſe; which he accordingly did, when a deſign was formed to have attacked him, but his general character was ſo good, that this ſcheme was let fall (s). The Earl of Newcaſtle upon this, retired again into the country, having little pleaſure in being at Court, where all things were viſibly tending to confuſion. He did not long, however, enjoy the repoſe he ſo earneſtly ſought; for upon the King's coming to York, his Lordſhip was ſent for thither; and in June 1642, his Majeſty gave him directions to take upon him the care of the town of Newcaſtle, and the command of the four adjacent counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, and Durham. Theſe orders were eaſily iſſued, but they were not ſo eaſily to be carried into execution; for at this time, the King had not either money, forces, or ammunition; and yet there never was more apparent neceſſity, for at that juncture his Majeſty had not a ſingle port open in his dominions; and if either the order had been delayed a few days, or had been ſent to any other perſon, the deſign had certainly miſcarried (t). But, as ſoon as he received his Majeſty's commands, he repaired immediately to the place, and by his own intereſt there ſecured it: he raiſed alſo a troop of one hundred and twenty horſe, and a good regiment of foot, which ſecured him from any ſudden attempts (u). Soon after, the Queen who was retired out of the kingdom, ſent a ſupply of arms and ammunition, which being deſigned for the troops under the King's command, the Earl took care they ſhould be ſpeedily and ſafely conducted to his Majeſty under the eſcort of his only troop, which his Majeſty kept, to the great prejudice of his own affairs in the North (w). The Parliament, in the mean time, had not forgotten the Earl's behaviour towards them, but as a mark of their reſentment excepted him by name; which was ſo far from diſcouraging, that it put his Lordſhip upon taking briſker meaſures; and having well conſidered his own influence in thoſe parts, he offered to raiſe an army in the North, for his Majeſty's ſervice (x). In return to this, he received all that was in the King's power to give, which was a commiſſion, conſtituting him General of all the forces raiſed North of Trent; and likewiſe General and Commander in Chief of ſuch as might be raiſed in the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, Lancaſter, Cheſter, Leiceſter, Rutland, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Eſſex; with power to confer the honour of Knighthood, coin money, and to print and ſet forth ſuch Declarations as ſhould ſeem to him expedient; of all which extenſive powers, though freely conferred, and without reſerve, his Lordſhip made a very ſparing uſe (y). But with reſpect to the more material point of raiſing men, his Lordſhip proſecuted it with ſuch diligence, that in leſs than three months, he had an army of eight thouſand horſe, foot, and dragoons, with which he marched directly into Yorkſhire; and his forces having defeated the enemy at Peirce-Bridge, his Lordſhip advanced to York, where Sir Thomas Glenham, the Governor, preſented him with the keys, and the Earl of Cumberland and many of the Nobility reſorted thither to compliment and to aſſiſt his Lordſhip (z). He did not long remain there; but having placed a good garriſon in the city, marched on towards Tadcaſter, where the Parliament forces were very advantageouſly poſted (a). The deſign which the Earl had formed, not only for reducing that place, but for making the troops that were there priſoners, failed, through the want of diligence in ſome of his officers; but notwithſtanding this, his Lordſhip attacked the place ſo vigorouſly, that the enemy thought fit to retire, and leave him in poſſeſſion of the beſt part of Yorkſhire (b). This advantage he improved to the utmoſt, by eſtabliſhing garriſons in proper places, particularly at Newark upon Trent, by which the greateſt part of Nottinghamſhire, and ſome part of Lincolnſhire, were kept in obedience (c). Thus ended the year 1642, when the King's affairs, under the direction of this noble Peer in the North, were in a fair and flouriſhing condition (d). In the beginning of 1643, his Lordſhip gave orders for a great convoy of ammunition to be removed from Newcaſtle to York, under the eſcort of a body of horſe, commanded by Lieutenant-General King, a Scotch officer, whom his Majeſty had lately created Lord Ethyn (e). The Parliament forces attempted to intercept this convoy at Yarum-Bridge, but were beaten on the firſt of February, with a great loſs (f). Soon after this, her Majeſty landing at Burlington, the Earl drew his forces that way to cover her journey to York, where ſhe ſafely arrived on the ſeventh of March (g), and having preſſing occaſions for money, his Lordſhip preſented her with three thouſand pounds, and furniſhed an eſcort of fifteen hundred men, under the command of Lord Percy, to conduct a ſupply of arms and ammunition to the King at Oxford, where he kept them for his own ſervice (h). Not long after, Sir Hugh Cholmondley and Captain Brown Buſhel were prevailed upon to return to (r) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 8, 9.

(s) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 167.

(t) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 12, 13. Clarendon's Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 223.

(u) Hiſtory of the Civil War, p. 97.

(w) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 117.

(x) Dugd. Baron. vol. ii. p. 421.

(y) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 15.

(z) Clare don's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 283.

(a) May's Hiſt. of the Parliament, l. iii. p. 61.

(b) Watwick's Memoirs, p. 236

(c) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 22.

(d) May's Hiſt. of the Parliament, l. iii. p. 61.

(e) Heath's Chr. p. 43.

(f) Hiſtorian's Guide, p. 20.

(g) Heath's Chron. p. 43.

(h) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 24.

their duty, and give up the important port and caſtle of Scarborough (i). This was followed by the routing Ferdinando Lord Fairfax on Seacroft, or as ſome call it Bramham-Moor, by Lord George Goring, then General of the Horſe under the Earl, when about eight hundred of the enemy were taken priſoners (k); and this again made way for another victory gained on Tankerſly-Moor (l). In the month of April, the Earl marched to reduce Rotheram, which he took by ſtorm, and ſoon after Sheffield (m); but in the mean time, Lord Goring and Sir Francis Mackworth were ſurprized, on the 21ſt of May, at Wakefield, where the former and moſt of his men were made priſoners, which was a great prejudice to the ſervice (n). In the ſame month, her Majeſty went from York to Pomfret under the eſcort of the Earl's forces; and from thence ſhe continued her journey to Oxford, with a body of ſeven thouſand horſe, foot, and dragoons, detached for that ſervice by the Earl; and thoſe forces, likewiſe, the King kept about him (o). In the month of June, the Earl reduced Howly-houſe by ſtorm; and on the thirtieth, gained a compleat victory over Ferdinando Lord Fairfax, though much ſuperior to him in numbers, on Adderton-Heath, near Bradford, where the enemy had ſeven hundred men killed, and three thouſand taken priſoners (p); and on the ſecond of July following, Bradford ſurrendered (q). The Earl advanced next into Lincolnſhire, where he took Gainſborough and Lincoln; but was then recalled by the preſſing ſolicitations of the gentlemen of Yorkſhire into that country, where Beverley ſurrendered to him on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt (r), and in the next month, his Lordſhip was prevailed on to beſiege Hull, the only place of conſequence then held for the Parliament in thoſe parts. Notwithſtanding theſe important ſucceſſes obtained by an army raiſed, and in a great meaſure kept up by his Lordſhip's perſonal influence and expence, there have not been wanting cenſures upon his conduct (s) [D]; of which, however, his Majeſty had ſo juſt a ſenſe, that by letters-patents dated the twenty-ſeventh of October, he advanced him to the dignity of Marquis of Newcaſtle; and in the preamble of his patent, all his ſervices are mentioned with ſuitable encomiums (t). That winter the Earl marched into Derbyſhire, and from thence to his own houſe at Welbeck in Not-

(i) May's Hiſt. of the Parliament, l. iii. p. 63, 64.

(k) Hiſtorian's Guide, p. 20.

(l) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 25.

(m) Hiſt. of the Civil War, p. 355.

(n) May's Hiſt. of the Parliament, l. iii. p. 67.

(o) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 27.

(p) May's Hiſt. of the Parliament, l. iii. p. 68. Hiſtorian's Guide, p. 22.

(q) Heath's Chr. p. 27.

(r) Hiſtorian's Guide, p. 23.

(s) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 237. 245.

(t) Dugd. Baron. vol. ii. p. 421.

[D] There have not been wanting cenſures upon his conduct.] In ſuch diſtracted times as theſe, when through private intrigues at Court, and the more open ſtruggle of civil and religious factions in the nation, all things were thrown into confuſion, it was no wonder, that let a man's character be what it would, he ſhould be liable, either to groundleſs calumnies or to unjuſt reprehenſions. It is ſaid of this noble Peer (11), that he was a perſon who liked the title, power, ſplendour, attendance, and pomp, of a General and Commander in Chief: that he affected to render his army numerous by increaſing the regiments, companies, and troops, of which it conſiſted, rather than by keeping a ſmaller number, and thoſe ſubſtantial, which had been more advantageous for the ſervice, as it would have been, if his garriſons had been fewer and ſtronger; that he was always jealous of his command, and equally afraid of it's being ſuperſeded or divided; which made him unwilling to march ſouthward on any condition, and hindered him from joining the King, that his glory might not be eclipſed by that of Prince Rupert; that he not only maintained but affected to ſhow his abſolute independance upon the Miniſters and Privy-Council at Oxford, by following entirely his own conceptions, and treating their commands with an indifference bordering on contempt; in fine, that there was ſomewhat romantic in his ſpirit, as appeared from his writings, his converſation, and the company he kept; that his courage was of the razor kind, and bore too thin and ſharp an edge; and that, upon the whole, he was a very fortunate General, but either through indolence or want of ſkill did not make the moſt of his good fortune. Theſe, ſo far as I can judge, are the principal ſtrokes of cenſure that have fallen upon this Nobleman's conduct; and after mentioning them, it ſeems to be a point of equity, to give the reader alſo ſome account of what the very ſame writers admit to have been fairly offered in his excuſe, or rather in his juſtification. It is then allowed, that the noble perſon of whom we are ſpeaking, was ſo far from ſeeking preferments, places, or power, that he declined all, and had retired into the country when the war broke out; and that he was drawn from this retirement by the reſpect that he thought due to his Maſter's poſitive commands, who ſent him an extenſive commiſſion without his ſeeking it; and from theſe two weighty motives, firſt, that without a Commander in Chief acting by ſuch a commiſſion, the North could not be preſerved; and ſecondly, that he had no ſubject in his dominions to whom this commiſſion could be given, but this noble Lord to whom it was ſent: That as he quitted his ſecurity, eaſe, and wonted courſe of life, and expoſed his perſon, ruined his fortune, and engaged his family and friends from the mere principles of loyalty; ſo his own noble diſpoſition led him to believe, that ſuch as profeſſed the ſame ſentiments that he did, would exert themſelves in the ſame manner, which induced him to multiply corps, and to give out ſo many commiſſions; and though the conſequence of this conduct might ſpeak it impolitic, yet, his Lordſhip's condition conſidered, it was not at all imprudent: for if thoſe whom he truſted had fulfilled their engagements, all had gone well; and conſidering the quality of the perſons truſted, and their capacity of diſcharging their truſts, and the intereſt they had in diſcharging them, the errors they committed were ſuch as he could not foreſee, and for which therefore he ought not to be brought to account: That as the army he commanded was entirely of his own raiſing, kept together chiefly by his influence, and not eaſy to be maintained in any quarters but thoſe which he aſſigned them, it was very natural for him, more eſpecially conſidering how neceſſary that army was to the defence of the North, to act as he did. We ought likewiſe to conſider, that when he ſent his only troop of horſe to Oxford, it was kept there; when he ſent an eſcort of fifteen hundred men, they were likewiſe kept; as the army alſo was, which was ſent to conduct the Queen with a train of artillery; ſo that he could not be ſaid with truth to act upon a narrow plan; and perhaps it might be ſaid with truth, that if he had kept the laſt-mentioned body, it had been better both for himſelf and the King. That the Miniſters at Oxford were very far from giving the King right advice, is generally allowed; that the orders ſent to this Nobleman were inconſiſtent with the King's ſervice in thoſe parts where his Lordſhip acted, may be preſumed; and therefore, that he did not hurt his Majeſty's ſervice by obeying them, ought not to be eſteemed a crime. Laſtly, as to his courage, it is fairly allowed, that upon ſeveral occaſions, when all things ſeemed to be loſt, they were retrieved by his ſignally expoſing his perſon, and engaging others to imitate his example; and though this may be called romantic, by perſons of a more phlegmatic temper, yet ſuch as conſider it attentively will hardly be brought to account it raſhneſs.

(11) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 403. Sir Philip Warwick's Memoirs, p. 235, 236. 243, 244, 245. Sir Richard Bulſtrode's Memoirs, p. 102. May's Hiſt. of the Parliament of Engl. l. iii. c. 4. Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, by his Ducheſs, p. 117. 120.

tinghamſhire, tinghamſhire, where he received the news of the Scots intending to enter England, which brought him back into Yorkſhire, from whence he ſent Sir Thomas Glenham to Newcaſtle, and himſelf for ſome time ſucceſsfully oppoſed the Scots in the Biſhoprick of Durham (u): but the forces he left behind under the command of Lord Bellaſis at Selby, being routed (w), the Marquis found himſelf obliged to retire, in order, if poſſible to preſerve York; and this he did with ſo much military prudence, that he arrived there ſafely in the month of April 1644, and retaining his infantry and artillery in that city, ſent his horſe to quarter in Derbyſhire, Nottinghamſhire, and Leiceſterſhire, for the ſake of ſubſiſtence (x). The city was very ſoon blocked up by three armies, who quickly commenced a regular ſiege, and were once very near taking the place by ſtorm; and at laſt, having lain before it three months, brought the garriſon into great diſtreſs for want of proviſion; and if the Marquis had not very early had recourſe to a ſettled and reaſonable, but withal a ſlender and a ſhort allowance, had infallibly reduced it by famine (y). For though Sir Charles Lucas, who commanded the Marquis's horſe, importuned the King for relief, yet it was the latter end of June before his Majeſty could ſend a ſufficient body, under the command of Prince Rupert, to join Sir Charles Lucas, and attempt the forcing the enemy to raiſe the ſiege; which, however, upon their approach, they did, remaining on the weſt ſide of the Owſe, with all their forces, while the King's army advanced on the eaſt ſide of the ſame river (z). By this quick and vigorous march, Prince Rupert had done his buſineſs; but, as is very well obſerved by a moſt judicious Hiſtorian of theſe times, he would needs overdo it; and not content with the honour of raiſing the ſiege of York by a confederate army much ſuperior to his own, he was bent upon having the honour to beat that army alſo; and this brought on the fatal battle of Heſſom, or, as it is more generally called, Marſton-Moor (a), which was fought July 2, 1644, againſt the conſent of the Marquis of Newcaſtle, who ſeeing the King's affairs totally undone thereby, made the beſt of his way to Scarborough, and from thence, with a few of the principal officers of his army, took ſhipping for Hamburgh (b). Thus the King's concerns in the North, that had proſpered ſo well under the prudent conduct of the Marquis, were ruined in a day by an unaccountable fatality, which ſome aſcribe to a ſlip of the Secretary's pen, and others, with greater appearance of truth, to the raſhneſs of Prince Rupert (c) [E]. After ſtaying about ſix months at Hamburgh, he went by ſea to Amſterdam, and from thence made a journey

(u) Heath's Chr. p. 53.

(w) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 43.

(x) Heath's Chron. p. 58.

(y) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 45.

(z) Heath's Chronicle, p. 58.

(a) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 279.

(b) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 51.

(c) See this point explained in the note.

[E] To the raſhneſs of Prince Rupert.] The accounts we have of this battle from ſeveral authors are in many reſpects irreconcileable, and ſome of their principal circumſtances contradictory to each other. We have not either room or leiſure to treat the matter at large, and ſhall therefore content ourſelves with repreſenting clearly thoſe circumſtances that regard the Marquis. He had thrown himſelf into York, and thereby hazarded his perſon for the preſervation of that important place; and did preſerve it by taking this ſtep, though beſieged by three great armies, and thoſe commanded by Generals of great reputation, viz. the Scots under Leſley, the Northern army under Fairfax, and the forces of the aſſociated counties under Mancheſter, ſeconded by Cromwell (12). When aſſiſtance from the King was ſolicited by the Marquis of Newcaſtle, he was ſo far from having any diſguſt to the perſon of Prince Rupert, that the noble Hiſtorian tells us, he wrote to the King that he hoped his Majeſty would not doubt his obeying the grandſon of King James (13). When the city was relieved, Lord Clarendon tells us, that the Prince engaged the enemy without conſulting the Marquis; but there is good reaſon to ſuſpect, that he was miſinformed. We are elſe where told (14), that the Marquis repaired to the Prince and adviſed him not to fight, for two reaſons, each of them ſo weighty, that, conſidered ſingly, they might have juſtified his Highneſs's taking that Lord's advice. The firſt was, that if he did not attempt beating the enemy into good humour with each other, they would infallibly break and retire ſeveral ways; the miſunderſtandings between their Generals being come to ſuch a height, that nothing could ſave them from ruin but a battle. The ſecond was, that his own troops having been ſo long ſhut up, were not in the beſt order for fighting; that within two days he expected Colonel Clavering with a reinforcement of three thouſand men, and two thouſand more that were to be collected from other garriſons; and farther ſtill, that the enemy had all advantages of ſun, wind, and ground. His Highneſs anſwered, that he had the King's poſitive command to fight the enemy, which therefore he would obey. In conſequence of this, there was ſome diſcourſe had with other officers as to the order and diſpoſition of the army. When theſe were adjuſted, the Marquis aſked his Highneſs where he would be pleaſed to have him charge; to which the Prince returned, that it was then too late to think of action, and that he would delay fighting till next morning, for which reaſon he adviſed the Marquis to go to his reſt. He went accordingly to ſleep in his coach, being exceedingly fatigued; but he had hardly compoſed himſelf a little, before he heard the thunder of cannon and ſmall arms, the battle being begun, ſo that he had only time to put himſelf at the head of his own regiment, where it is agreed, that both he and his troops did wonders. Prince Rupert charged at the head of the left wing, where Newcaſtle's horſe were under the command of Lord Goring; and they beat the Scots and Lord Fairfax's horſe, and purſued them ten miles (15); but in the mean time, Prince Rupert's horſe that were on the right of the King's army were beaten, and the Marquis's foot being thus uncovered, Cromwell with his reſerve came down upon them, and though they ſtood like a wall, yet they were mowed down like a meadow, as my author has it (16). At laſt, the Marquis's foot threw themſelves into a ring, and diſclaiming all thoughts of ſafety, refuſed quarter, and having ſlain more than had fallen in the whole action beſide, were themſelves to a man deſtroyed (17). The noble Hiſtorian (18) ſeems to blame the Marquis for quitting the kingdom ſo precipitately; but it is to be obſerved, that he, or rather the Prince, had loſt for him not a battle only but his army; for the Prince kept his horſe, and all the foot were cut off. The enemies Generals were pretty well reconciled by the victory, which put them in poſſeſſion of the open country, and ſoon after of the city of York. The Marquis's money was entirely exhauſted, and the only thing he had in his power, was to eſcape with the Lord Ethyn, Lord Falconbridge, Sir Hugh Cholmondley, and others of his friends, whoſe circumſtances, had they been taken, would have been as deſperate as his own (19). It ſeems, therefore, that what the Marquis did was purely from neceſſity, and no man in a ſhipwreck was ever yet blamed for ſecuring himſelf upon the firſt plank.

(12) Hiſt. of the Civil Wars of Great-Britain and Ireland, p. 121. Warwick's Memoirs, p. 278. Heath's Chron. p. 58, 59. Sir Richard Bulſtrode's Memoirs, p. 101, 102.

(13) Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 404.

(14) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, by his Ducheſs, p. 46, 47, 48.

(15) Hiſt. of the Civil Wars of Great-Britain and Ireland, p. 121. Heath's Chron. p. 58. Bulſtrode's Memoirs, p. 101, 102.

(16) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 280.

(17) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 49. Heath's Chron. p. 61.

(18) Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 402, 403, 404.

(19) Heath's Chron. p. 61. Warwick's Memoirs, p. 120. Bulſtrode's Memoirs, p. 102.

to Paris, where he continued for ſome time; and where, notwithſtanding the vaſt eſtate he had when the Civil War broke out, his circumſtances were now ſo bad, that himſelf, and his young wife, were reduced to the pawning their cloaths for a dinner (d). He removed afterwards to Antwerp, that he might be nearer his own country; and there, though under very great difficulties, he reſided for ſeveral years; while the Parliament in the mean time levied prodigious ſums upon his eſtate, inſomuch, that the computation of what he loſt by the diſorders of thoſe times, though none of the particulars can be diſproved, amount in the whole to a ſum that is almoſt incredible (e) [F]. All theſe hardſhips and misfortunes never broke his ſpirit in the leaſt, which was chiefly owing to his great foreſight; for as he plainly perceived after the battle of Marſton-Moor, that the affairs of Charles I. were irrecoverably undone, ſo he diſcerned through the thickeſt clouds of King Charles IId's adverſity, that he would be infallibly reſtored (f): and as he had predicted the Civil War to the father before it began, ſo he gave the ſtrongeſt aſſurance to the ſon of his being called home, by addreſſing to him a treatiſe upon Government and the Intereſts of Great-Britain, with reſpect to the other powers of Europe; which he wrote at a time, when the hopes of thoſe about his Majeſty ſcarcely roſe ſo high as the Marquis's expectations (g). During this long exile of eighteen years, in which he ſuffered ſo many and ſo great hardſhips, this worthy Nobleman wanted not ſome conſolations, that were particularly ſuch to one of his high and generous ſpirit. He was, notwithſtanding his low and diſtreſſed circumſtances, treated with the higheſt reſpect, and with the moſt extraordinary marks of diſtinction, by the perſons entruſted with the government of the countries where he reſided (h). He received the high compliment, of having the keys of the cities he paſſed through in the Spaniſh dominions offered him: he was viſited by Don John of Auſtria, and by ſeveral Princes of Germany (i). But what comforted him moſt, was the company very frequently of his royal Maſter, who, in the midſt of his ſufferings, beſtowed upon him the moſt noble Order of the Garter (k). At length, this dark period came to an end; and as he ſhared in the exile, ſo he ſhared in the bleſſings of his Majeſty's Reſtoration (l). On his return to England, he was received with all the reſpect due to his unſhaken fidelity and important ſervices; and, as a mark of the royal favour, was conſtituted Chief Juſtice in Eyre of the counties north of Trent (m); and, by letters-patents dated the ſixteenth of March 1664, was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Ogle, and Duke of Newcaſtle (n). He ſpent the remainder of his life, for the moſt part, in a country retirement, and in the purſuit of thoſe ſtudies which he moſt affected [G]. He alſo employed a great part of

(d) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 56.

(e) Lloyd's Memoirs of the Sufferers for King Charles I. p. 672.

(f) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 83.

(g) Ibid. p. 135.

(h) Ibid. p. 79.

(i) Ibid. p. 59. 79.

(k) Aſhmole's Order of the Garter, p. 717.

(l) Kennet's Chron. p. 850.

(m) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 138.

(n) Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii. p. 421.

[F] To a ſum that is almoſt incredible.] When one conſiders, that this noble perſon was the ſon of Sir William Cavendiſh's youngeſt ſon, and therefore inherited from his grandfather ſuch an eſtabliſhment only, as out of his fortune he could make for one child out of many, it will appear ſtrange, and yet it is certainly true, that at the breaking out of the Civil War, the Earl of Newcaſtle had one of the beſt eſtates in England (20). His grandmother, the Counteſs of Shrewſbury, left him her third huſband's Sir William St. Lowe's eſtate, which amounted to above fifteen hundred pounds a year. His mother, the Lady Ogle, left him three thouſand pounds a year, and twenty thouſand pounds in money. His firſt wife was an heireſs, and brought him two thouſand four hundred pounds a year, beſides a jointure of eight hundred pounds a year for her life. But without entering into farther particulars, it appears that his eſtates as they were let in the year 1641, in the counties of Nottingham, Lincoln, Derby, Stafford, Glouceſter, Somerſet, York, and Northumberland, produced twenty-two thouſand three hundred and ninety-three pounds a year; beſides which, by the death of his brother, he inherited an eſtate of two thouſand pounds a year more. All theſe fell at once into the hands of the Parliament, and brought no profit whatſoever to him for the ſpace of eighteen years, and in that time the Parliament took every method poſſible to make the moſt of them. They cut down woods upon ſeven of his eſtates to the value of forty-five thouſand pounds. They took from his brother, Sir Charles Cavendiſh, by way of compoſition, five thouſand pounds, after receiving all his rents for eight years; and in 1652, they diſpoſed of the whole Newcaſtle eſtate at the rate of five years and a half's purchaſe, by which they raiſed 111,593 l. 10 s. 11 d. at once. Beſides this, all his houſes were plundered and ruined, and the furniture either ſtolen or ſold, his ſtock of corn, cattle, &c. which was of great value, went the ſame way; as did alſo his excellent breed of horſes, which were his principal delight, and which were eſteemed as good as any in Europe. His parks were treated in like manner, ſo that at his return there was hardly a deer or tree left in, nay, ſcarcely a pale about them. But to cut this matter ſhort, we ſhall only add, that from a computation of theſe particulars it is affirmed, that the loſs ſuſtained by his Grace was rather over than under 733,579 l. (21).

(20) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 89, 107.

(21) Lloyd's Memoirs of the Sufferers for King Charles I. p. 673.

[G] And in the purſuit of thoſe ſtudies which he moſt affected.] This noble perſon was celebrated for his love to the Muſes from his youth; and though he thought ſo cloſely, when he was diſpoſed, on the moſt ſerious ſubjects, that the famous Mr. Hobbes, who was known to be not over fond of other men's notions, yet adopted ſome of his as his own; he was rather inclined to amuſe himſelf with lighter topicks, and was the great patron of the wits in the reign of King Charles I. This humour of his has drawn upon him the cenſure of ſome grave men. Lord Clarendon mentions this, yet with decency (22); but Sir Philip Warwick loſes all patience, and thinks it ſufficient to ruin this great General's character, that he appointed Sir William Davenant, a Poet, his Lieutenant General of the Ordnance (23); as if it were not poſſible for a man to have a turn to poetry, and a capacity for any thing elſe at the ſame time. It is a wonder he did not point out another ſlip in this noble Lord's conduct of the ſame kind, I mean his making the Rev. Mr. Hudſon, Scout Maſter-General of the army, who yet was an excellent maſter of his trade and a very able Divine: beſides (24), all the world knows, that Mr. Chillingworth, in argument, battered the Papal Church with very great ſucceſs, which however did not hinder his ſerving as an Engineer in the Royal army with great reputation (25). The truth is, that this worthy Nobleman living always magnificently, and having a great kindneſs for men of merit, never wanted them about him, and never failed to employ them the beſt way he could. The famous Ben Jonſon was one of his firſt favourites, and he addreſſed to him a very fine copy of verſes, which may be ſeen in his works (26). Mr. Shadwell

(22) Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 403.

(23) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 235, 236.

(24) Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, vol. ii. B. ix. p. 6—45.

(25) See his Life written by Mr. Des Maizeaux.

(26) Underwood, p. 223.

of his time in repairing the injuries which his fortune had received from the malignity of the times; and, equally full of years and of glory, died in poſſeſſion of the greateſt honours and the faireſt reputation, December 25, 1676, in the eighty-fourth year of his age (o). His Grace was twice married, but had iſſue only by his firſt Lady, of which the reader will find an account in the notes (p) [H]. His body lies interred, with that of his Ducheſs, under a moſt noble monument at the entrance into Weſtminſter-Abbey, with an inſcription ſuitable to his merits (q). His titles deſcended to his ſon Henry, Earl of Ogle, who was the laſt heir male of this family, and died July 26, 1691, in whom the title of Newcaſtle, in the line of Cavendiſh, extinguiſhed. But his daughters married into ſome of the nobleſt families of this kingdom, as the reader will ſee at the bottom of this article [I].

(o) See the inſcription on his monument in Weſtminſter-abbey.

(p) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 139.

(q) Antiquities of St. Peter's, Weſtminſter, vol. ii. p. 114.

Shadwell was one of the laſt, and he made his acknowledgments to his Grace in more than one Dedication (27). In the buſy ſcenes of life, it doth not appear that this noble Lord ſuffered his thoughts to ſtray ſo far from his employments as to write any thing: but in his exile, reſuming his old taſte of breaking and managing horſes, than which there could not be a more manly or martial exerciſe, he thought fit to give the world his ſentiments upon a ſubject which nobody knew better; and if we may credit what the beſt writers (28) on this head have ſince delivered, there is no great danger of any body's ever underſtanding it better. His firſt treatiſe he publiſhed in French; his ſecond near ten years after; their titles run thus:

(27) See his Dedications prefixed to his Epſom Wells, and to the Libertine.

(28) See M. de Soliel's Preface to his Le parfait Mareſchal.

La Methodo nouvelle des Dreſſer les Chevaux avec Figures, i. e. The new Method for managing Horſes with cuts. Antwerp 1658, in fol. This book was firſt written in Engliſh; and afterwards by his Lordſhip's directions tranſlated into French by a Walloon; and was till within theſe few years very ſcarce and dear.

A new Method and extraordinary Invention to dreſs Horſes, and work them according to Nature; as alſo to perfect Nature by the Subtlety of Art. fol. London 1667. The latter, as the Duke informs his reader, 'Is neither a tranſlation of the firſt, nor an 'abſolute neceſſary addition to it; and may be of 'uſe without the other, as the other hath been hither-'to, and ſtill is, without this; but both together will 'queſtionleſs do beſt.' A noble edition of this work has been of late years printed in this kingdom.

In his exile, he wrote alſo two Comedies, viz.

The Country Captain, a Comedy. Printed at Antwerp 1649; afterwards preſented by his Majeſty's ſervants at Black-Fryars, and very much commended by Mr. Leigh.

Variety, a Comedy, preſented by his Majeſty's ſervants at Black-Fryars; and firſt printed in 1649, and generally bound with the Country Captain. It was alſo highly commended in a copy of verſes by Mr. Alexander Brome.

He has likewiſe written

The Humorous Lovers, a Comedy, acted by his Royal Highneſs's ſervants. London 1677, 4*to*. This was received with great applauſe, and eſteemed one of the beſt plays of that time.

The triumphant Widow: or the medley of Humours, a Comedy, acted by his Royal Highneſs's ſervants. London 1677, 4*to*. which pleaſed Mr. Shadwell ſo well, that he tranſcribed a part of it into his Bury Fair, one of the moſt taking plays written by that Poet Laureat. His Grace wrote in Jonſon's manner, and is allowed by the beſt judges not to have been inferior to his maſter. We have many other pieces written by this ingenious Nobleman, ſcattered up and down in the poems of his Ducheſs; all which ſeem to confirm the character given by Mr. Shadwell, 'That 'he was the greateſt maſter of wit, the moſt exact 'obſerver of mankind, and the moſt accurate judge 'of humour that ever he knew (29).' *

(29) Langbaine's Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, p. 387.

* Whincop aſcribes to the Duke a Comedy, called the Exile; but its exiſtence is doubted, as no ſuch play is to be found in any of the collections now in being.

[H] Will find an account in the notes.] This noble Peer, as has been obſerved in the text, married two wives. The firſt was Elizabeth, daughter and ſole heir of William Baſſett of Blore in the county of Stafford, Eſq; widow of the Honourable Mr. Henry Howard, younger ſon to Thomas, Earl of Suffolk (30), by whom his Lordſhip had three ſons, and as many daughters, viz. William, who died young; Charles, Viſcount Mansfield, who ſerved under his father in the Civil War in quality of Maſter of the Ordnance: he married the daughter of Richard Rogers of Brianſton in the county of Dorſet, Eſq; but died in his father's life-time without iſſue; Henry, Earl of Ogle; who ſurvived his father and inherited his honours, and of whoſe poſterity we ſhall ſpeak in the next note. His Grace's daughters were theſe, Lady Jane, married to Charles Cheney of Cheſham Boys in the county of Bucks, Eſq; Lady Elizabeth, to John, Earl of Bridgwater; Lady Frances, to Oliver, Earl of Bolingbroke. His ſecond wife was Margaret, daughter to Charles Lucas of Colcheſter, Eſq; and ſiſter to John Lord Lucas, and to the famous Sir Charles Lucas, who was ſhot at Colcheſter for his fidelity to his Royal Maſter, by whom he had no iſſue (31). She lies buried with him at Weſtminſter-Abbey, was the conſtant companion of his exile abroad, and of his retirement at home. She was a woman of great wit, and ſome learning; for beſides the life of the Duke and her own, ſhe wrote a great number of folio's, and publiſhed ſix and twenty plays; in ſeveral of which, there are ſcenes and ſongs written by the Duke. It muſt be owned, that in many of theſe pieces there is much extravagance, and more of fancy than of judgment in them all: but at the ſame time it ſhould be conſidered, that this was in a good meaſure owing to the humour of the age, and to her having lived ſo long abroad.

(30) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 422.

(31) See the inſcription on their monument in Weſtminſter-abbey.

[I] Will ſee at the bottom of this article.] Henry Cavendiſh, Duke, Marquis, and Earl of Newcaſtle, &c. eſpouſed Frances, eldeſt daughter to William Pierpoint of Thoreſby in the county of Nottingham, ſecond ſon to the Earl of Kingſton, by whom he had one ſon, Henry, Earl of Ogle (32), who died in his father's life-time, and five daughters, viz. Lady Elizabeth, married to Chriſtopher Monk, Duke of Albemarle; and ſecondly, to Ralph, Duke of Montagu; Lady Frances, married to John Campbell, then Lord Glenorchy, afterwards Earl of Broadalbin; Lady Margaret, married to John Holles, Earl of Clare, afterwards Duke of Newcaſtle, by whom ſhe left iſſue one ſole daughter and heir, the Lady Henrietta Cavendiſh Holles, married to Edward, Earl of Oxford; Lady Catherine, married to Thomas Tufton Earl of Thanet; Lady Arabella, youngeſt daughter, married to Charles Spencer, Earl of Sunderland (33). C.

(32) Dugdale's Baron. vol. iii. p. 422.

(33) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 139.

 [This, we are apprehenſive, is one of the articles wherein our ingenious and candid predeceſſor, Dr. Campbell, hath carried his praiſes to the utmoſt height of which they were capable of being raiſed. Indeed, we entirely agree in opinion with Mr. Walpole, that "the ample encomiums would endure ſome abatement (34)." With regard to what is ſaid, in particular, concerning the Marquis of Newcaſtle's military conduct, his character ſeems to be overrated. If his behaviour to the Earl of Holland contributed to raiſe his reputation, it procured for him a reward which that behaviour did not merit. Little ſervice could be expected from an army in which an inferior officer might challenge his General, on account of a ſuppoſed ſlight in the giving of orders; and thoſe perſons muſt have had ſtrange ideas of the laws of honour, who could blame a commander in chief for refuſing ſo unſoldierly a challenge. When the Marquis was himſelf raiſed to the ſupreme command of the northern counties of England, his conduct was not ſuch as entitled him to be called one of the moſt able Generals of the age. This is agreed upon by thoſe contemporary writers, who do not appear to have had any prejudices againſt him, and who muſt have been the beſt judges of the ſubject. "He "liked the pomp, ſays Lord Clarendon, and abſo-"lute authority of a General well, and preſerved "the dignity of it to the full; and for the diſcharge

(34) Royal and noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 14. Second edition.

"of

" of the outward ſtate and circumſtances of it, in " acts of courteſy, affability, bounty, and generoſity, " he abounded; which, in the infancy of a war, " became him, and made him, for ſome time, very " acceptable to men of all conditions. But the " ſubſtantial part, and fatigue of a General, he did " not in any degree underſtand (being utterly unac- " quainted with war) nor could ſubmit to; but re- " ferred all matters of that nature to his Lieutenant " General King; who, no doubt, was an officer of " great experience and ability; yet, being a Scotch- " man, was, in that conjuncture, upon more diſ- " advantage than he would have been, if the Ge- " neral himſelf had been more intent upon his com- " mand (35)." The like account of things is given by the other Hiſtorians who flouriſhed in the ſame period, and they are followed in this reſpect by the moſt judicious modern authors. Mr. Hume obſerves, that the Marquis of Newcaſtle was engaged in military operations, contrary to the natural bent of his diſpoſition; that the fatigues of war were oppreſſive to the indolence of his temper; and that the ſeverity and application, requiſite to the ſupport of diſcipline, were qualities in which he was entirely wanting (36). Mr. Granger remarks, that his conduct, after the defeat of Ferdinando, Lord Fairfax, at Adderton Moor, has been juſtly cenſured; that it ſeems to have contributed greatly to the ruin of the King's affairs; and that the Marquis was much better qualified for a Court than a Camp (37). Both theſe writers agree, likewiſe, that Sir William Davenant, and the other perſons in whom he placed confidence, were but ill qualified for the buſineſs which they undertook. It is not denied, that the Marquis of Newcaſtle was, at times, an active and ſpirited commander; and that he obtained ſeveral conſiderable advantages over the enemy. Lord Clarendon takes notice, that in all actions of the field he was ſtill preſent, and never abſent in any battle; that he always gave inſtances of invincible courage and fearleſſneſs in danger; and that, by expoſing himſelf notoriouſly, he did ſometimes change the fortune of the day, when his troops began to give ground. But the noble Hiſtorian adds, that no ſooner were ſuch articles of action over, than he retired to his delightful company, muſic, or his ſofter pleaſures; to all which he was ſo indulgent, and to his eaſe, that he would not be interrupted upon any occaſion whatſoever; inſomuch that he ſometimes denied admiſſion to the chiefeſt officers of the army, even to General King himſelf, for two days together, whence many inconveniencies reſulted (38). Upon what reaſonable grounds could ſuch a man be ſtyled one of the moſt able Generals of the age; and eſpecially of an age which was remarkably diſtinguiſhed for producing great men in the military line?

(35) Hiſtory of the Rebellion, vol. ii. Part 2d. p. 509. Octavo edition.

(36) Hiſt. of England, vol. vii. p. 12, 13.

(37) Biographical Hiſtory, vol. ii. p. 124, 125.

(38) Clarendon, ubi ſupra.

Our learned predeceſſor is guilty of an equal exceſs in his praiſes of the Duke of Newcaſtle as a writer. His treatiſe on horſemanſhip, indeed, is allowed to have merit; but his other works are held in little eſteem. To ſay that his Grace wrote ſo much in Ben Jonſon's manner, that he is allowed by the beſt judges not to have been inferior to his maſter, is the extravagance of encomium. Who are theſe beſt judges? Even Langbaine, who is ſufficiently copious in his applauſes of the Duke, doth not go ſo far. He only ſays, that it was from Jonſon that his Grace attained to a perfect knowledge of what was to be accounted true humour in Comedy. The ſame author, likewiſe, aſſerts, that the play of the " Humorous Lovers" equals moſt Comedies of the age (39). But ſtill he doth not put the Duke upon a level with Ben Jonſon; nor can any of the dramatic productions of the former, pretend to be mentioned with the " Every Man in his Humour," the " Alchymiſt," the " Silent Woman," and the " Volpone," of the latter. If they could, they would not be ſo totally neglected and forgotten as they are at preſent. The Biographia Dramatica hath not much renewed the praiſes beſtowed upon his Grace's Comedies. All it ſays is, that " The Variety" was acted with very great applauſe at Black-Friars; and that " The Triumphant Widow" is eſteemed an excellent play, though now it is never repreſented (40).

(39) Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, p. 386, 387.

Mr. Granger mentions ſeveral engraved prints of the Duke; one from Vandyck, another by Hollar, and the reſt from portraits by Abraham Diepenbeck, a Painter much encouraged by his Grace. Diepenbeck was one of the few ſcholars of Reubens that came to England. He drew his noble patron's managed horſes from the life, whence were engraved the cuts that adorn his book of horſemanſhip. Some of the original pictures ſtill remain in the hall at Welbeck. Diepenbeck drew, likewiſe, views of the Duke's ſeats in Nottinghamſhire and Derbyſhire; and, beſides the portraits of the Duke, Ducheſs, and his children, gave deſigns for ſeveral plates prefixed to the works of both their Graces (41).

(40) Biographia Dramatica, vol. ii. p. 379. 388.

John Egerton, Earl of Bridgwater, to whom the Duke of Newcaſtle's ſecond daughter, Elizabeth, was married, deſired to have it recorded on his tomb, that " he enjoyed, almoſt twenty-two years, all the " happineſs that a man could receive in the ſweet " ſociety of the beſt of wives." It is ſaid of this Lady, that the virtues and graces conſpired to render her one of the moſt excellent and amiable of women (42).

(41) Granger's Biogr. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 124. Vol. iii. p. 20. 98. Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting, vol. ii. p. 95.

Lord Clarendon hath given ſo high a character of Sir Charles Cavendiſh, the Marquis of Newcaſtle's brother, that it well deſerves to be inſerted in this place. " The converſation the Chancellor took moſt " delight in (43), was that of Sir Charles Caven- " diſh, brother to the Marquis; who was one of the " moſt extraordinary perſons of that age, in all the " noble endowments of the mind. He had all the " diſadvantages imaginable in his perſon; which " was not only of ſo ſmall a ſize, that it drew the " eyes of men upon him; but with ſuch deformity " in his little perſon, and an aſpect in his counte- " nance, that was apter to raiſe contempt than ap- " plication: but in this unhandſome or homely ha- " bitation, there was a mind and a ſoul lodged that " was very lovely and beautiful; cultivated and po- " liſhed by all the knowledge and wiſdom that arts " and ſciences could ſupply it with. He was a great " Philoſopher, in the extent of it; and an excellent " Mathematician; whoſe correſpondence was very " dear to Gaſſendus and Deſcartes; the laſt of which " dedicated ſome of his works to him. He had " very notable courage; and the vigour of his mind " ſo adorned his body, that being with his brother " the Marquis in all the war, he uſually went out " in all parties, and was preſent, and charged the " enemy in all battles, with as keen a courage as " could dwell in the heart of man. But then the " gentleneſs of his diſpoſition, the humility and " meekneſs of his nature, and the vivacity of his " wit, were admirable. He was ſo modeſt, that he " could hardly be prevailed with to enlarge himſelf " on ſubjects he underſtood better than other men, " except he were preſſed by his very familiar friends; " as if he thought it preſumption to know more than " handſomer men uſe to do. Above all, his virtue " and piety was ſuch, that no temptation could work " upon him to conſent to any thing, that ſwerved in " the leaſt degree from the preciſe rules of honour, " or the moſt ſevere rules of conſcience (44)." This gentleman, being prevailed upon, by the Chancellor, to go to England, to compound for his eſtate, that he might be of ſervice to his family and friends, accompliſhed his purpoſe, but died before his return to Antwerp (45).] K.

(42) Granger, ubi ſupra, vol. iii. p. 20, 21.—Note.

(43) Whilſt he reſided at Antwerp.

(44) Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, vol. i. p. 249, 250. Octavo edition.

(45) Ibid. p. 250—253.

 [CAVENDISH (MARGARET), Ducheſs of Newcaſtle, and ſecond wife to the Nobleman who is the ſubject of the preceding article, was born at St. John's, near Colcheſter, in Eſſex, about the latter end of the reign of King James the Firſt. Her father, of whom ſhe was the youngeſt daughter, was Sir Charles Lucas, a gentleman of a very ancient and honourable family, and who was himſelf a man of great ſpirit and fortune. Dying young, he left the care of his children to his widow, a lady of exquiſite beauty beauty and admirable accompliſhments, who took upon herſelf the education of her daughters, and inſtructed them in needle-work, dancing, muſic, the French tongue, and other things that were proper for women of faſhion. As, however, Miſs Margaret Lucas had, from her infancy, a natural inclination for literature, and ſhe ſpent much of her time in ſtudy and writing, her Biographers have lamented that ſhe had not the advantage of an acquaintance with the learned languages, which might have extended her knowledge, refined her genius, and have been of infinite ſervice to her in the numerous compoſitions and productions of her pen (a). In 1643, ſhe obtained permiſſion from her mother to go to Oxford, where the Court then reſided, and where ſhe could not fail of meeting with a favourable reception, on account of the diſtinguiſhed loyalty of her family (b), as well as of her own accompliſhments. Accordingly, ſhe was appointed one of the Maids of Honour to Henrietta Maria, the royal conſort of King Charles the Firſt; and, in that capacity, accompanied her Majeſty to France, when the Queen was obliged, by the Civil War, to quit England, and retire to her native country. At Paris Miſs Lucas firſt ſaw the Marquis of Newcaſtle, then a widower, who admiring her perſon, diſpoſition, and ingenuity, was married to her at that place, in the year 1645 (c). The Marquis had heard of the lady's character before he met with her in France; for having been a friend and patron of her gallant brother, Lord Lucas, he took occaſion one day to aſk his Lordſhip in what reſpect he could promote his intereſt. To this his Lordſhip replied, that he was not ſolicitous about his own affairs, as being prepared to ſuffer either exile or death in the royal cauſe; but that he was chiefly concerned for his ſiſter, on whom he could beſtow no fortune, and whoſe beauty expoſed her to danger. At the ſame time, he repreſented her other amiable qualities in ſo ſtriking a light, as raiſed the Marquis's curioſity to ſee her (d). After their marriage, the Marquis and Marchioneſs of Newcaſtle went from Paris to Rotterdam, where they reſided ſix months. From Rotterdam they removed to Antwerp, which they fixed upon as the place of their reſidence during the time of their exile. In this city they enjoyed as quiet and pleaſant a retirement as their ruined fortunes would permit. Though the Marquis had much reſpect paid him by all men, as well foreigners as thoſe of his own country, he principally confined himſelf to the ſociety of his Lady (e), who, both by her writings and her converſation, proved a moſt agreeable companion to him during his melancholy receſs. The exigency of their affairs obliged the Marchioneſs once to come over to England. Her view was to obtain ſome of the Marquis's rents, in order to ſupply their preſſing neceſſities, and pay the debts they had contracted. Accordingly, ſhe went with Lord Lucas, her brother, to Goldſmiths-Hall; but could not procure a grant from the rulers of thoſe times, to receive one penny out of her noble huſband's vaſt inheritance: and had it not been for the ſeaſonable generoſity of Sir Charles Cavendiſh, ſhe and her Lord muſt have been expoſed to extreme poverty. At length, however, having obtained a conſiderable ſum from her own and the Marquis's relations, ſhe returned to Antwerp. Here ſhe continued with him till the Reſtoration, and employed herſelf in writing ſeveral of her works.

When upon King Charles the Second's recovering the throne of his anceſtors, the Marquis of Newcaſtle came back to his native country, he left his Lady ſome little time abroad, to diſpatch his affairs there; which having managed in a ſatisfactory manner, ſhe followed her conſort to England. The remaining part of the Ducheſs's life was principally employed in compoſing and writing Letters, Plays, Poems, Philoſophical Diſcourſes, and Orations (f) [A]. It is ſaid, that ſhe was of a very generous turn of mind,

(a) Ballard's Memoirs of Britiſh Ladies, p. 209. octavo edition. Cibber's Lives of the Poets, vol. ii. p. 162, 163.

(b) Dugdale's Baronage, p. 473, 474.

(c) Ballard and Cibber, ubi ſupra.

(d) Cibber, ubi ſupra.

(e) Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, vol. i. p. 249.

(f) Ballard, ubi ſupra, p. 209, 210. Cibber, ubi ſupra.

[A] Principally employed in compoſing and writing Letters, Plays, Poems, Philoſophical Diſcourſes, and Orations.] The following is a catalogue of her works, which we have tranſcribed from Mr. Ballard. 1. "The World's Olio." Which I have not yet ſeen. 2. "Nature Picture, drawn by Fancie's Pencil, to the Life. Written by the thrice Noble, Illuſtrious, and Excellent Princeſs, the Lady Marchioneſs of Newcaſtle. In this volume there are ſeveral feigned ſtories of Natural Deſcriptions, as Comical, Tragical, and Tragicomical, Poetical, Romancical, Philoſophical, and Hiſtorical, both in Proſe and Verſe, ſome all Verſe, ſome all Proſe, ſome mixt, partly Proſe and partly Verſe. Alſo, there are ſome Morals, and ſome Dialogues; but they are as the advantage Loaf of Bread to the Bakers dozen, and a true Story at the latter end, wherein there is no feigning." London, 1656. Fol. 3. "Orations of divers ſorts, accommodated to divers Places. Written by, &c. the Lady Marchioneſs of Newcaſtle." Fol. London, 1662. 4. "Plays. Written by, &c. the Lady Marchioneſs of Newcaſtle." London, 1662. 5. "Philoſophical and Phyſical Opinions. Written by, &c. the Lady Marchioneſs of Newcaſtle." London, 1663. Fol. 6. "Obſervations upon Experimental Philoſophy: To which is added, the Deſcription of a new World. Written by, &c. the Dutcheſs of Newcaſtle." 2d Edit. London, 1668. Fol. Mr. James Briſtow began to tranſlate ſome of theſe philoſophical diſcourſes into the Latin tongue. Vid. Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. Col. 835. 7. "Philoſophical Letters or Modeſt Reflections upon ſome Opinions in Natural Philoſophy, maintained by ſeveral famous and learned Authors of this Age, expreſſed by way of Letters: by, &c. the Lady Marchioneſs of Newcaſtle." London, 1664. Fol. 8. "Poems and Phancies. Written by, &c. the Lady Marchioneſs of Newcaſtle. The ſecond Impreſſion, much altered and corrected." London 1664. Fol. 9. "CCXI. Sociable Letters. Written by, &c. the Lady Marchioneſs of Newcaſtle." London, 1664. Fol. 10. "The Life of the thrice Noble, High and Puiſſant Prince William Cavendiſhe, Duke, Marquiſs, and Earl of Newcaſtle; Earl of Ogle; Viſcount Mansfield; and Baron of Bolſover, of Ogle, Bothal and Hepple: Gentleman of his Majeſty's Bedchamber, one of his Majeſtie's moſt honourable Privy Council; Knight of the moſt noble Order of the Garter: His Majeſtie's Lieutenant of the County and mind, and kept a number of young ladies about her perſon, who occaſionally wrote what ſhe dictated. Some of them ſlept in a room contiguous to that in which her Grace lay, that they might be ready, at the call of her bell, to riſe at any hour of the night, to take down her conceptions, leſt they ſhould eſcape her memory. The taſk of theſe young ladies was not very pleaſant; and there can be no doubt but that they frequently wiſhed that their lady's poetical and philoſophical imagination had been leſs fruitful; eſpecially, as ſhe was not deſtitute of ſome degree of peeviſhneſs (g). If the Ducheſs's merit as an author were to be eſtimated from the quantity of her works, ſhe would have the precedence of all female writers, ancient or modern. She produced no leſs than thirteen folios, ten of which are in print (h). Of all the riders of Pegaſus, obſerves Mr. Walpole, there have not been a more fantaſtic couple than his Grace and his faithful Ducheſs, who was never off her pillion (i). The life of the Duke her huſband, is the moſt eſtimable of her productions; but it abounds in trifling circumſtances. The touches on her own character are curious: ſhe ſays, "That it pleaſed "God to command his ſervant Nature to indue her with a poetical and philoſophical "genius even from her birth, for ſhe did write ſome books even in that kind before "ſhe was twelve years of age." But though ſhe had written philoſophy, it ſeems ſhe had read none; for at nearly forty years of age, ſhe informs us that ſhe applied to the peruſal of philoſophical authors—"In order to learn the terms of art." But what gives one, continues Mr. Walpole, the beſt idea of her unbounded paſſion for ſcribbling, was her ſeldom reviſing the copies of her works, leſt it ſhould diſturb her following conceptions (k).

(g) Cibber, ubi ſupra.

(h) Granger's Biographical Hiſt. vol. iv. p. 60.

(i) Walpole's royal and noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 125

(k) Walpole, ubi ſupra, p. 13.

But though the Ducheſs's literary character and works are now treated with ſuch general diſregard, this was by no means the caſe during her own life. The compliments that were paid her were abſurd and extravagant in the higheſt degree. Nor were theſe compliments beſtowed upon her by perſons whoſe applauſes might be deemed of little eſtimation, but by learned bodies, and by men of great eminence in literature. From a book now uncommonly ſcarce, Mr. Granger hath given a few ſpecimens of the adulations addreſſed to her Grace by thoſe to whom ſhe made preſents of her writings [B].

George

and Town of Nottingham, and Juſtice in Ayre Trent North: who had the Honour to be Governour to our moſt Glorious King and Gracious Sovereign, in his Youth, when he was Prince of Wales; and ſoon after was made Captain General of all the Provinces beyond the River of Trent, and other Parts of the Kingdom of England, with Power, by a ſpecial Commiſſion, to make Knights. Written by the Thrice Noble, Illuſtrious, and excellent Princeſs, Margaret Dutcheſs of Newcaſtle, his Wife." Fol. Lond. 1667. This work (which Mr. Langbaine ſtiles the crown of her labours) was tranſlated into Latin, and printed with the following title: "De Vita & Rebus Geſtis Nobiliſſimi Illuſtriſſimique Principis, Gulielmi, Ducis Novo-Caſtrenſis, commentarii: Ab Excellentiſſima Principe, Margareta, ipſius Uxore Sanctiſſima Conſcripti. Et ex Anglico in Latinum converſi." London, 1668. Fol. II. "Plays, never before printed." London, 1668. Fol. This book I have not ſeen, and am obliged to Mr. Langbaine for the notice of it; as the Ladies will be for the catalogue of her Plays, which here follow in the ſame order that gentleman has placed them. "Apocryphal Ladies, a Comedy." This play conſiſts of three and twenty ſcenes, but is not divided into acts. "Bell in Campo, a Tragedy," in two parts; in the ſecond play are ſeveral copies of verſes written by the Duke of Newcaſtle. "Blazing World, a Comedy." Though this be ſtiled a play in former catalogues, yet it is but a fragment; the authoreſs before ſhe finiſhed the ſecond act deſiſted, not finding her genius tend to the proſecution of it. "Bridals, a Comedy." "Comical Haſh, a Comedy." This play has not been in any catalogue before. "Convent of Pleaſure, a Comedy." "Female Academy, a Comedy." "Lady Contemplation, a Comedy," in two parts. Three ſcenes in the firſt, and two in the ſecond part, were written by the Duke. "Love's Adventure, in two parts, a Comedy." The ſong, and the epithalamium, in the laſt ſcene in the ſecond part, was likewiſe written by the Duke. "Matrimonial Trouble," in two parts; the ſecond being a Tragedy, or as the authoreſs ſtiles it, a Tragi-Comedy. "Nature's three Daughters, Beauty, Love, and Wit, a Comedy," in two parts. "Preſence, a Comedy." To this are added twenty-nine ſingle ſcenes, which the Dutcheſs deſigned to have inſerted in this play, but finding it would too much lengthen it, ſhe printed them ſeparately. "Publick Wooing, a Comedy." In which the Duke wrote ſeveral of the ſuitors ſpeeches; as that of the ſoldier, the countryman, the ſpokeſman for the baſhful ſuitor; beſides two other ſcenes, and the two ſongs at the end of the Comedy. "Religious, a Tragi-Comedy." "Several Wits, a Comedy." "Sociable Companions, or the Female Wits, a Comedy." "Unnatural Tragedy." The prologue and epilogue were of the Duke's making. Act II. Scene III. the Dutcheſs againſt Mr. Camden's Britannia: though whether with juſtice, I leave to the determination of others. "Wits Cabal, a Comedy," in two parts. His Grace wrote the epilogue to the firſt part. "Youth's Glory, and Death's Banquet, a Tragedy," in two parts. Two ſcenes, with the ſpeeches at the firſt part, in commendation of Mlle Sans pareille, were written by his Grace; ſo were all the ſongs and verſes in the ſecond part. "The Blazing World, Bridal, Convent of Pleaſure, Preſence, and Sociable Companions," are printed together in one volume; and the reſt in another. In the library of the late Mr. Thomas Richardſon was the Dutcheſs of Newcaſtle's Poems, 2 Vol. Fol. MS. Vid. Richardſon's Cat. p. 50. And in the library of the late Biſhop Willis was another MS. of her poems in Fol. Vid. Cat. p. 55. Whether ever printed, I know not (1)." The Biographia Dramatica hath given the liſt of her plays in a different order, and they amount, in the whole, to twenty-ſeven in number (2). The ſame work hath not entered into a diſcuſſion of the merits of any of theſe dramatical productions, probably conſidering them as totally unworthy of a critical examination. We have taken notice, in the article of Camden, of the Ducheſs's having, in one of her plays, a whole ſcene againſt that eminent writer's Britannia.

(1) Ballard's Memoirs of Britiſh Ladies, p. 210—213.

(2) Vol. i. p. 64, 65.

[B] Hath given a few ſpecimens of the adulations addreſſed to her Grace.] "There is, ſays Mr. Granger, a very ſcarce folio volume of Letters and Poems, printed in 1678. It conſiſts of one hundred and eighty-two pages, filled with the groſſeſt and moſt fulſome panegyric on the Duke and Dutcheſs of Newcaſtle, eſpecially her Grace. I know no flattery, ancient or modern, that is, in any degree, comparable to it, except the deification of Auguſtus, and the erection

George Steevens, Eſq; the ingenious and learned editor of Shakſpeare, hath favoured us with a much larger number of extracts from the ſame book; and his communication will form a very curious and valuable note [C]. Such a profuſion of incenſe reflects diſcredit erection of altars to him in his life-time. Incenſe and adoration ſeem to have been equally acceptable to the Roman god and Engliſh goddeſs. This is part of a letter of thanks ſent to the Dutcheſs by Anthony Thyſius, Rector of the Univerſity of Leyden, upon the receipt of her works, which ſhe ſent to the public library. Princeps fœminini ſexûs merito diceris. Abripitur fœcunda tua eruditio, per cœlos, terras, maria, & quicquid in natura vel civili vita, ullove ſcientiarum genere nobile occurrit. Ipſa Pallas academiæ noſtræ præſes tibi aſſurgit, gratiaſque immenſas pro veſtro munere agit, & cum imaginem veſtram aſpicit, ſeipſam, veluti in ſpeculo, intueri videtur.

" The following paſſages came from Cambridge. —Nondum, (quod ſcimus) annalibus excidêre, neque certe per nos unquam excident, erudita nomina, Aſpaſia Periclis, Odenati Zenobia, Polla Lucani, Boethii Ruſticiana; quæ tamen, ſi reviviſcerent hodie, adeo tecum (inclyta dux) de eruditionis palma non contenderent, at famæ tuæ potius ancillantes, ſolam Margaretam conſummatiſſimam principem & agnoſcerent & poſito genu certatim adorarent.—In auctiorem nominis veſtri famam optamus teſtatioreſque virtutes tuas, ut tot tanquam erudita opera, tali aliquando idiomate exeant, quali inter Romanos, Tullium & Maronem; inter Graios, Platonem & Demoſthenem, legimus & miramur. Omnem illam fortunæ magnitudinem immortalis ingenii felicitate ita ſuperas, ut quæ verſare ſolemus exemplaria Græca Latinaque miſſa jam facere, & tua unius ſapientia contenti eſſe poſſimus. Quoties enim in philoſophiam ſecedis, ſola magiſtri nullius in verba juras, ſed in omni doctorum familia laborans, & ſubtiliter expendis, & acute diſcernis, & ad unguem caſtigas, quicquid aut riſit Democritus, aut flevit Heraclitus, aut deliravat Epicurus, aut tacuit Pythagoras, aut intellexit Ariſtoteles, aut ignoravit Arceſilas; nec omittis ſiquid majorum inventis addidêre novi homines, Verulamius, Harvæus, Carteſius, Galilæus.

" I ſhall finiſh the climax with another paſſage addreſſed, on the ſame occaſion, to her Grace, from Oxford. We have a manuſcript author in the Bodlie's library, who endeavours to ſhew that women excel men: your Excellency has proved what he propoſed, has done what he endeavoured, and given a demonſtrative argument to convince the otherwiſe unbelieving world.

" However ſtrange it may ſeem, yet nothing is more certain than that theſe monſtrous ſtrains of panegyric relate chiefly to that wild philoſophy which would have puzzled the whole Royal Society, and on account of which ſhe ſeems to have been deſirous of being admitted to one of their meetings (3)." *

(3) Granger's Biogr. Hiſt. vol. iv. p. 61. note.

* She was accordingly admitted to one of them.

[C] Will form a very curious and valuable note.] The following extracts from " A Collection of Letters and Poems, written by ſeveral Perſons of Honour and Learning, upon divers important Subjects, to the late Duke and Dutcheſs of Newcaſtle (4)," will abundantly prove that academick flattery is of all others the moſt ſhameleſs and unpardonable. Such falſe praiſes might indeed be forgiven to individuals, whoſe deciſions are ſometimes warped by friendſhip, or corrupted by want; but ſocieties of erudite men, acting collectively, ſhould reſpect their ſituation, and withhold their applauſe from worthleſs compoſitions, though produced by noble or even royal authors.—When our ſtately pedants preſented their fantaſtick trifles to many of the libraries in both our Univerſities, theſe favours were acknowledged in a proportionable number of epiſtles which, had their publication been foreſeen, we may ſuppoſe would never have been written. Perhaps, however, the vanity of the Duke could not permit ſuch ſplendid teſtimonials of the literary merits of his conſort and himſelf to remain in obſcurity, but commended them to be printed after his death. They accordingly appeared in a thin folio (dated 1678), which is now become ſo rare as to have eſcaped the notice of the learned and inquiſitive compilers of the firſt edition of the Biographia Britannica. I have ſeen only one copy of theſe compli-mental addreſſes; the reſt, in all probability, being conſumed in the ſervice of Paſtry-cooks and Trunk-makers.

(4) London, printed for Langley Curtis, in Goat-Yard, on Ludgate-Hill.

The Maſter and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge, deliver their ſentiments to the Dutcheſs in the following words. " In your poeſy we praiſe that life and native verdure every way conſiſtent with itſelf. Caſtalian-like, it ſtands not ſtill, nor boils over, but with a gentle ſtream doth touch our ears, and ſlide into our minds." Again, " Truth to your Grace doth freely open and unbowel herſelf, fearing to be branded with incivility if ſhe ſhould deny: your Grace only amongſt women owes nothing to nature: for how much ſoever ſhe hath graced you with an incomparable luſtre in your feature, or pregnancy of wit, your Grace hath returned all of it in theſe elegancies of philoſophy and poeſie, with a moſt excellent retaliation." [p. 4, 5.]

John Pearſon, Maſter of Trinity College, Cambridge, 1663 (5), indulges himſelf in this florid interrogatory. " We who wonder that the ancients ſhould adore the ſame tutelar Goddeſs both of arts and arms, what ſhall we think of your Excellency, who are both a Minerva and an Athens to yourſelf, the Muſes as well as an Helicon, Ariſtotle as well as his Lycæum?" [p. 11.]

(5) John Pearſon, afterwards Biſhop of Cheſter, and writer on the Creed.

The Vice Chancellor and Senate of the ſame Univerſity, 1663, are not leſs magnificent in their thanks and queſtions.—" Præcipiti quodam impetu non modo gloriæ tuæ favemus, verum etiam Excellentiſſimam Heroinam, tanquam cœlo delapſum Sibyllam veneramur. Quippe fœmineæ ſortis egreſſa terminos, longè ultra mundum muliebrem ſapis, & quicquid uſpiam egregium aut divinum eſt intra mortales, id tuo tibi jure vindicas. Sive ſtas in acie, ſive exerces tribunalia, ſive carmen fundis, ſive nodos explicas, nuſquam hæres, nuſquam ſuccumbis, Dux, Miles, Senator, Poeta, Philoſophus, ac (ut verbo expediamus) una omnium inſtar. Interrogare te porrò cupimus, iſta tam lætæ indolis, tam felicis ingenii, tam excelſi judicii flamma, quo primum incenſa numine, quibus adjuta flatibus, aut enutrita fomitibus effulget? An virili veſte induta Marchioniſſa annos fortaſſe aliquot, idque Athenis, inter Philoſophos delituiſti? An Regina rerum Philoſophia (quæ virorum conſpectum verecundè fugit) tibi ſe viſendam exhibuit, virgincoſque ſinus omnes expoſuit?" [p. 13, 14.]

The Society of St. John's College, Cambridge, (in this their ſecond addreſs to her Grace) with rather leſs of delicacy, repeat the ſame idea, obſerving that " ſome grope for nature in vacuums and empty ſpaces, with a ſucceſs not unlike their ſuppoſals. But ſhe willingly ſhows herſelf all bare and naked to your Grace." [p. 19.]

The Vice-chancellor and Senate of this Univerſity exclaim on another occaſion, 1677. " Moſt excellent Princeſs, you have unſpeakably obliged us all, but not in one reſpect alone, for whenſoever we find ourſelves non-plus'd in our ſtudies, we repair to you as to our Oracle; if we be to ſpeak, you dictate to us; if we knock at Apollo's door, you alone open to us; if we compoſe an Hiſtory, you are the remembrancer; if we be confounded and puzzled among the Philoſophers, you diſentangle us and aſſoil all our difficulties." [p. 24.]

The Maſter, &c. of St. John's College, &c. 1667, repeat their expreſſions of gratitude in terms yet more hyperbolical. " Your Excellency hath only brought it to paſs, that we have hopes yet to live; the memory of our name being perpetuated in your Excellencies books, which will not only ſurvive our Univerſities, but hold date even with time itſelf; foraſmuch as it pleaſeth you, moſt excellent Princeſs, ſo long as either name or honour remains, either to virtue or to books; and incontinently this age, by reading of your books, will loſe its barbarity and rudeneſs, being made tame by the elegance of your ſtyle and matter: and moreover it will not judge us to be no-bodies, whom ſuch an accompliſhed Princeſs hath not refuſed to make not only the peruſers, but even diſcredit on the age in which it was offered, and ſtrongly impeaches the judgment, we would not willingly add the integrity, of the flatterers. They were probably dazzled, and almoſt blinded, by the high rank and ſolemn pomp of the Duke and Ducheſs of Newcaſtle. Abſurd, however, as were her Grace's pretenſions to philoſophical knowledge, and extravagant as are her other compoſitions, it cannot, we apprehend, be denied, that ſhe had conſiderable powers of imagination and invention. Mr. Jacob ſays, that ſhe had a great deal of wit, and a more than ordinary propenſity to dramatic poetry; and Langbaine obſerves, that, if it be conſidered, that both the language and plots of her plays are her own, ſhe ought in juſtice to be preferred to thoſe of her ſex, who have built their fame on other people's foundations (l). If her fancy had been enriched by information, reſtrained by judgment, and regulated by correctneſs of taſte, ſhe might probably have riſen to conſiderable excellence. A very able and elegant writer hath, within theſe few years, paid a much higher compliment to her genius and poetical merit, than hath been cuſtomary with modern authors. In a viſion of female poets riding Pegaſus, he hath thus expreſſed himſelf concerning the Ducheſs: "Upon this a lady advanced; who, though ſhe had ſomething rather extravagant in her air and deportment, yet had a noble preſence, that commanded at once awe and admiration. She was dreſſed in an old-faſhioned habit, very fantaſtic, and trimmed with bu-

(l) Ballard, ubi ſupra. Langbaine's Account of dramatic Poets, p. 391.

even the moderators, and judges of her works." [p. 25, 26.]

(6) Thomas Barlow, afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln.

Thomas Barlow (6), of Queen's College, Oxford, 1655, tells the Dutcheſs, that but for "a fatal ſickneſs I had long ere this returned my moſt humble and hearty thanks for that infinite honour you were pleaſed to do me (a poor impertinent thing in black), in deigning to write and truſt me with the diſtribution of your favours (or magnificence rather) to the Univerſity." [p. 66.]

In another epiſtle on the ſame occaſion, the ſame humble Divine repeats his aſtoniſhment, "that a perſon ſo illuſtrious and (for place and parts ſo) eminent, ſhould look upon ſo inconſiderable and impertinent a thing in black, as I am, but that I know the ſun doth ſhine on ſhrubs as well as cedars. If I miſtake not I told you in my laſt, that I had a manuſcript book in my keeping (for it was never yet printed), which the author intitles thus:—Womens worth, or a Treatiſe proving by ſundry Reaſons that Women excell Men. Many of my ſex will hardly believe it, yet I believe your Honour may prove the beſt argument in the world to convince them of their infidelity." [p. 70, 71.]

(7) Dr. Jaſper Mayne, author of the City Match, a Comedy, 1639; and the Amorous War, another Comedy, 1658.

Jaſper Mayne (7), of Chriſt-Church, Oxford, 1663, aſſures her Graces that a perſon is already engaged to tranſlate her works "into the Catholick language; though it will be hard to make them ſpeak ſo good Latine as they now do Engliſh." [p. 94.]

In a ſecond letter, 1664, he adds, "I have read as much of your Poetry, tranſlated by a young ſcholar, as hath hitherto paſt his pen. In ſome parts whereof I find him happy enough. But your excellent fancy expreſſing itſelf ſometimes in terms of art, and words only known to Philoſophy, he tells me the hardeſt part of his taſk will be how to find out current Roman words to match them. To remove which difficulty, I have directed him to read Lucretius before he proceeds further." [p. 96.] "Had I the art like ſome here, to teach birds to ſpeak, all the fowls which fly in your woods ſhould preſently be tranſformed to Nightingales, and taught muſick enough to ſing the praiſes of ſo great a miſtreſs." [p. 97.]

(8) John Fell, afterwards Biſhop of Oxford.

John Fell (8), of the ſame College, declares, "that it will reſt a problem not eaſily to be reſolved, whether her Grace appears greater in her acquiſitions or obligings; whether ſhe inſtructs the world, or enriches it more." [Ibid.]

(9) John Dolben, afterwards Archbiſhop of York.

The Biſhop of Rocheſter, in 1671 (9), tells the Duke—"I am glad to ſee the King do that which is ſo decent and worthy of him, as to order your Grace a tomb among the Kings, who have always been ſo near to him, and who ſtood up ſo cloſe to his father in extremity of danger, and ſo bravely, that had not God deſigned to reſtore the Crown in his own miraculous way, it had been certainly done before by your hand." [p. 107.]

The Students of Trinity-College, 1668, inform her Grace that they mean hereafter to dedicate the following epitaph to "her worthy name and memory."

To Margaret the Firſt:
Princeſs of Philoſophers:
Who hath diſpelled Errors:
Appeaſed the difference of Opinions:
And reſtored Peace
To Learning's Commonwealth. [p. 152.]

To this band of encomiaſts may be added Edward Rainbowe (10), afterwards Biſhop of Carliſle; the well-known Sir Kenelm Digby; Ambroſe Sorbiere, author of the Travels into England, anſwered by Sprat; Dr. Henry More, the myſtical Divine; Dr. Walter Charlton, Phyſician to the King; the Biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, in 1663 (11); Joſeph Glanvil, the writer on Witchcraft; Sir Samuel Tuke, Bart. a dramatic author; Lord Berkley, the Lord Plauſible of Wycherley; Edward Howard, the Perſon of Honour alluded to in the Rehearſal; Shadwell the Poet; Hobbes the Philoſopher; ſome Profeſſors in foreign Univerſities, &c.

(10) Of Magdalen-College, Cambridge, and Vice-Chancellor in 1663.

(11) John Hacket.

The volume from which the foregoing extracts have been made, conſiſts of 182 pages, and concludes with ſeveral copies of verſes by Sir George Etherege, Shadwell, and others; together with an Engliſh Elegy on the death of the Ducheſs of Newcaſtle, by Knightly Chetwood, in whoſe guilt the author of this note would be involved, were he to produce any quotation from ſo impious a performance. This gentleman was afterwards Dean of Glouceſter, and wrote the Diſſertation on Paſtoral Poetry prefixed to Dryden's tranſlation of the Eclogues of Virgil.

Theſe examples of talents miſapplied, of learning degraded by ſervility, and adulation deviating into profaneneſs, ſufficiently authorize the ſeverity of Prudentius, who allows no praiſe even to conſummate elegance, when proſtituted to unwarrantable purpoſes.

Os dignum, æterno tinctum quod fulgeat auro,
Si mallet laudare Deum; cui ſordida monſtra
Prætulit, & liquidam temeravit crimine vocem.
Haud aliter, quam ſi raſtris quis tentet eburnis
Cænoſum verſare ſolum, limoque madentes
Excolere aureolis ſi fortè ligonibus ulvas;
Splendorem dentis nitidi ſcrobs inguinat atra,
Et pretioſa acies ſqualenti ſordet in arvo.

Contra Symmach. Lib. 1.

Since the above memorandum was drawn up, I have been told that the late ingenious and amiable Mr. Granger, in his ſecond edition of the Biographical Hiſtory of England, vol. iv. p. 60, has referred to the ſame collection of fulſome addreſſes; but it will appear that we have not claſhed in our extracts, or much impoveriſhed the book from which they are taken. Thoſe who chance to meet with it hereafter, will rather wonder at our forbearance to introduce more ample quotations from it, than find reaſon to charge our reſpective ſelections with partiality.

gles

gles and points; ſuch as was worn in the time of King Charles the Firſt *. This lady, I was informed, was the Ducheſs of Newcaſtle. When ſhe came to mount, ſhe ſprang into the ſaddle with ſurpriſing agility; and giving an entire looſe to the reins, Pegaſus directly ſet up a gallop, and ran away with her quite out of ſight. However, it was acknowledged, that ſhe kept a firm ſeat, even when the horſe went at his deepeſt rate; and that ſhe wanted nothing but to ride with a curb bridle. When ſhe came to diſmount, Shakeſpeare and Milton very kindly offered their hand to help her down, which ſhe accepted. Then Euterpe came up to her with a ſmile, and begged her to repeat thoſe beautiful lines againſt Melancholy, which (ſhe ſaid) were ſo extremely pictureſque. The Ducheſs, with a moſt pleaſing air, immediately began——

* There is a portrait of her at Welbeck, in a theatrical habit, which ſhe uſually wore. Granger, vol. iv. p. 60.

Dull Melancholy——————
She'll make you ſtart at ev'ry noiſe you hear,
And viſions ſtrange ſhall to your eyes appear.
Her voice is low, and gives an hollow ſound;
She hates the light, and is in darkneſs found;
Or ſits by blinking lamps, or tapers ſmall,
Which various ſhadows make againſt the wall.
She loves nought elſe but noiſe which diſcord makes;
As croaking frogs, whoſe dwelling is in lakes;
The raven hoarſe, the mandrake's hollow groan;
And ſhrieking owls, that fly i' th' night alone;
The tolling bell, which for the dead rings out;
A mill, where ruſhing waters run about.
She loves to walk in the ſtill moon-ſhine night,
And in a thick dark grove ſhe takes delight:
In hollow caves, thatch'd houſes, and low cells,
She loves to live, and there alone ſhe dwells.
There leave her to herſelf alone to dwell,
While you and I in mirth and pleaſure ſwell.

"All the while that theſe lines were repeating, Milton ſeemed very attentive; and it was whiſpered by ſome, that he was obliged for many of the thoughts in his L'Allegro and Il Penſeroſa to this Lady's Dialogue between Mirth and Melancholy (m)." The concluding remark we believe to be groundleſs, and, indeed, not conſiſtent with chronology.

(m) Connoiſſeur, vol. ii. p. 263—265. No 69.

The Ducheſs of Newcaſtle departed this life at London, in the cloſe of the year 1673, and was buried in Weſtminſter-Abbey, on the 7th of January, 1673-4. The ſuperb monument erected there to the memory of her and the Duke, and the inſcription upon it, are well known to the greater part of our readers. Her perſon is reported to have been very graceful. With regard to her character, her temper was naturally reſerved; ſo that ſhe ſeldom ſaid much in company, and eſpecially among ſtrangers. In her ſtudies, contemplations, and writings, ſhe was moſt indefatigable. She was truly pious, charitable, and generous; very kind to her ſervants; an excellent œconomiſt; and a complete pattern of conjugal affection and duty (n). It hath been thought ſurprizing, that ſhe, who devoted her time ſo greatly to writing, could acquit herſelf with ſo much propriety in the ſeveral duties and relations of life (o).

(n) Ballard, ubi ſupra, p. 213.

(o) Granger, vol. iv. p. 61.

Mr. Jonathan Richardſon, on the authority of a Mr. Fellows, relates, that the Duke of Newcaſtle being once complimented, by a friend, on the great wiſdom of his wife, anſwered, "Sir, a very wiſe woman is a very fooliſh thing (p)." The known attachment of his Grace to the Ducheſs, the high compliments he paid her, and the aſſiſtance he gave her in her works, detract from the credit of this ſtory. If there be any truth in it, the Duke's reply might be uttered in a fit of ill-humour, or in one of thoſe capricious ſtarts of temper to which moſt characters are occaſionally ſubject.] K.

(p) Richardſoniana, p. 249, 250.

CAVENDISH (CHARLES), brother to William the Third, and ſon to William the Second, Earl of Devonſhire. He was born at London May 20, 1620, and his Majeſty being his godfather, gave him the name of Charles (a). His genius being quick and lively, and at the ſame time very penetrating and ſolid, he was, according to the method eſtabliſhed in this noble family, put into a ſtrict and regular mode of education; and when he was thoroughly ſeaſoned with the principles of uſeful knowledge, he was ſent abroad with a Governor about 1638, to poliſh the learning he had acquired at home, by ſeeing the world abroad (b). He went firſt to Paris, and that great city ringing at that time with the fame of the ſiege of Luxemburgh, which it was thought the French army nigh that place would make, the martial genius of our young traveller prompted him to ſteal thither, from whence his Governor, with ſome difficulty, brought him back to his ſtudies in Paris (c). The next year he made the tour of Italy, when he viſited and made ſome ſtay at Naples, Rome, and Venice, from which laſt city, in the ſpring of the next year, he embarked for Conſtantinople, leaving his Governor and Engliſh ſervants behind him. When he had ſatisfied his curioſity in viewing that famous capital of the Turkiſh empire, he made a journey by land through Natolia, and having ſeen whatever was worth ſeeing there, embarked for Alexandria, and travelled from thence to Grand Cairo. All the wonders of Egypt ſurveyed, he returned once more to Alexandria, took his paſſage in a ſhip bound for Malta, proceeded thence by ſea to Spain, then traverſing part of that kingdom and of France, returned ſafely to Paris, and after ſome ſhort ſtay there, came back to England in May 1641 (d). He appeared at Court with the greateſt advantages poſſible: he had a fine perſon, a ſprightly wit, a deep judgment, a generous ſpirit, a diſintereſted loyalty, and a nice ſenſe of honour. Theſe ſhining qualities made him equally the favourite of the King and Queen, and the darling of the people. He had a ſtrong paſſion for arms; and his mother, the Counteſs Dowager of Devonſhire, willing to gratify him, had thoughts of purchaſing Lord Goring's regiment of foot, then in the Dutch ſervice; and to qualify him for this command, he made the campaign that ſummer in the Prince of Orange's army, from whence he returned in the month of November (e). Upon his coming back, he found there was no neceſſity of ſeeking employment for his martial talents in ſtrange climates, the hard neceſſity of the times having unhappily naturalized them to his own. He repaired to York, and offered his ſervice to the King, in whoſe own troop he rode, under the command of Lord Bernard Stuart, brother to the Duke of Richmond, and a kinſman of his own, in which ſituation we find him, October 23, 1642, at the battle of Edge-Hill. It was of this troop, and upon that occaſion, that his Majeſty ſaid, That the fortunes of thoſe who compoſed it, would buy the eſtates of the Lord Eſſex, and of all the officers in his army (f). In this battle Mr. Cavendiſh ſo much diſtinguiſhed himſelf, that the Lord Aubigny, who commanded the Duke of York's troop, being killed in the action, he was preferred to that poſt as the reward of his ſervice (g). He did not continue long in that ſtation, but laid hold of the firſt opportunity to convert his troop into a regiment for the King's ſervice; and this brought him into the North, and under the command of his couſin the Marquis of Newcaſtle [A]. In this part of the world he proſpered greatly, and being informed that the Parliament garriſon at Grantham very much incommoded the adjacent country, he marched thither, attacked, reduced it, made priſoners three hundred and fifty men with their officers, and then demoliſhed it (h). Other actions he performed of leſs importance; and being declared Lieutenant-General of the horſe, was employed by the Marquis of Newcaſtle, to eſcort the Queen in her journey to Newark, which with great credit he performed. Her Majeſty recollected him at firſt ſight, told him very graciouſly that ſhe ſaw him laſt in Holland, and was glad to meet him again in England; and the firſt night, when Major Tuke came for the word, her Majeſty was pleaſed to give CAVENDISH (i). At Dunnington he had ſome advantage over the Parliament's forces, and was very active on that ſide: but that he marched with her Majeſty to Oxford, as moſt writers ſay, is hard to believe, her Majeſty, in her own letter, affirming directly the contrary; and that, at the requeſt of the gentry of the country, much againſt his own will, ſhe left him behind, with two thouſand foot, and twenty troops of horſe (k). Upon his having this command, and being informed that a great body of the enemy's troops were at Gainſborough, which they had ſurprized, and had made themſelves maſters of the Earl of Kingſton's perſon, Lieutenant-General Cavendiſh immediately marched that way, and in their paſſage had reſcued the Earl of Kingſton, if an unfortunate ſhot, haſtily fired, had not moſt unluckily killed him, in the cabin of the veſſel, in which they were carrying him down the Trent to Hull (l). This ſeemed to be an omen of the misfortunes that quickly followed; for on July 30, 1643, General Cavendiſh attacked a great body of the Parliament forces under Cromwell, and being overpowered was forced to a retreat, which the Lieutenant-General covered with a ſmall body of reſerve, and made a noble defence, till, by the ſuperiority of numbers, and weight of the enemy's cavalry, they were forced into a bog, and there, after quitting his horſe, and dangerouſly wounded, this gallant man loſt his life, throwing his blood in the faces of his enemies, as deſpiſing and diſdaining quarter

(a) Kennet's Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family, p. 83.

(b) Memoirs of the Life of Col. Cavendiſh, MS.

(c) Kennet's Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family, p. 50.

(d) Life of Chriſtian Counteſs of Devonſhire, p. 47.

(e) Kennet's Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family, ubi ſupra.

(f) Life of the Counteſs of Devonſhire, p. 49.

(g) Life of Col. Cavendiſh, MS.

(h) Hiſtorian's Guide, p. 20.

(i) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, by his Ducheſs, p. 34.

(k) Ruſhworth's Collections, vol. ii. P. iii. p. 274.

(l) Heath's Chr. p. 53.

[A] Of his couſin the Marquis of Newcaſtle.] The beſt account we have of this matter occurs in the work of one of the Hiſtorians of this noble family, and therefore it will be proper to give it in the author's own words (1). 'This troop was ſoon after 'put into the Prince of Wales's regiment, wherein 'the ſuperior officer put ſomething on Captain Ca'vendiſh which he thought an indignity, and there'fore he deſired his Majeſty to aſſign him one thou'ſand pounds (which his own brother the Earl of 'Devonſhire had preſented to the King) promiſing, 'that if his Majeſty would be pleaſed to let him have 'the Duke of York's troop out of the Prince of 'Wales's regiment, he would go into the North and 'raiſe the Duke a compleat regiment of horſe before 'the army could take the field; to which the King 'conſented, aſſuring him the honour of being Colo'nel of his new regiment. In order to compleat it, 'he accepted of Thomas Markham, Eſq; to be his 'Lieutenant-Colonel, and Mr. Tuke for the Captain 'of his firſt troop, and took his head quarters at 'Newark, keeping under many of the rebel garri'ſons at Nottingham, and other neighbouring parts, 'and by degrees became maſter of the whole country; 'ſo that the King's Commiſſioners for Lincolnſhire 'and Nottinghamſhire deſired his leave to petition 'the King that he might have the command of all 'the forces of their two counties in quality of Co'lonel-General; which he complied with, and the 'King granted.'

(1) Life of the Counteſs of Devon, by Mr. Pomfret, p. 49, 50.

at their hands (m), though, by ſome writers, this is differently reported [B]. His body was carried to Newark, where the people expreſſed their tenderneſs and concern for him, by keeping it above ground for ſeveral days, till they could give ſome vent to their grief, after which it was interred; and, thirty years after, upon his mother's death, removed to Derby, and buried under the ſame tomb with her (n). It was very remarkable, that, though at ſo great a diſtance of time, the lamentations of the people at Newark broke out afreſh, and the whole town was in tears upon the removing of his corps, as if he had been but juſt dead (o). But, after all, the nobleſt tribute paid to the memory of this great and gallant young man, is the epitaph, or rather elegiac verſes, of the celebrated Mr. Waller (p), which the reader, without doubt, will be well pleaſed to find in the notes [C]; more eſpecially, as it plainly ſhews, how much Cromwell valued himſelf

(m) Lloyd's Memoirs of the Sufferers for King Charles I. p. 673.

(n) Life of the Counteſs of Devon. p. 92.

(o) Idem. ibid.

(p) Waller's Poems, p. 209.

[B] Though, by ſome writers, this is differently reported.] We have ſeveral accounts of this gentleman's death ſo little correſponding with each other, that it requires an extraordinary degree of attention to find out the truth. In Heath's Chronicle, the ſtory is told at large, in theſe words (2): 'Some of Lord Willoughby's forces at Gainſborough, had ſurprized the 'Earl of Kingſton, father to the Marquis of Dorcheſter, and brought him thither, whence, for better ſecurity of his perſon, which was of great concernment to the King's affairs thereabout, they reſolved to ſend him to Hull. In the way thither, 'Colonel Cavendiſh, brother to the Earl of Devonſhire, with a party, purſued the pinnace to a ſhallow which it could not paſs, and demanded her and 'the Earl's ſurrender; which being refuſed, a drake 'was diſcharged, which unhappily killed the ſaid 'Earl and one of his ſervants, being placed on purpoſe on the deck to deter the Royaliſts from ſhooting; whereupon they preſently ſtruck ſail and yielded, 'but with a juſt revenge were all ſacrificed to the 'ghoſt of that moſt loyal and noble Peer. Notice 'of this party and their deſign being given to the garriſon, a ſufficient number under Colonel White, a 'Lincolnſhire gentleman, were haſtened to relieve 'the boat, or recover it if taken; who accordingly 'encountred with the Royaliſts, and being too many 'for them, this valiant perſonage was forced to take 'the Trent with his horſe, which ſwam him ſafe to 'the other ſide, but there ſtuck in the owze and mud; 'and as ſoon as the Colonel had got aſhore off his 'horſe's back, the enemy was come round by the 'ford, and ſeeing him deſperately wounded, offered 'him quarter; which he magnanimouſly refuſing, and 'throwing his blood he wiped off his face among 'them, was killed outright upon the place.' Much to the ſame purpoſe is the ſtory told us by Lloyd (3), only heightened a little by his declamatory way of delivering himſelf upon all occaſions. The Ducheſs of Newcaſtle has a very exact and very ſuccinct relation of this unfortunate accident (4), which I mention the rather, becauſe it ſhews the credit due to the facts ſet down in thoſe Memoirs, which are more accurately related than is commonly imagined. 'The forces, 'ſays ſhe, which my Lord had in the county of Lincoln, commanded by the then Lieutenant-General 'of the horſe, Mr. Charles Cavendiſh, ſecond brother to the then Earl of Devonſhire, though they 'had timely notice and orders from my Lord to make 'their retreat to the Lieutenant-General of the army, 'and not to fight the enemy, yet the ſaid Lieutenant-General of horſe being tranſported by his courage '(he being a perſon of great valour and conduct) 'and having charged the enemy, unfortunately loſt 'the field, and himſelf was ſlain in the charge, his 'horſe lighting in a bog. Which news being brought 'to my Lord when he was on his march, he made all 'the haſte he could, and was no ſooner joined with 'his Lieutenant-General, but he fell upon the ene'my and put them to flight.' After all, Cromwell's own letter to the Committee of the aſſociated counties at Cambridge, dated from Huntington, July 31, 1643, to which place he had been driven by Newcaſtle, gives the fulleſt account of this matter, and which deſerves moſt credit, as being written by an eye-witneſs. After having related the manner in which he collected a body of troops for the relief of Gainſborough, his arrival there, and beating the vanguard of this body of horſe, he proceeds in theſe words (5): 'I perceiving this body, which was the 'reſerve, ſtanding ſtill unbroken, kept back my Major Whaley from the chaſe, and with my own troop 'and the other of my regiment, in all being three 'troops, we got into a body: in this reſerve ſtood 'General Cavendiſh, who one while faced me, another 'while faced four of the Lincoln troops, which was 'all of ours that ſtood upon the place, the reſt being 'engaged in the chaſe. At laſt, General Cavendiſh 'charged the Lincolners, and routed them; immediately I fell on his rear with my three troops, which 'did ſo aſtoniſh him, that he gave over the chaſe, 'and would fain have delivered himſelf from me, but 'I preſſing on forced them down a hill, having good 'execution of them, and below the hill drove the 'General, with ſome of his ſoldiers, into a quagmire, 'where my Captain-Lieutenant ſlew him with a 'thruſt under his ſhort ribs, the reſt of the body was 'wholly routed, not one man ſtaying upon the place.' Another writer (6) aſſures us, that it was Colonel Bury who murdered this brave young gentleman in cold blood after quarter given, and that he made himſelf dear to Cromwell by this and ſome other acts of cruelty. We are told by ſome writers, that among the valuable papers collected by Dr. Moor, Biſhop of Ely, there were ſeveral of this gentleman's, which ſhowed him to have had very deep ſkill in ſome parts of the Mathematics (7). But I doubt there is a miſtake in this, and that theſe papers did not belong to him but to Sir Charles Cavendiſh, the Duke of Newcaſtle's younger brother, of whom the noble Hiſtorian (8) gives this character: That he was a man of the nobleſt and largeſt mind, though the leaſt and moſt inconvenient body that lived; and of whoſe great ſkill in the Mathematics, we are able to produce more teſtimonies than one (9), which makes it probable that theſe papers were his.

(2) Heath's Chr. p. 53, 54.

(3) Memoirs of the Sufferers for King Charles I. p. 673.

(4) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, by his Ducheſs, p. 33, 34.

(5) Ruſhworth's Collections, vol. ii. P. iii. p. 278.

(6) Pomfret's Life of the Counteſs of Devon. p. 53.

(7) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. i. p. 152.

(8) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 402.

(9) Life of the Duke of Newcaſtle, p. 74. Lloyd's Memoirs of the Sufferers for King Charles I. p. 673.

[C] To find in the notes.] The chief reaſon for giving place to this poem here is, becauſe the reader, from the peruſal of the foregoing article, will enter more clearly and fully into the ſenſe of it, and diſcern perfectly the force of Mr. Waller's hiſtorical application; which is at once as judicious as it is elegant and poetical (10).

(10) Waller's Poems, p. 209.

On the death of Colonel Charles Cavendiſh.

Here lies CHARLES CA'NDISH: let the marble ſtone,
That hides his aſhes, make his virtues known.
Beauty, and valour, did his ſhort life grace;
The grief, and glory, of his noble race!
Early abroad he did the world ſurvey,
As if he knew he had not long to ſtay:
Saw what great ALEXANDER in the Eaſt,
And mighty JULIUS conquer'd in the Weſt.
Then, with a mind as great as theirs, he came
To find at home occaſion for his fame:
Where dark confuſion did the nation hide;
And where the juſter, was the weaker ſide.
Two loyal brothers took their Sov'reign's part,
Employ'd their wealth, their courage, and their art:
The elder did whole regiments afford;
The younger brought his conduct and his ſword.
Born to command, a leader he begun,
And on the rebels laſting honour won:
The horſe inſtructed by their General's worth,
Still made the King victorious in the North:

Where

ſelf upon delivering his party from the arms of this hero, who, after a life ſhort in duration, but full of glory, ſlept thus in the bed of honour.

Where CA'NDISH fought, the Royaliſts prevail'd;
Neither his courage, nor his judgment, fail'd;
The current of his vict'ries found no ſtop,
'Till CROMWELL came, his party's chiefeſt prop.
Equal ſucceſs had ſet theſe champions high,
And both reſolve to conquer, or to die:
Virtue with rage, fury with valour ſtrove;
But, that muſt fall which is decreed above!
CROMWELL, with odds of number, and of fate,
Remov'd this bulwark of the Church and State:
Which the ſad iſſue of the war declar'd,
And made his taſk, to ruin both, leſs hard.
So, when the bank neglected is o'erthrown,
The boundleſs torrent does the country drown.
Thus fell the young, the lovely, and the brave;
Strew bays, and flowers, upon his honour'd grave!

C.

 [It hath been remarked to us, by a very reſpectable correſpondent, that Charles the Firſt's obſervation with regard to his own troop, "That the "fortunes of thoſe who compoſed it, would buy the "eſtates of the Lord Eſſex, and of all the officers in "his army," ſhould not have been made by his Majeſty, or repeated by his well-wiſhers. The man who poſſeſſes forty ſhillings a year may, and ought to be, as zealous in the defence of his little inheritance, as he who is entitled to an annual income of forty thouſand pounds. Nor did thoſe who oppoſed the Court deſerve to be treated with contempt, though their purſes might not be ſo heavy as the purſes of the gentlemen who conſtituted the King's troop of horſe-guards. They had ſomething to defend, and what they had they would not give up without the authority of law.]

K.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM), the firſt Duke of Devonſhire, one of the ableſt Stateſmen, and moſt diſtinguiſhed Patriots of his time. He was born January 25, 1640, and educated with all the care due to his high birth, and the great hopes excited by the pregnancy of his parts (a). When he was of a fit age to make the tour of Europe, he was ſent abroad under the care of Dr. Killegrew, who was afterwards Maſter of the Savoy, a gentleman perfectly ſkilled in polite literature, who gave his noble pupil a true reliſh of the claſſic writers, and contributed in other reſpects to form that fine taſte, for which this nobleman became afterwards diſtinguiſhed (b). His Lordſhip was one of the four Peers eldeſt ſons, that bore up King Charles the Second's train at his coronation in 1661 (c); and the ſame year he was elected one of the Knights for the county of Derby, and continued a member of that which was called the Long Parliament till it was diſſolved (d). September 21, 1663, he was created Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford, by the ſpecial command of the Chancellor (e). In 1665 he went a volunteer, and expoſed his perſon extremely in his attendance upon the Duke, who commanded the Britiſh navy that year (f). In the ſpring of the year 1669, he accompanied his intimate friend Mr. Mountague in his embaſſy to France, and being accidentally at the Opera at Paris, met with an adventure, which, though it endangered his life, gained him a very high reputation (g) [A]. In 1677 he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Houſe of Commons, by a vigorous oppoſition of the Court meaſures; and, the year following, was very inſtrumental in forwarding an enquiry into the Popiſh plot, and was alſo of the Committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment (h) againſt the Lord High-Treaſurer Danby. He was choſen Knight of the ſhire for the county of Derby, in the Parliament which met in the ſpring of the year 1679 (i), and, together with his inſeparable friend Lord Ruſſel, he was named of that Privy-Council, of whom the King gave this character: That they were men whoſe known abilities, intereſts, and eſteem, in the nation, rendered them above all ſuſpicion of miſtaking or betraying the true intereſt of the kingdom (k). He acted in this high ſtation with the ſame firmneſs as in Parliament, till finding his attendance ineffectual, in conjunction with the Lord Ruſſel, Sir Henry Capel, and Mr. Powle, he deſired leave to withdraw (l). He was again elected Knight of the ſhire for Derby, in that Parliament, which, after many prorogations, met upon the 21ſt of October, 1680 (m), and diſtinguiſhed himſelf therein, by a firm adherence to thoſe meaſures which he thought moſt conducive to the welfare of the nation, and the ſafety of the Proteſtant religion (n). In that ſeſſions, he carried up to the Lords an impeachment againſt the Lord Chief Juſtice Scroggs, for his arbitrary and illegal proceedings in the Court of King's Bench, and made two famous ſpeeches on the ſubject of the Excluſion Bill, to which he was a hearty friend (o). He repreſented the ſame county for which he had been choſen in three former Parliaments, in that held at Oxford (p), and behaved there with the ſame ſteadineſs and zeal: but as his Lordſhip well underſtood the nature of our excellent conſtitution, ſo he was as careful in avoiding

(a) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(b) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 155.

(c) Baker's Chr. p. 738.

(d) Parliamentary Regiſter, p. 74.

(e) Wood's Faſti, Oxon. vol. ii. col. 154.

(f) Corspleat Hiſt. of Engl. vol. iii. p. 255.

(g) Temple's Letters, vol. ii. p. 70.

(h) Journal of the Houſe of Commons, p. 189, 195, 196.

(i) Parliamentary Regiſter, p. 74.

(k) See the King's Speech to his Privy Council, April 20, 1679, and in the Houſe of Lords the next day.

(l) Compl. Hiſt. of England, vol. iii. p. 368.

(m) Parliamentary Regiſter, p. 74.

(n) Collection of Debates in the Houſe of Commons, in the year 1680, p. 1.

(o) Compl. Hiſt. of England, vol. iii. p. 379. Debates before cited, p. 154.

(p) Parliamentary Regiſter, p. 74.

[A] Gained him a very high reputation.] This accident, we are told, happened thus (1): Three officers of the French King's guard came full of wine upon the ſtage, and one of them coming up to him with a very inſulting queſtion, his Lordſhip gave him a ſmart ſtroke on the face; upon which they all drew, and puſhed at him very hard. Lord Cavendiſh ſetting his back againſt one of the ſcenes, defended himſelf very ſtoutly, notwithſtanding he had received ſeveral wounds, till at length a ſturdy Swiſs, belonging to the Lord Embaſſador Mountague, caught him up in his arms, and threw him over into the pit. In his fall, his arm catched upon an iron ſpike, and was grievouſly torn. The officers were, by the King's orders, ſent to priſon, where they remained, till by his Lordſhip's interceſſion they were diſcharged. Sir William Temple wrote him a very handſome letter upon this occaſion, dated July 18, 1669 (2), from the Hague, in which he compliments him highly upon his courage, and tells him, that the Dutch thought a thing of this kind could happen no where but in France, or at leaſt would have been ſuffered no where elſe, without the reſt of the company's interpoſing, which is a ſevere but juſt remark upon that nation.

(1) Kennet's Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh, p. 117, 118.

(2) Temple's Letters, vol. ii. p. 70.

whatever

whatever might injure it, by overſtraining the privileges of Parliament, as he was watchful over the encroachments of prerogative; and, therefore, though no man ſpoke more freely in the Houſe of Commons than he did, yet never any Member was more ſtudious to avoid any harſhneſs or indecency (q). He was not afraid of meeting and converſing with his noble friends, even after Parliaments were laid aſide: but though he was a hearty promoter of legal oppoſition, he ſincerely abhorred whatever tended to ſedition or confuſion; and, therefore, when at one of theſe meetings a very bold overture was made, he roundly declared He would never go among them more, and kept his word (r). His friendſhip to Lord Ruſſel induced him to appear as a witneſs for him at his trial, and the teſtimony he gave will do laſting honour to both their memories (s) [B]. When his noble friend was under ſentence of death, he ſent him a meſſage by Sir James Forbes, that he would come and change clothes with him in priſon, if he thought it practicable to make his eſcape (t); but that unfortunate Lord being too generous to accept the propoſal, he waited upon and aſſiſted him to the laſt, did all in his power to alleviate the grief of his diſconſolate Lady; and, to give the higheſt proof of his reſpect for his family, married his eldeſt ſon to the daughter of his friend (u). The ſame generous diſpoſition led him to ſend a challenge to Count Koningſmark, who, though ſtrongly ſuſpected of being concerned in the aſſaſſination of Mr. Thynne, had been acquitted by a jury; but it ſeems, that was a method of trial the Count thought fit to decline (w). In 1684, he became, by the deceaſe of his father, Earl of Devonſhire; and perſevering in the ſame generous principles, an attempt was made, in the reign of King James, to terrify him, by giving out that one poſitive witneſs was to be found, who would charge him with rebellious practices; but he put a ſtop to this ſcheme by deſiring to confront him (x). The Court, however, gained one advantage over him by a proſecution in the Court of King's Bench, for ſtriking a gentleman in the verge of the Court, for which he was fined thirty thouſand pounds (y) [C]. It is no wonder, that after ſuch treatment as this, he choſe to retire into the country; and that he might find ſome employment there worthy of his active and excellent genius, he pulled down the ſouth ſide of his houſe at Chatſworth, and rebuilt it with a front to his gardens, in ſo juſt, ſo regular, and noble a taſte, that it looked like a model of what might be done in after ages (z). But neither the hazards he had run, the diſappointments he had met with, or the pleaſures of his retirement, could hinder him from contriving in his mind ſuch methods as ſeemed to him practicable, for the relief of his country; and, therefore, with infinite danger to himſelf, he ventured to concert, with ſome noble friends, a plan for their common deliverance (a) [D]. When the Prince of Orange landed, he was one of the firſt

(q) See the Debates before cited, p. 316.

(r) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(s) Trial of William Lord Ruſſel, fol. p. 53.

(t) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own Times, p. 560.

(u) Kennet's Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh, p. 134.

(w) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 164.

(x) Funeral Sermon for the Duke of Devonſhire, p. 48, 49.

(y) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 165.

(z) Kennet's Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(a) See this explained at large in the note.

[B] Will do laſting honour to both their memories.] It appears from the trial, that Lord Ruſſel thought proper, in his defence, to call ſome perſons of quality, with whom he had been well acquainted and converſed much, that they might ſpeak from their knowledge of his former behaviour, whether they could think him guilty of a thing of the nature he was charged with. The anſwer given by the Lord Cavendiſh, was conceived in theſe words (3); 'I had the honour to be 'acquainted with my Lord Ruſſel a long time. I al-'ways thought him a man of great honour, and too 'prudent and wary a man to be concerned in ſo vile 'and deſperate a deſign as this, and from which he 'would receive ſo little advantage. I can ſay nothing 'more, but that two or three days ſince the diſcovery 'of this plot, upon diſcourſe about Colonel Rumſey, 'my Lord Ruſſel did expreſs ſomething as if he had 'a very ill opinion of the man; and, therefore, it is 'not likely he would entruſt him with ſuch a ſecret.'

(3) State Trials, vol. iii. p. 724.

[C] For which he was fined thirty thouſand pounds.] It ſeems, that the Earl of Devonſhire having received an affront from Colonel Culpepper, within the verge of the Court, ſo far reſtrained his reſentment, as not to take any ſatisfaction upon the ſpot; and afterwards thought fit, though the inſult was very rude, to compromiſe it, upon the Colonel's promiſe never to appear again at Whitehall (4). But after the defeat of the Duke of Monmouth, the Colonel was encouraged to ſlight the obligations he was under, and to come publicly to Court as uſual, where he was riſing into ſome degree of favour. This occaſioned a ſecond quarrel; for the Earl of Devonſhire meeting him in the King's preſence-chamber, and receiving from him, as he thought, an inſulting look, he took him by the noſe, led him out of the room, and gave him ſome diſdainful blows with the head of his cane. For this bold act, the Earl was proſecuted in the King's Bench upon an information, and had an exorbitant fine of 30,000 l. impoſed upon him, and was committed, though a Peer, to the King's Bench priſon, till he ſhould make payment of it. He was never able to bear any confinement that he could break from, and therefore, he eſcaped, only to go home to his ſeat at Chatſworth. Upon the news of his being there, the Sheriff of Derbyſhire had a precept to apprehend him, and bring him with his poſſe to town. But he invited the Sheriff, and kept him a priſoner of honour, till he had compounded for his own liberty, by giving bond to pay the full ſum of thirty thouſand pounds; which bond had this providential diſcharge, that it was found among the papers of King James, and given up by King William. We are told, that the Counteſs Dowager, his mother, being uneaſy to ſee him under ſo great a hardſhip, waited on the King to beg her ſon's pardon; and for diſcharge of the fine, did humbly deſire, that his Majeſty would accept of her delivering up bonds, and other acknowledgments, for above 60,000 l. lent by her huſband and his mother to his royal father and brother, in their greateſt extremities. But it ſeems, the Popiſh party then thought, the Earl had forfeited all title to gratitude and equity (5).

(4) Kennet's Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh, p. 136—139.

[D] A plan for their common deliverance.] We are told by the Hiſtorians of this family, that this noble Earl concerted meaſures with the Earl of Danby, Sir Scroop How, and others, previouſly to the Revolution (6). A very late author, whoſe account, I preſume, is taken from the tradition in that part of the country, gives us the following account (7): 'At Whittington, 'ſays he, a village on the edge of Scarſdale in Der-'byſhire, the Earls of Devonſhire and Danby, with 'the Lord Delameer, privately concerted the plan 'of the Revolution. The houſe in which they met, 'is at preſent a farm-houſe, and the country people 'diſtinguiſhed the room where they ſate, by the name 'of the plotting-parlour.' We have a larger and more authentic account of this whole tranſaction from a moſt noble pen: I mean, that of the late Duke of first who declared for him, ſecured the county town of Derby, and from thence marched to Nottingham, where he had the honour of receiving the Princeſs Anne, whom he lodged in the Caſtle, from which its noble owner, Henry Duke of Newcaſtle, thought fit at that time to retire, and afterwards conducted her to Oxford, to her conſort Prince George of Denmark (b). He then came up to London, and was one of that aſſembly of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, who joined in an addreſs to the Prince of Orange to take upon him the adminiſtration, till the Convention then ſummoned ſhould meet (c). In the Convention alſo, he was very active, argued ſtrenuouſly in ſupport of the reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, that King James had abdicated, and that the throne was vacant; which being once carried, he found himſelf at the head of a great majority, on the final reſolution, that the Prince and Princeſs of Orange ſhould be declared King and Queen of England (d). As the juſt reward of theſe his arduous and important ſervices, he was, on the 14th of February following, ſworn of the Privy-Council; and not long after, named Lord Steward of their Majeſties Houſhold (e); and on April 3, 1689, he was choſen one of the Knight's companions of the moſt noble Order of the Garter; and was inſtalled on the 14th of May following, with great ſolemnity (f). At their Majeſties coronation, he acted as Lord High-Steward of England (g); and in the firſt ſeſſion of Parliament afterwards, procured a reſolution of the Houſe of Lords, as to the illegality of the judgment given againſt him in the former reign, and a vote, that no Peer ought to be committed for non-payment of a fine to the Crown (h). Neither was he leſs ſolicitous to procure redreſs, as far as was poſſible, for others, who had been injured in the courſe of that and the former reign, and even in favour of the repreſentatives of ſuch as were deceaſed (i). In January 1691, he attended King William to the Congreſs at the Hague, where he lived in the utmoſt ſtate and magnificence, and had the honour to entertain ſeveral ſovereign Princes at his table, the King himſelf being preſent incognito; after which he waited upon the King to the camp, and having been preſent at the ſiege of Mons, returned to England with his Majeſty in April following (k). On the 12th of May 1694, he was created Marquis of Hartington and Duke of Devonſhire; and in the preamble of his Patent, the higheſt juſtice was done to his patriotiſm in the late reigns, and to his ſervices in this (l). Indeed, higher honours could hardly be done, or greater rewards conferred upon a ſubject; for beſides his Garter and White Staff, he was intruſted with the county of Derby as Lord Lieutenant, and Cuſtos Rotulorum, and was conſtituted alſo Lord Juſtice in Eyre (m). He ſhowed his gratitude to, and affection for that excellent Princeſs Queen Mary, by writing a pindaric poem on her death, which, as Mr. Dryden aſſerted, was the beſt that appeared upon that melancholy ſubject (n). The deceaſe of the Queen making it neceſſary for his Majeſty to appoint Lords Juſtices at ſuch times as the affairs of Europe required his preſence on the Continent, his Grace had the ſignal honour of being the only temporal Peer that was in every one of theſe commiſſions (o). But notwithſtanding all theſe honours and preferments, his Grace's conduct in Parliament was never governed by other dictates than thoſe of his conſcience; as appeared eminently in the caſe of Sir John Fenwick (p), and of the bill for the reſumption of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland; and in the latter, he not only voted but ſpoke againſt it, with his uſual freedom and eloquence (q). At the funeral of King William, his Grace and the late Duke of Somerſet, ſupported Prince George of Denmark as chief mourner (r). He was confirmed in all his offices by Queen Anne (s), whom he dutifully ſerved; and was, on the other hand, treated by her Majeſty with all imaginable marks of eſteem and confidence. In April 1705, he attended her Majeſty to Cambridge, and was there created Doctor in Law (t). In 1706, himſelf and his ſon the Marquis of Hartington, were in the number of the Engliſh Peers, appointed Commiſſioners for treating and concluding an union between the kingdoms of England and Scotland (u). This was the laſt of his public employments, for being ſeized with a ſevere illneſs, which yielded not to the art of the beſt Phyſicians, he departed this life, Auguſt 18, 1707, about nine in the morning, at Devonſhire-houſe in Piccadilly, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age (w). His Grace's character is too well known, and has been drawn by pens too eminent for us to hope to give any addition, either to the luſtre or the extent of his fame. He was a Nobleman no leſs diſtinguiſhed by his virtues than by his titles, and which alſo derives honour to

(5) This judgment was afterwards declared illegal by the Houſe of Lords, as the reader is told in the text.

(6) Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family by Kennet, p. 146—155. Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 166, 167.

(7) Dr. Akenſide's Ode, addreſſed to the Earl of Huntingdon, p. 26.

(b) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 167.

(c) Compl. Hiſt. of England, vol. iii. p. 505.

(d) Journal of the Houſe of Lords, Feb. 7, 1688.

(e) Compl. Hiſt. of England, vol. iii. p. 515.

(f) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 169.

(g) Compl. Hiſt. of England, vol. iii. p. 524.

(h) Journal of the Houſe of Lords, May 6, 1689.

(i) See the article ARMSTRONG (Sir THOMAS) in this Dictionary.

(k) See an exact Relation of the Entertainment of King William at the Hague.

(l) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 172.

(m) Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh.

(n) Lives of the Poets, vol. ii. p. 24.

(o) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 174.

(p) Compl. Hiſt. of England, vol. iii. p. 731.

(q) Kennet's Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

(r) Compl. Hiſt. of Europe for the year 1702, p. 111.

(s) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 175. Hiſt. of Europe for the year 1702, p. 118.

(t) Pointer's Chronological Hiſtory, vol. ii. p. 513.

(u) Taken from the Commiſſion, dated April 16, in the fifth year of her Majeſty's reign.

(w) Compl. Hiſt. of Europe for the year 1707, p. 489.

(8) Copies and Extracts of ſome Letters written to and from the Earl of Danby, now Duke of Leeds, in the years 1676, 1677, and 1678. With particular Remarks upon ſome of them, publiſhed by his Grace's direction, Lond. 1710, 8vo. in the Introduct.

Leeds, who at the time of this tranſaction was Earl of Danby; and who in a book, which he publiſhed to juſtify his own character, and to ſhew, that the beſt men who were concerned in the proſecution againſt him under the reign of King Charles II. afterwards changed their ſentiments, has this paſſage, in relation to the noble perſon, who is the ſubject of this article, (8), viz. The Duke of Devonſhire alſo, when we were partners in the ſecret truſt about the Revolution, and who did meet me and Mr. John D'Arcy for that purpoſe, at a town called Whittington in Derbyſhire, did, in the preſence of the ſaid Mr. D'Arcy, make a voluntary acknowledgment of the great miſtakes he had been led into about me, and ſaid, that both he and moſt others were entirely convinced of their error. And he came to Sir Henry Goodrick's houſe in Yorkſhire, purpoſely to meet me there again, in order to concert the times and methods by which he ſhould act at Nottingham (which was to be his poſt) and I at York (which was to be mine); and we agreed, that I ſhould firſt attempt to ſurprize York, becauſe there was a ſmall garriſon with a Governor there; whereas Nottingham was but an open town, and might give alarm to York, if he ſhould appear in arms before I had made my attempt upon York: which was done accordingly, but is miſtaken in divers relations of it.

his memory, by the ſolidity of his abilities, and the brilliancy of his parts. He was not only a Stateſman and a Patriot, but a Poet too; and, which is more, an excellent Poet, as his writings ſhew [E]. He was a Critic alſo, and ſo good a one, that Lord Roſcommon, whoſe verſes will live as long as our language, ſubmitted them to the reviſion of this ſevere, but candid judge (x). He was only once married, which was to the Lady Mary, daughter of James, Duke of Ormond (y), and their iſſue will be ſeen in the notes [F]. His

(x) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 174.

(y) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, vol. ii. p. 551.

[E] As his writings ſhew.] It is a very difficult matter to deſcribe, and that within the narrow compaſs of a note, the great abilities of this Nobleman, who was the friend and companion, and at the ſame time the equal, of Ormond, Dorſet, Roſcommon, and all the noble ornaments of that reign of wit, in which he paſſed his youth. It is, however, to his honour extremely, that he preſerved his public principles from being either tinged with ſlaviſh ſubmiſſion, or an enthuſiaſtic fondneſs, for that ſort of anarchy, which ſome call liberty. His frequent diſcourſe was to commend the conſtitution and laws of this kingdom, and to affirm, that as he always had, ſo he ever would endeavour to defend and preſerve them. He ſeemed to be made for a Patriot: his mien and aſpect were engaging and commanding: his addreſs and converſation were civil and courteous in the higheſt manner. He judged right in the Supreme Court, and on any important affair, his ſpeeches were ſmooth and weighty. As a Stateſman, his whole deportment came up to his noble birth and his eminent ſtations: nor did he want any of what the world calls accompliſhments. He had great ſkill in languages, was a true judge in Hiſtory, a critic in Poetry, and had a fine hand in Muſic. He had an elegant taſte in Painting, and all politer arts, with a ſpirit that was continually improving his judgment in them; and in Architecture had a genius, ſkill, and experience, beyond any one perſon of his age, his houſe at Chatſworth being a monument of beauty and magnificence, that perhaps is not exceeded by any palace in Europe. It was of this fine houſe, that Marſhal Tallard, who was a more ſucceſsful Courtier than he was a General, is reported to have ſaid a very fine thing, after being invited thither by the noble owner. His compliment at his departure, was conceived in theſe terms: My Lord, when I come hereafter to compute the time of my captivity in England, I ſhall leave out the days of my enjoyment at Chatſworth (9). His Grace's genius for Poetry ſhewed itſelf, particularly in two pieces that are publiſhed, and are allowed by the critics to be written with equal ſpirit, dignity, and delicacy.

(9) Kennet's Memoirs of the Cavendiſh Family.

I. An Ode on the Death of Queen MARY, with this motto: Poema eſt Pictura Loquens.

II. An Alluſion to the Biſhop of Cambray's Supplement to Homer.

We may add to theſe, as an additional proof of his genius and character, the following inſcription, which he ordered to be placed on his monument, as it is an equal teſtimony of both.

WILLIELMUS DUX DEVON.
BONORUM PRINCIPUM FIDELIS SUBDITUS, INIMICUS ET INVISUS TYRANNIS.

William Duke of Devonſhire.
Of good Princes the faithful ſubject,
An enemy to, and hated by, tyrants.

[F] Will be ſeen in the notes.] The iſſue of his Grace by the Lady Mary Butler, his only wife, and with whom he paſſed ſo many years with the moſt uninterrupted harmony, were three ſons and one daughter. 1. William Duke of Devonſhire. 2. Lord Henry Cavendiſh, repreſentative in Parliament for the town of Derby twice (10), who died May 10, 1700, leaving iſſue by his wife Rhoda, daughter to William Cartwright, of Aynoe, in the county of Northampton, Eſq; one daughter Mary, married to John, Earl of Weſtmoreland. 3. Lord James Cavendiſh, of Staley-Park, in Devonſhire; he married Anne, daughter of Elihu Yale, Eſq; formerly Governor of Fort St. George, by whom he had a ſon William, and a daughter Elizabeth. 4. Lady Elizabeth Cavendiſh, his Grace's only daughter, married Sir John Wentworth, of Broadſworth, in the county of York, Bart. by whom ſhe had three ſons.

(10) Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, p. 236.

William, Duke of Devonſhire, was a Nobleman of unblemiſhed character and unſpotted integrity, enjoyed under the reigns in which he lived the higheſt employments, with the faireſt reputation, and died June 4, 1729 (11). He married the Lady Rachael Ruſſel, daughter of William Lord Ruſſel, and ſiſter to the Duke of Bedford, by whom he had iſſue, 1. William, Duke of Devonſhire. 2. Lord James Cavendiſh. 3. Lord Charles Cavendiſh, who married the Lady Anne Grey, third daughter to his Grace the Duke of Kent; and by her had two ſons. 4. Lord John Cavendiſh, who died May 10, 1720. His daughters were Lady Mary, who died unmarried; Lady Rachael, who eſpouſed Sir William Morgan, of Tredegar, Knt. of the Bath; Lady Elizabeth, who became the wife of Sir Thomas Lowther, Baronet; Lady Catherine, who died unmarried; Lady Anne, and Lady Diana, who alſo died unmarried. C.

(11) Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 181.

 [William, the firſt Duke of Devonſhire, was undoubtedly a Nobleman of admirable public principles and character, whoſe political conduct in general, and whoſe affection to Lord Ruſſel in particular, together with the concern which he had in the Revolution, will ever render his memory dear to this country. He had, therefore, merit enough to recommend him, without its being neceſſary, on account of his writing two copies of verſes, to give him the praiſe of having been an excellent Poet. If Mr. Dryden ſaid, that his Grace's Ode on the death of Queen Mary was the beſt poem that appeared on that melancholy ſubject, it might be a tribute of flattery, which that great man had little ſcruple in paying to diſtinguiſhed rank; or it might be one of the beſt of the elegies occaſioned by her Majeſty's deceaſe, without its being entitled to any very high applauſe. Though we remember to have read, when young, both the Duke's pieces, we do not recollect their having made ſuch an impreſſion upon us as ever induced us to call for them again, or to eſtimate him, in our own minds, as a conſiderable Poet. Mr. Jacob, however, hath aſſigned him a place in his Poetical Regiſter, and hath produced ſome ſpecimens from the performances juſt mentioned, which only ſhew that his Grace, like ſeveral other Noblemen of his time, could occaſionally amuſe himſelf with verſification (12). Having, ſince the laſt ſentence was written, read the whole of the Ode on the death of Queen Mary, and ſome farther extracts from the "Alluſion to the Biſhop of "Cambray's Supplement to Homer," we continue in the ſame opinion. Mr. Walpole hath ranked the Duke of Devonſhire among his noble Authors, not only on account of theſe Poems, but on account, likewiſe, of two ſhort ſpeeches made by him, in King Charles the Second's reign, when he was a Member of the Houſe of Commons, and a paper which he delivered to the Mayor of Derby, in 1688 (13). The ſame ingenious writer hath thus briefly drawn his Grace's character: "A patriot among the men, "galant among the ladies. His friendſhip with "Lord Ruſſel, his free ſpirit, his bravery, duels, "honours, amours, are well known, and his epitaph "will never be forgotten (14)." Macky's account of him is, that he had been the fineſt and handſomeſt gentleman of his time; that he loved the ladies, and plays; that he kept a noble houſe and equipage; that he was tall, well made, and of a princely behaviour; and that he was of nice honour in every thing, but the payment of his tradeſmen (15). The laſt circumſtance, if true, greatly derogates from the worth and dignity of his character.

(12) Jacob's Poetical Regiſter, vol. ii. p. 23—26.

(13) Collins's Engliſh Baronage, p. 90—94. 107. 109—112. Royal and noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 99.

(14) Ibid. p. 98.

(15) Macky's Characters of the Court of Great-Britain, p. 18.

Mr. Colley Cibber relates, that, in the ſummer preceding the Revolution, when the Earl of Devonſhire was retired to Chatſworth, and had there been deeply

His corpſe was interred with his anceſtors in the Church of Allhallows in Derby, and his Ducheſs ſurviving him till the 31ſt of July 1710, deceaſed then in the ſixty-eighth year of her age; and on the 6th of Auguſt following, was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey (z). Thus we have collected, digeſted, and tranſmitted to poſterity, the memoirs of ſome of the moſt eminent and celebrated perſons of this truly noble and illuſtrious family; and this, with ſuch regard to their deſcents, as might preſerve, as nearly as poſſible, the natural and chronological order of reading, and at the ſame time, leave as little of deficiency or obſcurity as the neceſſity of keeping within reaſonable bounds would permit. That there were many more of this line which deſerved to be remembred, we very well knew: but, as on the one hand, the nature of our deſign reſtrained us from mentioning any but the moſt diſtinguiſhed; we were conſcious, on the other, that the titles with which the merits of the houſe of Cavendiſh have been juſtly honoured by our Princes, have ſecured ſome memorials of their actions and fortunes; ſo that there is no danger that oblivion ſhould ever overſpread their memories, or hide from ſucceeding ages the glories of a houſe peculiarly remarkable for producing great men in almoſt every ſenſe of the word, and thoſe too, as good as they were great.

(z) Le Neve's Monum. Anglic. p. 202.

deeply engaged, with other Noblemen, in meaſures which ſoon after brought it to bear, King James ſent a perſon down to him, with offers to mitigate his fine, in the caſe of Colonel Culpeper, upon condition of ready payment. To this his Lordſhip replied, that if his Majeſty would be pleaſed to allow him a little longer time, he would rather chooſe to pay double or quit with him. The time of the intended riſing was then ſo near at hand, that the demand, it ſeems, came too late for a more ſerious anſwer (16). There is a circumſtance recorded in that ſplendid work, the Memoirs of Thomas Hollis, Eſq; which has an alluſion to this ſtory. The matter is thus related from a letter written by that excellent man to a friend, in the latter end of the year 1765. "I was in cloſe "connection with the late Duke of Devonſhire (17), "on matters of virtú, for ſome time before he died, "and had juſt obtained his confidence to ſo abſolute "a degree, as to have employed it to many noble "purpoſes. I had more than half perſuaded him, "in the ingenious bagatelle way, to cauſe dies to be "engraven for a ſeries of medals of the Dukes of "Devonſhire. And in the laſt converſation I had "with him, juſt before he became ſtricken, I ſaid to "him, that I had found the inſcription, though not "the ſubject, for the reverſe of the medal for the "firſt Duke of Devonſhire, DOUBLE OR QUITS, "at which we both laughed heartily. For he had "feelings, feelings too ſenſible, and died under them" (18). Nothing, as the ingenious and ſpirited writer of Mr. Hollis's life obſerves, could be more happily imagined than this inſcription; ſince, to ſecure the ſum of thirty thouſand pounds to the Crown, his Grace gave bond for ſixty thouſand to the Sheriff, who was ſent to Chatſworth to apprehend him. This might be called the Duke of Devonſhire's ſtake, hazarded on the event of the game of the Revolution, in which James might be ſaid to play for his Crown, againſt the Duke his antagoniſt. Had the project of the Revolution miſcarried, the Duke had loſt his DOUBLE STAKE; as it ſucceeded, he was QUITS. The people of England, adds the ſame writer, ought never to forget their obligations to this moſt noble, illuſtrious, and patriotic family. The character of the firſt Duke, inſcribed by his own order on his monument, deſcended to his poſterity. "William, the "ſecond Duke, continues our author, inherited his "father's principles and ſpirit with advantage. It "is a cold commendation given of him in the Bio-"graphia Britannica, that "he was a Nobleman of "unblemiſhed character and unſpotted integrity," "in compariſon of what a Miniſter of State, and an "excellent diſcerner of men, ſaid of him, a little "before his Grace's death, "that, ſhould there "have been a failure of Proteſtant heirs, and the "Crown ſhould have been to be diſpoſed of by the "rule of detur digniori, in a free election of the peo-"ple, the choice muſt inevitably have fallen on the "Duke of Devonſhire." The ſame honourable per-"ſon who communicated this anecdote, and was in-"timately acquainted with his Grace, ſaid, the "Duke had frequently in his mouth that fine ſtanza "of Horace,

"Fortes creantur fortibus & bonis,
"Eſt in Juvencis, eſt in Equis Patrum
"Virtus; nec imbellem feroces
"Progenerant Aquilæ Columbam——

"and particularly when he delivered his bowl, his "favourite exerciſe (19)." Mr. Macky's character of him, when he was Marquis of Hartington, is, that he had for many years made a conſiderable figure in the Houſe of Commons; that he was a man of very good ſenſe, a bold orator, and a zealous aſſerter of the liberty of the people; and that he was one of the beſt beloved gentlemen, by the country party, in England (20). Of the laſt Duke of Devonſhire, who died at the German Spa, on the 3d of October, 1764, Mr. Hollis ſays, that he was a Nobleman who was a friend to liberty and his country, and the arts (21).

Were it our deſign to enter into the hiſtory of families ſo much as our predeceſſors have ſometimes done, we could enlarge ſtill farther, with much pleaſure, on the Cavendiſhes. Among the noble and illuſtrious houſes which this country hath produced, few have been more diſtinguiſhed for their integrity and public ſpirit; and they ſtill continue to ſuſtain the ſame character. A juſt tribute of applauſe hath lately been paid to them in this reſpect, by a very ingenious author (22). Nor hath the race of Cavendiſh been deſtitute of the glory of ſcience, as well as of virtue. Lord Charles Cavendiſh, ſon to the ſecond Duke of Devonſhire, hath long been an eminent Member of the Royal Society, and celebrated for his philoſophical purſuits and knowledge. One of his Lordſhip's ſons, the Honourable Mr. Henry Cavendiſh, ſhines with no ſmall degree of luſtre in the ſame walk of literature, and hath made many important experiments and diſcoveries. Of theſe we could produce a variety of evidence, from the Tranſactions of the Society, Dr. Prieſtley's works, and other publications; but it is the intention of the Biographia to do juſtice to the dead, and not to adulate living merit.] K.

(16) Apology for the Life of Colley Cibber, vol. i. p. 55, 56. Fourth edition.

(17) William, the fourth Duke.

(18) Memoirs of Thomas Hollis, Eſq; vol. i. p. 173.

(19) Ibid. p. 173, 174.

(20) Macky's Characters, p. 47.

(21) Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 273.

(22) Dunbar's Eſſays on the Hiſtory of Mankind, p. 335.

CAWTON (THOMAS), a very learned Miniſter among the Nonconformiſts in the XVIIth century. He was the ſon of the Reverend Mr. Thomas Cawton, a worthy and truly religious Puritan, who was baniſhed for his loyalty (a) [A]. As for our author, he

(a) Life and Death of Mr. Thomas Cawton, Lond. 1662, 8vo. p. 5.

[A] Baniſhed for his loyalty.] Mr. Thomas Cawton, ſenior, was Miniſter of St. Bartholomew's behind the Royal Exchange, and had an exceeding fair character in the city. This occaſioned his being called to preach before the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, at Mercer's Chapel, February 25, 1648, when he delivered himſelf in ſuch plain terms againſt the canting hypocriſy of their governors, that he was firſt ſent for to he was born at Wivenhoe, near Colcheſter, in Eſſex, about the year 1637, his father being then Miniſter of the place. The firſt rudiments of learning he received from his father, whom he attended in his baniſhment, and lived with him ſeveral years in Holland, where he ſtudied the Oriental languages under Mr. Robert Sheringham, at Rotterdam, with equal diligence and ſucceſs (b). About the year 1656, he was ſent to the Univerſity of Utrecht, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his extraordinary ſkill in the Oriental languages, in ſuch a manner as did honour to his country (c). On the 14th of December, 1657, he maintained a Theſis in relation to the Syriac Verſion of the New Teſtament, and printed his diſcourſe, as he did ſome time after another diſſertation on the uſefulneſs of the Hebrew language in the ſtudy of Theoretic Philoſophy, which treatiſes ſufficiently ſhew both the extent of his learning, and the ſolidity of his judgment (d) [B]. When he left Utrecht, the famous Profeſſor Leuſden ſubſcribed an ample teſ-

(b) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 583.

(c) See the Account given of him by Mr. Leuſden in note [C].

(d) Theſe treatiſes were both printed in Latin at Utrecht, in 4to. 1657.

to Weſtminſter, and then committed to the Gatehouſe (1). This ſerved only to raiſe his character among the loyal Preſbyterians, who, when King Charles II. had thoughts of entering England, and aſſerting his right, intruſted him, with Mr. Chriſtopher Love, and ſome other worthy perſons, with the money raiſed by them for his Majeſty's ſervice, for which, when Mr. Love was impriſoned, and afterwards executed, Mr. Cawton betook himſelf to a voluntary exile, and retiring to Rotterdam, became Miniſter of the English Church there, ſpending the remainder of his days in peace and honour (2). His ſon took care to preſerve a juſt account of his merits and ſufferings by writing his life as is mentioned in the text. The title of it ran thus: The Life and Death of that Holy and Reverend Man of God, Mr. Thomas Cawton, ſome time Miniſter of St. Bartholomew, &c. To which is added, his Father's Sermon, intituled, God's Rule for a godly Life, from Philippians i. 27. which is the ſermon for the preaching of which he was impriſoned, London 1662, 8*vo*.

(1) See a brief Vindication of the Preſbyterians from the murder of King Charles I.

(2) Bates, Elenc. Mot. P. ii. p. 133.

[B] Solidity of his judgment.] The title of the firſt of theſe pieces runs thus: Diſputatio de Verſione Syriaca Vet. & Novi Teſtamenti, 4*to*. 1657. i. e. A Diſcourſe on the Syriac Verſion of the Old and New Teſtament. It is in ſome meaſure a reproach on our nation, that while many of our countrymen are admired for their parts abroad, their names are ſcarcely known at home; and for this reaſon it ſeems neceſſary to give ſome account of this learned Tract, which it does not appear that any of our Biographers have ever ſeen. Our author ſpeaks, firſt of the Syriac Verſion of the Old Teſtament (3); and in reſpect to this he obſerves, there may be four queſtions moved. I. Whence this Syriac Verſion was made? In anſwer to which he tells us, that there were antiently two, one from the Septuagint, and the other from the original Hebrew; but that the latter only was in uſe among the Maronites, Neſtorians, and Jacobites, of which the famous Primate Uſher obtained a copy from the Patriarch of Antioch, which is printed in the Engliſh Polyglot. II. Who compoſed this Verſion? Mr. Cawton ſhews, that this is abſolutely uncertain. III. When were either of theſe Syriac Verſions made? He ſays, the Maronites pretend, that it was made from the Hebrew under the reigns of Solomon and Hiram; but this he obſerves is carrying the thing too high, though, from various authorities, he is convinced it is a very ancient Verſion, and inclines to fix it about the time of the Apoſtles. IV. Whether the Syriac Verſion of the Old Teſtament be of any moment? He anſwers in the affirmative, and gives his reaſons, ſhewing alſo abundance of places wherein it varies from the Hebrew original. He comes next to the Syriac Verſion of the New Teſtament, as to which he ſays, there may be five queſtions moved. I. By whom, and when was this Verſion made? In anſwer to which he cites the Preface of Jacobus Martinus, in which it is aſſerted, that this is the oldeſt of all Verſions, and that it was either made by one of the Apoſtles themſelves, or by ſome of their Diſciples with their aſſiſtance. Our author does not, however, ſeem to give entire credit to this, and much leſs to what has been reported on the credit of William Poſtell, that it was made by St. Mark the Evangeliſt, which notion he refutes by very ſolid reaſons. He mentions, laſt of all, the ſentiments of Dr. Rainolds, who thought it might be made about the IIId or IVth century; and ſeems inclined to place it higher, chiefly for this reaſon, that in moſt of the copies of the Syriac Verſion, there are wanting the ſecond Epiſtle of St. Peter, the ſecond and third Epiſtles of St. John, the Epiſtle of St. Jude and the Revelation, which argue it to have been made before thoſe Scriptures were generally received by the Church. II. By whom this Verſion has been publiſhed? He acquaints us, that it has gone through many editions; in ſome of which, for want of Syriac, they have been forced to make uſe of Hebrew types. It was thus printed by Chriſtopher Plantin, at Antwerp, in 1575, but without vowels. In like manner by Elias Hutter, at Noremberg, in his Bible of twelve Languages, 1599; but there, though printed in Hebrew characters, it is pointed. Since theſe editions it has been publiſhed in the Syriac character, particularly in the Engliſh Polyglot. In moſt of theſe editions, the ſtory of the Adultreſs in the eighth Chapter of St. John, is wanting, as well as the ſeveral pieces before mentioned; but in the edition of Hutter, and the Engliſh Polyglot, they are found. In many, there are no points at all; in ſome, they are marked only here and there; but in Hutter, and the Engliſh Polyglot, they are marked throughout. But of all the editions, that publiſhed by Gutbirius, Profeſſor of Divinity at Hamburgh, which was printed in a pocket volume, 1663, is the beſt. III. Whether the Syriac Verſion is of any moment, or has any utility? He anſwers in the affirmative, and for this very good reaſon, that Syriac being the language in which our bleſſed Saviour and the Apoſtles ſpoke, their thoughts appear more clearly therein, than in any other; ſo that texts, which are very obſcure in the Greek, become plain and eaſy when we conſult the Syriac Verſion. Of this he gives ſeveral inſtances, particularly, 1 Cor. x. 2. And were all baptized unto Moſes in the cloud and in the ſea, where the ſenſe is far from being clear: in the Syriac it is, By the hand of Moſes, which is perfectly plain. He farther adds, that many words in the New Teſtament are abſolutely Syriac, though written in Greek characters, ſuch as Raka, Aceldama, Abba; ſo that without the knowledge of this tongue it is impoſſible to apprehend perfectly the force and energy of the Divine Writings. IV. By what name is this language called in the New Teſtament, and where is it now the vulgar tongue? This language, ſays he, is called the Aramite, from Aram, the ancient name of the country in which it was ſpoken, as it is Syrian from Syria the more modern. In the New Teſtament it is frequently called the Hebrew, becauſe Syriac was a dialect of the Hebrew: at preſent, the Syriac is ſcarcely any where the mother tongue, excepting in a few villages about Mount Libanus; but throughout all Aſia and Africk it paſſes for the learned language among the Chriſtians. V. Which was the firſt tranſlation of this Syriac Verſion into Latin? He tells us in anſwer to this, that Henry Stephens printed, in 1569, the Latin Verſion of Tremellius; that about two years afterwards, there appeared another Latin Verſion by Boderianus. But ſome diſpute has ariſen, whether one of theſe tranſlations was not ſtolen from the other. The ſecond piece publiſhed by our author is intituled, Diſſertatio de Uſu Linguæ Hebraicæ in Philoſophia Theoretica, printed at Utrecht in 1657. This diſſertation on the uſe of the Hebrew language in the ſtudy of Philoſophy, is likewiſe a very curious piece; but as it is written upon a more abſtruſe ſubject, and as this note is already of an extraordinary length, we forbear entering more particularly into its contents.

(3) This Analyſis was very carefully made from the work itſelf.

timonial in his favour, wherein he expreſſes a great regard for his perſon, as well as a juſt ſenſe of his parts (e) [C]. On his return to England, he went to Oxford, and was entered there of Merton-College, for the ſake of Mr. Samuel Clark, famous for his thorough knowledge of the Oriental languages (f). Our author ſhewed his loyalty by writing a copy of Hebrew verſes on his Majeſty's Reſtoration, having been pretty early in the year 1660 (g), admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts, at which time Profeſſor Leuſden's certificate was read publicly (h). In 1661, he was ordained by the Biſhop of Oxford (i); and in 1662, he publiſhed the Life of his Father (k). In all probability,

(e) Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(g) Britannia Rediviva, Oxon. 1660, 4to.

(h) Faſti, Oxon. vol. ii. col. 127.

(i) Calamy's Life of Baxter, vol. ii. p. 73.

(f) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, vol. ii. p. 73.

(k) Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 584.

[C] As well as a juſt ſenſe of his parts.] In this certificate he obſerves, that Mr. Cawton had, with infinite labour, ſtudied and acquired a perfect knowledge of the principal languages of the East; that he had eſtabliſhed a deſerved reputation, by publiſhing the treatiſes before-mentioned, and that he was in all reſpects a perſon of quick wit, piercing judgment, and deep erudition: but it may not be amiſs to cite part of the certificate (4). 'Totum vetus Teſtamentum 'Hebraicum partim punctatum, partim non punctatum perlegit & explicuit——Regulas Grammaticæ '& Syntaxeos Hebraicæ optime perdidiſcit. Deinde 'in Lingua Chaldaica Danielis & Paraphraſibus 'Chaldaicis, in lingua Syriacâ Novi Teſt. & in Lingua Arabica, & Commentariis Rabbinorum ſtrenuè 'ſeſe exercuit. Denique quæſtiones Philologico-'Hebraicas circa Vetus Teſt. Hebræum moveri ſolitas, ita perdidiſcit, ut ſummo cum honore duas 'diſputationes philologicas publicè defenderit, priorem de Verſione Syriaca veteris & Novi Teſt. poſteriorem vero, de Uſu Linguæ Hebraicæ in philoſophia Theoretica, illius fuit Reſpondens, hujus 'vero Author & Reſpondens. Certe in Diſputatione 'hac componenda, & in ejuſdem ſtrenua Defenſione, 'ingenium & eruditionem ſuam omnibus palam fecit, '&c. 18 Maii 1659, Joh. Leuſden.'——In all probability our author would have afforded his country more conſpicuous marks of his ſkill in theſe matters, if the taſte for that kind of learning had not begun to decay, and his own troubles for Nonconformity come on. All that he afterwards publiſhed, was a ſermon bearing the title of BALAAM'S WISH, or the Vanity of deſiring, without endeavouring, to obtain the Death of the Upright. London 1670, 8vo. and again, in 1675 (5). This is a very grave, ſolid, and judicious diſcourſe, and is at once a proof of the deep learning and ſincere piety of its author. I have ſeen a letter written by one Mr. Bruce, who ſtudied at Utrecht, to a relation of his in Scotland, which is dated in June 1682, in which, ſpeaking of his countrymen and other Britiſh ſubjects that had ſtudied in that Univerſity, he gives a very high character to our author in the following words: 'Beſides the late Dr. 'Nicholas Shepherd, who was Miniſter of the Engliſh Church at Middleburgh, Mr. Thomas Cawton, who died but a few years ago, and was a man 'very eminent among the Nonconformiſts, laid the 'foundation of his great knowledge in the Oriental 'languages here; and it is wonderful how freſh the 'memory of his proficiency in thoſe ſtudies remains 'in this place. The Profeſſor has a particular regard for thoſe of our nation, and takes a great 'pleaſure in ſpeaking of ſuch of them as have been 'under his care: but I never heard him mention any 'with greater reſpect than this gentleman, who was 'not only eminent for his knowledge in the Hebrew, 'but in the Syriac alſo, and other Eaſtern tongues; 'and wrote a treatiſe to ſhow the uſefulneſs of this 'kind of learning, not in Divinity only, but in the 'ſtudy alſo of Philoſophy, in which he was a very 'great maſter. That tract of his is become very 'ſcarce, ſo that it was with ſome difficulty that I procured it; and I am afraid, I ſhall meet with many 'ſuch obſtacles in my deſign of making a collection 'of all the pieces of that kind that have been printed 'in this country by the natives of Great-Britain; 'and which, according to the computation I have 'been able to make, will not fall very far ſhort of 'threeſcore. I doubt, whether any encouragement 'could be had for reprinting them, which might be 'done in three volumes in quarto: but if I am able 'to compleat ſuch a collection, I think it would be 'an acceptable preſent to one of our Univerſities, and 'with this view I ſhall take ſome pains, both here 'and at Leyden, and ſhall endeavour to procure the 'characters of the principal perſons at leaſt, from the 'ſeveral Profeſſors who were acquainted with them, 'and are ſtill living, &c.' C.

(4) Reg. Convoc. Un. Ox. quod incipit, 1659, p. 9.

(5) Calamy's Life of Baxter, vol. ii. p. 73.

 [Mr. Thomas Cawton, who was father to the ſubject of the preſent article, and Miniſter of Wivenhoe in Eſſex, before he had the living of St. Bartholomew's behind the Royal Exchange, was educated at Queen's College in Cambridge, and "there, "ſays Mr. Granger, laid the foundation of that "learning in which he had few equals, and began to "diſtinguiſh himſelf by that piety in which he had "ſcarcely a ſuperior. He was eminent for his knowledge of the ancient and modern languages, and "was well known in England and Holland, as an "Orientaliſt. He was very inſtrumental in promoting the great work of the Polyglot Bible, and was "an encourager of Dr. Caſtell's Polyglot Lexicon. "—The account of his life is an artleſs picture of a "man who did great honour to his profeſſion, and "was a pattern of virtue in every ſocial relation. "The author tells us, that when Mr. Cawton firſt "received the Sacrament, he fainted; and he ever "afterwards expreſſed the profoundeſt reverence, and "the moſt elevated devotion, at that awful ſolemnity (6)." From the effect which the receiving of the Lord's Supper had on Mr. Cawton, it is probable that he was not wholly free from ſuperſtitious ideas concerning that inſtitution. The rational, and, at the ſame time, the truly ſcriptural manner, in which the Sacrament has been explained by Mr. John Hales, Biſhop Hoadly, and, above all, by Dr. Bell, ſhews that there is nothing in it myſterious, terrifying, or alarming. However, Mr. Cawton's ardent piety was deſerving of the higheſt commendation.

(6) Biographical Hiſtory of England, vol. iii. p. 47.

From the manner in which Leuſden has expreſſed himſelf, in the paſſage cited in note [C], "illius "fuit Reſpondens, hujus vero Author & Reſpon-"dens," it hath been obſerved to us by a ſagacious correſpondent, that it is pretty evident, that the firſt diſſertation, de Verſione Syriaca, was not compoſed by Mr. Cawton junior; but that, in truth, it was drawn up by Leuſden himſelf. There is the more weight in this remark, as it is well known that it is not unuſual for the profeſſors abroad to write the Theſes which young men are to defend upon taking their degrees. Nevertheleſs, as the diſcourſe was uniformly aſcribed to Mr. Cawton by his contemporaries, and we do not know that his claim to having been the author of it hath ever been diſputed before, he ought not lightly to be deprived of a reputation which he hath ſo long poſſeſſed.

The writer of the preſent note is a ſucceſſor of Mr. Cawton; being the ſixth Paſtor of the Society of Proteſtant Diſſenters, which was originally formed by that gentleman, in the city of Weſtminſter. The three firſt Miniſters of the Congregation, Mr. Cawton, Mr. Alſop, and Dr. Calamy, have been thought worthy of a place in the Biographia, by my learned predeceſſor in it, Dr. Campbell. Mr. Samuel Say, the fourth, on account of his poems, his diſſertations on metrical harmony, and and his celebrated character of Mrs. Bridget Bendyſh, will deſerve to be noticed, either in a ſhort diſtinct article, or on ſome other occaſion. Dr. Obadiah Hughes, the fifth, who was a reſpectable man, of large property and conſiderable influence among the Diſſenters, publiſhed ſeveral ſermons; but did not otherwiſe diſtinguiſh himſelf by any literary undertaking. With regard to myſelf, I eſteem it an honour to have been ſo far connected with the Biographia Britannica, as to have uſed my beſt endeavours to enlarge and improve it in a ſecond edition.] K.

he

he might have obtained very conſiderable preferment, if his principles had not led him to Nonconformity. When he retired from the Univerſity, he was taken into the family of Sir Anthony Irby, of Lincolnſhire, where he officiated for ſome years as Chaplain; but the air of that country diſagreeing with him, and the family going down thither on account of the plague in 1665 (l), he was obliged to quit it, and lived afterwards with the Lady Armin till about the year 1670, when he gathered a congregation of Diſſenters in the city of Weſtminſter, to whom he preached, with ſome interruption from the ſeverities of the government, for about ſeven years, till falling into a bad ſtate of health, he died of a gradual decay, April 10, 1677 (m), being then about forty years of age. He was buried in the New Church in Tothil-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, at which time his friend and Fellow-collegian, Mr. Henry Hurſt, preached his funeral ſermon; as did alſo Mr. Nath. Vincent in another place (n). He was a man, who, as his learning rendered him admired, ſo his virtues made him beloved by all parties. Anthony Wood, ſpeaking of the praiſes beſtowed upon him by Mr. Hurſt in his diſcourſe, gives them alſo his ſanction; they were, ſays he, deſervedly ſpoken (o). His congregation followed the advice he gave them on his death-bed; for he told them that he knew none ſo proper to be his ſucceſſor, as a certain Northamptonſhire Miniſter, who wrote againſt Dr. Sherlock. This was Mr. Vincent Alſop, whom they accordingly choſe (p).

(l) Calamy's Life of Baxter, vol. ii. p. 73.

(m) See Mr. Hurſt's Funeral Sermon on our author.

(n) Calamy's Life of Baxter, vol. ii. p. 73.

(o) Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 584.

(p) See the article of ALSOP (VINCENT) in this Dictionary.

CAXTON (WILLIAM), the firſt who introduced, practiſed, and communicated, the moſt uſeful and inſtructive art or myſtery of Printing, in England. He was born about the latter end of King Henry the IVth's reign, who died in the year 1412, and, as himſelf acquaints us, in the Weald, or woody part of Kent (a); and, therefore, not in the town that bears his name in Cambridgeſhire, as Dr. Fuller was miſled to believe (b). His father, Mr. William Caxton, who reſided with him at Weſtminſter when he was in the height of his buſineſs there, muſt have lived to a good old age, according to the memorial we have of his death (c). Whether Matilda Caxton, who founded a chantry in Walbrook Ward, in the City of London, and had a monument in St. Swithin's Church there after the repair of it in 1420, was any relation of his, my author does not intimate (d). The cuſtom which had long prevailed of impoſing that badge of Norman ſlavery, the French language, upon our children at the grammar-ſchools, as is very particularly obſerved by Ranulphus Higden, and John de Treviſa [A], being, in the younger years of Caxton, much worn off, and the neglect of it accounted no deficiency in education; he was, by the care of his prudent mother, ſo well inſtructed and qualified at home in reading and writing (e), as ſerved his occaſions very commendably, when he was put out to a genteel trade. But afterwards, by his diligent application, he arrived to a conſiderable proficiency, not only in writing, after a very clear, free, and dexterous manner, that ſtrong hand which was then in moſt requeſt, as may be ſeen in ſome copies of his books to this day, but in attaining both a competent knowledge of the Latin tongue, and to a good perfection in the French, when he was preferred to a conſiderable charge abroad by his Prince, and to very honourable patronage, in the latter part of that long courſe of time he continued there. He might be about the age of fifteen or ſixteen, when he was put apprentice to Mr. Robert Large, a Mercer of ſuch eminence in London, that he was elected one of the Sheriffs in the year 1430, and, nine years after, Lord-Mayor of this city (f). The ſaid Magiſtrate held his mayoralty in that which had been the Manſion-houſe of Robert Fitzwalter, anciently called the Jew's Synagogue, at the north corner of the Old Jewry; and here Caxton appears to have reſided with his maſter till his death, which happened on the twenty-fourth of April 1441, as by the Latin inſcription that was cut on the brazen-plated ſtone in the ſouth iſle of the pariſh church of St. Olave Jewry appears. To the reparation of this church Mr. Large gave two hundred pounds (g); and in his laſt will he bequeathed alſo to his ſervant Caxton, thirty-four marks; a conſiderable legacy in thoſe times, and a creditable, as well as early teſtimony, of his good behaviour and great integrity (h). He mentions himſelf afterwards, how much he was obliged to the city, and that company, of which he was a ſworn freeman; and he was now become a man of ſuch reputable character,

(a) His Prologue to The Recuyel of the Hiſtories of Troy.

(b) Worthies of England in Cambridgeſhire.

(c) In The compte of the Wardens of the Pariſhe Churche of Sayncte Margarete of Weſtminſter, from the 7 of May, in the Yere 1478, &c. to the 18 of May 1480, thus; Item, The day of buryeng W. Caxton, for 2 Torches, and 4 Tapers, 20*d*.

(d) J. Stow's Survey of London, edit. fol. 1633, p. 241.

(e) See his Prologue to Thyſtory and Lyf of Charles the Grete Kyng of Fraunce. Alſo John Bagford's Life of W. Caxton, annexed to his Propoſals for printing an Hiſtorical Account of the Art of Typography, in one ſheet folio. And Mr. J. S. Ames his Specimen, joined to his Propoſals for an Hiſt. of Printing in England, &c. in half a ſheet, 4to. p. 3.

(f) Fabian's Chron. R. Graſton; and Stow's Survey of Lond. p. 563. 565.

(g) Stow, as before, p. 288. 290.

(h) The Lyfe of Mayſter Wyllyam Caxton of the Weald of Kent, the firſt Printer in England, &c. by John Lewis, Miniſter of Margate in Kent, 8vo. Lond. 1737, p. 2.

[A] As is very particularly obſerved by Ranulphus Higden, and John de Treviſa.] The former, in his Polychronicon, tranſlated by the latter, and printed by Maſter Caxton (1), ſpeaking of the cauſes of the impairing of our language, ſays, 'One is, by cauſe that 'children that gon to ſcole learne to ſpeke firſt Englyſhe, and then ben compelled to conſtrewe her (‖) leſſions in Frenſh; and that have ben uſed ſyn 'the Normans come into Englond. Alſo gentilmens 'children ben lerned and taught from theyr yougthe 'to ſpeke Frenſh. And uplondyſh men will counterfete and liken himſelf to gentilmen, and arn beſy 'to ſpeke Frenſh, for to be more ſette by. Wherefore, it is ſayd by the comon proverbe, Jack wold 'be a gentilman, if he coude ſpeke Frenſhe.' To which, John de Treviſa, his Tranſlator, adds as follows: 'This manner was moche uſed tofore the grete 'deth (2): but ſyth, it is ſomedele chaunged. For, 'Sir John Cornuayl, a Mayſter of Gramer chaunged 'the techyng in Gramer ſcole, and conſtruction of 'Frenſhe; and other Scoolmayſters uſe the ſame way 'now in the yere of our Lord 1365 (3), the 9th yere 'of Kyng Rychard the ſecund, and leve all Frenſh 'in ſcoles, and uſe al conſtruction in Englyſhe. 'Wherein they have avantage one way, that is, that 'they lerne the ſonner theyre Gramer; and in another, diſadvantage; for nowe they lerne no Frenſh, 'ne conne none, whiche is hurte for them that ſhal 'paſſe the ſee: and alſo gentilmen have moche lefte 'to teche theyr children to ſpeke Frenſh.'

(1) Fol. 1482, lib. i. in Capit. de Inculcarum Linguis.

(‖) their

(2) There were two mortalities in the reign of King Edward III. the firſt in 1349, the ſecond in 1361.

(3) So Caxton's edition of Polychronicon, and ſo Wynkin de Worde's edition after him, which is erroneous; for 1365, is the 39th of Edward III. and the 9th of Richard II. is 1385, as it ſhould be here. So it is corrected in Julyan Notary's edit. of Higden's Deſcript. of England, at the end of his impreſſion of The Fruit of Time. And ſo Dr. Hickes, in the Pref. of his Theſaurus, &c. which correſponds with the MS. of Treviſa, in St. John's College.

character, of ſuch probity, abilities, and expertneſs in his buſineſs, that when he went to ſettle abroad, in the ſame year his maſter died, as he informs us himſelf (i), and is agreed on by thoſe writers who have beſt acquainted themſelves with his ſtory, he was deputed and entruſted by the Mercers Company, to be their Agent or Factor in Holland, Zealand, Flanders, &c. to eſtabliſh and enlarge their correſpondence, negociate the conſumption of our own, and importation of foreign manufactures, and otherwiſe promote the advantage of the ſaid corporation, in their reſpective merchandize, &c. (k). It ſeems that he ſpent about twenty-three years in thoſe countries, upon this, and ſuch like employments, before we hear of him again: but he had then acquired ſuch an eminent character for his knowledge and experience, his diligence and fidelity, that we ſee him joined with Richard Whetehill, Eſq; in a very honourable commiſſion, granted to them by King Edward IV. in the year 1464, to continue and confirm the Treaty of Trade and Commerce, between his Majeſty and Philip Duke of Burgundy; or, if they found it neceſſary, to make a new one; and the commiſſion gives both, or either of them, full power to tranſact and conclude the ſame. They are ſtiled Ambaſſadors and Special Deputies, &c. in the ſaid commiſſion; as, for the ſatisfaction of the curious, may appear in the tranſcript annexed [B]. There were afterwards, ſeveral other treaties between theſe two powers, for the communication of their merchandize, fiſhery, &c. in which, other Embaſſadors or Agents were after the like manner employed (l); and theſe, with other views of mutual advantage, produced a near alliance between them in the marriage of King Edward's ſiſter, the Lady Margaret of York, with the Duke's ſon Charles, in July 1468, he being then Duke of Burgundy, &c. (m). When this Lady Margaret arrived at the Duke's Court at Bruges, ſhe was very magnificently attended, and Maſter Caxton appears then to have been of her retinue. He was either now one of her houſhold, or held ſome conſtant poſt or office under her; becauſe, as he ſays, he received of her a yearly fee or ſalary, beſides many other good and great benefits (n); which alſo demonſtrates that he was very ſerviceable to her, or much in her favour. Being a man expert in penmanſhip and languages, as well as matters of commerce; and by his long converſation abroad with ingenious men, being alſo acquainted with matters of literature, which were now grown the faſhionable diſcourſe of thoſe parts more than ever, through the ſurprizing communication thereof by the new invention of Printing, of which Caxton muſt have heard the progreſs from its very birth, it is is highly probable that he was employed by the Ducheſs in ſome literary way; which, indeed, ſoon appeared, by her encouraging him in the practice of the ſaid new invention. It is evident, he had partly attained this myſtery of Printing, and, as he ſays himſelf, with great expence (o), before he was thus apparently eſtabliſhed in her ſervice; becauſe he no ſooner appears in it, but we ſee him employed by her, in tranſlating out of French, a large volume, and then in printing it himſelf, as we ſhall preſently more particularly ſpecify. Yet it is not likely that his firſt eſſay in this art ſhould be upon a book of that bulk, which now appears to be the firſt he printed; nor even upon another, which he is well atteſted to have alſo printed in Latin abroad, though, as it ſeems, before the other, becauſe this is rather more voluminous than that. However, as this, which is named Bartholomeus de Proprietatibus Rerum, may poſſibly have been his earlieſt performance of the two, we ſhall here firſt ſpeak more largely of it. The ſaid Latin edition of this book, which Caxton is affirmed to have been concerned in at the preſs, ſeems to have been, either that fair one, in which there is no mention made by whom, where, or when, it was printed; or another that was printed at Cologne in the year 1470 [C]. His engagement

(i) The Recueyl, &c.

(k) Mr. Lewis's Life of Caxton, as before.

(l) Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xi. edit. 1710, p. 591.

(m) Idem, p. 590. 601, &c. See alſo Francis Sandford's Genealogical Hiſt. of England, fol. edit. 1707, p. 402.

(n) The Recueyl, &c. as before.

(o) Idem.

[B] For the ſatisfaction of the curious, may appear in the tranſcript annexed.] This commiſſion is preſerved in the following title and form:

Super Trugis Burgundiæ.

A. D. 1464. An. 4 Ed. IV. } REX omnibus, ad quos &c. Salutem. Sciatis, quòd cum certa Appunctuamenta, Intercurſum Marchandiſarum inter Subditos noſtros ac Subditos cariſſimi conſanguinei noſtri Ducis Burgundiæ concernentia, ſub certis modo & formâ ante hæc tempora concordata fuerant & concluſa, ſæpiúſque interim prorogata; nos appunctuamenta illa pro Parte Noſtra teneri & obſervari volentes, ac de fidelitatibus & providis circumſpectionibus dilectorum & fidelium noſtrorum Richardi Whetehill Armigeri, & Willielmi Caxton, pleniùs confidentes, ipſos Ricardum & Willielmum noſtros veros & indubitatos Ambaſſiatores, Procuratores, Nuncios & Deputatos ſpeciales facimus, ordinamus, & conſtituimus per præſentes: dantes & concedentes eiſdem Ambaſſiatoribus, Procuratoribus, Nunciis & Deputatis Noſtris, & eorum utrique plenam Poteſtatem & Auctoritatem ac Mandatum generale & ſpeciale ad conveniendum, tractandum & communicandum cum præfato Conſanguineo Noſtro, ſeu ejus Ambaſſiatoribus, Procuratoribus, Nunciis & Deputatis, ſufficientem poteſtatem ab eodem Conſanguineo Noſtro ad hoc habentibus, de & ſuper continuatione Intercurſûs prædicti, & prorogatione ejuſdem, &, ſi neceſſe fuerit, de novo capiendâ, appunctuandâ & concludendâ, cæteraque omnia & ſingula quæ in præmiſſis neceſſaria fuerint & opportuna faciendum & exercendum; promittentes, bona fide, & in verbo Regio, Nos ratum, gratum & firmum, pro perpetuo habituros totum & quicquid per dictos Ambaſſiatores, Procuratores, Nuncios & Deputatos Noſtros, ſeu eorum alterum, in formâ prædictâ, actum, geſtum, ſeu procuratum fuerit in præmiſſis, ſeu aliquo præmiſſorum. In cujus, &c.

Teſte Rege, apud Wycomb, Viceſſimo die Octobris.
Per ipſum Regem, & de Datâ prædictâ, &c. (4).

(4) Rymer' Fœd. tom. xi. edit. 1710, p. 536.

[C] Either that fair one — or another that was printed at Cologne in the year 1470.] Of theſe two books, the late Mr. John Lewis gives us the following account:—'In the library of Bennet College, in 'Cambridge, is an edition of this book in Latin, in 'a large folio. It is an exceeding fair book; the 'types are very ancient, but well cut; and it is 'printed gagement upon this larger work, might be the reaſon, that though he began the other at the command of Lady Margaret, not very long after ſhe arrived at Bruges, he did not finiſh it in three years, but laid it by, being a little diſcouraged at ſome difficulties or fatigues in it (p), and till he had inured himſelf, probably, upon ſome other work,

(p) Ibidem.

'printed without any ſignatures, date, or name of 'the place or Printer (5).' Of the other Latin edition, he ſays: 'We have an account, that it was 'printed at Cologne, in the year 1470, by John Ko- 'elholf: and, as this might be while Mr. Caxton was 'at Cologne, learning and practiſing the Art of 'Printing, he might poſſibly be aſſiſting in printing 'this book, or in the expence of it; and ſo be re- 'membered by De Worde as the Printer (6).' This authority for Caxton's being the Printer of a Latin edition of that book, being ſo good, it deſerves to be a little more amply conſidered; for this was Wynkin de Worde, whom Caxton probably knew at this time there, and whom he either brought with him into England, or ſent for him when he was ſettled here; the ſame who wrought under him till he died, and ſucceeded him with great reputation in his buſineſs, for above forty years, before he died himſelf. This Printer, who, by his long practice, greatly advanced and improved the Art among us, perceiving that author, whoſe name was Bartholomew Glanvill, a Franciſcan Friar (deſcended of the Earl of Suffolk's family) who flouriſhed about the year 1360 (7), was well accepted of abroad (inſomuch that there was another Latin edition of him publiſhed under the ſame Koelholf's name, who ſtiles himſelf de Lubeck, Coloniæ Civem, folio 1481) thought that a tranſlation of him would be no leſs acceptable to us. His reaſons were, that the work was a Natural Hiſtory, of ſuch variety; gathered moſtly from the ancients, and ſome moderns, who lived nearer the author's own time; explaining more eſpecially the nature and properties of beaſts, birds, fiſhes, ſtones, &c. that are mentioned in Scripture: and there being an Engliſh tranſlation made, by John de Treviſa before-mentioned, in the year 1398, at the command of his Patron, Thomas Lord Berkeley, which might be recommended to Caxton in his life-time; it was printed, though the edition is not dated, ſoon after his death, by Wynkin de Worde, at the prayer and deſire of Roger Thorney, Mercer; as De Worde informs us, in his poetical Proem to the ſaid work; wherein, having ſaid, there is no pleaſure comparable to the reading and underſtanding of wiſe books, with reſpect more eſpecially to thoſe perſons who, for the propagation of knowledge and virtue, delight in the making, reviving, or otherwiſe exhibiting them to the world, he proceeds in theſe words:

(5) Lewis's Life of William Caxton, p. 7.

(6) Idem. p. 8.

(7) Vid. Leland, Bale, and Pits.

And alſo, of your Charyte, call to remembraunce
The ſoule of William Caxton, firſt Prynter of this boke,
In Laten tonge at Coleyn, hymſelf to avaunce;
That every well diſpoſyd man may thereon loke (8).

(8) Prohemium Bartholomei.

From which it is reaſonably enough inferred, that he had a hand in compoſing, at the preſs, one of thoſe two former editions above-mentioned; for the latter was printed when he was in England. There are three more lines that follow, to make up the ſtanza, which are alſo ſo remarkable, that they muſt not be here omitted;

And John Tate the yonger, joye mote hem broke,
Which late hathe in Englonde doo make this paper thynne,
That now, in our Engliſh, this boke is prynted inne (9).

(9) Idem.

By which we are at once informed, that this Engliſh edition of Bartholomeus, printed by Wynkin de Worde, is the firſt book for any thing we yet know to the contrary, that was printed in England, upon paper that was made in England; and that John Tate the younger, firſt cauſed that paper to be made here, or was at the expence of introducing the art of that manufacture, ſo highly ſerviceable for the preſervation of all kinds of literature among us. The paper of this book is ſofter, ſmoother, and thinner, than that of Caxton's books: it might be alſo a fairer or whiter paper, could we behold it without the diſadvantage of age; nor is there to be ſeen in any of his, the ſame paper mark; which is, as I remember, in the midſt of every other leaf, or half ſheet, ſomewhat reſembling a Catherine-wheel, or Star of eight rays, encloſed in a double circle. This is different from the marks in any paper which Caxton printed on; and, therefore, his might more probably be imported from Holland; and in this book, may be the earlieſt ſpecimen of Engliſh made writing-paper now in being, though we had the uſe of ſuch paper in England long before. The regiſters made of paper which Dean Prideaux mentions (10), as inſtances of its great antiquity, being but as old as King Edward IIId's reign, do not approach near to its primitive invention; for we certainly have grants, conveyances, and other deeds and evidences in England, or at leaſt have had, and eſpecially among the very ancient collections of Richard Gaſcoyne, Eſq; that able Antiquary, who died about the time of the Reſtoration, written upon paper that was as old as the Conqueſt: and it is not improbable, but thoſe Quaternions of leaves ſtitched together, whereof King Alfred, ſo long before, made his little hand books (11), were alſo of paper, rather than parchment, or vellum; a book or tract no broader than a quarter of a ſheet of paper, anſwering that deſcription better, as being more contracted, pliable, and handy for uſe, than one as wide as a quarter of a ſkin of parchment, &c. We are told by one of the Antiquaries in Queen Elizabeth's reign, that the firſt Paper-Mill we had in England was erected at Ware in Hertfordſhire, as I remember (12), but have forgotten whether he mentions that John Tate the younger, was concerned therein. In the ſame reign, we had a Poet who wrote a pamphlet upon the ſame ſubject (13), with the ſetting forth of a Paper-Mill, built near Darthford, by a High German, called Mr. Spilman, Jeweller to the Queen. It is written in verſe; and though it might be forth-coming at Oxford in Anthony Wood's time, upon a late ſearch, it was not to be found there. Who that John Tate the younger was, we cannot be poſitive: but in the liſt of our Lord-Mayors of London, we find Sir John Tate, Mercer, ſon of John Tate, to have been elected, anno 1473. And John Tate, called the younger, ſon of Thomas Tate of Coventry, alſo elected in 1496, being eight years after his brother Sir Robert Tate, Mercer, was dignified with the ſame office (14); which John Tate the younger, we take to be the very man to whom we owe the art of making this moſt uſeful commodity: and Joye mote hem broke ſay I again, for the ſame, as honeſt Wynkin heartily ſaid before; by which, and this rare device of Printing, the moſt remote tranſactions, intelligence, and inventions of paſt times, are both made preſent, and tranſmitted to poſterity; by which, as from a fountain with innumerable conduits, knowledge and inſtruction are raiſed out of the deepeſt ſources of antiquity, and diffuſed through many parts at once; by which, the preſs will diſpatch as much in a day, as the pen in a twelvemonth, as it is expreſſed in the epigram made upon Ulric Han, who firſt carried it to Rome.

(10) Prideaux's Connexion, &c. Part i. lib. vii.

(11) A Diſſertation upon Pamphlets, in a Letter to a Nobleman, by W. O. 4to. 1731, p. 2.

(12) See William Valans his Tale of two Swans; 4to. Lond. 1590.

(13) Thomas Churchard's Deſcription and Diſcourſe of Paper, and the Benefits that it brings, &c. 4to. 1588. Alſo in Dr. Harris's Hiſtory of Kent, upon the ſame ſubject.

(14) See Stow's Survey of London, in the Catalogue of the Lord-Mayors, under thoſe years.

Imprimit ille die quantum non ſcribitur anno:
Ingenio, haud noceas, omnia vincit homo.

Or, to paſs over many other advantageous lights, in which the art might be celebrated, to conſider it only in its renovating property, we need go no farther than Maſter Wynkin again; if by way of novelty, we can bear once more with his ancient phraſe,

For yf one thyng myght laſte a thouſand yere,
Full ſone comyth aege, that frettyth all away;
But lyke as Phebus, wyth his bemes clere,
The Mone repyreth, as bryght as ony day,
When ſhe is waſtyd; ryght ſo may we ſay,
Theſe bokes old and blynd, when we renewe,
By goodly Prynting, they ben bryght of hewe.

the better to accompliſh this; but then being, by his ſaid patroneſs, prompted to bring it to a concluſion, he ſtuck painfully to it, till he brought it forth under the title of The Recuyell of the Hiſtorys of Troye, &c. which is the firſt book, at leaſt in being, or which we now know of, that was ever printed in the Engliſh tongue [D]. In the year laſt mentioned, King Edward was driven over to his brother-in-law, the Duke of Burgundy's court, to ſeek ſuccour againſt his rebellious ſubjects, where Caxton no doubt paid his obedience to him (q), and received his Majeſty's approbation for his engagement in this new art; but the King returned to England without any great enforcement, before Caxton compleated his ſaid work. He wrought ſome time upon it at Ghent, but he finiſhed it at Cologne in the year 1471. Then he returned to Bruges, and preſented his performance to the Lady Margaret, who very graciouſly accepted, and liberally rewarded him for it. He alſo then diſpatched his copies to his other friends and encouragers, who had been impatient for the ſame; and no doubt ſome of them he ſent into England, if he did not then bring them over himſelf. Hence it is, from this tranſmiſſion, or introduction of the ſaid ſpecimens or products of the art, that John Stow, and others of our Chronologiſts, have dated Maſter Caxton's firſt introducing the art itſelf among us, in or about that year (r); though indeed we cannot now find that the art was practiſed in England by him till at leaſt three years after, much leſs by any body elſe. However, a certain writer, very ſuperficially acquainted with our literary antiquities, yet moved by private intereſt, near two hundred years after, did, by a blind unauthoriſed ſtory, inſinuate, that a foreigner practiſed the art of Printing in England, ſix years before Maſter Caxton [E]. After he publiſhed The Book of Troy, he proceeded, it ſeems, (q) Philip. de Comines. J. Speed's Chron. &c.

(r) Stow's Annals, fol. edit. 1615, p. 404.

[D] The firſt book we now know of, that was ever printed in the Engliſh tongue.] In the title page of this book, we read as follows:—'Here begynneth the 'volume, intituled, and named, The Recuyell of the 'Hiſtorys of Troye: compoſed and drawen out of 'dyverce bookes of Latyn into Frenſhe, by the Right 'Venerable perſone and Worſhipfull man, Raoul le 'Feure, Preeſt, and Chapelayn unto the Right Noble 'Gloryous and Myghty Prynce in his tyme, Phiſip, 'Duc of Bourgoyne, of Braband, &c. in the yeare of 'the Incarnacion of our Lord God, a thouſand four 'hundred ſixty and foure, and tranſlated and drawen 'out of Frenſhe into Engliſh by Willyam Caxton, 'Mercer of the cyte of London, at the commaundement of the Right Hye Myghty and Vertuouſe 'Princeſſe, his redoubtyd Lady Margarete, by the 'Grace of God, Ducheſſe of Burgoyne, &c. (15). 'Whiche ſayd tranſlacion and werke was begonne in 'Brugis in the countee of Flaunders, the fyrſt day of 'Marche, the yeare of the Incarnacion of our ſaid 'Lord God, a thouſand foure hondred ſixty and 'eight, and ended and fynyſhed in the holy cyte of 'Colen the xix day of Septembre, the yeare of our 'ſayd Lord God, a thouſand four hondred ſixty and 'enleven.' The ſaid title page (to diſtinguiſh this from ſubſequent editions) is printed, as well as ſome other principal parts in the book, with red ink; and it is ſaid to be printed with the ſame letter as the original edition was in 1464: but the French edition has two wooden cuts in it, and no name mentioned of the perſon who printed it: but this Printer is conjectured to have been an inſtructor of Maſter Caxton in his art (16). The reaſon why this book was recommended to him before any other, might be in compliment to the Duke of Burgundy's Chaplain, the author; and poſſibly to gratify the diſpoſition there was at this time in the Engliſh or Britiſh nation, to derive their original from Brutus and his Trojans. Caxton's great modeſty, diffidence, and humble opinion of his abilities, appear in this, as well as all others of his books, very much to his commendation; it having been obſerved out of the Prologue before it, 'That he thought himſelf ſo unqualified on account 'of his unperfectneſs in both languages, having never 'been in France, and lived out of England near thirty 'years, that he was fully in wyll to have lefte it, and 'accordingly laid it aſide for two years after he had 'begun it, or till 1470; when it fortuned, his ryght 'redoubted Lady ſent for him, to enquire, it ſeems, 'what progreſs he had made in this tranſlation. 'And when ſhe had ſeen, or read, five or ſix quires '(or parcells) of it, ſhe found a defaute in the Engliſh, but commanded him to amande, and make an 'end of the reſidue: accordingly he proceeded in his 'tranſlation; which he tells us, he begun in Brugis, 'the firſt of March, in the year 1468, continued in 'Gaunt, and finiſhed in Colen, the 19th of Sep-'tember 1471.' Having thus finiſhed the tranſlation of this book, he next ſays, 'He deliberated in him-'ſelf to take the laboure in hand of printing it, to-'gether with the third book of the Deſtruction of 'Troy (17), tranſlated of late by John Lydgate, a 'Monk of Burye, in Engliſh rithme.' Of this, Mr. Caxton gives us the following account, full of complaints of the painfulneſs of it to him.—'Thus, ſays 'he, end I this booke—and for as moche as in 'wrytynge the ſame, my penne is worne, myne hand 'wery, and myn eyen demmed, with overmoch lokyng 'on the white paper,—and that age creepeth on me 'daily, and feebleth all the body—and alſo, becauſe 'I have promyſid to dyverce gentilmen, and to my 'frendes to addreſs to hem as haſtely as I might this 'ſaid book; therefore, I have practyſed and lerned 'at my grete charge and diſpence, to ordyne this 'ſayde book in prynte, after the manner and forme 'as ye may here ſee; and is not wreton with penne 'and ynke as other bokes ben, to thende that all men 'may have them attones; for all the bookes of this 'ſtorye, named, THE RECULE OF THE HISTORYS 'OF TROYES thus emprynted as ye here ſee, were 'begonne in oon day, and alſo fyniſhed in oon day '(18).' Thus it is obſerved of Fauſt and Schæffer, the very firſt practiſers of this art of Printing, That they uſed to advertiſe the public, at the end of their firſt printed works from Mentz, that they were non atramento, plumali canna neque æra, not written with a pen and ink, as all other books had been before, but made by a new art or invention of Printing, or ſtamping them with characters, or types of metal, ſet in forms, whereby the ſeveral ſheets were done all at once, and not line by line, as when they were written (19). The ſame notice was given by other Printers in the firſt books that were printed by them in other towns and cities, as Dr. Middleton has truly obſerved (20).

[E] That a foreigner practiſed the art of Printing in England, ſix years before Maſter Caxton.] This is aſſerted by one Richard Atkyns; who, in the time of our Civil Wars, having reduced his fortune in the ſervice of the Crown, ſought to repair it after the Reſtoration, by endeavouring to entitle the Crown to one of the moſt valuable privileges of the people. And, after having been at the expence of above a thouſand pounds in Chancery, and other Law Courts, for nearly twenty-four years, to prove the right of the King's grant in printing of Law-books (21), he publiſhed a pamphlet in which he tells an unknown improbable tale, to prove the Art of Printing was a royal purchaſe, and thereby to inſinuate that it was a royal prerogative, in order to get himſelf made a Patentee

(15) This Lady Margaret's titles were, Ducheſſe of Burgoyne, of Lothrein, of Brabant, of Lymburgh and Luxemburgh; Countes of Flanders, of Artoys and of Burgoyne; Palatinee of Heynawd, of Holland, of Zeland and Namur; Marqueſſe of the Holy Empire; Lady of Fryſe, of Salins, and of Malines. The Recuyell, &c. and Rymer's Fœd. as before quoted.

(16) Mr. Ame's Specimen, joined to his Propoſals for The Hiſtory of Printing, &c.

(17) The Hiſtory, Siege, and Deſtruction of Troy, at the Commandement of King Henry V. 1412, in Engliſh Metre or Verſe. Tho. Speght's Catal. of John Lydgate's Works.

(18) Lewis's Life of Caxton; and The colophon to The Recuyel, &c.

(19) Lewis, as before, p. 6.

(20) Dr. Conyers Middleton's Diſſertation concerning the Origin of Printing in England; ſhewing, that it was firſt introduced and practiſed by our countryman William Caxton at Weſtminſter, and not as is commonly believed by a foreign Printer at Oxford, edit. Cambr. 4to. 1735, p. 16.

(21) See an Epiſtle to the Parliament, prefixed to The Original and Growth of Printing; collected out of Hiſtory, and the Records of this Kingdom: wherein it is demonſtrated, That Printing appertaineth to the Prerogative Royal, and is a Flower of the Crown of England, by Ric. Atkyns, Eſq; Printed by the order of Secretary Morrice, 4to. 1664.

ſeems, in printing others; and if he had before no hand in that edition of Bartholomæus, printed as above-mentioned at Cologne, he might now in the other undated one. Of the

Patentee for the printing of books in that Science, which, it is ſaid, he afterwards did; not heeding, therein, how ſlaviſhly, for a little private and pecuniary advantage, he undermined the liberties of his countrymen; how rancorouſly he vilified the Stationers, as a ſwarm of drones, who lived upon the labours of the painful Printers; or how unwarrantably he robbed Maſter Caxton of the honour wherewith he had long been, by the ſuffrage of all learned men, undeniably inveſted, of firſt introducing and practiſing this moſt ſcientifical invention among us. Indeed, as a Poet may have licence to make uſe of any incidents, or arguments, that are plauſible, or conducive to his purpoſe, there need be little exception made to a ſpeech in Shakeſpeare, where Jack Cade charges the Lord Say, who was put to death by his rebellious authority in 1450, with the following unpardonable crimes: 'Thou haſt moſt traiterouſly corrupted the 'youth of the Realm, in erecting a Grammar-'School! and whereas before, our fathers had no 'other books but the ſcore and the tally, thou haſt 'cauſed PRINTING to be uſed! and contrary to the 'King, his Crown and Dignity, thou haſt built a 'PAPER-MILL (22)!' If this Lord Say did really put theſe things in practice but a few years before he died, he might be ſet up for the firſt inventor of Printing himſelf; the earlieſt Epocha of any thing conſiderable in that art even abroad hardly appearing older. This is nothing in a poetical writer; and a critical one, will not ſeverely cenſure an Anachroniſm in him, which he will allow in the greateſt Poets among the ancients; ſince this our Poet has been leſs extravagant in chronology, or the æra of printing, than one of our moſt profeſſed Hiſtorians. For Dr. Fuller, under the year 1400, ſays (23), that, 'Over into England, about this time, firſt came the 'Myſtery of Printing.' But the author we are here more particularly to produce, Mr. Atkyns, where he undertakes to play alſo the Hiſtorian, as well as Shakeſpeare upon this ſubject, though he may not digreſs ſo much in point of time, yet in other circumſtances will prove, I am afraid, more a Poet of the two. His firſt buſineſs is, to ſet our Hiſtorians aſide; though he never read what one of the greateſt intelligence among them, who was Librarian to King Henry VIII. has ſaid, where he calls Caxton, Angliæ Prototypographus, 'The firſt Printer of England (24),' and only cites John Stow; whoſe words are theſe under the year 1459, 'The noble Science of Printing 'was about this time found in Germany, at Magunce, 'by one John Cuthemburgus, a Knight; and Wil-'liam Caxton, of London, Mercer, brought it into 'England about the year 1471, and firſt practiſed the 'ſame in the Abbey of St. Peter at Weſtminſter (25).' To this he adds the concurrence of Sir Richard Baker (26) and Mr. James Howel (27). In the next place, thoſe words are to be wilfully miſunderſtood, or quibbled out of their meaning, and then a ſtrange ſtory is to be put in their room, as follows. 'Hiſtorians 'muſt of neceſſity take many things upon truſt; they 'cannot with their own, but with the eyes of others, 'ſee what things were done before they themſelves 'were; Bernardus non vidit omnia: it is not then 'impoſſible, they ſhould miſtake. I ſhall now make 'it appear they have done ſo, from their own, as 'well as from other arguments. Mr. Stow's expreſſions are very dubious, and the matter expreſſed 'very improbable. He ſaith, Printing was firſt 'found in Magunce, which preſuppoſes it was practiſed ſomewhere elſe before, and loſt: and further, 'That it was found in the reign of King Henry VI. 'Anno Dom. 1459, and not brought into England 'till eleven years in the ſucceeding reign of Edward 'IV. being twelve years after; as if it had been loſt 'again. If this be true, there was as little reality 'as expedition in obtaining it, the age of twelve 'years time having intervened; and ſo, indeed, it 'might be the act of a Mercer, rather than a more 'eminent perſon. But, when I conſider what great 'advantage the kingdom in general receives by it, I 'could not but think a publique perſon, and publique 'purſe, muſt needs be concerned in ſo publique a 'good. The more I conſidered of this, the more in-'quiſitive I was, to find out the truth of it. At laſt, 'a book came to my hands, printed at Oxon, Anno 'Dom. 1468 (28), which was three years before any 'of the recited authors would allow it to be in Eng-'land; which gave me ſome reward for my curioſity, 'and encouragement to proceed further: and in pro-'ſecution of this diſcovery, the ſame moſt worthy 'perſon, who truſted me with the aforeſaid book, did 'alſo preſent me with the copy of a Record and manu-'ſcript in Lambeth-houſe, heretofore in his cuſtody, 'belonging to the See, and not to any particular 'Archbiſhop of Canterbury; the ſubſtance whereof 'was this, though I hope, for publique ſatisfaction, 'the Record itſelf, in its due time, will appear.—'Thomas Bourchier, Archbiſhop of Canterbury 'moved the then King, Henry VI. to uſe all poſſible 'means for procuring a Printing-mould, for ſo it was 'there called, to be brought into this kingdom: the 'King, a good man, and much given to works of 'this nature, readily hearkened to the motion; and 'taking private advice how to effect this deſign, con-'cluded it could not be brought about without great 'ſecrecy, and a conſiderable ſum of money given to 'ſuch perſon or perſons, as would draw off ſome of 'the workmen from Harlem in Holland, where John 'Cuthenberg had newly invented it, and was him-'ſelf perſonally at work. It was reſolved, that leſs 'than one thouſand marks would not produce the 'deſired effect; towards which ſum, the ſaid Arch-'biſhop preſented the King with three hundred marks. 'The money being now prepared, the management 'of the deſign was committed to Mr. Robert Tur-'nour, who then was of the robes to the King, and 'a perſon moſt in favour with him, of any of his con-'dition. Mr. Turnour took to his aſſiſtance Mr. 'Caxton, a citizen of good abilities, who trading 'much into Holland, might be a creditable pretence, 'as well for his going as ſtaying in the Low-Coun-'tries. Mr. Turnour was in diſguiſe, his beard and 'hair ſhaven quite off, but Mr. Caxton appeared 'known and publique. They having received the 'ſum of one thouſand marks, went firſt to Amſter-'dam, then to Leydon, not daring to enter Harlem 'itſelf; for the town was very jealous; having im-'priſoned and apprehended divers perſons, who came 'from other parts for the ſame purpoſe. They ſtaid 'till they had ſpent the whole one thouſand marks in 'gifts and expences. So as the King was fain to 'ſend five hundred marks more; Mr. Turnour hav-'ing written to the King, that he had almoſt done 'his work; a bargain, as he ſaid, being ſtruck be-'tween him and two Hollanders for bringing off one 'of the workmen, who ſhould ſufficiently diſcover 'and teach this new art. At laſt, with much 'ado, they got off one of the under-workmen, 'whoſe name was Frederick Corſells, or rather 'Corſellis; who late one night ſtole from his 'fellows in diſguiſe, into a veſſel prepared before for 'that purpoſe; and ſo the wind, favouring the de-'ſign, brought him ſafe to London. It was not 'thought ſo prudent to ſet him on work at London, 'but by the Archbiſhop's means, who had been Vice-'Chancellor, and afterwards Chancellor of the Uni-'verſity of Oxon, Corſellis was carried with a guard 'to Oxon; which conſtantly watched to prevent 'Corſellis from any poſſible eſcape, till he had made 'good his promiſe, in teaching how to print. So that 'at Oxford, Printing was firſt ſet up in England; 'which was, before there was any Printing-Preſs, or 'Printer in France, Spain, Italy, or Germany; ex-'cept the city of Mentz, which claims ſeniority, as 'to Printing, even of Harlem itſelf; calling her 'city Urbem Maguntinam Artis Typographicæ Inven-'tricem primam, though it is known to be otherwiſe; 'that city gaining that art by the brother of one of 'the

(22) Shakeſpeare's ſecond Part of King Henry VI. Act iv. Scene vi.

(23) Fuller's Hiſt. of the Univerſity of Cambridge, fol. 1655, p. 58.

(24) J. Lelandi Comment. de Scriptoribus Britannicis, edit. Oxon, 8vo. 1709, tom. ii. c. 586, p. 480.

(25) Stow's Annals, fol. 1615, p. 404.

(26) Baker's Chron. fol. 284.

(27) Howel's Londinopolis, or Hiſtorical Deſcript. of Lond. and Weſtm. fol. 353.

(28) That book, though not mentioned by this author, is intituled, Expoſitio Sancti Ieronimi in Simbolum Apoſtolorum, ad Papam Laurentiam; and at the end, Explicit Expoſitio, &c. Impreſſa Oxonie, & finita Anno Dom. MCCCCLXVIII, xvii die Decembris. See Mich. Maittaire's Annal. Typogr. edit. Hagæ Comit. 4to. 1719, vol. i. p. 63.

the next book which he is better known to have printed, I mean The Game of Chefs, it appears by an undated edition, that he made ſome ſmall impreſſion while he reſided in the

'the workmen of Harlem, who had learnt it at home 'of his brother, and after ſet up for himſelf at Mentz. 'This preſs at Oxon, was at leaſt ten years before 'there was any printing in Europe, except at Harlem and Mentz, where alſo it was but new born. 'This preſs at Oxford, was afterwards found inconvenient, to be the ſole Printing-place of England, 'as being too far from London, and the ſea; whereupon the King ſet up a preſs at St. Albans, and 'another in the Abbey of Weſtminſter; where they 'printed ſeveral books of Divinity and Phyſick: for 'the King, for reaſons beſt known to himſelf and 'Council, permitted then no Law-books to be printed; 'nor did any Printer exerciſe that Art, but only ſuch 'as were the King's ſworn ſervants; the King himſelf having the price and emolument for printed 'books (29).' Many objections have been made to this Narrative of that Record and Manuſcript, as it is called, for in nothing ſo bulky or conſpicuous as a Chronicle it is pretended to be preſerved; and many incoherencies with matters of fact detected therein. It is obſerved, I. That neither Mr. Atkyns, nor his anonymous friend, do any ways pretend to have ſeen the original of ſuch a Record, &c. much leſs to have compared the copy therewith. II. They give no account when, where, or by whom the ſame was written; nor by what means it came into, or by whoſe it was communicated out of, the Lambeth library. III. No author before, none beſides Mr. Atkyns, and thoſe who have taken it upon truſt from him, have ever mentioned this Record, or ever ſaw any ſubſtance or abſtract of it, though he pretends to wiſh the Record itſelf in due time may appear. IV. No ſuch Record was to be found at Lambeth by the perſon who was particularly employed to ſearch after it by the late Earl of Pembroke. V. That manifeſt inconſiſtences in this Narrative, with the moſt confirmed authorities we have now attained concerning the diſcovery of the Art abroad, have alſo raiſed many exceptions (30), and might ſo many more, with reſpect to the practice of it in England, as would ſufficiently diſtinguiſh, if thoroughly ſifted, the whole to have been a chain of inventions, hung upon two or three noted names, and the ſlight ſupport of a book printed at Oxford, without any Printer's name to it, and with a date at the end of it, which is atteſted to be falſe by the workmanſhip on every foregoing leaf in it, and many other corroborating circumſtances. Dr. Middleton having examined this relation of that pretended Record, makes ſeveral remarks upon it, from whence he concludes it to be a meer forgery (31); and thinks 'Mr. Atkyns, a bold vain man, might 'be the inventor of it, having an intereſt in impoſing upon the world, to confirm his argument, that 'Printing was of the Prerogative Royal, in oppoſition to the Stationers; againſt whom he was engaged in expenſive law-ſuits, in defence of the 'King's Patents, under which he claimed ſome exclusive powers of Printing.' As for the book aforeſaid, which, for its date of M.CCCC.LXVIII. would take place, as ſenior by ſix years, of all other books, that have been the iſſue of any Engliſh preſs, it is a ſuſpected date; and is very reaſonably taken by the ſaid Doctor, and others, to have been falſified originally by the Printer, either through deſign or miſtake; and an X to have been dropped or omitted in the age of its impreſſion (32): an error ſo common in Printing, eſpecially of numerals, that there are few readers, who have been much converſant in books, but have met with inſtances of it. Maſter Caxton himſelf will afford ſome examples; and, I have ſeen others in books ſo far antedated, that, if the dates alone were to carry it, or might ſatisfy us of the years in which they were really printed, they would entitle London to the invention of Printing, perhaps before any other place in Europe: but, if you were to inſpect, or examine them, the novelty of their ſubject matter, or more modern manner of Printing, would contradict their pretended antiquity: juſt as the caſe is here; where the neatneſs of the letter, and the regularity of the page; but, above all, the uſe of ſignatures, or letters and figures at the bottom, for the greater convenience of gathering the ſheets in order, and folding them in binding, being an improvement in the art, not uſed ſo early as the pretended date of that book, brings it to a certainty, that it is erroneous (33). And what farther confirms it is, that there was not any other book printed for ten or eleven years after at Oxford. If Frederick Corſellis was brought thither at ſuch expence, according to the Record, to practiſe the art, how comes it that he never printed any thing in all that while, or that his name appeared not to that one book, if he did print it? If he came to teach the Art there, how comes it that no-body learnt it? If he was diſcouraged, or met with any inconvenience there, he would have been acceptable at Cambridge; that Univerſity being boaſted to have a power to print within the ſame, Omnes & Omnimodos Libros, which the Univerſity of Oxford hath not (34): and yet we hear of no printing there, till long after there was at Oxford; and then, ſome of the earlieſt printing for their uſe, appears to have been executed by Wynkin de Worde, in the year 1510 (35). But it was ſome ſeven years after that, before Sibert, their Univerſity Printer, brought the Myſtery to any tolerable perfection; and then, indeed, he fairly ſet forth Eraſmus's book, De Conſcribendis Epiſtolis; the author at the ſame time living in Cambridge, who may be preſumed curious in ſuperviſing the impreſſion (36): and if there was ſuch a man as Corſellis at Oxford, who printed nothing but one book in eleven years, why might not he have been as well employed by the Univerſity of Cambridge, as were afterwards, the ſaid Wynkin and Sibert? If it was inconvenient to have the only preſs ſo remote from London, and the ſea, as at Oxford or Cambridge; and therefore preſſes were ſet up at Weſtminſter and St. Albans, according to Mr. Atkyns; Corſellis, if he was the only firſt performer of the Art, muſt have been heard of there, to have wrought at one, or other of them; and then, being a Foreigner, it would probably have been upon Latin books: but where, among us, do we hear of any ſo early printed, that ſuſpected one before-mentioned excepted, as ſome of the Engliſh ones, that were ſet forth by Caxton? If the King, for reaſons beſt known to himſelf and Council, permitted no Law-books to be printed; and, if no Printers exerciſed that art, but only ſuch as were the King's ſworn ſervants, as Mr. Atkyns alſo above aſſerts; how came John Lettou and Will. de Machlinia, two foreign Printers in London, who were no ſworn ſervants of the King, to print Judge Littleton's book of Tenures about the time of, or not long after, his death? Laſtly, if Maſter Caxton was thirty years abſent from England, as Bale, Pits, and many other authors have allowed from his own words, then, how could he be within that time ſent from hence, with Mr. Turnour, to lie at Amſterdam and Leyden in Holland, in order to ſpirit over a Printer from Harlem; when he was at that very time waiting upon the Ducheſs of Burgundy, tranſlating and actually printing a book himſelf by her command, at Bruges in Flanders? In ſhort, the more I conſider Mr. Atkyns's Record, or account of it, the more it appears a fiction or romance; whereas, if we admit of Dr. Middleton's conjecture, as what is moſt obvious and probable about the date of that book, all the repugnance will be reconciled, all the obſcurity cleared up: a numerical letter in the date being only reſtored therein, makes it M.CCCC.LXXVIII. Then, the book appearing printed in the ſame manner, and with the ſame letter, as two more, the next two oldeſt books at Oxford were printed the next year: we may preſume, by another alſo printed not long after them, at the ſame place, with the name of its Printers, that the ſame hands printed them all; and then there will be no room to allow of any ſuch man as Corſellis to have been before there; nor need to ſubmit to ſuch contradictions, as we have obſerved muſt occur, by his intro-

(29) Rich. Atkyns's Original and Growth of Printing, &c. p. 3—5.

(30) See Samuel Palmer's General Hiſt. of Printing, and particularly in England, 4to. 1732, B. iii. ch. 3, &c.

(31) Diſſertat. on the Origin of Printing in England, p. 6.

(32) Idem. p. 7.

(33) Ibid. p. 91

(34) Coke's Inſtit. 4. Of the Juriſdiction of Courts, p. 228.

(35) Robert Alynton's Suplifica Principia, was then printed by him at London, Ad uſum Cantabrigienſem, ſays Dr. Fuller, in his Hiſt. of the Univerſity of Cambr. fol. 1655, p. 59.

(36) Vid. Caii Hiſt. Cant. Acad. lib. ii. p. 127.

the Court at Bruges. In theſe employments upon thoſe, and perhaps other like works, and in the time required to provide himſelf with preſſes, types, and all other printing materials, in order to practiſe and eſtabliſh the art in his own country, being now arrived at the evening of life, and naturally inclining homeward, he might paſs three years; till he appears, by the edition of the book of Cheſs, dated in 1474, to be ſettled in England; which book is reputed to be the firſt (s) that was ever printed in this kingdom [F]. Though we do not meet with any books of Caxton's printing that bear date introducement at the time and in the manner aforeſaid. If then it be granted, that the book of St. Jerom in diſpute above cited, was printed at Oxford the year laſt-mentioned, the preſs will appear to be kept going ſome time there; for the next year it alſo produced Leonard Aretin's tranſlation of Ariſtotle's Ethics (37). And though the name of its Printer is not mentioned therein, there will appear good reaſon to believe, that no perſon named Corſellis had any hand in it; that both were printed with the ſame Types, and that theſe were ſet by the ſame Compoſitor. The ſame preſs alſo brought forth another performance the ſame year, printed after the ſame manner. This, like the firſt, is a religious treatiſe, upon Original Sin, compoſed by Egidio Romano (38). Of all theſe three books, the Oxford Antiquarian ſays, Perſpicuis magis & pulchrioribus, quam recentiores nonnulli; that they are more diſtinctly printed, and more beautiful, than ſome of later date. Which ſimilitude or congruity of workmanſhip in them, very much implies, that they were not done by different hands. And, indeed, ſo few there were then in England, that but four years after theſe books were printed, an Act of Parliament was paſſed, whereby leave was given to 'any artificer, or merchaunt ſtraunger, of 'what nation or country he was, or ſhould be of, to 'bring into the Realme, and ſell by retaile, or 'otherwiſe, anie book, writen or printed (39).' And the reaſon hereof, is ſaid, by another act, to have been, that there were then, 'But few Printers within 'the Realme, which could well exerciſe and occupie 'the ſcience and crafte of Printing (40);' which would not be expected, if ſo great a Maſter of it was purchaſed over, and guarded here, to teach it us ſo long before, as fifteen years. But the whole myſtery of this firſt printing at Oxford, ſeems to be cleared up in the annals of the Art the following year; and that Frederick Corſellis, of whom we have hitherto ſeen nothing but the name, ſeems to be turned at laſt into Thomas Hunte, who is commemorated in ſome Latin verſes, printed by (41) his partner Theodoric Rood, at the end of Aretin's Latin tranſlation of Phalaris's Epiſtles, for having printed the firſt Latin books at Oxford, as Nic. Jenſon had done among the Venetians. Theſe muſt be thoſe books before-mentioned, with, perhaps, others now loſt, or then tranſported, if my ſaid author computes right, that Hunte printed at Oxford, ſo ſoon as four years after Caxton began to print at Weſtminſter (42). Rood was a native of Cologne in Germany, where poſſibly Caxton might know him, and whence he might probably draw him, after he was himſelf ſettled at Weſtminſter, to aſſiſt Hunte at Oxford, as he did from 1480 to 1485, and how long after is not obſerved. It is farther added, 'That the Engliſh had then a 'good reliſh of, and were well pleaſed with, the Latin tongue; and, that Hunte and Rood printed ſo 'many books, as to export, or ſend them abroad; or 'at leaſt, ſo ſufficiently to ſupply all demands for 'books in that language at home, that there was no 'occaſion for the Venetians to ſend any of their 'printed books hither, as they were before wont to 'do (43).' Laſtly, it is to be farther remarked, That as the care and diligence of the moſt curious and inquiſitive Literati, have hitherto been able to find no more than four books printed by thoſe two Printers; ſo it makes it the more probable, that Hunte was the Printer of the three books beforementioned, which are dated in 1468 and 1479. So that, in the whole, of the firſt printing at Oxford, and the ſtory of Corſellis, it may in effect be made out, partly by this Hunte, who firſt printed there, and partly by that Rood, who was introduced from Cologne (by Turnour and Caxton, if you pleaſe, but let it be after the Art was in action at Weſtminſter) and might have, for ought we know, ſome aſſiſtant with him; whom I would rather ſuppoſe to be that Corſellis himſelf, than give the leaſt diſpleaſure to any perſon, by totally diſcrediting any late inſcription upon a monument of the dead.

(s) John Bagford, Sam. Palmer, Dr. Middleton, &c.

(37) Intituled, Textus Ethicorum Ariſtotelis, per Leonardum Aretinum luciditſimè tranſlatus correctiſſimeque impreſſus, Oxon. Anno Domini MCCCCLXXIX.

(38) Tractatus brevis & utilis de Originali Peccato, editus à fratre Egidio Romano, Ordinis fratrum Heremitarum Sancti Auguſtini. Impreſſus & finitus Oxonie, à Nativitate Dom. MCCCCLXXIX. xiiii. die Menſis Marcii.

(39) Anno Primo Ric. III. cap. ix.

(40) Ann. 25 Hen. VIII. cap. xv.

(41) See them in Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 24, 25.

(42) Ibidem.

(43) Ibidem.

[F] Which book is reputed to be the firſt that was ever printed in this kingdom.] Mr. Lewis, out of the Preface of the ſecond Edition of this book, printed without any date, or name of the place at which it was printed, makes a citation of Caxton's; where, expreſſing how commendable it is in thoſe who will take pains, to inſtruct the unlearned and ignorant in wiſdom and virtue, he adds, 'Emonge whom, there 'was an excellent Doctour of Dyvynyte in the Roy-'ame of Fraunce, of the Order of thoſpital of Saynt 'John's of Jheruſalem, which entended the ſame, 'and hath made a booke of the Cheſſe moralyſed; 'whiche at ſuche tyme as I was reſident in Brugys, 'in the Counte of Flaunders, cam into my Handes; 'whiche whan I had redde and overſeen, me ſemed 'ful neceſſarye for to be had in Engliſhe; and in 'eſchewyng of ydlenes, and to thende, that ſomme 'which have not ſene it, ne underſtonde Frenſh ne 'Latyn, I delybered in my ſelf to tranſlate it unto 'our maternal Tongue. And when I ſo had achyeved 'the ſaid Tranſlacion, I dyde doo ſette in enprynte 'a certeyn nombre of theym, which anone were de-'depreſshed and ſolde. Wherfore bycauſe thys ſayd 'Book is ful of holſom wyſedom, and requyſyte unto 'every aſtate and degree, I have purpoſed to en-'prynte it, ſhewyn therin, the figures of ſuch per-'ſones as longen to the play (44).' By this it ſhould appear, that the former edition was without figures; and thoſe in this are very rudely cut; of which Mr. Lewis farther obſerves, 'That thoſe of the Alphines, 'which are directed to be formed in manner of judges 'ſetting in a chair, with a book open before their 'eyes; and of the Rookes, which ben Vycarys and 'Legates of the Kynge, have ſuch caps, or hoods, on 'their heads, as Mr. Caxton's picture has (45).' And, indeed, it has been preſumed, that the Prints which have been made of Caxton were invented from ſome of theſe Figures. The edition of this book, which we have ſeen, is a ſmall folio, and it is that which is dated as above; and the Title is as follows: The Game and Play of the Cheſſe; in which Thauctorities, Dictes, and Stories of auncient Doctours, Philoſophers, Poetes, and of other wyſe men been recounted, and applied unto the Moralitie of the publique Wele, as well of the nobles, as of the comyn people. Tranſlated out of French, and imprynted by William Caxton, fyniſhed of, the laſt day of Marche, the yere of our Lord God, a thouſand foure hundred and LXXIIII. Our typographical Antiquaries all allow this book to have been printed in England, though no place is mentioned in it; and alſo to have been the firſt ſpecimen of the Art among us. As ſuch it has been ſo valued, that it is ſaid, the late Earl of Pembroke, for a fair copy thereof, which was given him by Mr. Granger, preſented him with a purſe of forty guineas. It is dedicated by Caxton to the King's brother, George Duke of Clarence; who being about four years afterwards ſentenced to death for treaſon, made his end, according to his choice, as it is ſaid, in the Tower of London, in a butt of Malmſey. And it is juſtly obſerved, to thoſe who doubt of its being printed in England, that by Caxton's telling the Duke, he made this Booke in the name and under the ſhadewe of his noble Protection, it is very ſtrongly implied that he was in England; ſince how could he be under his protection out of it (46). Farther, as a memorial that printing was firſt practiſed in England this year, 1474, it is preſumed that Caxton afterwards uſed at the end of his books, that Cypher or Device, complicating the two latter figures of that date in a knot, between the initial

(44) Mr. Lewis's Life of W. Caxton, p. 142.

(45) Idem. ibid.

(46) Ibid. p. 11.

date till three years after this, it is very probable that a few of his undated books, especially ſome written by Chaucer, Lydgate, &c. as they bear the aſpect of his earlieſt performances, were printed in this interval, of which, ſuch as cannot be adjuſted under their proper years, ſhall be mentioned at the end, after thoſe which are dated have been ſpoken of. John Stow, and others following him, have not only ſaid that Printing was introduced by Caxton, about three years ſooner than the year laſt mentioned, but he expreſsly ſays, 'That in the Eleemoſinary, or Almonry (at Weſtminſter-Abbey) 'now corruptly called the Ambry (t), for that the alms of the Abbey were there diſtri-'buted to the poor, John Iſlip, Abbot of Weſtminſter, erected the firſt preſs of book-'printing that ever was in England; and Caxton was the firſt that practiſed it in the 'ſaid Abbey (u).' Whoever authoriſed him, it is certain he did, there, at the entrance of the Abbey, exerciſe the art; from whence a printing-room is to this day called a Chapel. But Stow and his followers are all miſtaken in the Abbot's name: for if Iſlip was Abbot of Weſtminſter as early as he makes him, he muſt have been ſo above three-ſcore years, according to the account of his death and funeral which is ſtill in being (w). It is certain, that Dr. Thomas Milling was Abbot in the year ſpoken of; a learned man, celebrated by John Leland for his knowledge in the Greek tongue; a rarity in thoſe days among the Monks. He was, in the ſaid year when that book was printed, made Biſhop of Hereford; when he ſeems to have held this Abbey in commendam. He outlived Mr. Caxton, was buried in the Abbey, and then was ſucceeded by the bountiful John Eſtney; by whoſe monumental inſcription alſo in the ſaid Abbey it appears, as tranſcribed by Mr. Camden, that he ſurvived Caxton ſeven years (x) before John Iſlip ſucceeded him; ſo that, if Iſlip was at any charge in ſettling Mr. Caxton in his buſineſs, it muſt have been about twenty-four years before he had this preferment in the ſaid Abbey. As for what Mr. Hearne mentions of Abbot Iſlip's knowing Mr. Caxton before, and employing him to tranſcribe and tranſlate ſeveral old pieces for his uſe, though it may not be altogether improbable, yet there is no other authority for it, than John Bagford's ſhort and inaccurate account of Caxton's Life, annexed to the Propoſals he publiſhed for printing an Hiſtorical Account of the Art of Typography (y). Caxton, in one of his books, having enumerated ſome of thoſe he had before printed (z), mentions, after the former two, The Hiſtory of Jaſon, which, though undated, we ſhall therefore next give ſome account of [G]. It is thought this book was printed by him in the (t) To this day the houſe is the ſign of the King's Head, ſays Bagford, but doth not ſeem ſo ancient, being a brick building, &c.

(u) Survey of London, edit. fol. 1633, p. 525.

(w) Lately in the poſſeſſion of John Anſtis, Eſq; Garter King of Arms, and probably to be found alſo in the Herald's Office: wherein it appears, that this John Iſlip died Abbot of Weſtminſter in the year 1532.

(x) Reges, Reginæ, Nobiles, & alii in Eccleſiæ Collegiata B. Petri Weſtmonaſterii Sepulti, &c. Lond. 4to. 1600. Sig. H. 2. b.

(y) See a larger Account of Mr. Bagford's Scheme, and Collections for this Work, in The Philoſophical Tranſactions for June 1707, which was drawn up by Mr. Humphrey Wanley. Bagford lived nine years after that, and never publiſhed his Hiſtory; but his papers are in the Harleian Library of MSS.

(z) The Golden Legende.

initial letters of his name, which we ſhall more particularly expreſs in its due place. The book was originally written in Latin; and the author of it has been called Jacobus de Theſſalonica, of the order of preaching Friars (47). But Antonius Senenſis, in his chronicle of the ſaid order, calls him Jacobus de Cezolis; and ſays, he flouriſhed about the year 1295. Lambecius obſerved, That his true name was Caſulis, from the city of Caſali in Italy, where he was born; which was corrupted to Theſſalis, and ridiculouſly to Theſſalonica. He agrees with the former author, as to the age of the writer; but L'Abbe removes him backward nearly a century. Du Freſne ſuppoſes Jac. de Ceſſulis, and Jac. de Theſſalonica, to be two different men of the ſame order; the firſt living about the time aforeſaid, and the laſt about 1410. The ſame learned writer thinks this game of Cheſs to have been an Arabian, or Perſian game, ſince he derives the title de ludo Schaccorum, from the word Schach, which in Arabic ſignifies a King, who is the principal perſon in the Game. This book having been rendered out of Latin into French, was now tranſlated by Maſter Caxton from thence, into Engliſh. Others have written upon the ſubject; namely, one Simon Ailward, an Engliſh Poet, who lived in the year 1456, and wrote a book of Latin Monkiſh Rymes upon this game; ſome of which may be ſeen in my author (48). We have a little book or two in Engliſh proſe, one in 4*to*, the other in 8*vo*, upon the ſame ſubject; but whether written upon the ſame plan with thoſe before-mentioned, and with reſpect to any moral, or political application, I do not now remember.

(47) Vide Oudin, De Script. vol. iii.

(48) J. Pits, in Append. Illuſtr. Angl. Script. Cent. iv. p. 939.

[G] Which we ſhall next give ſome account of.] It is entitled, The Hiſtorie of Jaſon; towchyng the Conqueſte of the Golden Fleſe: Tranſlated from the Frenſh, and printed by William Caxton, in a thin folio, without date. By the order in which Mr. Caxton mentions it in his Golden Legend, as we obſerved, it ſhould be the next book he printed. It is with a type different from the former two, and with which he printed ſeveral others. It was written in French by the old Duke of Burgundy's Chaplain, author of The Recuyel before-mentioned, and by him dedicated to the ſaid Duke Philip, ſurnamed the Good, who, in memory of Jaſon's expedition, founded the order of the Golden Fleece. It was newly compiled from all the hiſtories of Jaſon, eſpecially what Dares Phrigius had written (49), and Guido de Columpnys upon that ſubject (50). This tranſlation was enterpriſed by Caxton, as he ſays, in his prologue, 'For the honour and worſhip 'of King Edward IV.' who had been elected Knight of the ſaid order in the firſt Chapter held by his brother-in-law Charles Duke of Burgundy, May 8, 1468. Caxton alſo mentions a ſtately chamber in the old Duke's caſtle at Heſdin in Artois, finely adorned with the paintings of this ſtory, and ſome other curious embelliſhments of art, in theſe words. 'Well 'wote I, that the noble Duc Philippe, firſt founder 'of this ſaid order, did doo make a chambre in the 'caſtell of Heſdyn, wherein was craftyly and curyouſly depeynted the conqueſte of the Golden Fleſe 'by the ſaid Jaſon. In which chambre I have ben, 'and ſeen the ſayd hiſtorie ſo depeynted; and in re-'membraunce of Medea, and her cunning and ſci-'ence, he had doo make in the ſayd chambre by 'ſubtyll engyne, that, when he wold, it ſhulde ſeem, 'that it lightned, and after thondre, ſnowe and 'rayne, and all within the ſayd chambre, as aft 'tymes, and when it ſhulde pleaſe him, which was 'all made for his finguler pleaſir (51).' 'Tis probable that all theſe fine ornaments were deſtroyed when that town and caſtle were demoliſhed by Philibert Emanuel Duke of Savoy, and General to the Emperor Charles V. in 1553. But afterwards, by the advice of John German, Biſhop of Nevers, the firſt Chancellor of this order, Jaſon's Fleece was changed for Gideon's, and his ſtory was wrought into rich hangings of gold and ſilver, which were remaining in the court at Bruſſels in the year 1652, when Chiflet publiſhed his book of this order (52). Hence ſome people miſconceived the foundation of the order, as Caxton well obſerves, where he ſays, in the ſaid prologue, 'Howe well ſome perſones affirme and ſaye, 'that the ſayde ordre hath taken his original of the 'Fleſe of Gideon, I will not diſpute.' He alſo ſays, that he preſumed not to preſent it to the King, becauſe

(49) De Bello Trojano.

(50) Deſtructionis Trojæ Hiſtoria.

(51) Caxton's Prologue to The Hiſtorie of Jaſon.

(52) Breviarium Ordinis Velleris Aurei.

the year 1475, as we have obſerved in the note, or at fartheſt the year after. But of the time when he printed his next book, and the place where, we can ſpeak with greater certainty, becauſe he mentions them both in it: it is properly a book of Apophthegms collected out of the works of the Ancients, and firſt compiled in Latin, which was afterwards tranſlated into the French tongue, and thence into Engliſh, by a Nobleman of great merit and renown, who was the Queen's brother; a man no leſs famous for arms than literature. This book, which is intituled, The Dicts and Sayings of the Philoſophers, was printed by Caxton at Weſtminſter in 1477. Of this, together with a ſhort Collection of Proverbs in verſe, which he printed the ſame year, we ſhall refer to ſome farther particulars [H]. Between the month of May in the next year, and ſome time becauſe he did not doubt but he had it in French: But intended through his licence, and the ſupportation of the Queen, to preſent it to his moſt redoubted young Lord the Prince of Wales, to the intent he might begin to learn to read Engliſh. It has been reckoned, that the ſaid Prince was then about five years old (53); which, if a right computation, will prove this book to have been printed in 1475. There was a book printed upon the ſame ſubject a few years after abroad, but whether a new edition of this, or a different work, we know not (54).

(53) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 145.

(54) The Hiſtorie of the Knyght Jaſon, by Gerard de Leew, fol. Andewarp 1480. The ſame Printer emprinted The Chronycles of the Reame of Englonde, with their Appertignaunces. Annales Typograph.

[H] We ſhall here refer to ſome farther particulars.] The former of theſe two pieces, named The Dictes and Sayengis of the Philoſophers, tranſlated out of Frenſh by Antone Erle Rywyers, &c. and Emprynted by William Caxton at Weſtmeſtre, Folio 1477, conſiſts of ſeventy-five leaves. This tranſlator was Anthony Wydeville, Earl of Rivers, Lord Scales, and of Newſells, a man renowned in his time for his literary, as well as warlike accompliſhments. He was the ſon of Sir Richard Wydeville, the firſt Earl of Rivers, by Jaquetta his wife, relict of John Duke of Bedford, and daughter to Peter of Luxemburgh, Earl of St. Paul. The ſaid Anthony Wydeville was, when about ſeventeen years of age, with the Earl his father, ſtolen or forced away at Sandwich, and carried to France; as may be read in a memorandum of William de Wyrceſtre's, which is quoted in theſe words, 'Cito poſt dictum feſtum nativitatis Domini 1459, Johannes Denham, cum aliis de Caleſia, ſecrete intravit Sandwycum, ac ibidem cepit Dominum de Reverys, & Antonium Widewele filium ejus, cum multis magnis navibus, & adduxit Caliſiæ, Comitatibus Marchiæ & Warrenici & Sarum, Caliſiæ exiſtentibus (55).' Elizabeth, the ſiſter of this Anthony, a beautiful lady, the relict of Sir John Gray of Grooby, was married to King Edward IV. in 1464. She lived to ſee her ſons, two hopeful Princes, murdered, beſides her father, and this her worthy brother aforeſaid; and died herſelf deſpoiled of all, in reſtraint, at the monaſtery of Bermondſey in Southwark (56). A few years after, the ſaid Anthony Lord Scales, became much renowned, far and near, for the moſt magnificent feats of chivalry in Smithfield, that were, perhaps, ever performed there; whereof, having ſome years ſince been poſſeſſed of a very ancient and curious hiſtory, in manuſcript, containing the whole ceremony, which is, probably, the moſt copious and exact account of any ſuch martial ſolemnity now in being, a tranſient view of its contents, by the heads thereof, in ſome parts enlarged a little out of the chapters themſelves, may not be here unacceptable. This great and ſolemn encounter at the tilt or tournament, &c. was performed between the ſaid Anthony Lord Scales, and Anthony the natural ſon of old Duke Philip beforementioned; therefore called The Baſtard of Burgundy, more often, and as a more honourable title (*), than by that of his Earldom, Count de la Roche, or other lordſhips, that he had. He was a man no leſs famous for his wit and courage than the Lord Scales; was the challenger himſelf to fight him on horſeback and foot; and there were granted letters by his Majeſty of ſafe conduct to the baſtard and his train, it ſeems upon this occaſion, which are preſerved among our records (57). The capital title in that old manuſcript hiſtory of thoſe feats of chivalry between theſe two champions, is as follows, The Actes of the full honorable and knightly Armes doon betwene the right noble Lords Sir Antony Wodevile, Lord Scales and of Newſelles, brother to the moſt high and excellent Princeſs, the Queen of Englonde, and of Fraunce, and Lady of Irlonde, Chalenger; and Sir Anton, the Baſtarde of Bourgoine, Earl of Roche, and Lord of Bener and Benereſſe, afore the mooſt Chriſtien and victorious Prince, Edward IV. the King of Englond, and of Fraunce, and Lord of Irlond; the eleventh and twelfth daies of Juyne, in the ſeventh yeere of his Reigne, Defender: The Erle of Worceſtre, the grete Coneſtable of Englond (58); in Smythfeilde. Then follow the diſtinct narratives of the whole proceedings therein, in twenty-four chapters: but as there are alſo three or four more of them, which precede that title, and relate to others following it, being, perhaps, inadvertently omitted, or not timely enough received to be entered in their proper order, we think it more regular and comprehenſible to mention them with thoſe whereunto they relate, than to ſpeak of the ſame things divided, and in different places; but ſhall refer in the margin to the pages whereon they are written, of which we ſhall here make the ſaid connexion; and then, a ſhort view of the whole will more orderly ſtand in this manner. Chap. I. The Fortune of the Empriſe of the ſaid full noble and valerioufe Knyght Sir Antony Wodevile; ſhewing, how on the Wedneſday after the Feaſt of the Reſurection, he had, in preſence of the Queen, a Collar of Gold, with the rich Flower of Souvenance enamell'd, faſtned above his knee, by ſome of her Ladys; with a Parchment Roll, or Bill, drop'd in his Bonnet, containing the Charge and Adventure he was to undertake. II. The Prologue of the ſaid Lord Scales, after redyng of the ſaid Bill, and the Chapters contained therein, for certain Arms on Horſeback, and on Foote. Shewing the 'foreſaid Prize was received of the Ladies on the 17th of April 1465.(†) III. The Contents of the Lord Scales's Letter to the Lord Baſtard, dated the 18th of April following. This relates to, or is expreſſed more at large in one of the Chapters preceding the Title above, thus deſcrib'd: 'This is the Writing and Articles ſent by the Lord 'Scales unto the Baſtard of Burgoyne;' dated from Shene, the day laſt mentioned (59). IV. The Supplication of the ſaid Lord to the King, that an Herald may carry over the ſaid Prize and Chapters to the Lord Baſtard, with the King's command to Cheſter-Herald to carry the ſame, and to the Conſtable of England to record this memorable Act. To this may properly follow, the Certificate of John Tiptoft Earl of Worceſter, High Conſtable of England, atteſting, the Queen's giving the Flower of Souvenance to the ſaid Sir Anthony Wodvile, Lord Scales, as a Charge to undertake the Enterpriſe, and his Delivery of it to Cheſter-Herald, that he might carry it over to be touched by the Baſtard, in token of his accepting the Challenge, on the 22d of April (60). V. The Preſentation of the ſaid Letter and Prize to the Lord Baſtard at Bruxels the laſt day of April; and his touching the ſame, by Licence of the Duke of Burgundy (with his Speech and Preſents thereupon). VI. The Names of thoſe preſent at the Touching of the Prize. Theſe were Lords, Knights, Squires, Gentlemen, and Heralds; as in a Chapter before the Title (61). The Anſwer of the ſaid Lord Baſtard to the Lord Scale's Letters aforeſaid. Dat. Bruxells, 4 May (62). VII. The coming of the Lord Baſtard to Graveſend 19 of May, accompanied with Lords, Knights, Eſquires, &c. above four hundred; met by Garter King of Arms. VIII. The Return of Cheſter-Herald to Greenwich, with the Prize touched, 23d of May. IX. The Meeting of the Baſtard at Blackwall by the Lord High Conſtable, with ſeven Barges, and a Galley full of Attendance, richly covered with Cloth of Gold and Arras, 30th of May: Is appointed the Biſhop of Saliſbury's

(58) Not the Duke of Clarence, as in John Stow, 1468.

(†) So this extract of that MS. but Quere if it ſhould not be 1467 or 1468; being the 7th of King Edward, as was before ſaid.

(59) Fol. 17.

(60) Fol. 20.

(61) Idem.

(62) Fol. 21.

(*) Vide Pontus Heterus, de Rerum Burgundicarum.

(56) Sandford's Genealog. Hiſt. fol. 407.

(57) Pro Baſtardo Burgundiæ, ſuper Punctis Armorum Perficiendis; in Rymer's Fœd. vol. xi. fol. 1710, p. 573.

time in the ſame month two years after, died that William Caxton at Weſtminſter, who has been taken for the father of our Printer (a), as we before obſerved. In the ſame

(a) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 19.

Saliſbury's Palaces in Fleet-ſtreet, and at Chelſea, for lodging. X. The King's Proceſſion to London, and ſolemn Meeting of the Baſtard in Fleet-ſtreet, where his Lordſhip and the Lord Scales had the firſt Interview, who bore the Sword before the King, Tueſday 2d of June. XI. The Preſentation to the King at Weſtminſter, of the Baſtard the ſame Day: His deſire for the day of Battle to be fixed; and alſo, the like deſire of the Lord Rivers, in behalf of his ſon the Lord Scales. The Barriers order'd in Smithfield (63), and the day appointed is the eleventh of June. XII. The Proceſſion or coming of the Lord Scales from Greenwich richly accompanied and array'd: Lodged in the Biſhop of Ely's Palace in Holborne, Friday 5th of June. XIII. The Chapter holden at Paul's by the Conſtable, for declaration of doubts moved upon the Chapters or Articles of Combat. XIV. The Names of the Lord Scales's Counſel, and the Baſtard's. XV. The Field more particularly appointed and deſcribed. XVI. The Proceſſion or coming of the Lord Scales to St. Bartholomew's, 10th of June. XVII. The Ordenance of keeping of the Field by the Heralds, 11th of June. XVIII. The Entrance into the Field on the ſaid day of Battle by the Lord Scales, attended by nine Noblemen, who bore his weapons. XIX. The Ornaments of the Trappers, and the nine Pages on Horſeback, who attended him. XX. The Deſcription of his Pavillion. XXI. The coming of the Baſtard with ſeven Followers; his Pages on Horſeback, and Noblemen bearing his Arms; all richly adorn'd. XXII. The Proclamation at the four corners of the Field. XXIII. After the Cry of Leſſer Aller, the Encounter is begun: The Baſtard and his Horſe thrown to the Ground (64). He refuſes to fight any more on Horſeback. XXIV. The Arms done on Foot the next day. Their Attendants and Accoutrements particularly deſcribed. The King forbids the perilous Spears that were brought for them, it being but an act of Sport. The whole Iſſue of the Combat; in which the Lord Scales appearing again too hard for the Baſtard, and the King perceiving they were growing in earneſt, and into a cruel aſſault, gave the ſignal to part them (65); commanding them to ſhake hands and reſpect one another, as brothers in arms; which they did, in the middle of the field, and ſo departed. Theſe are the heads of that ancient manuſcript. As to the particulars of the combat, farther than are mentioned in the margin, we refer to the chronicles; only, if the date of the year that theſe Juſtes were performed in, is rightly here mentioned, then it ſhould ſeem rather to be upon celebrating the Coronation of the Lord Scales's ſiſter Queen Elizabeth. And if the King's letters of ſafe conduct for the Baſtard before-mentioned are rightly dated in Rymer, that is in October the next year, they may import a new permiſſion for another trial of ſkill in the 6th of K. Edward, which he calls 1466. But if this ſhould be 1467, then we may with Stow fix the combat upon the concluſion of the marriage between King Edward's ſiſter and the duke of Burgundy's ſon, in the year 1468 (66). As for what farther concerns the ſtory of this noble author, the Lord Scales, we ſhall only mention, that in the times of the Civil Wars, between the Houſes of York and Lancaſter, his father Richard, the firſt Earl Rivers, with John his ſon, were in the year 1469 taken in the foreſt of Dean, and, by the faction at Northampton, with others beheaded, at the command of George, Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick. As for this his ſurviving ſon, Anthony, Earl Rivers, who was afterwards counſellor and governor of the young Prince Edward; and of whom Sir Thomas More ſays, Vir haud facile diſcernas manuve, aut conſilio promptior (67): He was a man of ſuch abilities, that it was difficult to diſtinguiſh, whether he was more able to adviſe, or to execute in affairs of ſtate. As ſoon as King Edward died in 1483, he was ſent for from Ludlow, with his royal Pupil, by the Protector Richard, ſeized at Stoney-Stratford, conveyed to Pontefract, and there, with others, beheaded the ſame day, in the Month of June, that the Lord Chamberlain Haſtings, was at London (68), being aged about forty one years, as it may be computed from the account of his age at the death of his mother, Jacquett Ducheſs of Bedford, in 1472, as it ſtands upon record in the Eſcheats. With what ſuperior ſplendor he ſhines among the illuſtrious, and, as it were, peerleſs, among peers, may be read in the general chronicles, the particular accounts of his family (69), and the memorials or teſtimonies of his merit that have been preſerved in the works of ſeveral heraldical Antiquaries (70). Of the books he publiſhed, this containing The Sayengies of the Philoſophres was the firſt, printed by Caxton at Weſtminſter in 1477, containing ſeventy-five leaves. The Earl, in his preface, obſerves, That every human creature is ſubject to the ſtorms of fortune, and perplexed with worldly adverſity, of which he had largely had his part; but having been relieved by the goodneſs of God, he was exhorted to diſpoſe his recovered life to his ſervice. And underſtanding that there was to be a jubilee and pardon at St. James's in Spain, Anno 1473, he determined upon a voyage thither. So in July, the ſame year, he ſet ſail from Southampton; when a worſhipful gentleman in his company, named Lowys de Bretaylles, lent him, to paſs over the time, this book of the Sayings of the Philoſophers, in French, which had been tranſlated from the Latin by Meſſieur Johan de Teonville, Provoſt of Paris (71). The Earl was very much taken with the wholeſome and ſweet ſayings of the Paynems; and finding how, 'It ſpeaketh univerſally of the exam-'ple, weel, and doctrine of alle Kynges, Prynces, 'and to people of every eſtate; lawdes vertue and 'ſcience, blames vices and ignorance;' though he could not then, nor in all that pilgrimage, overſee it well at his pleaſure, through the diſpoſitions that belong to the taker of a jubilee and pardon, and the great acquaintance he found there of worſhipful folks, he intended at a more convenient time to be better acquainted with it. Remaining in this opinion, after the King commanded him to attend upon the Prince, and having then leiſure, he tranſlated it into Engliſh, which had not been before done. But as there were divers copies of this book, differing from each other, he concludes with intimating his hopes, that he ſhall not be cenſur'd for that which he has follow'd, or his tranſlation be judged of by thoſe which vary from it. The work itſelf opens with the Sayings of Sedechias, and goes on with thoſe of many eminent ancients; as Homer, Solon, Hyppocrates, Pythagoras, Diogenes, Socrates, Plato, Ariſtotle, Alexander, Ptolemy, Seneca, St. Gregory, Galen, and ſome others, who are each of them allow'd a chapter for his ſayings, but the laſt is more miſcellaneous. A taſte of theſe Apophthegms may be read in the account of this book that has been before given, and is here, in ſome parts, made uſe of (72). At the end of the tranſlation of this work there is a remarkable chapter added, of three leaves (which concludes the whole volume) written by William Caxton, or the Earl in his name. For, as it contains a tranſlation from the French, of thoſe Sarcaſms of Socrates againſt the fair ſex, which our noble tranſlator of the reſt had purpoſely paſſed over, in the proper place, under the chapter of that philoſopher; the reader is left to judge, if the ſaid Earl ſeriouſly intended to favour the fair, by ſuch an omiſſion in the middle of his book, whether his Printer would probably make ſo free as to publiſh it of his own accord, though in his own name, more conſpicuouſly at the end of it. If it is a piece of fineſſe, it is artfully enough conducted, whether by tranſlator or printer, to expoſe the fair ſex more notoriouſly, under the notion of forbearing to do it at all. We know not that it has been ſo interpreted, nor can declare in what vein Maſter Caxton's apology for the ſaid addition was written, or is to be read; but ſhall leave it to the reader, to decide whether there is not ſomething of a droll humour, or delicate air of raillery, in the following expreſſions: 'I fynde that my ſayd Lord hath 'left out certayn and dyverſe concluſions towchyng 'women! wherein I mervaylle that my ſayd Lord 'hath not wreton them, ne what hath mevyd him ſo

'to

(63) The Liſts were 120 yards and 10 feet long; and 80 yards 10 feet broad; double barr'd, 5 feet between the bars: The timber and workmanſhip coſt 200 marks; beſides fair and coſtly galleries for the Nobility, &c. of both ſexes. See Hall, Stow, &c.

(64) Some ſay this was the ſecond day of the Tourney; the ſpike in the chafron of Lord Scales's horſe at the encounter, running into the noſtrell of the Baſtard's horſe, he reared ſo an end, that both he and his rider fell to the ground. Stow's Annals, p. 420.

(65) When the point of Lord Scales's pol'ax entering the ſight of the Baſtard's helm, he might have plucked him on his knees. Idem.

(66) Stow's Annals, as before, anno 1468. There is a diſagreement in authors about a year throughout this reign. See Speed, edit. 1623, fol. 868; and Lewis, in Caxton's Life, p. 31.

(67) In Vit. Ricardi III.

(68) See Hall, Grafton, Speed, &c.

(69) In Dugdale's Baronage, &c.

(70) Among the MS. Collections of Sir Richard Seynt George, Norroy King at Arms, and his deſcendants.

(71) Some call him William de Tignonville, or Thignonville, and ſay he was Provoſt of the Univerſity there in 1408, and that his tranſlation is intituled, Les Dicts Moraux des Philoſophes, les Dicts des Sages, & les Secrets d'Ariſtote: Annales Typogr.

(72) The Britiſh Librarian, 8vo. 1738, p. 65.

ſame year, 1478, he printed another book, which was tranſlated by the ſaid Anthony Earl Rivers before-mentioned. This is intituled The Cordyal, and its double title ſeems to have occaſioned ſome miſtakes [I]. We have already ſpoken of the Printing that

‘ to do, ne what cauſe he hadde at that time: But I ‘ ſuppoſe that ſome fair Lady hath deſired hym to ‘ leave it out of his booke; or elleys he was amorous ‘ on ſomme noble Lady, for whoſ love he wold not ‘ ſette it in his booke; or ellys, for the very affec- ‘ tyon, love, and good wylle that he hath unto alle ‘ Ladyes and Gentylwomen, he thought that Socrates ‘ ſpared the ſothe, and wrote of women more than ‘ trouthe. For if he had made fawte in writing of ‘ women, he ought not, ne ſhold not be belevyd in ‘ his other Dyctes and Sayinges. But I appercyve ‘ that my ſaid Lord knoweth veryly, that ſuche ‘ defautes ben not had ne founden in the women ‘ born and dwellying in theſe parties, ne regions of the ‘ world. Socrates was a Greke, boren in a ferre contre ‘ from hens, whyche contre is alle of othre condycions ‘ than this is; and men and women of other nature ‘ than they ben here in this contre; for I wote wel, ‘ of what ſomever condicion women ben in Grece, ‘ the women of this contre ben right good, wiſe, play- ‘ ſant, humble, diſcrete, ſobre, chaſt, obedient to their ‘ huſbondis, trewe, ſecrete, ſtedfaſt, ever buſy, and ‘ never idle; attemperat in ſpeking, and vertuous in ‘ alle their workis; or at leaſt ſholde be ſoo. For ‘ which cauſes ſo evydent, my ſayd Lord, as I ſup- ‘ poſe, thoughte it was not of neceſſite to ſette in his ‘ booke the ſaiengis of his auctor, Socrates, touchyng ‘ women. But for as much as I had commandment of ‘ my ſayd Lord to correct and amende, whereas I ‘ ſholde fynde fawte; and other fynde I none, ſauf that ‘ he hath left out theſe Dictes and Sayinges of the wo- ‘ men of Grece; therefore in accompliſhing his com- ‘ mandment, for as moche as I am not in certayn whe- ‘ der it was in my Lord's copye or not (73); or ellis ‘ paradventure that the winde had blowe over the leef ‘ at the tyme of tranſlation of his booke, I purpoſe ‘ to wryte the ſame Saynge, of that Greke, Socrates, ‘ whiche wrote of the women of Grece, and nothyng ‘ of them of this Reyame, whom, I ſuppoſe, he never ‘ knewe; for if he had, I dar plainly ſaye, that he ‘ wold have reſerved them in eſpeciall, in his ſaid ‘ dictes. Alway not preſumyng to put and ſette ‘ them in my ſayd Lordes book, but in the ende, ‘ aparte, in the reherſayll of the workis; humbly re- ‘ quirying all of them that ſhal rede this lytyl reher- ‘ ſayll, that, yf they fynde ony faulte, tarrette it to ‘ Socrates, and not to me, &c.' Thus much may ſuffice both of this apology, and for an example of the pleaſant and ironical ſtyle, or manner of expreſ- ſion in thoſe times. As for the Typographical re- marks that have been made on this earlieſt product of the preſs, at Weſtminſter, that is expreſsly mentioned to have been printed there, they may be read in the book before quoted (74). We ſhall only obſerve far- ther here, that there is a beautiful manuſcript of it in being, written in as fair, regular, and even a Ro- man hand, as if it was printed; and having before it an illumination or painting in miniature, repreſenting King Edward and his Queen, the Duke of Clarence and his children, and Earl Rivers in his Surcoat of Arms, making a preſentation of his book (75).

The other piece, which the ſaid Earl tranſlated, and Caxton alſo printed the ſame year, as is above in the text obſerved, was The Morale Proverbes of Chryſtyne of Pyſe. They conſiſt of two ſheets in folio, are com- poſed in diſtichs or couplets of Engliſh verſe, and are uſually bound with the former book. One of the ſaid proverbs, is as follows:

Little vailleth good example to ſee,
For him, that wole not the contrarie flee.

That Lady was an Italian born at Piſa: but her fa- ther removing to Bologne in France, ſhe wrote her book in the language of that country (76), and flou- riſhed about the year 1400. At the end of this ver- ſion, Caxton has ſome rhymes, informing us by whom it was written, and tranſlated, and declaring his own exactneſs in printing the ſame. This he mentions in two ſtanzas, whereof part of the laſt contains theſe words:

Go thou litil quayer, and recommaund me
Unto the good grace of my ſpecial Lorde Therle Ryveris, for I have emprynted the
At his commandement following ev'ry worde
His copye, as his Secretary can record.

Therein following our old Patriarch of the Engliſh Muſes,

Go litil Quaire unto my livis Quene,
And to my very hertis ſoverayne,
And be right glad, for that ſhe ſhal the ſene;
Soche is thy Grace (77).

[I] This is intituled the Cordyal, and its double title ſeems to have occaſioned ſome miſtakes.] That is, in ſpeaking of it as two books, when it is but one (78). There is a pious Preface before it, written by the ſaid Earl Rivers, as it ſeems, and at the end of the author's Prologue enſuing it appears, that it is called, The Cor- dyal, from the reaſons urging, that the four important articles treated of therein, death, judgment, hell, and heaven, ſhould be cordially imprinted in our hearts. But the firſt words of the book are, Memorare Noviſſi- ma, & in Eternum non peccabis, from Eccleſiaſticus; whence it is often titled from thoſe two firſt words. This book, like The Dicts and Sayings, has no num- bers of the pages at top, nor ſignatures or catch words at bottom. The three or four lines of every chapter are ſhortened, to leave room toward the margin for the initial letter, which is always a ſmall one, only to di- rect the Painter of the capitals, which are here in me- tal to print ſuch initials. The beginnings of the chap- ters are alſo adorned with red, and many of the ſmaller capitals that begin the periods, with yellow. In the Type, there are ſeveral combined letters, and ſome marks of abbreviation: In the Orthography, words not always ſpelled alike; and as to Pointing, the only ſtops, are a little ſquare one, like a croſs, and little oblique daſhes. The Epilogue or Concluſion is written by Caxton, wherein he ſays, ‘ This book is thus ‘ tranſlated out of Frenſhe into our maternal tongue, ‘ by the Noble and Virtuouſe Lord Anthoine, Erle ‘ Ryviers, Lord Scales, and of the Iſle of Wight; ‘ Defenſeur and Directeur of the cauſes Apoſtolique ‘ for our holy Fader the Pope in this Royame of ‘ Englond (79); Uncle and Governour to my Lorde ‘ Prince of Wales. Which book was delivered to me ‘ William Caxton by my ſaide noble Lorde Ryviers, ‘ on the day of Purification of our bliſſid Lady, fallying ‘ the Tewſday the ſecunde day of the moneth of Fe- ‘ verer in the yeer of our Lord M.CCCC.LXXVIII, ‘ for to be emprinted, and ſo multiplied to goo abrood ‘ emong the peple, that thereby more ſurely myght ‘ be remembred, The Four laſt Thingis undoubtedly ‘ comyng. And it is to be noted, that ſythen the ‘ tyme of the grete tribulacion and adverſite of my ‘ ſaide Lord, he hath been ful vertuouſly occupied; ‘ as in goyng to Pilgremagis to Seint James in Galice, ‘ to Rome, to Seint Barthylmew, to Seint Andrew, ‘ to Seint Mathew, in the Royalme of Naples; and ‘ to Seint Nicholas de Bar in Puyle, and other divers ‘ holy places. Alſo hath procured and goten of our ‘ holy Fader the Pope, a greet and large indulgence, ‘ and greet and large indulgence, and grace unto the ‘ chapel of our Lady of the Piewe, by Seint Stephens ‘ at Weſtmeſtre, for the relief and helpe of Criſten ‘ ſowles paſſed out of this tranſitorie world; which ‘ grace is of the like vertue to thindulgence of Scala ‘ Celi. And notwithſtaunding the greet labours and ‘ charges that he hath had in the ſervice of the Kyng ‘ and of my ſaid Lord Prince, as well in Wales as in ‘ Englond, which hath be to him no litle thought ‘ and beſines, bothe in ſpirite and body, as the fruit ‘ thereof, experimently ſheweth; yet over that, ten- ‘ riche his vertuous diſpoſicion, he hath put him in ‘ devoyr

(73) My Lord's words are, under the Chapter of Socrates — And the ſaid Socrates had many ſeyinges againſt women, whiche is not tranſlated.

(74) The Brit. Libr. p. 63.

(75) This fine MS. of the Earl's tranſlation of the ſaid Dicts and Sayings, &c. is preſerved in the Lambeth Li- brary.

(76) Intituled, Les Proverbes Moraux, & le Livre de Pru- dence, par Chriſ- tine de Piſan, fille de M. Tho- mas de Piſan, Autrement dit de Bologne. Vid Oudin de Script. tom. iii. col. 2220.

(77) Chaucer's Complaint of the Black Knight.

(78) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 19, 20.

(79) Of theſe ti- tles, ſee Sir Hen. Speiman, in Gloſſar. Voc. De- fenſor. And DuFreſne's Gloſſ. in V. Advocatus. And Richelet's Dictionaire, in V. Directeur.

that began to make its appearance at Oxford in 1479; and about this time, Caxton ſeems to have had an increaſe of hands to carry on his buſineſs more expeditiouſly at Weſtminſter; for henceforward we ſhall find his preſs more fruitful, and that, for the generality, he printed more books in a year, than he did in the beginning. Thus he is obſerved to have ſet forth three books more in 1480, which therefore may be ſpoken of in one note together [K]. It ſeems that about this time there was another printing preſs ‘ devoyr at all tymes when he might have a leyſer, ‘ whiche was but ſtartemele, to tranſlate diverſe ‘ bookes out of Frenſh into Engliſh. Emong other, ‘ paſſed thurgh myn hande, the booke of the Wiſe ‘ Sayinges, or Dictes of Philoſophers, and the wiſe and ‘ holſom Proverbis of Chriſtine of Pyſe, ſet in metre. ‘ Over that, hath made diverſe Balades agenſt the ‘ ſeven dedely Synnes (80). Furthermore it ſeemeth, ‘ that he conceiveth wel the mutabilitie and the un- ‘ ſtablenes of this preſent lyf, and that he deſireth ‘ with a greet zeal and ſpirituell love our gooſtley ‘ help and perpetuel ſalvation, and that we ſhal ab- ‘ horre and utterly forſake thabominable and damp- ‘ nable ſynnes, which comunly be uſed now dayes; ‘ as pride, perjurye, terrible ſwering, thefte, murdre, ‘ and many other. Wherefore, he took upon him ‘ the tranſlating of this preſent werke, named Cor- ‘ dyale; truſting, that bothe the reders and the herars ‘ thereof ſholde knowe them ſelf herafter the better, ‘ and amende thair lyvyng, or they departe, and loſe ‘ this tyme of grace to the recouvre of their ſalvacion. ‘ Which tranſlating, in my jugement is a noble and ‘ a meritorious dede. Wherfor, he is worthy to be ‘ greetly commended, and alſo ſingulerly remembred ‘ with our goode prayers. For certaynely, as well ‘ the reders as the herers, well conceyvyng in their ‘ hertes, the forſayd Foure laſt Things, may thereby ‘ greetly be provoqued and called from ſinne to the ‘ great and plentiouſe mercy of our bliſſid Saveour; ‘ which mercy is above all his werkis. And no man ‘ beyng contrite and confeſſed, nedeth to fear thobteyn- ‘ ing thereof; as in the Preface of my ſaide Lordes ‘ booke, made by hym, more playnly it appeareth. ‘ Then in obeyng, and followyng my ſaid Lordes com- ‘ mandement, in which I am bounden ſo to do, for the ‘ manifolde benefetes and large rewardes of hym had ‘ and receyved of me undeſervid, I have put me in ‘ devoyr taccomliſhe his ſaide deſir and comaundе- ‘ ment; whom, I beſeche Almighty God to kepe ‘ and mayntene in his vertuous and laudable actes and ‘ werkis, and ſende hym thaccompliſhement of his ‘ noble and joyous deſirs and playſirs in this worlde; ‘ and after this ſhort daungerous and tranſitory lyf, ‘ everlaſting permanence in heven: Amen. Which ‘ werke preſent, I began the morn after the ſaide Puri- ‘ ficacion of our bleſſid Lady; whiche was the daye ‘ of Seint Blaſe, Biſhop and Martir, and finiſhed on ‘ the even of th Annunciacion of our ſaid beiſſid Lady, ‘ fallyin on the Wedneſday, the xxiiii day of Marche, ‘ in the xix yeer of Kyng Edwarde the Fourth.’

(80) He alſo wrote another ballad or dit y when he wa: afterwards priſoner in Pontefract Caſtle, beginning Sum what Muſyng and Mournyng, &c. which is inſerted by John Roſſe in his Hiſt. p. 214.

[K] Which therefore may be ſpoken of in one note together.] Theſe three books are named, The Image of the World, Ovid's Metamorphoſes, and The Chronicles, with a Deſcription of England. The Ymage, or Myrrour of the World, was, as it appears in the Prologue, tranſlated out of Latin into French, by the direction of John Duke of Berry and Auvergne, anno 1245; and now tranſlated out of French into Engliſh by W. Caxton; at the requeſt and expence of the Honour- able and Worſhipful man, Hugh Brice, Alderman, and Citizen of London (81); with intent to preſent the ſame to the Vertuous, Noble, and Puiſſant Wil- liam, Lord Haſtynges, Lord Chamberlain to King Edward the Fourth, and Lieutenant of the Town of Calais, and the Marches there; whom he humbly beſeecheth to receive in gree and thank. Which book containeth in all ſeventy-ſeven chapters and twenty- ſeven figures; without which it may not eaſily be un- derſtood. The copy here followed, was engroſſed, and in all points ordained by chapters and figures in French, in the town of Bruges in June 1464; and undertaken by him to be tranſlated into Engliſh, the ſecond day of January 1480, in the Abbey of Weſt- minſter. And in his Epilogue, at the end, having beſeeched the Lord Chamberlain to pardon his rude and ſimple tranſlation; ‘ and yf ther be fault in meſuryng ‘ of the firmament, ſunne, mone, or of the earth, or ‘ in ony other mervaylles herin conteyned, I beſeche ‘ you not tarette the defaulte in me, but in hym that ‘ made the copye.’ So having repeated the time when he began to tranſlate the ſame, as before, he adds, that he finiſhed it the eighth day of March, the ſame year, the twenty-firſt year (†) of King Edward IV. The firſt edition of this book is printed upon a thicker and better paper than the others: it has alſo no large capitals printed at the beginning of the chapters; they being ſtill painted or drawn out with a pencil in vermillion or red ink, but there are ſignatures at the bottom of every other four leaves. The figures are ſimple and but thinly ſhaded; and ſome of them keep a little up to the dreſs of the times, eſpecially in the long beaked ſhoes. In ſome copies, the pages at top are number- ed, and the figures of the celeſtial and terreſtrial ſpheres are explained in writing by Caxton himſelf. There was afterwards another edition of this book printed on a different letter, though it might be Cax- ton's, with a different wooden cut to the ſecond chapter. It has alſo large initials printed before each of them, and at the end, there is this addition— Caxton me fieri fecit, which in the firſt edition is want- ing, and ſhews it to have been that which Mr. Lewis deſcribes (82). He ſays, that ‘ At the end of this ‘ book, is printed an Epilogue, with Mr. Caxton's ‘ cypher, which ſhews he uſed it not above ſix years ‘ after he has ſuppoſed him to have firſt printed in ‘ England; though it is not unlikely that he uſed it ‘ ſooner, only, as is very common with other old ‘ books, this leaf has been torn out (83),’ and ſo it might be with the copy of this edition we have ſeen; no ſuch cypher appearing at the end thereof. This copy had been in the poſſeſſion of the late Reverend Mr. Thomas Baker, of St. John's College, Cam- bridge; who in the ſhort account he has drawn out from the Prologue, in one of the blank leaves before it, has theſe words—‘ It was then valued for the mat- ‘ ter it contains, is now valuable for the print, aud ‘ is yet a preſent for a Lord.’ Indeed, there are ſome marvellous reports in this book, which would perſuade us there have been performed, through great know- ledge in ſome of the Sciences, no leſs ſurprizing miracles by the Antients, than have been aſcribed, through religion, to ſome of the legendary Saints. But of Virgil in particular, there are ſuch extraordi- nary performances here ſpecified, as ſurpaſs any thing of his own heroes, and would ſend the moſt profound magician to ſchool. The Artificial Dove of old, or the more modern Iron Fly, were nothing to compare with Virgil's Copper Fly in this book, which could chaſe all other Flies, for ſuch a ſpace from his pre- ſence. And Virgil's Brazen Horſe, is here ſuch a Doctor among the ſpecies, that the moſt diſeaſed of thoſe animals was preſently cured by looking only upon it. Theſe rarities, with the ſpacious city he built upon an egg, were to be ſeen, as precious or profitable reliques at Naples, when this book was firſt written; and doubtleſs that great Lady's tinder-box, at which he obliged all the citizens of Rome to light their candles, who would rekindle the fires he had extinguiſhed throughout that city, would have been as great a curioſity, had it been repoſited among the reſt. But ſuch an artiſt he was, in building the wonderful bridge here deſcribed; which how per- formed, no man knew, but all men could paſs ſafely over, as might make us wiſh him to be a live at the preſent day; and Friar Bacon's Brazen Head ſeems to have been but a loggerhead in compariſon of that here affirmed to be of Virgil's making; which was endowed with ſo much brains, as to anſwer all queſ- tions, and foretel all events, and thoſe with ſuch true Oracular Amphibology, that it proved too hard for it's

(†) It is thought it ſhould be the Twentieth, ac- cording to his reckoning.

(81) He was a Goldſmith, She- riff of London 1475, and Lord Mayor of the ſaid city 1485.

(82) Life of Cax- ton, p. 27.

(83) Idem. p. 26.

preſs erected at St. Albans in Hertfordſhire, by one who was a Schoolmaſter in the Abbey, and the firſt, if not the only Printer there, in a Chapel within the limits of that monaſtery, as we are informed by Mr. Bagford; who adds, that Caxton and he held a cloſe correſpondence (b). 'Tis thought that Caxton furniſhed him with a ſet of the types he could beſt ſpare; and thoſe indeed which he did uſe, do much reſemble ſuch of Caxton's as were rudeſt or moſt worn. It is preſumed alſo, that Caxton taught him his art of Printing, as well as furniſhed him with materials to exerciſe the ſame (c). There was alſo a little practice of the art, about the ſame time, in the city of London.

(b) Bagford's Life of Caxton, p. 4.

(c) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 48.

it's maker; who, unable rightly to interpret one of it's reſponſes, fell a ſacrifice to his own art: which, with other ſuch like curious particulars, here mentioned of him, have eſcaped ſome of his moſt conſiderable editors; and may in the whole, ſuggeſt to us, the extenſive aſſiduity of Popiſh impoſture and avarice, in raiſing profit and admiration from the ignorant, out of miracles and reliques, in every other ſcience, as well as the diſtricts of ſanctity; out of Heathen as well as Chriſtian examples, and wherever they think any name of Antiquity is venerable enough to ſolemnize their abſurdities and impoſitions, as well in profane as ſacred ſtory (84). This book ſeems to have been very attractive in it's time, and had other editions after this: one of them, to make it the more amuſing, was adorned with many more wooden cuts than either of theſe; though ſeveral of them have no reference to any thing mentioned in the book. There is an abridgment of Caxton's Prologue at the beginning; but his name as the tranſlator is ungratefully ſunk by one of his own profeſſion; ſo early did they begin to be unfaithful in reprinting of books, or tranſmitting them unmaimed and complete to poſterity (85).

(84) See Thymage or Myrrour of the World, Part iii. cap. xiii. Of the Mervailles that Virgyle made by Aſtronomye in his time, &c.

(85) This edition is intituled, The Myrror and Dyſcryption of the Worlde; with many Marveylles and the Seven Sciences, &c. emprynted by Laurence Andrewe at the Golden Croſs by Flete Bridge, fol. without date.

Next after this, is mentioned by Caxton himſelf in his Golden Legend, as tranſlated out of French and printed by him, 'The XV bokes of Metamorphoſes, in which ben contayned the Fables of Ovid.' This book is placed by Ouduin under this year, where he ſays, Libri XV. Metamorphoſeon Ovidii in Anglicam proſam per Caxtonum converſi, A.D. 1480. And after him, Mr. Lewis mentions it in the ſame year; but John Bagford dates it a year before. In Mr. Samuel Pepys's library at Magdalen-College in Cambridge, there is a MS. copy of part of this book, intituled, A Proſe tranſlation of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, beginning at the tenth book; and at the end, this colophon; 'Thus endeth Ovyde his booke of Metamorphoſe, 'tranſlated and fyniſhed by me William Caxton at 'Weſtmeſtre, the xxii day of Apryll, in the yere of C 'our Lord M.IIII.LXXX, and the xx year of the regne 'of Kynge Edward the fourth.'

The third book printed by Mr. Caxton this year, was The Chronicles of Englond; to which is added, The Deſcripcion of Englond, Wales, and Scotlond, and alſo Yrlond, in folio. Many authors have fallen into errors and miſtakes about this book; and many have cenſured Caxton, as the compiler, who was but the Printer of it. He ſays himſelf, that he endeavoured to emprint the ſame at the requeſte of divers gentilmen, and only ordeyned a table of the matters ſhortly compiled and chapitred, that every man may find more readily what he pleaſes to rede. Which booke begyneth at Albyne, and endeth at the begynnyng of the regne of Kyng Edward the IIIIth (86). The title of the firſt chapter is, The Names of this Londe, which begins thus — In the noble Londe of Sirrie, there was a noble Kyng and myghty—At the end, Caxton ſays it was emprinted by him in th Abby at Weſtmynſter. Fynniſhid and accomplyſhid the X day of Juyn the yere of th Incarnacion of our Lord God M.CCCC.LXXX, and in the xx yere of the regne of Kyng Edward the fourth. Upon the miſapprehenſion of Caxton's being the author of this Chronicle, many reflections have been made on him. John Major, the Scotiſh Hiſtorian (87), charges him with improbabilities and inconſiſtencies, and ſays, the invective againſt Robert and David Bruce, contains as many falſhoods as words, when he ſhould have accuſed the author from whom he printed. Yet, as he incorporates the Engliſh and the Scotch Hiſtory together, he takes the greateſt part of what relates to his own country from the Engliſh writers (88), as Bede, Froiſſart, and Caxton; which laſt, he owns he often literally tranſlates; and chuſes to follow his Hiſtory, at the ſame time that he is quarelling about the truth of it; eſpecially, where it aſſerts the dependency of the Crown of Scotland upon that of England. But Biſhop Nicholſon, in his reflexions on Caxton, as encouraging his readers, by the opportunity he had of being acquainted with the Court tranſactions of his own time, in the reign of King Edward IV. to hope for great matters from him, when his fancy only led him into an undertaking above his ſtrength (89); has therein moſt ſeverely reflected on himſelf, by falling into the cenſure of that which was beyond his knowledge; for if he had read theſe Chronicles, he would have found at the very entrance, as it has been obſerved, that they conclude at the beginning, and not at the end of the ſaid King Edward's reign. In theſe Chronicles it is reported, that King John was poiſoned at the Abbey of Swineſhed near Lincoln, by a Monk of that houſe, for which Caxton has been ignorantly cenſured, as the firſt broacher of that ſtory, at leaſt in Engliſh Hiſtory. He was the firſt Printer of it, it is true; but it was faithfully, from an old Engliſh manuſcript, which was the original of this whole Chronicle (90), ſo that it is no otherwiſe to be called his, than as it paſſed his preſs; and ſo thoſe who know how to ſpeak of it, do diſtinguiſh; as John Stow, where he ſays — The Engliſh Chronicle, printed by William Caxton, and therefore, called Caxton's Chronicle (91), &c. yet Robert Parſons the Jeſuit, who was not enough acquainted with this Chronicle to make ſuch diſtinction, charges Caxton with being the firſt author of this ſtory (92), and a late writer of notes on Rapin's Hiſtory of England, as the firſt who mentions it in Engliſh (93). Withal adding, that it is not mentioned by any Hiſtorian who lived within ſixty years of King John's death, or before 1276; when his being poiſoned is mentioned in the Chronicle of John Abbot of Peterburgh, which ends in 1259. How can Caxton, John Fox, or Sir Francis Haſtings, be accuſed juſtly of malice or forgery in diſplaying this ſtory, when there are more ancient Hiſtorians, who have ſo circumſtantially and poſitively avouched the ſame (94), that even ſucceeding writers, who have been friends to Monkery, have made no ſcruple to believe it? And why ſhould they not; ſays the learned and judicious Dr. John Barkham in the life of this King, ſince an author, more ancient and unexceptionable than all the reſt, even King John's ſon and ſucceſſor in his kingdoms averred it, when the Prior of Clarkenwell ſaucily told him, being in that houſe, 'That, as ſoon as he ceaſed to do juſtice towards his 'Prelates, he ſhould ceaſe to be a King:' To which his Majeſty enraged with his traitorous threat, reply'd, 'What! mean you to turn me out of my king-'dom, and afterwards to murder me, as my father was 'dealt with (95).'

(89) Nicholſon's Hiſtorical Library, fol. edit. 1736, p. 69.

(86) See Caxton's Prologue to the Chronicles of England.

(87) De Geſtis Scotorum, 4to. 1521.

(88) Mackenzie's Lives of the Scots Writers, vol. ii. fol. 315.

With theſe Chronicles of England is uſually joined, The Deſcription of Englond, Wales, and Scotlond, and alſo Yrlond; which was fynyſhed the 18th day of Auguſt the yere of our Lord God 1480, and the 20th yere of the regne of King Edward IV. This was printed from John de Treviſa's Engliſh tranſlation of Ranulph Higden, author of the Polychronicon, and afterwards reprinted with the Fructus Temporum, &c. This Deſcription conſiſts of twenty-nine chapters. It has been obſerved, 'That from the Conqueſt down 'to the reign of King Henry VIII. our Engliſh Geo-'graphers have either been very few, or the want of 'Printing has occaſioned the loſs of moſt of them, 'and that this of Caxton's is the only thing in its 'kind which we have (96).' And yet it is certain, as another author truly obſerves, this is not Caxton's but Higden's Deſcription, and only printed by him from Treviſa's tranſlation of it into Engliſh, as has been hinted before (97).

(90) There are ſeveral MSS. of this Chronicle; one in Bennet-College Library, &c.

(91) Annal. in Hen. VI.

(92) Father Parſons's Warn Word to Sir Fra. Haſting's Waſte word, 8vo. 1602, Enc. 2. cap. 15.

(93) Engliſh edit. of Rapin in 8vo. vol. iii. p. 242.

(94) Eulogium; MS. in Bibl. D. Rob. Cotton. And another MS. Hiſt. written in the reign of King Edward I. Alſo Pet. Langtoft; R. Higden; John of Tynmouth; Thom. Otterbourne, the Franciſcan; John of Lichfield, the Monk of Leiceſter, &c. &c.

(95) Mat. Paris, Hiſtor. Major, p. 854. Alſo in Dr. Barcham's Life of King John, in Speed's Chronicles.

(96) Biſhop Nicholſon's Engliſh Hiſtorical Library.

(97) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 4.

Of

Of the few books that were printed there, as well as at St. Albans, and eſpecially the chief of them, a Chronicle, comprehending the ſubſtance of Caxton's in the note laſt mentioned, which, for want of proper diſtinction, has occaſioned ſome confuſion in the citation thereof, we ſhall give a ſhort account below [L]; and ſo proceed to enquire after

[L] We ſhall give a ſhort account below.] The moſt antient book printed at either of theſe places, that has been taken notice of, was a Treatiſe of Rhetorick, and according to the printed catalogue of the choice library of the late Dr. John More, Biſhop of Ely, ſet forth at St. Albans in 1480 (98). Though it is ſaid, the copy of this book, which is in Bennet College Library, has neither at the beginning or end, any account of the Printer's name, or of the place or time, where or when it was printed. The next in courſe of time was Jacobus de Valentia's book on the Pſalms, printed in the city of London by John Lettou, the next year (99). This printer was in all probability a Frenchman, or a German, who was then allowed to practiſe that art in this city. And at the ſame time there was another foreign printer in the ſaid city, William of Machlin, who printed another religious book in Latin, called The Chriſtian's Mirror, at the expence of a Dutch Merchant, who is named in the title thereof, as it is here likewiſe exhibited in the margin (100). Theſe two foreigners alſo printed in conjunction, as well as apart, but neither was their letter ſo fair or clear, nor their compoſing ſo regular as Caxton's. They ſet forth Sir Thomas Littleton's Tenures, in a thin folio, ſoon after the others, as we before obſerved; and in the Latin colophon at the end, mention that book to have been newly imprinted by them, in the city of London, near the church of All Saints, or All Hallows; but which church they meant of that name is not now very diſtinguiſhable. There was one John Latton, who was Autumn Reader of the Inner Temple, in the ſixteenth and ſeventeenth years; Double Reader in Lent, the twenty-fourth; and Treaſurer of the ſaid ſociety the twenty-ſixth of King Henry the VIIIth, whom ſome have imagined to be either the printer of thoſe Tenures; or, as an eminent lawyer, had ſuch reſpect for that book, and the merits of it's author, that it was, at leaſt, by his procuration and expence, the ſaid Machlin printed the ſame: but therein they are as erroneous as Sir William Dugdale is, in the account he gives of the ſaid book (101); for if that Lettou had been this Latton, and was at the charge of printing that work, he would have been diſtinguiſhed in like manner as the other benefactors to their other impreſſions were. Beſides, one of the two religious books above was printed by Lettou himſelf, without any aſſiſtance of Machlin; which ſhews that he was a profeſſor of the art: but where do we ſee any eminent Lawyers, even in our days, when that art is much better known, and more generally practiſed in this city, than it was then, employing their time in printing of Pſalm books, or any other? But the book which has neareſt relation to any of Caxton's, and was printed not long after theſe, was that chronicle above-mentioned in the text, ſaid to have been printed at St. Albans, and is therefore often ſtiled The Book of St. Albans, and The Chronicle of St. Albans: it is entitled, The Chroniclis of Englonde, with the Frute of Tymis, printed in a thick ſhort folio 1483; which part, relating to the latter title, being tranſlated or gathered moſtly from foreign authors, chiefly concerning Scripture, and foreign hiſtory, the book is improperly quoted as Caxton's (102), though his chronicle printed three years before, and relating chiefly to the affairs of England, or the MS. he followed, is involved therein. In the prologue, the ſaid Chronicle and Fruit of Times, are ſaid to be compiled together at Saynt Albons, in the year aforeſaid; but it is not mentioned to be printed at St. Albons, nor even compiled, or printed by the ſchoolmaſter there; much leſs by John Inſomuch; a name ſurely that was never aſcribed to the compiler or printer of this book, till it appeared in Sir Henry Chauncy, where he is giving an account of the firſt printing at that monaſtery (103). Indeed Wynken de Worde, at the end of his edition of this book in 1497 ſays, 'That 'Chronicle, with the Fruyte of Tymes, was compyled 'in a Booke, and emprynted by one ſome time ſcole-maſter of St. Albans.' If there was any ſuch flaw or obſcurity about thoſe words, one ſome time in Sir Henry's copy of that impreſſion, as might tempt any body who thought they could reſtore the true reading, to ſuppoſe it ſhould be, and therefore made out of it that name, Sir Henry might have ſome colour of authority for his aſſertion; but it is rather believed the firſt word of the book itſelf, which is Inſomuch, ran in his head for the name of the author. This work is divided into ſeven parts: the laſt part makes half the book, and begins at the Conqueſt. Not only the initials of every chapter, but many other capitals in every chapter are drawn or painted with red ink. The leaves are not paged at top, nor have they any words of direction from page to page at bottom; but they have ſignatures. There are three ſimple wooden prints in ſome of the leaves towards the beginning, of the Tower of Babel, the City of London, and that of Rome, with ſome few others. This author propoſes in the prologue, that the ſeventh or laſt part of theſe chronicles ſhould be continued, 'from the Normans, to oure tyme, whych 'is, under the regne of Kynge Edward the fourth, '23 yere, whoof noble Cronycles, by cuſtome, may not 'be ſeen.' Yet, in the beginning of the ſeventh part of the table, it is added again, 'Continuying to our dais, 'that is to ſay, to the regne of King Edward the IV. 'the twenty-third yere.' But at the end of the chronicle, this compiler does not deſcend ſo low by near a dozen years, being as it is thought cut off by death; for the laſt paragraph ends with the popedom of Sixtus IV. who was choſen 1471, and is yet, at the makyng of this boke, ſais he; concluding that, 'John Abbot 'of Habingdon was this Popys Legate in Englonde, 'to diſpoſe of the treſour of the chirch, to withſtand 'the myſbylevabull Turke, &c.' In a copy of this firſt edition, which I have ſeen, there are ſeveral eraſements with a pen, either by the examiners of heretical paſſages in ſuch old books, or ſome zealous bigot to Popery, of ſome paſſages, which were thought not very conſiſtent with the polity of holy Church; and as he all along interlaces the hiſtories of Emperors and Popes in this work, ſo where he ſpeaks of one of them, it gave ſuch offence, that the words were entirely croſſed over with a pen in that manner; but being not indiſcernable, I could read them to be as follows, 'Johanne Anglicus, of the nacion of Maguntynne, about this 'tyme was Pope, and ſhe was a woman, arryed in 'mannys garmentys: Bot ſhe profetid ſo in holy Scripture, that ther wos founden none lyke hir. Then 'ſhe wos choſen Pope; bot afterward, ſhe wos with 'childe; and when ſhe ſhuld have gone opynly in 'proceſſion, ſhe traveled and deceſſid: And this is the 'ſixt pope the whiche, to this tyme, had the nam of 'Holyneſſe, and were vecius: And this perſon, as 'other curſed popis wer, was punyſhed of God; nor 'ſhe wos not nombred in thee boke of Popis (104).' Yet was there no Engliſh chronicle in theſe popiſh times ſo generally read, nor any for above an hundred and fifty years after, ſo often reprinted, as this was, by Wynkin de Worde, Richard Pynſon, Julyan Notary, &c. even to five or ſix impreſſions in the ſpace of thirty years. I have ſeen a remark, written in one of Pynſon's copies, printed 1510, upon the laſt leaf but one, after the words, havyng Poſſeſſyon of all the Realme, that here ends Caxtons Chronicle. Theſe later editions of this Fruit of Times and Chronicle, have annexed to them The Deſcription of Englond, &c. before-mentioned, which Caxton reprinted from Treviſa's Polychronicon, though both their names are omitted in Pynſon's edition; which concludes with a ſhort Latin epilogue, briefly enumerating the Kings of England from the Conqueſt; which we find not in the others. They all are embelliſhed with wooden cuts, different from one another; and the laſt edition has moſt of them in number. But the next moſt famous book that was printed at St. Alban's, and, it ſeems, with Caxton's letter, is all we ſhall here take notice of, as the off-ſpring in theſe early times of that preſs; and it is the rather not to be omitted,

(98) Intituled, Rhetorica Nova Fratris Laurentii Gulielmi de Saona, ordinis Minorum, compilata in Alma Univerſitate Cantabrigiæ, ann. 1478. Impreſſa ap. Villam St. Albani 1480.

(99) Jacobus de Valentia in Pſalterium. Excuſ. in Civitate Londonienſi, ad expenſas Wilhelmi Wilcox, per me Johannem Lettou, fol. MCCCCLXXXI.

(100) Speculum Chriſtiani — Iſte Libellus impreſſus eſt in opulentiſſima Civitate Londoniarum, per Willelmum de Machlinia, ad inſtantiam nec non expenſas Henrici Urankenbergh Mercatoris.

(101) Origines Juridiciales, fol. edit. 1671, p. 58.

(102) So Richard Grafton in his Hiſt. of Engl. vol. ii. As ſayth Caxton in his Chronicle which he calls The Fruit of Tyme. So Fox— It is found in the Chronicle of William Caxton, called Fructus Temporum.

(103) In his Hiſtory and Antiquities of Hertfordſhire.

(104) The Frute of Timis, at the end of the fifth Part.

after the next offspring of Caxton's preſs; which ſeems to have been intituled, The Conqueſt of Jeruſalem, by Godfrey of Bologne, a book which had been written to inſtigate the omitted, becauſe of divers miſtakes that have been made, concerning both it, and it's author. This book treats of Hunting, Hawking, and Heraldry; and is aſcribed to an illuſtrious and heroic Lady, of great gifts in body and mind; a ſecond Minerva in her ſtudies, and another Diana in her diverſions; in ſhort, an ingenious Virago, as Bale and Pits call her, who lived about 1460, and yet ſhe was no leſs than an Abbeſs, as Sir Henry Chauncy, or Prioreſs, as Dr. Middleton ſtiles her, of the ſtrict and mortified Nunnery at Sopwell in Hertfordſhire; who ſays alſo, that ſhe was ſiſter to Richard Lord Berners of Eſſex (†). But that the ſaid Juliana Barnes was ſuch a religious Lady, and ſo nobly deſcended, no author, as yet, has attempted to prove. As for the book in queſtion, it has been ſometimes called The Gentleman's Recreation, and The Gentleman's Academy, or book of St. Albans. But of the original edition now before us, there is a colophon comprehending the true title, in theſe words, Here, in thys boke afore, ar contenyt the bokys of Haukyng and Huntyng, with other pleſuris dyverſe, as in the boke apperis: and alſo of Coot Armuris, a nobull werke. And here now endyth The boke of Blaſyng of Armys, tranſlatyt and compylyt togedyr at Seynt Albons, the yere from the Incarnacion of owre Lorde Jhu Criſt M.CCCC.LXXXVI. In the laſt leaf, there is a kind of coat or ſcutcheon, ſtampt from a wooden print in colours, repreſenting Gules, a Saltire, in a bordure, Or, within a rundel; out of which ariſes a kind of double croſs having a bar above and below, argent. There is this inſcription at top, Hic finis diverſorum Generoſis valde utilium, ut intuentibus patebit: and at bottom, Sanctus Albanus. The firſt paragraph of the book ſufficiently expreſſes the contents of the firſt treatiſe, which begins with the ſame word as the Chronicle of St. Albans did, as follows, 'Inſomoch, that gentillmen and honeſt perſones have grete delite in Haukyng, and deſire to have the maner to take Haukys: and alſo how, and in waat wyſe, they ſhulde gyde theym ordynateli: and to knaw the gentill termys in communyng of theyr Haukys; and to underſtonde theyr ſekeneſe, and enfermitees: and alſo to knawe medecines for them accordyng; and mony notabull termys that ben uſed in Haukyng, both of their Haukys and of the Fowles, that their Haukys ſhall ſley: therefore, this book followyng, in a dew forme, ſhewys veri knawlege of ſuche pleſure to gentillmen and perſonys diſpoſed to ſe itt.' To particularize the chapters, and all the terms that were uſed in this ſport, and of the birds of prey that were kept to make it, whereof ſo many volumes have, with ſo much unprofitable induſtry been written, were enough both to furniſh out a Dictionary of the jargon, moſtly derived from the French, and expoſe the immoderate application of our anceſtors at the ſame time, in making ſuch a profound ſcience of it. A ſport, unknown to the Roman (105), nor mentioned till about the time of Alaricus the Goth, by Julius Firmicus. From the Turks and other Barbarians, the Europeans, and the Engliſh eſpecially, aped it in great extravagance down to the laſt century, though perhaps to little more benefit or importance, than the Perſians did, who trained up their ſparrows to hawk after butterflies (106); it appearing in the laſt chapter of this book before us, that there were Hawks appropriated to all degrees of the people, from an Emperor, down to the holy-water Clerk, and poor man, or the beggar: ſo true it is, that he was accounted nobody, who in thoſe ages, wherein the indulgence of falconry ſo licentiouſly reigned, had not an hawk on his fiſt; eſpecially, as I ſaid among us; ſeeing that, even by foreigners, who have practiſed theſe bewildering diverſions themſelves with exceſs, our Engliſh Nobility have been reproached as more inordinately addicted to them; as if they had nothing better in them, or depended on nothing more noble to prove their gentility, than Hawking and Hunting (107). Nay, theſe ſports have been maintained as the moſt preferable accompliſhments by ſome of our Nobility themſelves, in thoſe of their own rank; as may be ſeen in the wiſe ſpeech of that lordly ſcorner of Literature, who ſaid; It was enough for Noblemen's ſons to winde their horn, and carry their hawk fair, and leave ſtudy and learning to the children of mean people: To whom, the learned Secretary of King Henry VIII. reply'd, Then you and other Noblemen muſt be content that your children may winde their hornes, and keep their hawks, while the children of mean people manage affairs of State (108). How deep would the Mad Doctor in Poggius have ſouſed this ſportſman in his pit, for the reſtoring him to his ſenſes? eſpecially, if it were conſidered, that from ſuch as he, ſo much treſpaſſing of one neighbour upon another, has been occaſioned; ſo much litigiouſneſs and enmity towards one another; and ſo much expence, not only in law-ſuits, but in accommodations for the ſport itſelf; ſo far exceeding the example produced by that facetious Florentine, of one who expended four hundred crowns per annum, to kill five or ten crowns worth of birds, that among the inſtances of greater prodigality in our nation, we have it recorded of Sir Thomas Monſon, who was a very expert Falconer, that he was at a thouſand pounds charge in goſhawks, only for one flight (†). All this conſidered, it is no wonder the diverſion at length dwindled away to that moderation in which it deſerves, as well as all other ſports, to be exerciſed. This treatiſe of Hawking, which is written in proſe, and has no author's name aſcribed to it, conſiſts of fifty-one pages; where it is ſhown to be at an end, by the word explicit. The next leaf begins thus — Lykewiſe, as in the booke of Hawkyng, aforeſayd are writyn and noted the termys of pleſure belongyng to gentillmen havyng delite therin: in the ſame manner thye booke followyng ſheweth to ſych gentill perſonys, The maner of Huntyng for all maner of Beeſtys, wether thay be Beeſtys of Venery, or of Chace, or Raſcall. And alſo it ſhewith all the termys convenyent, as well to the Howndys as to the Beeſtys aforeſayd, &c. This treatiſe of Hunting is written in verſe, divided into ſeveral chapters; and the whole poem contained in twenty-three pages. It ſeems in general to conſiſt of two parts, and the readers are addreſſed throughout the firſt, in the perſon of a woman, who begins the work, with diſtinguiſhing the beaſts of Venery; and having adviſed, whereſoever you are, in wood or in field, to give heed to what Triſtram ſays, or informs you of; ſhe alſo adds, if you will liſten, you ſhall learn of your dame, which kinds thoſe beaſts of Venery are; ſo names the Hart, the Hare, the Boar, and the Wolf; then proceeds to the Beaſts of the Chaſe, &c. And in ſeveral other parts, ſpeaks to her ſons of Venery, and bids them Say childe where you goo, yowre dame taght you ſo.

In the chapter of Hunting the hare, there are many French terms uſed, as the faſhionable phraſes in that ſport at thoſe times. What we call the ſecond part, is a kind of dialogue in ſeveral chapters, between the Maſter Hunter and his Man. At the end of the whole poem we read theſe words, 'Explicit Dam Julyans Barnes, in her boke of Huntyng.' In the next page, there are three or four ſhort chapters diſtinguiſhing, which are Beaſts of the Chace; of the Sweet, and Stinking Foot: The various names of Hounds: The Properties of a Grayhound; and how to be trained, or what he is fit for every year. After which we have a long liſt in two leaves, of the proper terms, by which any companies of beaſts and fowls, as well as ſeveral bodies or ſocieties of men and women are to be called in the Sportſman's Dialect; among which, there are ſome, one would ſcarcely expect to meet with from a Lady of that holy calling and character which are aſcribed to the writer of theſe pieces; as, an Uncredibilitie of Cocoldis; abominable ſight of Monkis; a rage of Mydenys; a ſuperfluyte of Nunnys, &c. which however true thoſe diſtinctions might be, are not very conſiſtent with a woman in that character. But indeed, there are words ſo blunt and indecent, both in the treatiſe of Hawking (110), and in this poem on Hunting (111), as were very unbecoming a woman, in any character. There is another liſt in the next page, of the terms or phraſes then uſed in carving, or, as it is (†) Dr. Middleton's Origin of Printing, &c. p. 14.

(105) Jul. Scaliger Comment. in Cir. fol. 344. Salmuth, Comment. in Pancirol. De Nov. Repert.

(106) Sir Anthony Shirley's Relation of his Travels into Perſia, Lond. 4to. 1613.

(107) Paulus Jovius in Deſcr. Britan.

(108) Ric. Pacæi De Fructu qui ex Doctrina percipitur Baſ. 4to. 1517.

(†) Sir Anthony Weldon's Court and Character of King James, 12mo. 1650, p. 105.

(110) In the Chap. of Medicines for Wormys, called Anguellis.

(111) In the laſt Chap. How ye ſhall breke an Hert.

the Princes of Chriſtendom to another Holy War againſt the Turks, in order to diſpoſſeſs them of the Holy Land. The ſame year alſo, he tranſlated out of the Dutch tongue and is called, of breekyng or dreſſyng divers Beeſtis, Fowlis, and Fyſshes. Laſtly, there is a table in another page, of all the Shyreys and Byſhopryches in the Reolme of Englond: but what congruity it bears with any thing in the foregoing treatiſes we perceive not. Thus all we ſee of Juliana Barnes is, that ſhe verſified a tract upon Hunting written by Sir Triſtram, whom Mr. John Manwood, of Lincoln's-Inn, in his treatiſe of Forreſt Law, calls a Monk and an old Forreſter, and always in quoting it aſcribes it to him, and never to her (†).

(†) Manwood's Laws of the Foreſt, edit. 4to. 1665, p. 98. 104, &c.

The next treatiſe printed in this book, though of a martial nature, and perhaps leſs likely to engage the ſtudies of a religious woman, is yet by authors aſcribed alſo to this Lady, though her name appears neither before nor after it. Beginning thus, In thys booke following is determyned, The Lynage of Coote Armuris, and how Gentilmen ſhall be knowen from ungentill Men; and how Bondeage began, firſt in Aungell, and after ſucceded in Mankynde; as it is ſhewede in proceſſe, boothe in the childer of Adam and alſo of Noe, and how Noe devyded the worlde in thre partes to his thre ſonnys. Alſo there be ſhewyd the nine Colowrys in Armys, figured by the nine Orderis of Aungelis; and it is ſhewyd by the forſayd Colowris, wych ben Worthy, and wych ben Royall; and of Rigalities, whiche ben Noble, and wich ben Excellent. And ther ben here the Virtuys of Chyvalry, and many other notable and famowſe Thyngys, to the Pleſure of noble Perſonys, ſhall be ſhewyd, as the werkys followyng witteneſes, whoſoever likyth to ſe thaym and rede thaym, wych were to long now to rehers: and after theys notable Thyngs aforeſayde, followyth, The Blaſyng of all maner Armys in Latyn, French, and Engliſh: ſo it begins with, Incepit Liber Armorum. Some fabulous Antiquities, Applications, and Alluſions, in this part of the ſaid work, ſeem to have been gathered from another of much the like complexion (112), which informs us, the beginning of theſe laws of arms were before the ten commandments of God. It is here alſo obſerved, that Chriſt was a gentleman, by his mother's ſide; and Prince of Cote Armure. After this part, intituled, The Lynage, &c. conſiſting of twenty-two pages, follows the laſt part, concerning The Blaſyng of Armys; in which there are a hundred and ſeventeen coats or ſcutcheons printed from wood, coloured, and blazoned in Latin, French, Engliſh. The example of higheſt Antiquity here produced, is that of King Arthur; who is ſaid to have changed his Three Dragons, and his other Shield of Three Crowns, for a Croſs of Silver, in a Field of Vert; with the Image of our Lady on the right, and her Son in her arm. A little farther it is obſerved of the Arms of France, which were, 'Three Flowris in 'maner of Swerdis, in a Felde of Aſure; that they 'were given (from heaven) to the Kyng of Fraunce, 'in ſygne of everlaſtyng trowbull, and that he and 'his ſucceſſaries, allway with betaill and ſwerddys 'ſhulde be punyſhid.' A little farther, ſpeaking of a coat conſiſting of a corded croſs, the author ſays, 'The which croſs I ſe bott late, in the Armys of a 'Nobull Man; the wich in very deed was ſumme 'tyme a crafty man, a Roper, as he hym ſelfe ſayd.' Where the quartering of the Arms of France and England is ſpoken of it is thus accounted for, that thoſe of France appear firſt. 'It ſhall not be tedeous to 'no man, that Fraunce is put before Englonde in 'blaſing; bot the cauſe is this, for thArmys of 'Fraunce, in armys to be put afore, and we have a 'generall rule, that whenſumever in armys be two 'colouris, or moo, in the poynt of the Shelde, then 'ye ſhall not begyn at the poynt to blaſe them, bot in 'the right parte, or ſide, of thoſe armys: that ſame 'coloure, ther founde, in the right ſide of the Shelde, 'is nott the Felde of thArmys; for it may be for-'tune, it is not the greateſt coloure in thArmys afor-'ſayd, but les, or with othir equall; and never the 'les ye ſhall begyn to blaſe ther.' Another remarkable quartering is obſerved in the Arms of Queen Anne, the wife of King Richard II. who bare 'ThArmys of Englond, Fraunce, and thEmperor of 'Almayn quartili, and in twenty one partes: that is 'to ſay in the right ſide of the Shelde, in the firſt 'quarter, ſhe bare thArmys of Fraunce, Thre Flore 'Delucis of Golde, in a Felde of Aſure; and in the 'ſecond quarter, Thre Libartis of Golde, in a Felde 'of Gowles; and in the thirde quarter, An Egle 'ſplayd, with two Neckis; and in the fourth, A 'black Lyon rampyng, in a Felde of Silver; and ſo 'chaungeably ſhe bare theſe Armys, in twenty one 'quarteris, the which ſeldyn is ſeen in Armys.' Farther, on treating of Bordures Gobonated, it is ſaid, 'This ſame Bordure baare that nobull Prynce the 'Duke of Glouceſtyr, brothyr to that nobull weri-'owre Kyng Henri the fifth; the wich Royall Duke 'bare in his Armys, The hooll Armys of Fraunce 'and Englond quartily, with a Bordure Gobonatit 'of Silver and Sable.' And after having diſcuſſed a nice point upon the Arms of Roger Mertemor Earl of Marche, whether they ſhould be called Bordured or not, there is mention made, in another chapter, 'Of 'certain Nobles who bore Fuſils in their Arms; of 'the nombur of which, ſais our author, my Lord of 'Glauceſtur that nobull Prince, uncle to King Henry 'the ſext, was:' adding, 'That he bore Three 'Fuſſils in a bar, in his Arms (but they are wrong 'blazoned in the text, or coloured in the ſcutcheon 'here) by the reſon of certain Londes belongyng to 'the Mounte.' This ſeems to be one of the lateſt inſtances taken notice of in theſe examples of Blazonry, excepting that of the noble Roper at firſt mentioned, and the notice taken of Duke Humphrey's arms. And this laſt part conſiſts of fifty-ſix pages, beſides that which contains the Arms of St. Albans at the end, before-mentioned. Thus have we paſſed through this whole book; and it is a more ample deſcription, or account of it, than has been yet given; the ſcarcity whereof has occaſioned many erroneous aſſertions. Though no name is aſcribed to this laſt part or book of Arms, yet has it been appropriated, like the others, to the pious Lady aforeſaid. The author was apparently converſant abroad in the world, often among courtiers, and men of quality. And how likely ſuch a perſon, ſuch a critick in the doctrine and laws of Chivalry, a ſcience ſo full of oſtentation to the world, was to have any ſuperintendency over a Nunnery of religious votaries, trained to ſtrict abſtinence, ſanctity, and retirement from the world, is not eaſy to reſolve. But in ſhort, this very treatiſe is ſaid to be abſtracted from that part of Dr. Nicholas Upton's book of Military Affairs, which treats De Inſignibus Anglorum Nobilium (113), who died in 1457, ten years after his patron Duke Humphrey, before-mentioned, in the ſaid treatiſe; to whom it was originally dedicated: And how inconſiſtent with the character and decorum that muſt have been expected in a Lady ſo religiouſly devoted, the other tracts in this book are, has partly before appeared. It ſeems not, that Bale or Pits ever ſaw this original edition, becauſe they alſo mention with it, a book of Fiſhing, as of this Lady's writing; which is not to be met with, but in the ſecond edition of theſe tracts, printed by Wynkin de Worde at Weſtminſter, in folio 1496; and therein it is neither aſcribed to her, nor any body elſe; but only printed in this larger volume of thoſe ſubjects relating to the Gentry and Nobility; that every idle and ordinary perſon might not be able to purchaſe it, as they would if it had been publiſhed in a little pamphlet by itſelf. And in the Preface to that Treatyſe of Fyſshynge with an Angle, there is expreſſed ſome intentions alſo of publiſhing a Treatiſe of Fowling. But nothing more of Juliana Barnes appears, than her name at the end of the ſaid doctrine of Hunting, as was before obſerved; from which ſuch high characters have been drawn of her, with ſuch noble alliance, and ſuch holy profeſſion imputed to her, as are before-mentioned. In that ſecond edition, it has been noted, that ſhe propoſed in her ſaid poem on Hunting, as her model, A Deſcription of the Myrthes of Huntynge by the Duke of York, Maſter of the Game; and he might feign himſelf to appear in the character of the old Triſtram before mentioned, or it might be the name of his principal (112) Geſta Trojanorum.

(113) Vide N. Uptoni De Militarii Officio, Lond. fol. 1654.

and printed, a political diſcourſe called Reynard the Fox; beſides two books of Cicero's, and two orations of Banatuſius Magnomontanus (d), which are commonly bound in one volume together; of which three books, or ſix diſcourſes, ſince the reader may expect ſome diſtinct account, as hath been given of the others, we ſhall in like manner draw together ſome deſcription or memorials of them at the bottom of the page [M]. The cipal Huntſman or Foreſter. However that was, when the book appeared afterwards in a later edition, publiſhed not improbably by Gervaſe Markham, he ſays expreſsly in the title page, that the book of Hunting, Hawking, and Armory were all compiled by Juliana Barnes in the year 1486 (114). And yet in the firſt paragraph of the treatiſe of Hunting, which is here all reduced to proſe, he ſays, Theſe, and none other be the ancient laws of Sir Triſtram: hence, Mr. Manwood, in his Foreſt-Laws, as was ſaid afore, always quotes Sir Triſtram, and never Mrs. Barnes; and not only gives him the title of Knighthood, but makes him a Monk withal. Sir Henry Chauncey never ſaw the edition printed at St. Albans of this book, nor perhaps any other, becauſe he calls it by a wrong title; The Gentleman's Recreation, &c. and makes the preſs delivered of it in 1481, five years before its time (115). But he contradicts himſelf in calling her Abbeſs of Sopwell, when he has a diſtinct chapter upon the religious foundation there, and only calls it a Priory; but mentions nothing of Juliana Barnes, in that place. The firſt perſon I have met with, who call her Lady Prioreſs of that Nunnery, is the author of the printed catalogue of Biſhop More's library, where he is giving a title of this book; and as for what has been more lately advanced (†), that Mrs. Barnes was ſiſter to Richard Lord Berners of Eſſex; in none of the pedigrees we have ſeen of this name, neither that in Sir Henry Chauncey's Hiſtory laſt quoted, nor that, more copious, drawn up by late Mr. Peter le Neve, Norroy King of Arms (116), nor that lately publiſhed in the Hiſtory of the county of Eſſex (117), does any ſuch Lady Abbeſs, or Lady Prioreſs, or any other Lady, of one name, or the other, appear, like thoſe of her in queſtion. And indeed, ſuch a contraſt of characters in one perſon, is apt to raiſe very conteſting ideas. One cannot reconcile the notions thoſe ſubjects inſpire, of their authors being ſo expert and familiarly practiſed in thoſe robuſt and maſculine exerciſes, with the character of ſuch a ſedate, grave, pious, matron-like Lady, as the Prioreſs of a Nunnery is imagined to be; a conjunction of ſuch extreams, ſeeming quite unnatural. Indeed, we have, and ſo we may have had, your romping, roaring hoydens, that will be for horſing and hunting after the wildeſt game, in the moſt giddy company: but to join ſo much of theſe rough and impetuous diverſions, as is required to obtain the proficiency aforeſaid, with the moſt ſerene and ſolemn profeſſion of a mortified and ſpiritual life in herſelf, and the charge or care of training it in others, muſt make an unaccountable mixture. In that light, there appears ſuch a motley maſquerade, ſuch an indiſtinction of petticoat and breeches, ſuch a problem and concorporation of ſexes, according to the image that ariſes out of the ſeveral repreſentations of this religious Sportſwoman or Virago, that one can ſcarcely conſider it, without thinking Sir Triſtram, the old Monkiſh Foreſter, and Juliana, the Matron of the Nuns, had united to confirm John Cleveland's Canonical Hermophradite (118): but other examples of the like inconſiſtencies being alſo united to dreſs up one character, might make this appear the leſs extraordinary, if there was any need to inſtance them.

(d) J. Lelandi Comm. de Script. Britan. p. 48.

(114) The Gentleman's Academy, or Book of St. Albans, &c. Reduced into a better method by G. M. Printed for H. Lownes, 4to. 1595.

(115) Sir Henry Chauncey's Hiſtorical Antiquities of Hertfordſhire, fol. 1700, p. 448, 449.

(†) Dr. Middleton's Origin of Printing.

(116) The Pedigree of Katherine Knyvet, &c. lineal heir of Sir John Bourchier, Knight of the Garter, the firſt Lord Berners. By P. Le Neve Norroy, 1717.

(117) The Hiſt. and Antiquities of the County of Eſſex, fol. by N. Salmon.

(118) The Works of Mr. John Cleveland, &c. 8vo. 1687, p. 20.

[M] Deſcription or memorials of them at the bottom of the page.] The firſt of theſe here mentioned, is intituled, The Siege and Conqueſt of Jheruſalem, with many other Hiſtoryes therein compryſed: and of the Meſeaſes of the Criſten men in the holy Lands; and of their Releef, &c. and how Godeffroy of Boloyne was firſt Kyng of the Latyns in that Royamme; and of his Deth: tranſlated and reduced out of Frenſshe into Engliſshe, by me ſymple perſone William Caxton; being begun the 12th of Marche, fynyſhed the 7th of Juyn, and emprynted the 20th of Novembre, fol. 1481. The deſign of this work, as we ſaid was, that every Chriſtian man might be the better encouraged to enterprize war for the defence of Chriſtendom, and to recover the ſaid city of Jeruſalem alſo, that Chriſtians may go thither with ſtrong hand to expel the Saracens and Turks out of the ſame, that our Lord might be there ſerved, &c. (119). Matters of fact ſeem to have been the chief purſuit of the author in this Hiſtory; and though ſome mervayllous workes do occur in it, yet it ſeems not ſo over-run with enthuſiaſtic romance, as ſome other Hiſtories of this age on that ſubject are. Our tranſlator ſays, he preſents this book to King Edward IV. which very preſentation book was ſold in the auction of Mr. Richard Smith's library (120). That expedition was incited by Pope Gregory VII. and it was reported, that no leſs than two hundred thouſand Chriſtians were confederated therein: old and young, rich and poor, went without any preſſing or compulſion. Beſides Godfrey of Boloyne, there were other chief leaders, as Beemond, Duke of Naples; and Hugh, the King of France's brother: and this paſſage was made by the Vyſyon of our Lady, as Maſter Caxton informs us in another book (121). The next work, intituled, Thyſtorye of Reynard, or Reynart the Fox, in 4to. was looked upon by the late Mr. Thomas Hearne, the Antiquary of Oxford, to be an admirable piece, written with a good deſign to repreſent a wiſe and politic government. In the firſt page of it, as Mr. Lewis informs us, for this is one of Caxton's pieces we have never ſeen, there is his cypher, before ſpoken of (122), printed in this manner, but larger; in memory, as it is preſumed, of the year in which, and the perſon by whom, the art of Printing was firſt practiſed among us. We are by the ſame author informed, that Caxton ſays there is in this book, 'Wreton the parable 'of good Leryng, &c. for an example to the people:' And that he ſays farther, 'I have not added ne 'mynyſhed, but have followed as nigh as I can my 'copi, whiche was in Dutche; and by me Wyl-'lyam Caxton, tranſlated into this rude and ſym-'ple Englyſshe, in the Abbaye of Weſtmeſtre 'the vi day of Juyn in the yere of our Lord 'M.CCCC.LXXXI, and in the xxi yere of the reigne 'of Kynge Edward IIII.' The third volume he printed this year, is intituled,—Tullius his book of OLD AGE: whereunto is added, his book of FRIENDSHIP; and the Decleracyon, ſhewing wherein HONOURE ſhold reſte: emprynted by William Caxton, fol. 1481. He does not mention who was the tranſlator of the firſt part of this work, which is Tully de Senectute, as Leland has alſo obſerved: but a late author informs us of a memorial of Wyllyam de Wyrceſtre, alias Botaner, which he has entered againſt the year 1473, by which it appears that he was the tranſlator of this piece; in which memorandum it is ſaid, 'On the 20th of Auguſt, I preſented to Wyl-'liam Waynflete, Biſhop of Wincheſter, the book 'of Tulley of old Age, tranſlated by me into Engliſh '(123).' This Wyllyam Wyrceſtre was an Antiquary and Phyſician, whence he had the name perhaps of Botaner or Herbaliſt; and alſo an Aſtronomer of great abilities for the age he lived in. He was born in the city of Briſtol, anno 1415, and was ſometyme ſervaunte and ſoget, or ſubject, withe his reverent maſter John Faſtolf Chevalier, and exerciſed in the werres contynuelly above 44 yeres (†); and in ſo great favour he was with Sir John, that he left him one of the executors of his laſt will, which is dated a little while before his death on the third of December 1459. In faithful and cordial affection to the memory of his ſaid renowned maſter, he wrote a book of the Life and Actions of the ſaid Sir John Faſtolf, which hath been ſaid to be ſtill in being. That account of his being the tranſlator of this book is farther confirmed by what Caxton ſays in his Preface before it, 'That it was 'tranſlated and thyſtoryes openly declared by the or-'denaunce

(119) Catalogus Bibliothecæ Harleianæ, vol. iii. 8vo. 1744, p. 193.

(120) Bibliotheca Smithiana, 4to. 1682, p. 275.

(121) Caxton's Chronicle in the year 1061.

(122) Life of Caxton, p. 51.

(123) Mr. Anſtis's Regiſter of the Order of the Garter, vol. ii.

(†) Itinerarium Will. Worceſter, MS. in Bennet-Coll. Library.

The next production of Caxton's preſs, was a copious body of Hiſtory in the year 1482, intituled Polychronicon, according to the Engliſh tranſlation of John de Treviſa, from the Latin of Ranulphus Higden, the Monk of Cheſter. Upon this Hiſtory, Caxton beſtowed ſome extraordinary pains; not only in tranſcribing it entirely over, to modernize, and render the obſolete ſtyle more conformable to the phraſe or language of his own time, but he compiled and added alſo a Continuation thereof, down to the beginning of the King's reign under whom he then lived; and after that, he was at the trouble of collecting, and writing into the margins of his impreſſion, the ſeries of Chronology which was wanting in the copy he followed. And yet here, as in all other of his books, he ſpeaks of his own toilſome endeavours with ſo much diffidence and humility, as if he feared they would prove more offenſive than acceptable, and procure him rather the cenſure than approbation of his readers; as may appear in the abſtract of his own account of the ſaid Hiſtory ſubjoined, and the obſervations which others have made thereon [N].

The

'denaunce and deſyre of the noble auncyent Knyght 'Sir Johan Faſtolf of the countee of Norfolk Bannerette, lyving the age of fourſcore yere; exercyſyng the 'warrys in the Royame of Fraunce and other countrees, 'for the diffence and unyverſal welfare of bothe 'Royames of Englond and Fraunce, by forty yeres 'enduryng; the fayte of armes hauntyng, and in admynyſtryng juſtice and politique governaunce under 'three Kyngs; that is to wete, Henry IV, Henry V, 'Henry VI, and was Governour of the Duchye of 'Angeou, and the countree of Mayne; Capytayne 'of many townys, caſtellys, and fortreſſys, in the ſaid 'Royame of Fraunce; having the charge and ſaufgarde of them dyverſe yeres, ocupyeng and rewlynge 'three hondred ſperes, and the bowes accuſtomed 'thenne; and yeldyng good acompt of the forſaid 'townes, caſtellys, and fortreſſes to the ſeyd Kyngs, 'and to their Lyeutenauntes, Prynces of noble recommendacion; as Johan, Regent of Fraunce, Duc 'of Bedford; Thomas, Duc of Exeter; Thomas, Duc 'of Clarence, and other Lyeutenauntes.' It appears further in Caxton's ſaid proem, That this treatiſe of Old Age had been tranſlated out of Latin into French by Laurence de Primo Facto, at the command of Lewis, Duke of Bourbon; and as Caxton prays his reader, to take this reducing patiently, ſubmitting himſelf to his amendment or correction; he might have an hand in modelling the ſaid diſcourſe, according to the neweſt mode of ſtile from the ſaid French tranſlation: yet in the main, he might follow as to the ſenſe, the tranſlation made by Wyrceſtre from the Latin, it ſeems at the command of Sir John Faſtolf; becauſe he ſays ſome things that in the original were compendiouſly ſpecified, and in a manner hard or obſcure in the text, are more amply expounded, and rendered ſweeter to the reader, keeping yet the juſt ſentence of the Latin. To this is joyned the ſecond treatiſe, which is of Friendſhip, beginning thus;—'Here followeth the ſaid Tullius de Amicicia, tranſ'lated into our maternal Engliſhe tongue, by the 'noble famous Erle, therle of Wurceſtre (ſone and 'heyre of the Lord Typtoft) which in his tyme flow'red in vertue and cunnyng; to whom I knew none 'lyke emonge the Lordes of the temporalitie in Sci'ence and moral vertue.' This treatiſe is marked with ſignatures in the ſame manner as the former at the bottom of the pages, but in neither are they numbered at top. Laſtly, follow the Two Declarations made by Publius Cornelius Scipio and Gayus Flamyneus, rivals for the love of Lucrice: ſhewing wherein True honour and Nobility conſiſts: the former placing it in blood, riches, and the worſhipful deeds of his anceſtors, without urging any thing of his own life or manners; the latter inſiſting that nobleneſs cannot be derived from the glory or merits of another man, or from the flattering goodneſs of fortune, but muſt reſt in his own proper virtue and glory. After theſe orations, Caxton concludes with requeſting his readers to remember the tranſlator, both of them, and the treatiſe of Friendſhip before them; 'I mean, ſays 'he, the Right Vertuous, and Noble Erle, therle of 'Wurceſter, which late pytouſly loſt his life; whos 'ſoul I recommende vnto youre ſpecial prayers; who 'alſo in his time made many other vertuous workes, 'whiche I have hard of. O good bleſſyd Lord God! 'what grete loſſe was it of that noble, vertuous, and 'well-diſpoſed Lord? whan I remembre and adver'tyze his lyf, his ſcience, and his virtue; methink'eth God not diſpleſyd ouer grete loſſe of ſuch a 'man, conſyderyng his eſtate and conning; and alſo 'thexerciſe of the ſame; with the grete laboures in 'gooing on pylgremage to Jheruſalem; viſyting there 'the holy places that our bleſſyd Lord Jheſu Criſte 'holowed with his bleſſyd preſence, and ſhedding there 'his precious blood for our redempcion, and from 'thens aſcended unto his Fader in heaven. And 'what worſhip had he at Rome, in the preſence of 'of our holy fader the Pope? And ſo in all other 'places unto his deth; at which deth, every man that 'was there, might lern to dye, and take his deth pa'ciently; wherin I hope, and doubte not but that 'God receyved his ſoul into hes everlaſtyng blyſſe: 'for as I am enformed, he ryght adviſedly ordeyned 'alle his thinges, as well for his laſt will of worldly 'goodes, as for his ſowle helthe; and pacyently and 'holyly, without grudchyng in charyte to fore, that 'he departed out of this world, whiche is gladſom 'and joyous to here, &c.' This John Lord Tiptoft, Earl of Worceſter, thus praiſed and lamented by his editor, was born at Everton in Cambridgeſhire, educated at Baliol-College in Oxford, where he attained to great learning; was created by King Henry VI. a Viſcount, Earl of Worceſter, and Lord High Conſtable of England; and by King Edward IV. Knight of the Garter; he was twice Lord High-Treaſurer of England; and in 1467, Deputy-Lieutenant of Ireland. In the Civil Wars between thoſe Kings, he could not be ungrateful to one, who had ſo much advanced him, nor diſloyal to the other, in whom the right of the Crown lay; ſo he viſited the Holy Land, and at Rome made ſuch an oration before Pope Pius II. that with the eloquence thereof, it drew tears from his eyes. But returning home in the ſhort and unlucky interval of King Henry's reſtitution, which was remarkable for nothing but the death of this worthy Lord; he was accuſed of ſome pretended rigor in the government of Ireland, being ſuſpected of favouring ſecretly King Edward's party; ſo that in 1470, the ax cut off more learning in this Nobleman at a blow, than it left in the heads of all the Nobility beſides. He wrote ſome orations and epiſtles beſides thoſe two tranſlations above-mentioned, and was buried in the Dominican's Convent in London according to Leland, who beſtows high commendations upon him, not only for his great learning and Ciceronian eloquence, but for his many virtues and other deſerts (124).

[N] In the abſtract of his own account of the ſaid Hiſtory, and the obſervations which others have made thereon.] Becauſe this Polychronicon, tranſlated from the ſaid Ranulphus Hygden, Monk of Cheſter, by Sir Johan Treviſa, Chapelayn unto Lord Thomas of Barkley, and dedicated to him, comprehends the occurrences of many ages, it is ſo called; and from His great example, who wrought all his works in ſix days, and reſted on the ſeventh, he divides it into ſeven books. The firſt deſcribes all countries in general, more eſpecially Britain; the other ſix are a conciſe model of civil hiſtory, from the Creation down to his own time; that is under the reign of King Edward III. Treviſa, in his Dialogue prefixed, in defence of Tranſlations ſays, that Higden brought the Hiſtory down to his laſt days. It ends in 1357; which therefore gives more credit to their report, who write, that this hiſtorian died in 1363, than theirs, who prolong (124) Comment. de Script. Britan. p. 43, &c. See alſo Bale, Camden, Brook, Sir James Ware, de Script. Brit. Fuller's Worthies, and Dugdale's Baronage.

The next year, 1483, there are no leſs than ſix books, ſaid to be of his printing, extant, if not one or two more alſo printed in the ſame year, that are undated. Theſe are intituled, The Pilgrimage of the Soul; Liber Feſtivalis; John Gower's Confeſſio Amantis; The Legend of the Saints; Cato's Diſtichs; and The Knight of the Tower. As the account that is to be given of theſe need not be very circumſtantial, they may all be comprehended under one note [O]. There have alſo been two other books entered into the prolong his life fourteen years beyond that (125). But Treviſa's account of the time when he finiſhed the ſaid tranſlation, printed at the concluſion of this work, is an error of the preſs, or of the copy, which Caxton followed; for here in print it is 1357, the ſame year that Higden finiſhed the hiſtory itſelf; whereas Treviſa mentions later dates in his own notes or additions interſperſed, as we have before obſerved (126): however, Archbiſhop Uſher, and Biſhop Nicholſon after him, among other miſtakes, ſay, thoſe interpolations were not made by Treviſa, but the editor (127). But as Mr. Lewis rightly obſerves, out of the old manuſcript of this tranſlation, it was ended by Treviſa in 1387; which will comprehend the lateſt date mentioned by him in thoſe notes. After the ſaid ſeven books, we have one more compiled by Caxton himſelf, which continues the hiſtory down to 1460, 'and the firſt year of King Edward IV. 'which amounts to an hundred and three years,' ſays he, in his epilogue, at the end of the book: and this exactly correſponds with the year in which Higden concluded his Chronicle. But in reſpect to the addition Caxton has made, he complains for want of thoſe advantages which printing, had it been in uſe in that period, might have afforded, by the intelligence or communication of hiſtorical materials for his purpoſe; that few writers could be heard of in thoſe days, who preſerved in their regiſters the occurrences of the times: ſo that he could meet with no other authorities than a book entituled, Faſciculus Temporum (128); and another, called Aureus de Univerſo, which yet contributed but little to his undertaking. Indeed the fifteenth century has not been accounted very fruitful in eminent writers, eſpecially of hiſtory: And it has been obſerved, particularly of the reign of Edward IV. that even the favourers of juſtice and his cauſe, have not known what account to give of the times (129), or how to form a regular hiſtory out of ſuch an heap of confuſion. Yet there were authors in that age who might have been aſſiſtant to Caxton, could he have arrived at the knowledge of them; but their writings remaining in manuſcript, and, as it were, locked up in obſcure confinement, till they were ſet at liberty by the preſs, are come to be better known in our times, than when they were written (130). We ſhall only obſerve farther of Treviſa's tranſlation, that the chronological tables, wherewith Higden ſays he charged his margins, in double and treble columns, were omitted in the copy that Caxton followed, or at leaſt left unprinted by him; wherefore in ſome of the printed copies, thoſe tables are written throughout with red ink, and probably with his own hand. All we ſhall farther add of Ralph Higden, the reputed author, is, that by a compariſon which has been made of ſome old MS. copies of this Polychronicon, with the Polycratica Temporum of Roger Ceſtrenſis, a Benedictine Monk alſo of St. Werberg, that are repoſited in the Harleian Library, there have been ſome reaſons found to believe, that our Ralph of Cheſter did endeavour to appropriate Roger of Cheſter's labours to himſelf; and particularly by a crotchet he uſed in the initial letters of the ſeveral chapters, which begin his Polychronicon, out of which it has been obſerved there may be read theſe words, Præſentem Chronicam compilavit frater Ranulphus Monachus Ceſtrenſis. But this was a whimſey uſed by other hiſtorians of thoſe times, as an author before cited has obſerved (131).

(125) Catal. Bibl. Harleianæ, vol. iii. p. 24.

(126) See the marginal remark (3) in the note [A].

(127) Vid. Uſſeri Hiſt. Dogm. edit. ab Hen. Wharton, p. 157. 439; and Nicholſon's Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, edit. fol. 1736, p. 65.

(128) Mr. Maittaire mentions a book called Faſciculus Temporum, per Joannem Pryſs, fol. Argentine, Anno Dom. 1487.

(129) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 63.

(130) As, Froiſſart, R. Avesbury, Tit. Livy, T. de la More, J. Roſſe, H. Knyghton, T. Walſingham, J. Wethamſted, and T. Otterborne, &c. &c.

(131) Biſhop Nicholſon, as above, fol. p. 64, 65. 67.

[O] They may all be comprehended under one note.] Yet that we may ſpeak diſtinctly of them, we ſhall begin with that which is called, The Pylgremage of the Sowle; tranſlated out of Frenſshe into Engliſshe: Full of devout maters towching the ſowle, and many queſtyons aſſoyled, to cauſe a man to lyve the better in this world, &c. It was printed by Caxton at Weſtminſter, and finiſhed the ſixth day of June, fol. 1483, 'and the 'firſt yere of the regne of Kynge Edwarth the Fyfthe '(132).' This Pylgremage is related in the manner of a dream. The author was a man of copious imagination; and this verſion out of French, with ſomewhat of additions, as it is ſaid at the end, was made in the year of our Lord 1413. Mr. Mattaire ſays it was written in French by Antoine Gerard, and entituled by him Le Pelerinage de l'Ame, and printed at Paris 1480 (133). As for the tranſlator, it does not directly appear who he was, but among the additions above-mentioned to be made, ſome, if not all of the poetry, ſeems to be a part; and much of that, written in the ſtile and ſtanzas of John Lydgate. This is remarkable, that the thirty-fourth chapter of that poet's Life of the Virgin Mary, which is a digreſſion in praiſe of Chaucer, and the author's lamentation for the loſs of him, who uſed to correct his works, he being then newly dead; and that, the thirty-fourth chapter of the ſecond book of this Pilgrimage ſhould be the ſame poem; which being unſuitable for any body to repeat, to whom Chaucer had not done ſuch ſervices, offers ſome probabilities that this tranſlation was made by Lydgate (134). The next he this year printed is entitled,

(132) This young Prince began his reign April 9, and was murdered in the Tower, and ſucceeded by his uncle Richard III. on the 22d of June in the ſame year.

(133) Annal. Typog.

(134) Catal. Bibl. Harleianæ, vol. iii. p. 126.

Liber Feſtivalis: or Directions for keeping Faſt all the year. 'Tis ſaid to be printed at Weſtmynſtre by William Caxton the laſte day of Juyn, Anno Domini 1483, in quarto (135). It conſiſts of ſhort diſcourſes or ſermons on the principal Sundays and holy days in the year. There have been many editions of this book. We never ſaw this of Caxton's; but one printed, though without the printer's name, by Wynkin de Worde in 1496, we have ſeen, and others. Thoſe ſermons on the principal Faſts and Feaſts, &c. are interlarded with hiſtorical narratives out of the legends; that the clerks who excuſed themſelves for default of books, might have this to teach their pariſhioners therein, and ſhew them, what the ſaints ſuffered and did for God's ſake. Mr. Hearne obſerves, 'That this book conſiſts of a courſe of homi-'lies, in which are many odd ſtories: That it goes by 'no other name but that of Feſtivall, among curious 'men, who are very inquiſitive after copies of it (136).' It may be farther obſerved, that ſome of thoſe odd ſtories are ſuch, that the Papiſts are now aſhamed of them. Mr. Lewis ſpeaks of four ſermons more added to this edition, which were alſo of Caxton's printing, as he ſays, and which, we, as well as Mr. Palmer, have ſeen in a ſeparate book; but printed alſo by Wynkin de Worde, though his name is not mentioned therein; yet viſibly his performance, as well by his type, as his cuſtom of regiſtring at the end, the number of his ſignatures. This Engliſh book, printed at Weſtminſter the ſame year as the other, 1496, has a Latin title, and is called Quatuor Sermones, though it is not very diſtinctly divided into four ſermons; but the two firſt ſeem to be comprehended under certain topics, by which we are inſtructed how to attain the knowledge of God; as the articles of the Lord's Prayer, Creed, and Commandments (137), the ſeven Sacraments, the ſeven Deeds of Mercy, the ſeven deadly Sins, and the nine Torments of Hell. The third ſermon treats of the three parts of Penance; contrition, confeſſion, and ſatisfaction: And that which ſeems to be the laſt ſermon is called the General Sentence, or Church Curſes; which were read to the congregation quarterly; ſome of which are ſingularly obſervable; ending very expreſsly againſt the with-holders of Tythes. After which follows the Modus Fulminandi Sententiam, in Latin; wherein all the violators of any articles mentioned in the ſaid general ſentence, are excommunicated, anathematiſed, given up to the Devil, and damned by holy Church, to all intents and purpoſes; wherever they are, in whatever doing, unleſs they repent and make ſatisfaction; after which ſentence the lights were extin-

(135) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 67, 68.

(136) Hearne's Chron. of Robert of Glouceſter, vol. ii.

(137) Of the Cenſure and Danger there was in reading only the Pater Noſter, Creed, &c. in Engliſh, above twenty years after this book was printed. See Lewis, p. 69, out of Fox, Tindal, Archbiſhop Arundel, &c.

the Catalogue of his Works, under the ſame year; but as we find not that they have any dates to them, whereby they can be poſitively fixed under this year, that which we guiſhed ad Terrorem, and all the bells ſet a jangling (138). This quarterly cuſtom of curſing and damning the people, was begun, it ſeems, by Archbiſhop Langton, in the year 1222; of which conſtitution, and the expoſition of John Wicliff thereupon, more may be read in one of the authors before quoted (139). We are in doubt, whether there be any older editions of the Liber Feſtivalis, and the Quatuor Sermones, in Engliſh, than thoſe here mentioned, however they have been aſcribed to Caxton, under the year aforeſaid; and if there is not, they ſhould be reſtored to Wynkin de Worde.

(138) Catal. Bibl. Harleianæ, vol. iii. p. 388.

(139) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 74.

The next book he printed this year, is entitled, Confeſſio Amantis: That is to ſaye in Englyſshe, The Confeſſion of the Lover; made and compyled by Johan Gower, ſquyre, borne in Walys, in the Tyme of King Richard the ſecond. Which book treteth, how he was confeſſyd to Genyus preeſt of Venus, upon the Cauſes of Love, in his five Wyttes, and ſeven dedely Synnes, &c. with divers Hiſtoryes and Fables, touching every matere compryſed therein. This is the title of the ſaid book. And at the end we read as follows, Emprynted at Weſtmeſtre, by me Willyam Caxton, and fyniſhed the 2d day of Septembre, the fyrſt yere of the regne of King Richard the Third, the yere of our Lord a Thouſand CCCCLXXXXIII. which to agree with that year of the ſaid King, muſt manifeſtly be a figure of X too much; like the error of ſetting one too few, in the early printed book, before-mentioned, at Oxford. The very title of this original edition may ſerve to correct ſeveral errors; and among others, even in ſo eminent an Antiquary as Leland; who ſays, as Fuller alſo does, and every body elſe after him, that Gower was born in Yorkſhire (140), whereas he appears, in the very front of this book, to have been a Welſhman: Then again, they have made him of the knightly order, and called him Sir John Gower, after Bale, &c. But here we ſee he is called no more than a ſquire. The ſame author would alſo make him Poet Laureat, from the little band or fillet, with four roſes, or white quarter-foyles, that were carved about the head of his monumental effigies in St. Mary Overy's church, as if it had been a wreath of bays; and Fuller, from the ſame, would think him a Judge (141), though that, with the collar of SS. carved round his breaſt, and a white ſwan at the end of it, were no other than the cognizances of Henry Earl of Darby, afterwards King Henry IV. which his eſquires, or ſome of his officers wore. But there is an error in Mr. Mattaire, of miſpelling his name, which Mr. Lewis has fallen into (142), and which could proceed from nothing elſe, but the miſtaking one letter in his name, as it appears in that old print, for two; where the firſt ſtem of the ꝟ appearing ſo much longer than the others, they have taken it for an l and a v, ſo inſtead of Gower they have called him Glover. This work he began at the encouragement of King Richard the ſecond, as his own words inform us (143), and in the ſixteenth year of his Majeſty's reign; when, as he more particularly tells us, meeting that King upon the river of Thames, his Majeſty called him into his barge, and among other diſcourſes, enjoined him to undertake ſome new work for his entertainment. Therefore he reſolved upon ſuch a performance as might neither be void of prudence for the wiſe, nor of matter of diverſion for thoſe who were gallantly diſpoſed. And becauſe few men then wrote in Engliſh, as he tells us, in his ſecond prologue (144), 'he determined to write this book in our 'own tongue, for the general uſe of his countrymen.' Thus we ſee his motive for writing this book, the matter it treats of, and the time when he began it; but through the frequent interruptions of ſickneſs and natural infirmities of old age, it ſeems he did not finiſh it long before the ſaid King was murdered in Pontefract Caſtle in Yorkſhire. And about that time he addreſſed it by the ſecond prologue to that Prince's ſucceſſor, Henry of Lancaſter, aforeſaid. This laſt prologue only, was printed with this firſt edition of Gower; but from ſuch an imperfect copy, as 'tis ſaid, that it wanted in ſeveral places, not only leaves, but whole columns and pages; which, together with the changing of words, and tranſpoſing of ſentences, made this eaſy author unintelligible, as the next editor, Tho. Barthelette, pretends (145), who was printer to King Henry VIII. dedicated his edition of this book to the ſaid Prince, and in his preface thereto reſtores the original prologue. Chaucer and Gower uſed to ſubmit their works to each other's correction; and the latter wrote many other books, beſides this, both in verſe and in proſe; and one or more of them is in being, though none beſides was ever printed. He was blind ſome time before he died, if, after his blindneſs, he preſented his ſong in Praiſe of Peace, to King Richard; and it is not unlikely but he ſurvived Chaucer ſome few years, though the time of his death is not diſtinctly agreed on.

(140) De Script. Britan.

(141) Fuller's Worthies in Yorkſhire.

(142) Life of Caxton, p. 80.

(143) Gower's Confeſſio Amantis, the firſt Prologue printed in the ſecond edition, by Thomas Barthelette, fol. 1532.

(144) Printed in this firſt edition.

(145) T. Berthelette's Preface to his edit. of Gower, as before.

The next product of Caxton's preſs, in the ſame year was, The Golden Legende: wherin ben conteyned alle the hygh and grete Feſtys of our Lord; the Feſtys of our bleſſyd Lady; the Lyves, Paſſyons, and Myracles of many other Sayntes; and other Hyſtoryes and Actes. Fynyſhed at Weſtmeſtre, by Wyllyam Caxton 1483. This is the firſt edition of the Golden Legend in Engliſh: it is printed in double columns on a ſpacious form, and that copy which we have ſeen, is perhaps the largeſt and moſt pompous of Caxton's printing; adorned with many wooden cuts, different from thoſe in the following editions; with the initial letters in red ink. At the end, whence the title above is extracted, we alſo read theſe words; 'Whych werke I 'have accompliſhed at the commaundement and re-'queſte of the noble and puyſſaunte Erle, and my 'ſpecyal good Lord Wylliam, Erle of Arondel.' There is but one preface to this edition; but to his next, in a ſmaller ſize, there is alſo another; expreſſing, that as the work would be over-chargeable to him, he began to deſpair of going through with it; till the ſaid Earl ſent a gentleman to him, named John Stauncy, who ſolicited him, in no wiſe to leave off, and promiſed that the ſaid Lord during his life 'Shold geve, ſays he, and graunt to me a yerely fee; 'that is, to wete, a bucke in ſommer, and a doo in 'wynter; with whych fee I hold me wel contente, '&c.' It is an error in Biſhop Nicholſon, where he ſays, That Capgrave's Legenda Sanctorum Angliæ was tranſlated into Engliſh by Caxton, and firſt printed in the year 1516 (146). Tho' indeed, he does, as he is charged by that author in the Legend of St. Urſula, add 15,000 men to the martyrdom of the 11,000 virgins, from what he had heard at Cologne. But after all the monſtrous improbabilities of that ſtory, how rationally the ſaid 26,000, may be reduced to two perſons, may appear in a modern French Hiſtoriographer, who is of Father Sirmond's opinion about this Legend, that thoſe who firſt broached it, finding, in ſome old martyrological MSS. St. Urſula, & Undecimilla V. M. that is, St. Urſula and Undecimilla, Martyrs; and imagining that Undecimilla with the V. and M. which followed, was an abbreviation for Undecem Millia Martyrum Virginum; did thence out of two virgins, make eleven thouſand (147). The truth is, of this whole volume, it is no tranſlation from any one author; for Caxton tells us, he had by him a Legend in French; that, we ſuppoſe, called La Legend d'Oree, and another in Latin, and a third in Engliſh, which varied in divers places; and alſo that many Hiſtories were compriſed in the two other books, which were not in the Engliſh one: therefore, ſays he, 'I have wryton one oute of the ſayd three 'bookes; which I have orderyd otherwyſe than the 'ſayd Engliſshe Legendis, which was ſo tofore 'made (†).' The following editions have ſeveral of the Lives and Hiſtories differently diſpoſed. For this begins with the Advent, Nativity, &c. of our Lord: and this edition has at the end, The noble Hiſtory of the Expoſicion of the Maſs, and the Twelve Articles of our Faith, which are wanted in the following editions; but it concludes with the life of St. Eraſmus, the holy Biſhop, as they do (148). Beſides another edition of this book, printed by Caxton, the ſame year, as Mr. Richard Smith has reported, in the copy he had thereof in his library (149), there was another printed by (146) Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, fol. p. 98.

(147) Valeſiana, 8vo. Amſterd. 1693.

† Caxton's firſt Pref. to the Golden Legend.

(148) Catal. Bibl. Harleianæ, vol. iii. p. 134.

(149) Idem, p. 12[illegible].

we have to ſay of them may be mentioned apart [P]. The next year, 1484, we meet with no more than a ſingle ſpecimen of his performance, unleſs that mentioned in the laſt by Julyan Notary; who has ſuppreſſed Caxton's name at the end, as his cuſtom was in reprinting his books (150); and afterwards there was another impreſſion made of it by Wynkin de Worde; who at the end thereof ſays, that it hath been diligently amended in divers places, where it was requiſite (151). The reaſon why it was called the Golden Legend, is therein given to be, 'That as gold paſſed 'all other metalls in value, ſo this Legend excelled 'all other books.' Yet an ingenious Spaniard has deſcribed it by a compariſon of it's author to metals of a much inferior value (152), which indeed, in relation to ſeveral of the Monkiſh miracles in it, are more ſuitable thereto. The next he printed this year was,

The boke ſaid or called Cathon, tranſlated out of Frenſshe into Engliſshe, in th Abbaye of Weſtmeſtre 23 of Decembre 1483. It contains Cato's Diſtichs or Precepts in Latin, with a Verſion and Comment in Engliſh. And he tells us, it had been tranſlated out of Latin into Engliſh by Maſter Benet Burgh, late Archdeacon of Colcheſter (153), and High Canon of St. Stephen's at Weſtminſter; but becauſe there had lately fallen into his hands this book in French, which rehearſed many fair inſtructions, he had tranſlated that into Engliſh; which he preſented to the city of London, and moſt gratefully tenders his ſervice thereto; where he calls himſelf a Conjurye, or ſworn citizen of the ſame, of the fraternity and fellowſhip of Mercery; and ſays, he owes of right his ſervice and good-will to it, being in duty naturally bound to aſſiſt and counſel her as far as he can, even as to his mother, of whom he received his nouriture and living; and that he ſhall pray for the proſperity and policy of the ſame during his life.

The laſt we meet with of his, dated this year, is, The booke of Thenſeignementes (154) and Techinge that the Knyght of the Toure made to his daughters, and ſpeketh to many fayre Enſamples. Enprinted at Weſtmiſtre, fol. the laſt day of Janyver, 1 Richard III. This he tranſlated, he ſays, into our maternal Engliſh, at the requeſt of a noble Lady, who had brought forth many fair daughters, for the love ſhe always had towards them, and a deſire to increaſe their knowledge in virtue: wherefore he entreats thoſe who ſhould learn any thing therein, 'By whiche they 'ſhould ben wyſer and better, that they ſhould give 'laud and thankynge to the ſayd Ladyes good 'grace, &c.'

[P] That which we have to ſay of them, may be mentioned apart.] Theſe two books Mr. Lewis mentions as printed by Caxton under the year aforeſaid, 1483, tho' there appears no date into them. The firſt, he names, The Fables of Æſop, Avian, Alphonſus, and Poggius: tranſlated out of Frenſshe into Englyſh, at Weſtmeſtre. 'The leaves of this book, he 'ſays, are numbered, I°. II°. and III°. and it has 'the ſignatures, but not the direction, or catch-'word; nor any date (155).' As we remember not to have met with it, we can ſpeak no more of it. The other is intituled,

The book of the Ordre of Chyvalry or Knyghthode: tranſlated out of the Frenſshe, and imprinted by William Caxton, 4*to.* without date. Mr. Lewis (156) has, by ſome miſtake, inſerted the year 1483, in that part of Caxton's Reherſal, at the end of this book, which he tranſcribes. We remember no other volume of ſo ſmall a ſize of Caxton's printing. It conſiſts of about an hundred pages, and is perhaps one of the ſcarceſt of his performances that are now in being: Tho' no date of the year when it was printed is expreſſed, it may be gueſſed at within a year, over or under, by ſuppoſing it in 1484, from the ſhort reign of that Prince to whom it is inſcribed at the end, as we ſhall ſee. There are large initial letters uſed at the beginning of the chapters, and only one ſort of points which are oblique or ſloping daſhes; there are alſo ſome double or united types, as in his other books; alſo ſignatures, but no catch-words at the bottom of the leaves, nor any numbers at top. It is divided into eight chapters. The I. ſhews how a Knight, who was an Hermit, beſtowed this rule or order of Chivalry upon a ſquire. The II. treats of the original of Chivalry or Knighthood. III. Of the Office of Chivalry. IV. Of the Examination that ought to be made of the Eſquyre, when he enters into the Order. V. In what manner the Squire ought to receive Chivalry. VI. Of the Signefyaunce of the Arms belonging to a Knight. VII. Of the Cuſtoms that appertain to a Knight: and VIII. Of the Honours that ought to be done to a Knight. By all this it will appear how different the Honour, the Profeſſion, and the Qualifications required in Knights anciently were, from thoſe for which they have been created in latter days (157). At the end, we have Caxton's Epilogue or Rehearſal; in which he ſays this tranſlation was made by him at the requeſt of a genteel and noble Squire, according to the copy he delivered him; which book, he ſays, was not fit for ordinary perſons, but only thoſe noble gentlemen, who by their virtue intend to enter into the order of Chivalry; which had not been exerciſed as in ancient times, when the noble acts of the Knights of England were renowned through the univerſe, ſuch as before the days of Chriſt, were Brenius and Belinus; who from Britain, now called England, even to Rome, and beyond, conquered many realms; whoſe noble acts remain in the Hiſtories of the Romans. And ſince the Incarnation, behold, ſays he, that noble King of Britain, King Arthur, with all the brave Knights of the Round Table, whoſe deeds of Chivalry fill ſo many volumes, as is incredible to believe. 'O ye Knyghts 'of Englond! where is the cuſtom and uſage of noble 'Chyvalry, that was uſed in tho dayes? What do you 'now, but go the baynes (*), and playe at dyſe? 'And ſome not well adviſed uſe not honeſt and good 'rule, ageyn all ordre of Knyghthode. Leve this, 'leve it; and rede the noble volumes of Saynt Grael, 'of Lancelot, of Galaad, of Triſtram, of Perſeforeſt, 'of Percyval, of Gawayn, and many mo: there 'ſhalle ye ſee manhode, curtoyſe, and gentleneſs. 'And loke in latter dayes of the noble actes ſyth the 'Conqueſt; as in Kyng Richard's dayes, Cuer dû 'Lyon; Edward I, and the III, and his noble ſones; 'Syre Robert Knolles, Syr John Hawkewode, Sir 'Johan Chaundos, and Syre Gaultier Manuy: rede 'Froiſſart (†). And alſo behold that vyctoryous and 'noble Kynge Harry the Fyfthe, and the Captayns 'under hym; his noble brethren; therle of Salyſbury, Montagu, and many other, whoos names 'ſhyne gloryouſly by their virtuous nobleſſe and actes 'that they did in thonour of thordre of Chyvalry. 'Allas; what do ye, but ſlepe and take eaſe, and ar 'all diſordered fro Chivalry. I wold demaunde a 'queſtion, yf I ſhould not diſpleaſe. How many 'Knightes ben there now in Englond, that have thuſe 'and thexercyce of a Knyght? That is, to wete, 'that he knoweth his hors, and his hors hym? That 'is to ſaye, he beynge redy at a poynt, to have al 'thyng that longeth to a Knyght; an hors, that is 'accordyng, and broken after his hand; his armures 'and harnoys mete and fyttyng, and ſo forth. I 'ſuppoſe, and a due ſerche ſhold be made, ther ſhold 'be many founden that lacke; the more the pyte is. 'I wold it pleaſyd our ſoverayne Lord, that twyes or 'thryes in a yere, or at leſt ones, he wold do cry, 'Juſtes of Pees, to thend that every Knyght ſhold 'have hors and harneys, and alſo the uſe and crafte 'of a Knyght, and alſo to tornoye one ageynſte onee 'or two ageynſt two, and the beſt to have a prys, a 'dyamond or jewel, ſuch as ſhold pleaſe the Prynce. 'This ſhold cauſe gentylmen to reſorte to thauncyent 'cuſtoms of Chyvalry, to grete fame and renowmee; 'and alſo to be alwey redy to ſerve theyr Prynce, 'when he ſhalle calle them, or have nede. Thenne 'late every man that is come of noble blood, and 'entendeth to come to the noble ordre of Chyvalry, 'rede this lytyl book, and doo therafter, in kepyng 'the lore and commaundements therin compryſed; 'and thene I doubte not he ſhall atteyn to thordre of 'Chyvalry, & cetera.' So he preſents the ſaid book to his dread ſovereign Lord King Richard, King of England

(150) The Golden Legend, &c. imprynted by Jul. Notary, fol. 1503

(151) Legenda Aurea, &c. Lond. fol. 1527.

(152) Ludovicus Vives, de Diſciplinis, l. ii. p. 91.

(153) See Newcourt's Repertorium, vol. ii.

(154) Inſtructions.

(155) Life of Caxton, p. 79.

(156) Idem, p. 81.

(157) Britiſh Librarian, p. 191.

* Baths, or Bagnios.

† If Caxton had tranſlated and printed this Hiſtorian, it is preſumed, we ſhould have had a more correct and genuine work, than his French editors have given us; by whom, the Engliſh name is at leaſt, if not the facts, were much corrupted.

laſt note was printed the ſame year. Of this, and three more which we find of his printing the next year, 1485, it may be expected we ſhould give ſome deſcription, as of the reſt [Q]. There has been a Book of Homilies aſcribed to him the ſame year, though it ſeems to be no other than the Liber Feſtivalis before mentioned, which my author has, among other errors, multiplied into two books more (e); and alſo entitles him to another in 1486, from Mr. Bagford, which neither of them we believe ever ſaw (f). It is better atteſted, that in the year following he printed The Book of Good Manners in folio, which was compiled by Jaques le Graunt, an Auguſtine Friar, from the Scriptures, Holy Fathers, &c. It was delivered, as Caxton ſays, to him, by his (e) Directions for keeping the Feaſts, &c. and An Expoſition on the Lord's Prayer, &c. See S. Palmer's Hiſtory of Printing, &c.

(f) A Treatiſe againſt Pride, ib.

England and France, that he may command the ſame to be read to the Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen within his Realm; that the ſaid noble order of Chivalry may be hereafter better practiſed and honoured, than it had been of late times. So praying for his Majeſty's welfare, and after this life, for one everlaſting, he concludes (158).

(158) Rehearſal to the Book of Chyvalry.

[Q] It may be expected we ſhould give ſome deſcription, as of the reſt.] The firſt of theſe four is called, The Ryal book: or book for a King. In which is compriſed, The Ten Commandments: The Twelve Articles of Faith: The Seven deadly Sins: The Seven Petitions of the Pater-Noſter: The Seven Gifts of the Holy Ghoſt: The Seven Virtues, &c. It was compiled, as Caxton ſays, at the requeſt of Philip le Belle of France 1279, and was reduced by himſelf out of French into Engliſh at the requeſt of a ſingular friend, a worſhipful Merchant and Mercer of London, for a ſpecial book, to know all vices and branches thereof, and alſo all virtues; which for the great ſubſtance compriſed therein, ought above all others to be called The Royal book: or book of a King; every man being ſuch, as the Scripture calls him, who can wiſely and perfectly govern himſelf according to virtue: and alſo becauſe it was compoſed at the requeſt of that noble King Philip. It was printed the 2d of Richard III. fol. with figures (159).

(159) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 96, where, by miſtake, he ſays it was printed in the 2d of Ric. II.

The next is intituled, Thyſtorye of the noble, right, valyant, and worthy Knyght, Parys, and of the fayr Vyenne, the Daulphyns Doughter of Vyennoys; the whyche ſuffred many Adverſytees, bycauſe of theyr true Love, or they coude enjoye the Effect thereof of eche other: tranſlated out of Frenſshe into Engliſshe by William Caxton, at Weſtmeſtre, &c. Emprynted, fol. 1485. That Dauphin is here named, Sir Godfrey of Alaunſon, kinſman to Charles, King of France in 1271. The ſtory ends, after all their diſappointments, with the Marriage of that Conſtant Pair. It does not appear, in Dr. Middleton's catalogue of thoſe books printed by Caxton, which are preſerved in the publick library at Cambridge, that there is any copy of it there.

But what was accounted his capital work this year, is a large thick volume, intituled, The Byrth, Lyf, and Actes of King Arthur; of his noble Knyghtes of the Round Table, their marvayllous Enqueſtes and Adventures; th Achyeviyng of the Sang real; and in the end, Le Morte D'Arthur; with the dolorous Deth and Departyng out of thys World of them Al. Whiche book was reduced to the Engliſshe by Syr Thomas Malory, Knyght, and by me (William Caxton) devyded into twenty one bookes; chaptyred, and emprynted, and fynyſhed in th' Abbey Weſtmeſtre, the laſt day of July, the yere of our Lord 1485. Sir Th nas Malory ſeems to have drawn this voluminous romance out of ſeveral manuſcripts, written in the French and Welch tongues, of the ſaid King Arthur and his Knights; and to be converſant in the adventures of ſuch redoubted champions, Caxton thought would inſpire a noble ſpirit of valour in our gentry, which made him recommend it to them, as was before obſerved (160). If this Sir Thomas Malory was a Welchman, as Leland, and others after him aſſert, he was probably a Welch prieſt; as appears not only by the legendary vein which runs through all the ſtories he has thus extracted and wove together, but by his concluſion of the work itſelf, in theſe words: 'Praye for me, whyle I am on 'lyve, that God ſende me good delyveraunce; and 'when I am deed, I praye you all, praye for my 'ſoule; for this booke was ended the 9th yeer of the 'reygne of Kyng Edward the Fourth, by Syr Tho-'mas Maleore, Knyght, as Jeſu helpe him for his 'grete myght, as he is the ſervaunte of Jeſu, bothe 'day and nyght.' As the author has not made his heroes any great commanders of their paſſions in their amours, nor rigorouſly confined them to honour and decorum, in point of fidelity and continence, his book became a great favourite with ſome perſons of the higheſt diſtinction for a long time. It had two or three impreſſions afterwards, and ſeems to have been kept up in print, for the entertainment of the lighter and more inſolid readers, down to the reign of King Charles I. (161), though Mr. Aſcham had long before paſſed ſuch a cenſure upon it, as might have put it out of continuance upon his remembering, at what time, and in what place, it had ſupplanted all others; where he obſerves that, in our forefathers time, when Papiſtry, as a ſtanding pool, covered and overflowed all England, few books were read in our tongue, ſaving certain books of Chivalry, as they ſaid for paſtime and pleaſure; which, as ſome ſay, were made in Monaſteries, by idle Monks, or wanton Canons; as one, for example, MORTE ARTHUR; the whole pleaſure of which book ſtandeth in two ſpecial pointes; in open man-ſlaughter and bold bawdry. In which book, thoſe be counted the nobleſt Knights, that kill moſt men without any quarrel, and commit fouleſt adulteries by ſubtleſt ſhifts; as Sir Lancelot, with the wife of King Arthur, his maſter; Sir Triſtram, with the wife of King Mark, his uncle; Sir Lamerock, with the wife of King Lote, that was his own aunte. This is good ſtuff for wiſe men to laugh at, or honeſt men to take pleaſure in! Yet, ſays he, I know when God's Bible was baniſhed the Court, and MORTE ARTHUR received into the Prince's chamber (162).

(160) Caxton's Book of the Ordre of Chivalry, in the Rehearſal.

(161) One edit. is called The Storye of the moſt noble and worthy Kynge Arthur, &c. folio, emprinted by Thomas Eaſt. Another is, The moſt ancient and famous Hiſt. of the Renowned Arthur, &c. 4to. 1634, &c.

(162) Roger Aſcham's Schole-Maſter: or, a plaine and perfect Way of Teaching children to underſtand, write, and ſpeake the Latin Tonge, &c. 4to, 1571, Book i.

The third book we meet with of Caxton's printing this year, bears the title of Thyſtory and Lyf of the moſt noble and Cryſten Prince, Charles the Grete, Kyng of Fraunce, and Emperour of Rome: reduced out of Frenſshe, by William Caxton, and by him emprinted the firſt day of Decembre, fol. 1485. This work, through it's great ſcarceneſs, has not been ſufficiently deſcribed in the Hiſtories of our firſt printed books. Dr. Middleton, by not mentioning it, implies, that they have it not in the publick library at Cambridge: and Mr. Lewis mentions it in ſuch a curſory manner, as if he had never ſeen it (163). Though it was originally compiled moſtly to the honour of Frenchmen, yet, as our tranſlator obſerves, it is for the profit of every man. Herein, beſides the Hiſtory of Charlemain himſelf, the reader will find that of Richard of Normandy, with the feats of Rowland and Oliver, and ſeveral others of his champions. Much of that vein which was in the ſpiritual inſpirers of Invaſions againſt the Turks, Saracens, and other Miſcreants, as they were called, under the title of the Holy War, appears in this book. It was firſt gathered together by our tranſlator, at the incitement of Henry Bolounyer, Channon of Lauſanne, the whole three parts out of two French books; that is to ſay, The firſt and third part, out of an old authentick book, named (‡), Myrrour Hyſtoryal (a fine copy whereof was in Iſaac Voſſius's library) and the ſecond part out of an old romance; and at the requeſt of ſome ſingular friends, eſpecially Mr. William Daubeny, one of the Treaſurers of King Edward IV. Jewels, tranſlated into Engliſh, and printed as above. Whether that treatiſe of the Actions and Manners of the Emperour Charles, which is ſaid to have been written by Chriſtiana of Piſa before-mentioned in French, and finiſhed on the laſt day of November 1404 (164), was ſerviceable in the compiling of this, we know not, having never ſeen it.

(163) Life of Caxton, p. 97.

(‡) This ſeems to be the ſame work with the Speculum Hiſtoriale of Vincentius Beluacenſis.

(164) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 97.

ſpecial

ſpecial friend, who was a Mercer of London, named William Praat, and tranſlated by him out of Frenſhe, finiſhed the eighth of June, the year laſt mentioned, and emprynted the 11th of May after, 1487. The year after this, we meet not with any books that are expreſsly mentioned to have been printed by him; whether he was interrupted by any ſickneſs, as he was now grown very aged, and probably infirm; or the books he printed this year happen to be loſt; or whether they were ſome of thoſe he printed without dates, we cannot now determine. Indeed Mr. Palmer aſcribes one to him in this year, 1488, but erroneouſly; for it appears not to have been printed till after his death (g). In the year 1489, we meet with two books appropriated to him; an account of which may appear in the note [R]. Two more of his books which bear date the ſucceeding year, are alſo to be met with in the libraries of the curious. The one, a proſaick tranſlation of Virgil, or Hiſtory drawn out of his poem of Æneas; and the other, a book of neceſſary inſtructions or preparations for death; a doctrine he now very wiſely took to the learning of, ſince he was ſo near putting it in practice. Theſe are the two laſt books we have met with of his printing that are dated; and as there are always ſome hiſtorical memorials, or other remarkable particulars, in the proems or poſtſcripts of his other books, that are worthy of preſervation or revival, ſo there are in theſe; which therefore deſerve ſome extract to be made of them, like the reſt [S]. Others have entitled him to

(g) Intituled, Dives and Pauper: a Dialogue on the X Commaundments; empryn edbyRic. Pynſon,fol.1493, and by W. de Worde, 1496, &c.

[R] An account of which may appear in the note referred to.] The firſt of theſe books is intituled, The Doctrine of Sapience. It is a collection of diſcourſes upon moral and divine ſubjects, illuſtrated with examples and parables; and divided into eighty-three chapters. The two laſt whereof are, 'Firſt, The 'Excuſacyon of hym that made thys booke.' And the other, 'The Complaint of hym that made thys 'boke.' In the former of theſe, we find that the ſame was firſt made in the year of our Lord 1388, by the Rev. Father in God, Guy de Roy, Archbiſhop of Sens: but the year after, a religious brother of the Order of Clugny, reading it diligently over, and finding it deficient in examples and authorities, he ſupplied it therewith; preſerving, however, all convenient brevity; becauſe, in matters of devotion, the world was then ſo moderate, as to be ſatisfied with a little, and preferred ſhort maſſes, but long meals. It was tranſlated by Caxton, out of French at Weſtmeſtre, and fynyſhed the 7th of May 1489. One of the authors who have written of Caxton, mentions this as the firſt book he had ſeen with Caxton's cypher printed at the end of it; but it is to be found, as we have obſerved, in ſome, much earlier. If he did not uſe it ſo early as to the book of Cheſs, it might be found taken out of another book, and bound up with it, and ſo anſwer Mr. Palmer's account, that it did appear therein; but it is wanting in many of his books, wherein it was firſt printed, becauſe being printed often on the laſt or ſpare leaf, at the end, it has, as a picture, been torn out by children (165). Not that it is always a proof the book was printed by Caxton, wherein it does appear: for it is well known to thoſe who have been converſant in our firſt printed books, that Wynkin de Worde uſed Caxton's cypher to many books by him printed ſeveral years after Caxton's death, which has occaſioned frequent miſtakes in our catalogues, and multiplied the liſt of Caxton's books, far beyond the number he printed.

(165) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 99.

The other work printed by Mr. Caxton the ſame year is called, The book of the Fayttes of Armes and of Chyvalrye: made and drawen out of ſeveral authors, by Chryſtyne of Pyſe, in Frenſsh: tranſlated into Engliſh, and printed by William Caxton, fol. 1489. This Lady was born at Piſa in Italy; but removing with her father to Bologne in France, ſhe wrote her book in the language of that country, and flouriſhed about the year 1400. In her Prologue to this book, ſhe apologizes for herſelf, to thoſe who would object, that the handling of her diſtaff and ſpinning-wheel might have better become her, than meddling with thoſe warlike ſubjects, according to the example of Minerva; by anſwering, that the invention and even uſe of arms, were owing to that Goddeſs, as well as arts. Her work, divided into four parts, is gathered out of Frontinus, Vegetius, and Tharbre of Bataylles; with many other thynges ſett into the ſame, requiſite to Werre, &c. There are ſome chapters towards the end, treating of that final Trial of Right, &c. by ſingle combat, within the liſts, as it was allowed and ordained by the Imperial and Lombard laws; which have been eſteemed the moſt curious part of the book. What opinion King Henry VII. had of it, may appear by Caxton's own words at the end, where he ſays, 'It 'was delivered to him by that King in his Palais of 'Weſtmeſtre the 23 of January in the 4th year of his 'regne; who deſired and wylled him to tranſlate it 'into Engliſh and put it into print, that every gen-'tleman born to arms, and all manner of men of 'warre, &c. ſhould have knowledg how to behave 'themſelves in feats of war, &c.' Accordingly, the tranſlation was finiſhed the 8th of Juyll the ſaid year, and emprynted the 14 day of Juyll next following, and full finiſhed (166).

(166) Catal. Bibl. Harleianæ, vol. iii. p. 265.

[S] Some extract to be made of them, like the reſt.] The firſt of theſe two books is intituled, The Boke of Eneydos; compyled by Vyrgyle: which hath he tranſlated oute of Latine into Frenſhe, and out of Frenſhe, reduced into Engleyſshe, by me William Caxton, the 22d day of Juyn, the Yere of our Lorde 1490; in a thin folio. This reduction of that epic poem to an hiſtorical narrative in proſe, was then a very acceptable and much approved work, to familiarize ingenious men to the contents thereof, and attract them to a better acquaintance with the original. As to the author, he ſeems to be that perſon, whoſe book in French, upon the ſame ſubject, was printed ſeven years before (167). This work begins ſo high as the building of Troy by Priamus, and is continued, beyond the ſlaughter of Turnus by Æneas, to the ſucceſſion of his ſon Aſcanius, and two or three ſucceſſions beyond. In the ſixth chapter the author has ſome digreſſory animadverſions upon Boccace, for relating the ſtory of Dido, in his Fall of Princes, differently from Virgil; and recites his account, as well as that of his author. And in chapter 33, he paſſes over Æneas's deſcent into hell, becauſe 'tis feign'd, and not to be believ'd; as if ſeveral other parts of this ſtory, which he has repeated, were not as incredible as that. But to paſs to the Tranſlator and Printer; we obſerve his ſtyle to be more ornate, as he terms it, or dreſſed up in ſuperfine words, eſpecially of the French extract, than we believe it would have been, had he not ſubmitted it to ſuch correction as he gratefully owns was done by him. There appear alſo ſome improvements in the printing of this book, beyond what may be obſerved in ſome of thoſe before ſpoken of, by a greater regard to regularity in the page, and not running out, but keeping the lines all even at the end. There are alſo here large initials at the beginning of every chapter, and beſides commas and periods, alſo colons and ſemicolons, or what might be deſigned as ſuch, though not always printed perhaps to anſwer the purpoſe of them (168). Our Tranſlator, in his preface, which is nearly two leaves, informs us, that ſitting in his ſtudy, where lay divers paunflettis and books, this work in French happened to come to hand; in reading whereof, he took great pleaſure, for it's judicious and eloquent ſtyle; for which, as well as the ſubject matter, he thought it would

(167) Livre des Eneides, compilé par Virgyle, tranſlaté de Latin en François, par Guillaume de Roy, Lyon, 1483.

(168) The Britiſh Librarian, p. 127, &c.

to the printing of ſeveral books beyond this year, 1490; but their miſ-reckonings, with the cauſes of them will be made to appear. Indeed, beſides all thoſe books above-mentioned, which are ranged in their annual order, according to the direction of their dates, we find that he printed alſo ſeveral others, which are undated; and therefore they cannot be diſtinctly remitted to the years under which they firſt appeared. Some there are, which neither mention the time when, the place where, nor the perſon's name by whom, they were printed; yet they were probably ſet forth by him, though not after the year aforeſaid, nor all of them, that have been aſcribed to him; becauſe would be very proper for the inſtruction of young Noblemen, as it had long ſince been learned daily in ſchools, eſpecially in Italy and other places; ſo he undertook to tranſlate it. But when he ſaw and conſidered the fine and ſtrange terms to be uſed therein, he doubted whether it would pleaſe ſome gentlemen, who had lately objected, that in his tranſlations he had adopted ſome over-curious terms, which could not be underſtood by the common people, and deſired him to make uſe of old and homely termes in his tranſlations; that is, long-accuſtomed and native, not new-fangled and foreign words; and he wiſhes he could ſatisfy every body; ſo he took an old book and read in it, but he found the Engliſh ſo rude and broad that he could not well underſtand it. And the Lord Abbot of Weſtminſter (†) ſhewed him certain evidences written in old Engliſh, for him to reduce into the then current language, and he found them ſo written, that he ſays they approached nearer Dutch than Engliſh, and he could not make them plainly underſtood. 'And certaynly, ſays he, our langage 'now uſed, varyeth ferre from that which was uſed 'and ſpoken whan I was born; for we Englyſh men 'ben borne under the domynacyon of the mone, 'which is never ſtedfaſte, but ever waverynge; 'wexyng one ſeaſon, and waneth and dyſcreaſeth 'another ſeaſon; and that comyne Englyſhe that is 'ſpoked in one ſhyre varyeth from another. In ſo 'muche, that in my dayes happened, that certaine 'merchauntes were in a ſhip in Tamyſe, for to have 'ſayled over the ſee into Zelande, and for lacke of 'wynde, they taryed atte Forlond, and went to 'lande, for to refreſhe them; and one of them named 'Sheffelde, a Mercer, came into an hows, and axed 'for mete, and ſpecially he axed for eggs, and the 'goode wyf anſwerde, that ſhe coude ſpeke no Frenſhe; 'and the marchaunt was angry, for he alſo coude 'ſpeke no Frenſhe, but wolde have hadde egges, 'and ſhe underſtode hym not. And thenne at laſte 'another ſayd, that he wolde have eyren; then the 'good wyf ſayd, that ſhe underſtod him wel. Loo, 'what ſholde a man in thyſe days wryte, egges, or 'eyren? Certaynly it is harde, to playſe every man, 'by cauſe of diverſite and chaunge of langage. For 'in theſe days, every man, that is in ony reputacyon 'in his countre, will utter his communicacyon and 'matters in ſuch manners and termes, that fewe men 'ſhall underſtonde them; and ſom honeſt and grete 'Clerkes have ben wyth me, and deſired me to 'wryte the moſte curyous termes that I coude fynde: 'and thus, bytween playn, rude, and curious I ſtand 'abaſhed. But in my judgmente, the comyn termes 'that be dayli uſed ben lyghter to be underſtonde 'than the old auncyent Englyſhe. And for as moche 'as this preſent booke is not for a rude uplondyſh 'man to labour therin, ne rede it, but only a Clerk 'and a noble gentleman, that feleth and underſtondeth in faytes of armes, in love, and in noble 'Chyvalry; therfor in meane bytwene bothe, I have 'reduced and tranſlated this ſayd booke into our 'Englyſhe; not over-rude, ne curyous; but in ſuch 'termes as ſhall be underſtanden, by Goddys grace 'accordyng to my copye. And yf ony man wyll 'entermete in redyng of hit, and fyndeth ſuche termes 'that he cannot underſtande, late hym goo rede and 'lerne Vyrgyll, or the Pyſtles of Ovyde; and ther 'he ſhall ſee, and underſtande lightly all, yf he have 'a good redar and enformer; for this booke is not 'for every rude and unconnynge man to ſee, but 'Clerkys and very gentylmen that underſtands gentylnes and ſcyence. Then I praye alle them that 'ſhall rede in this lytyl treatys, to holde me for excuſed for the tranſlatynge of hit; for I knowleche 'my ſelfe ignorant of connynge to empryſe on me ſo 'hie and noble a worke. But I praye Mayſter John 'Skelton, late created Poete Laureate in the Unyverſite of Oxenforde, to overſee and correcte thys ſayd 'booke; and taddreſſe and expowne where as ſhall 'be founde faulte, to thym that ſhall requyre it: for 'hym I knowe for ſuffycyent to expowne and Englyſhe every difficulte that is therein: for he hath 'late tranſlated the Epyſtles of Tulle, and the booke 'of Dyodorus Syculus (†), and dyverſe other workes 'oute Latyn into Engliſhe, not in rude and olde langage, but in polyſhed and ornate termes craftely; 'as he that hath redde Vyrgyle, Ovyde, Tullye, 'and all the other Poets, and Oratours, to me unknowen: and alſo he hath redde the ix Muſes, and 'underſtands their muſicalle Scyences, and to whom 'of them eche Scyence is appropred: I ſuppoſe he 'hath dronken of Elycon's Well. Then I praye hym, 'and ſuch other, to correcte, adde, or mynyſhe, 'whereas he, or they, ſhall fynde faulte; for I have 'but folowed my copye in Frenſhe, as nygh as me is 'poſſible. And yf ony worde be ſayd therein well, 'I am glad; and yf otherwyſe, I ſubmytte my ſayd 'boke to theyr correctyon; which boke I preſente 'unto the hye born my tocomynge naturell and 'ſoverayne Lord Arthur, by the Grace of God, 'Prynce of Walys, Duc of Cornewayll, and Erle of 'Cheſter, fyrſt begoten ſone and heyer unto our moſt 'dradde, naturall, and ſoverayn Lorde, and moſt 'Cryſten Kynge Henry the VII. by the Grace of 'God, Lorde Kynge of Englonde, and of Fraunce, 'and Lorde of Ireland; byſeching his noble Grace 'to recyve it in thanke of me his moſt humble ſubget and ſervaunte: and I ſhall praye unto Almighty 'God for his proſperous encreaſyng in vertue, wyſdom, and humanyte; that he may be egal with the 'moſt renouned of alle his noble progenytours; and 'ſo to lyve in this preſent lyf, that after this tranſitorye lyf, he, and we all, may come to everlaſtynge lyf in heaven; Amen.' We read in Mr. Lewis, That the bright and accurate author of the Dunciad tells us, 'Caxton tranſlated into proſe Virgil's Æneis as an Hiſtory; and that he ſpeaks of it 'in a very ſingular manner, as of a book hardly 'known.' But this cenſure, ſays my author, is confuted by the very copy of Caxton's Preface to this book, which even this ingenious writer has printed in his Appendix. So he extracts ſome particulars before recited; and concludes, with, How eaſy a matter is it to make dunces at this rate (169)!

(†) This was Dr. Thomas Milling, as was before obſerved, (and not John Iſlip) who ſhewed him theſe old Saxon Deeds.

(†) A MS. of his Tranſlation of this author, if not the other, is ſtill in being.

(169) Life of Caxton, p. 149.

The other book he ſet forth the ſame year is called A Lityll Treatiſe, ſhorte and abredged, ſpekynge of the arte and crafte to knowe well to Dye: tranſlated oute of Frenſhe into Englyſhe, by William Caxton, the xv day of Juyn, and printed by him, folio, 1490. This important ſubject, of ſuch univerſal concern, was prudently undertaken by Mr. Caxton at the age he was now advanced to, and under the decay he now perhaps felt approaching, which put an end to his laudable labours when he was about a twelvemonth older. It is the more to be regarded, in that he choſe, by this work to ſet himſelf the example of that doctrine which is therein recommended. It is divided into ſix parts; treating Of the Praiſe of Death, and how we ought to die gladly; Of the Temptations we are under at the Point of Death; Of the Queſtions that ought to be made at that Time; Of the Inſtructions that ought to be given; Of the remembrance of God's Dooings and Sufferings for us; and Of certain devout Prayers that ought to be ſaid by, or for, the dying Perſon. From all theſe articles it may evidently appear, as the author concludes, That to every perſon who would die well, it is neceſſary that he learn to die, before death comes, and prevents him (170).

(170) Catal. Bibl. Harleianæ, vol. iii. p. 129.

both

both his type and his cypher, having been ſometimes uſed by his ſucceſſor, as hath been obſerved, have miſguided ſome, as an erroneous opinion that he lived three or four years longer than he did, has others, to father performances upon him in which he could have no hand. Of all theſe undated books we ſhall make the cleareſt diſtinction we can, and ſpeak in the beſt order our intelligence has enabled us, under one more head or diviſion [T]; and then, all that remains farther to be obſerved is, that though he

[T] And ſpeak in the beſt order our intelligence has enabled us, under one more head or diviſion] And firſt of thoſe which are thought to have been among ſome of his earlieſt productions. Among theſe, as he had a ſingular reſpect for Chaucer, ſo after he had it in his power to extend his renown, by the publication of his works, he ſeems to have no longer deferred this juſtice to them, than he could procure the manuſcripts that would inſpire him to pay it. From thence he printed, I. Boecius de Conſolatione Philoſophie, in folio, without date, or place where printed; without capital initials to the chapters, ſignatures, catch-words at bottom, or numbering of pages at top. In his poſtſcript at the end, he ſays, that foraſmuch as the ſtyle is difficult to be underſtood by ſimple perſons; 'Therefore, the worſhipful Fader and firſt 'foundeur and enbeliſsher of ornate eloquence in our 'Engliſsh; I mene Maiſter Geffery Chaucer hath 'tranſlated this ſayd worke oute of Latyn, into oure 'uſual and moder tonge; folowyng the Latyn as 'neygh as is poſſible to be underſtande; wherein, 'in myne oppynyon, he hath deſervid a perpetuell 'lawde and thanke of all this noble Royame of 'Englond; and in eſpeciall of them that ſhall rede 'and underſtande it.' Then he tells us farther, that becauſe this tranſlation was not diſperſed, nor known; 'atte the requeſte, ſays he, of a ſinguler friende and 'goſſib of myne, I William Caxton have done my 'debuoir and payne tenprynte it, in form, as is here 'afore made, in hopyng that it ſhal prouffit moche 'peple, to the wele and helth of their ſoules, and 'for to lerne to have and kepe the better pacience in 'adverſitees. And furthermore, I deſir and require 'you, that of your charite ye wold praye for the 'ſoule of the ſayd worſhipful man, Geffery Chaucer, 'firſt tranſlatour of this ſayde boke into Engliſsh, 'and embeliſsher, in making the ſayd language 'ornate and fayr, which ſhal endure perpetuelly, 'and therefore he ought eternally to be remembrid; 'of whom the body and corps lieth buried in 'th Abbay of Weſtmeſtre beſide London to fore the 'chapele of Seynte Benet, by whos ſepulture is 'wreton on a table hangyng on a pylere, his epita-'phye maad by a Poete Laureat, whereof the copye 'foloweth, &c.' This epitaph, conſiſting of thirty-four lines in Latin, was compoſed by Stephen Surigon, Poet-Laureate of Milan, at the coſt and inſtance of Mr. Caxton; and may be ſeen in ſeveral editions of Chaucer's works (171). It is not improbable, but Chaucer himſelf was under ſome ſuch tribulation, when he tranſlated this book, as the author was, when he wrote it: but of that, we have no room to expatiate here. Another part of the ſame author, Caxton alſo printed, as we are informed, which was II. A Collection of Chaucers and Lydgates Poems, quarto. This book is without any ſignatures, date, or name of place, or printer, and contains fourteen pieces of theirs and John Skogan's writing, as they are enumerated by Mr. Lewis (172). That this collection was of Caxton's printing, we cannot affirm, having never ſeen it. But others of Chaucer's works are well known to have been firſt ſet forth by him, as III. The Canterbury Tales; tho' it doth not appear, that any of our Typographical Hiſtorians have ſeen a perfect copy of his edition, becauſe they have quoted nothing from the proem, or epilogue of it. That which we have ſeen in the Harleian library was imperfect; ſo is another that Mr. Samuel Pepys was poſſeſſed of, which is preſerved with his other books, in Magdalen College, Cambridge. The contents thereof were tranſmitted by Dr. Daniel Waterland, then Maſter of the ſaid college, to my author, when he was writing upon this ſubject, and he has printed the ſame (173); wherein it appears, that the number of Prologues and Tales in the ſaid copy amounts to fifty; beſides, as it ſeems, Chaucer's tract of Repentance or Retractation for writing his Parſon's Tale; which, in ſome following editions, was rejected as ſpurious, and an impoſition upon his name, contrived by ſome of the Prieſts, in revenge for his having expoſed them. We have been informed, that Caxton publiſhed two editions of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales *; but ſome have obſerved, that he could not get ſuch complete copies as have ſince been diſcovered, and that therefore his editions have fallen into ſuch neglect and decay. We have ſeen ſome other little pieces of Chaucer's that were alſo printed by him, as IV. His Troylus and Creſeyde, folio, without date; and V. The Book of Fame, made by Geferey Chaucer, emprinted by Wylliam Caxton, fol. without date. This poem is in three books, and towards the end of the ſecond, there is, in a note written upon the margin of the copy that was in the Harleian library, in a modern hand, theſe words, 'Here all other editions are imperfect; and there 'are ſome lines in others which are not here, and 'therefore are to be ſuſpected.' Caxton, at the concluſion of this work, has given a great encomium of Chaucer (174). Theſe two pieces are printed in a leſs character than the edition before-mentioned of the Canterbury Tales, which we have ſeen; but it might be of the ſame ſize with that of the other edition that is ſpoken of; and ſo Caxton might by degrees, as he could meet with the manuſcripts, deſign a compleat and uniform edition of Chaucer; but we think he never did proceed much farther towards the ſame, than what we have ſpoken of. But to the other Poet lately mentioned with him, we have ſeen entitled, VI. The Lyf of our moſt bleſſyd Lady, Mayde, Wyf, and Moder of our Lord Jheſu Cryſt: Compyled by Dan John Lydgate, Monke of Burye, at the Excitation and Styryng of the Noble and Victoryous Prince, King Harry the fyfthe. Empryntyd by Wyllyam Caxton. Folio, without date. This is a poem, divided into eighty-two chapters, three of which are concerning the Virgin's Midwives; and therein are to be found, which is more than every body knows, the names of them. In the concluſion we have ſome of Maſter Caxton's poetry, with two ballads, as he calls them, in Latin and Engliſh (175). There is another work of the ſame author printed alſo by him under the title of VII. The Laberous and moſt Merveylous Werkes of Sapience; a thin folio, without date. Though neither the Author's nor Printer's name appears to this poem, it was viſibly enough printed by Caxton and compoſed by Lydgate, had we not the authority of John Stow for it, in the catalogue of his writings. The author tells us it was written at the command of his Sovereign, perhaps King Henry V. and it ſeems to be one of the ſcarceſt of his pieces extant. It is not mentioned, as we remember, by any writer who has undertaken to enumerate Caxton's works. There ſeems to be more invention in it, and variety of matter, than in moſt other of his compoſitions; diſplaying, after a copious debate between Mercy and Truth, Juſtice and Peace, a diſtinct ſurvey throughout the palace and domains of Sapience, of all the products of Nature, Arts, and Sciences, in ſeveral chapters; with his farther reference at the end of each, to the authors who have written upon them (176). We have alſo VIII. his book named, Speculum Vitæ Chriſti: or, The Myrrour of the bleſſyd Lyf of Cryſte: Compiled from the Latin Booke of Dr. Bonaventure, De Meditacione Vite Jheſu Criſti. Together with a ſhorte Treatyce of the hyheſt and moſt worthy Sacramente of Cryſtes bleſſid Body, and the Merveylles thereof, &c. folio. Imprinted by William Caxton, without date. This book is divided into ſeven parts, according to the ſeven days of the week; and in the Latin Proem before it we are informed, that whatever is tranſlated therein from the work aſcribed to Bonaventure, is diſtinguiſhed in the margin by a B, and all the reſt, which is interlaced by the

* One of theſe editions might be only ſuperviſed or corrected by Caxton: for Richard Pynſon, in the Proheme to his edition of the Tales, ſtyling Caxton his worſhipful Maſter, ſays, that 'This 'boke had bin di-'ligently ovirſene, 'and duely exa-'mined by his 'Politike Reaſon, 'and Overſight.'

(171) As that printed by Thomas Godfray, fol. 1532; and that by Geo. Biſhop, fol. 1602, &c.

(172) Life of Caxton, p. 104.

(173) Idem, 105, &c.

(174) Catal. Bibl. Harleianæ, vol. iii. p. 242.

(175) Id. p. 122.

(176) Ib. p. 229.

he printed no more books, yet had he ſuch a ſhare of health, or at leaſt ſuch ſtrength of intellects, in the advanced years he was now arrived at, that he kept preparing copy for the Tranſlator, is ſignified by an N. It is farther ſaid in that Proem, that, about the year 1410, the Compiler preſented the ſaid tranſlation and additions, to Archbiſhop Arundell, for his inſpection and examination, before it was publiſhed; who ſingularly approved of it, and exerted his Metropolitan authority in recommending it to the publick, for the edification of the Faithful, and the confutation of the Lollards. It is adorned with many wooden cuts; and the firſt of them, printed before the ſaid Proem, repreſents the Tranſlator preſenting his book to the ſaid Archbiſhop of Canterbury (177). The reaſon given for the title of this book, as Mr. Lewis obſerves, or it's being called The Myrrour of the bleſſyd Lyf of Jheſu Criſte, is becauſe the Life of Chriſt may not be fully deſcribed, as the Lives of other Saints, but in a manner of likeneſs; as the image of a man's face is ſhewed in the Myrror, or looking-glaſs (178). The next that occurs, is IX. Three Eccleſiaſtical pieces in Latin, intituled, Directorium Sacerdotum: ſive Ordinale Secundum Uſum Sarum; una cum Defenſorio ejuſdem Directorii: Item Tractatus qui dicitur Crede Michi, fol. without date. To this book is prefixed a Calendar; at the end of which is Caxton's cypher; and in the Prologue that follows, it appears, that the ſaid Ordinal was written by Clement Maydeſtone, Prieſt, the ſame, we take it, who was a learned Carmelite, and wrote the Hiſtory of Archbiſhop Scroop's Martyrdom (179), beſides other things. At the end of the Defenſorium Directorii, there is a colophon, expreſſing, That Directory and Defence of it to have been printed by William Caxton at Weſtminſter near London. After which follows the Crede Mihi, which was ſo named, becauſe it might be depended upon, as the true and approved form or rule of the church of Sarum (180). Theſe three are ſaid to be the only tracts we have of Caxton's printing in Latin; though there is a good deal of Latin text mixed with ſeveral of the tranſlations he publiſhed; as Cato, Boëtius, and two or three more; which are proofs ſufficient that he did not confine himſelf only to the printing of Engliſh books. X. The Chaſtyſing of Goddes Chyldren, a book prouffytable for manne's ſoule, and ryght comfortable to the body; and ſpecially in adverſite, fol. without date (†), or any appearance of the Printer, farther than by Caxton's cypher. There is a copy of it in Secretary Pepys's library. XI. A Booke compoſed of dyvers Goſtley Matters; of which the firſt is named Orologium Sapiencie: ſhewing ſeven points of true love of everlaſting wiſdom. At Weſtmiſtre, folio. This name was given it, becauſe the ſubject of it was communicated to the author in a viſion, under the figure of a fair Orloge adorned with roſes, and cymbals ſweetly ſounding. There is beſides in this book, 2. The Twelve Prouffytes of Tribulacion, and 3. The Holy Rule of Saynt Benet. Printed alſo at Weſtmiſtre, at the deſire of certain worſhipful perſons, perhaps rather at Caxton's preſs than by him, as the Latin lines by my author quoted ſeem to imply (181). XII. The Curiale of Alayn Charetier, tranſlated out of French into Engliſh, and printed in a very thin folio, by W. Caxton, without date. This is the copy of a letter Charetier wrote to his brother, who deſired to come and live at Court (182). Charetier was a famous French Poet and Hiſtorian, and Secretary to Charles VI. and VII. Kings of France. He was a great refiner of the French language, and died in 1458 (183). By which it may be computed, that his poem called La Belle Dame ſans Mercy, could never be tranſlated by Chaucer, though an old tranſlation of it is printed in his works. XIII. The Lyf of the Holy and bleſſyd Vyrgyn Saynt Wenefryde. It is a very thin folio, of fifteen leaves only, without date; but, at the end of the Life is this colophon, 'Thus endeth the Decollacion, the Lyf after, and the Tranſlacion of Saynte Wenefrede Virgyn and Martir, whiche was reyſed, after that her Hede had been ſmyton of the ſpace of 15 Yere; reduced into Engliſh by me William Caxton.' Then follow the Offices of the Popiſh Church, in Latin, upon the day of her paſſion, her tranſlation, &c. (184). Whether this is a tranſlation of that religious Romance from the Epitome of her Legend in Friar Capgrave, or from his original, written more at large by Robert Prior of Shrewſbury, we have not leiſure to examine: but from a copy of this Prior's Life of her, there was an Engliſh tranſlation publiſhed above an hundred years ſince (185), which being reprinted towards the latter end of Queen Anne's reign, with additions, by it's Popiſh editor, of ſeveral miraculous cures performed at Winifred's Well in Wales, there was another impreſſion given of it the next year by Dr. William Fleetwood, then Biſhop of St. Aſaph, with ſuch learned and judicious notes annexed thereto (186), as may ſerve to reduce the zeal of her Pilgrims to a due temper, and correct the jeſuitical doſe of miracles, to the ſatisfaction of all readers, having either affection for the reaſonableneſs of our Eſtabliſhed Faith, or averſion for the dotages of Popery.

There are ſtill ſome other books, which have been thruſt into the liſts of Caxton's Works, which we have met with no certainty that he ever printed: ſuch as, 1. The Siege of Rhodes, in proſe; written, and dedicated to King Edward IV. by John Kay his humble Poet Laureat. 2. The Spouſage of a Virgin. 3. The Book of Arts and Sciences. 4. De Fide & Cantu Famule ſue. 5. The goody Narration, how St. Auguſtine, the Apoſtle of England, raiſed two dead bodies at Long-Compton: Collected out of divers authors; tranſlated by Jhon Lidgate Monk of Bury. This ridiculous miracle is pretended to have been performed upon the corps of a patron of the church there, who had been excommunicated an hundred and ſeventy years before, and on the corps of the Prieſt who had ſo expelled, to confront him, becauſe he had refuſed to pay the ſaid Prieſt his tythes (187). Of this fiction, which betrays its own inconſiſtency with the age it pretends to concern, there is alſo a MS. in the Cottonian Library; and ſuch a tract, with the aforeſaid title, was printed in quarto about the year 1525, but no body has produced, or pretended to hear of one, printed ſo early as Caxton's time. There has been likewiſe 6. The Life of St. Edward the Confeſſor, aſcribed to him in Mr. Bagford's Catalogue of his Works, which is all the authority others alſo ſeem to have had for repeating it in theirs. Some books he might print no farther than in part, and leave them unfiniſhed, which might be compleated by his ſucceſſor; others he might recommend, or leave in charge, to be printed after his death. Hence, perhaps, we may ſome how account for that different expreſſion at the end of ſome books which are reputed his, Caxton me fieri fecit. In one of theſe caſes, the leaving of a book behind him, which he had not quite printed, or compoſed at the preſs, we are told there is an example in 7. The Lyff of that gloryous Vyrgyn and Martyr Saynt Katheryn off Sene: With the Revelations of Saynt Elyſabeth, the Kynges Daughter of Hungarye. Emprynted at Weſtemyſtre, by Wynkyn de Worde; fol. without date. It is thought that Caxton tranſlated this book, and printed the greateſt part of it; being viſibly with his type, all but the laſt page, and two or three leaves beſides in the book, which are ſaid to be printed with Wynkin's letter; if the difference in that book which occaſioned this obſervation, was not owing to the taking ſome leaves out of one impreſſion to compleat the ſaid copy, which might be of another. As for Caxton's cypher at the end of it, it has been ſaid before, that Wynkin uſed it to ſeveral books he printed entirely himſelf after Caxton's death; yet perhaps with ſome regard or diſtinction to ſuch only, as Caxton might have ſome hand in, deſign of printing, or deſire to have printed. That remarkable Legend was compiled by Fryar Reymond, of the Order of St. Domynic, Doctor of Divinty, and Confeſſor to this Holy Virgin. He ſays the truth of what is here written may be proved by the writings of her Confeſſors, and alſo the witneſſes he propoſes to cite at the end of each chapter; and they were doubtleſs thought needful; here being many miracles faſtened upon her, as well after, as before her death, which happened

(177) Id. p. 122.

(178) Life of Caxton, p. 110.

(179) H. Wharton's Anglia Sacra, vol. ii. p. 369, &c.

(180) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 111.

(†) The only edition we have ſeen, with other tracts annexed, was printed in a thin folio by Wynkin de Worde, 1493. Vide Catal. Bibl. Harleian. vol. iii. p. 125.

(181) Lewis's Life of Caxton, p. 112, &c.

(182) Catal. Bibl. Harl. vol. iii. p. 122.

(183) Vid. Oudini Com. de Script. Eccleſ. & Baillet Jugemens des Savans, edit. Amſterd. 4to. tom. iv. p. 10.

(184) Cat. Bibl. Harl. vol. iii. p. 29.

(185) The admirable Life of Saint Wenefride, Virgin, Martyr, Abbeſs, and Patroneſs of Wales, by J. F. with a copper print of her Well, and herſelf kneeling before a crucifix, Permiſſ. Superior. 8vo. 1635.

(186) The Life and Miracles of St. Wenefrede, together with her Litanies, with ſome Hiſtorical Obſervations made thereon, 8vo. 1713.

(187) Selden's Hiſt of Tythes, edit. 4to. 1618, cap. ix, x. Alſo Sir W. Dugdale's Hiſt. & Antiq. of Warwickſhire. Dr. Prideaux's Origin of Tythes, p. 165; and Biſhop Kennet's Paroch. Antiq.

for the preſs to the very laſt. And indeed, that a man ſhould, for twenty years together, after age had crept over, and begun to make impreſſions upon him, when others happened on the twenty-ſixth of April, 1380. As for St. Elizabeth, who ended her life in 1261, ſhe declared ſhe had ſo great certainty of all her Revelations, that 'She wolde rather ſuffree Deth, thenne 'doubte ony lytyll part of theim, that they were not 'trewe (188).' As for St. Katherine, the ſaid Wynkin alſo printed afterwards a book of her Revelations, in which ſhe is called the New Seraphical Spouſe of Chriſt, and ſhe concludes her work with begging of him 'That ſhe may renne in the deedly 'way, with the lyghte of Holy Faythe; with the 'whiche lyghte me ſeemeth, thou haſe made me now 'lately, Ghoſtley Drunke (189).' The work is ſaid to have been written as ſhe indited, in her mother tongue, was tranſlated into Engliſh by Dane James, and printed at the coſt of Richard Sutton, Eſq; Steward of the monaſtery of Syon. The copy, whence theſe obſervations were made on it, had belonged to the Lady Elizabeth Strickland, a ſiſter of that monaſtery, and is ſtill in being. The laſt book we ſhall take notice of that has been aſcribed to Maſter Caxton, is intituled, 8. Vitas Patrum: The right Devoute, meche lowable, and recommendable Lyff of the ould ancyent holy Faders Hermytes; late tranſlated out of Latyn into Frenſhe, and diligently corrected in the City of Lyon, the Yere of our Lord 1486, upon that which hath be wryten, and alſo tranſlated out of Greke into Latyn, by the bleſſyd and holy Saynt, Saynt Jerom &c. and other ſolytary relygyous Perſones after hym; and after, in the Yere of our Lorde 1491 reduced into Englyſhe; following the Copy, alwaye under Correccyon of Doctors of the Chirche. Emprynted in Weſtmynſtre by Wynken de Worde, folio, with ſeveral wooden cuts, 1495. The ſaid Wynkin, in his colophon at the end of theſe Lives of the Hermits, or Holy Faders lywynge in Deſerte, informs us, it was tranſlated out of Frenſhe into Englyſhe by Wyllyam Caxton of Weſtmynſtre, late deed, and that he fynyſhed it at the laſte Daye of his Lyff. Had theſe particulars been duly regarded, they might have prevented thoſe errors, which have been the conſequence of ſtretching his life two or three years beyond that in which he died. There have been other miſtakes made about this book, as if it were only a different edition of the Golden Legend before mentioned. But it is indeed a different book from any already ſpoken of, and may properly enough be admitted into the Catalogue of Caxton's Works, in his character as a Tranſlator, though not as the Printer thereof (190).

(188) Catal. Bibl. Harleianæ, vol. iii. p. 125.

(189) The Orcharde of Syon, in whiche is contayned the Revelacyons of Seynt Katherine of Sene; with ghoſtly Fruytes and precyous Plants for the Helthe of Mannes Soule. Imprynted at London by Wynkyn de Worde, fol. 1519.

(190) Catal. Bibl. Harleianæ, vol. iii. p. 127.

This is all we have here to ſay of Caxton's Works in particular: ſome more pieces there are, that we might be thought tedious to ſpeak any farther of, which have, in certain Catalogues, been attributed to him; wherein through ignorance, or craft to advance their value, his name is often joined to old black-lettered books, which he did neither tranſlate or print; as others, which he did, may have been loſt, before their antiquity rendered them rarities, and deſirable to be preſerved in the libraries of the curious. His judgment in the choice of thoſe authors or arguments upon which he did beſtow his time and labour, is rarely to be called in queſtion; becauſe, as we have often obſerved, the ſubjects were commonly pitched upon, and he enjoined and encouraged by others, perſons of the higheſt rank and authority to ſet them forth. As for the choice or form of his type or letter, his, like that of the other firſt Printers, muſt have been taken from the moſt eſtabliſhed, and beſt known writing then in uſe; for had they uſed any new-invented character, men muſt have gone to ſchool again to have read it. As for other diſtinctions, in the mechaniſm of his work, or his improvements in the art of Printing, than we have incidentally ſpoken of, we ſhall refer our readers to Mr. Palmer's remarks, who was a good judge, being a good Printer himſelf; and to the obſervations that may be made by an attentive inſpection of Caxton's own books for that purpoſe. If any aſk, How it came to paſs that he printed none of the Greek or Roman Claſſicks? we may anſwer, by another queſtion, How came it that none of them were printed in thoſe days at either of the Universities? why, it was not the taſte of that age; it was not the reading in faſhion: no, the Heathen and Profane examples in thoſe old Greek and Roman Poets and Hiſtorians, were not ſo reliſhable to Mother Church, as Ordinals, Confeſſionals, and ſuch books as would inſpire pious contributions, and enlarge eccleſiaſtical revenues; or ſuch as would inſtruct them in Holy Knight Errantry, in Pilgrimages or Sainterings to the Holy Land, or the brave attempts of Military Chriſtianity, to raviſh it out of the hands of it's Miſcreant Poſſeſſors by Holy Wars. As for his not printing any of the Engliſh tranſlations of the Old or New Teſtament, as Treviſa's, and others that there were, beſides Wycliff's in his time, as well as ſome more early and leſs liable to objection; the danger of ſuch an undertaking may appear in the words of Sir Thomas More, where he ſays, 'That 'on account of the penalties ordered by Archbiſhop 'Arundel's Conſtitution' (which were the ſame with thoſe of being the Fautors of Hereſy, viz. the greater excommunication and death (191) 'though the old 'tranſlations that were before Wycliff's days re-'mayned lawful, and were in ſome folkis handys had 'and red, yet he thought no Prynter would lyghtly 'be ſo hote to put any Byble in prent at hys own 'charge, and then hange upon a doubtfull tryall, 'whyther the firſt copye of hys tranſlacyon was made 'before Wycliff's dayes, or ſynnis: for yff yt were 'made ſynnys, yt muſt be approved byfore the prynt-'yng.' But ſuch an approbation, my author intimates, was not then to be obtained (192). In ſhort, how much this new ART of PRINTING alarmed the Prelacy, and how much they feared it would uncloke the myſteries in which they had involved religion, and thus produce the Reformation which enſued, cannot better appear than in a letter of Cardinal Wolſey's to the Pope, where he ſays, That his Holineſs could not be ignorant what divers effects the new invention of Printing had produced; for as it had brought in, and reſtored books and learning, ſo together it had been the occaſion of thoſe ſects and ſchiſms which daily appeared in the world, but chiefly in Germany; where men begin now to call in queſtion the preſent faith and tenets of the Church, and to examine how far religion is departed from it's primitive inſtitution. And that which was particularly to be moſt lamented, they had exhorted lay and ordinary men to read the Scriptures, and to pray in their Vulgar Tonge. That if this were ſuffered, beſides all other dangers, the common people at laſt might come to believe, that there was not ſo much uſe of the Clergy: for if men were perſuaded once, they could make their own way to God, and that the prayers in their native and ordinary language, might pierce Heaven as well as in Latin; How much would the authority of the Maſs fall? How prejudicial might this prove to all Eccleſiaſtical Orders (193)? However, Mr. Caxton cannot be charged with any deſign, in eſtabliſhing the Art among us, but what was very laudable. He had no thought of diſturbing the faith, or tenets of the Church: He made choice of ſuch books to print, as had a tendency to promote religion, and encourage virtue and good manners; or 'Books, in which he 'found many good enſeignmentis, and learnynges, 'and good enſamples for all maner of peple in gene-'rally: ſpecial books to know all vyces and braunchis 'of them, and alſo al vertues,' as he expreſſes it in his own ancient phraſe; for the frequent and neceſſary uſe whereof, throughout this account of his Life, we may be allowed the ſame apology as was made by one of our late learned Antiquaries upon the like occaſion (194), who hopes the extracts he has made will not be diſreliſhed, becauſe they have been inſerted in their primitive ſpellings and obſolete terms; which he dares own are, like the precious ruſt and canker upon antique coins and medals, the moſt convincing marks both of their antiquity and genuineneſs. O.

(191) Lyndewood's Provinciale.

(192) Sir Thomas More's Dyalogues, fol. edit. 1529, p. 49, col. 1.

(193) Liberty of Conſcience, the Magiſtrates Intereſt, &c. 4to. 1668, p. 21; from Lord Herbert's Hiſtory of King Henry VIII.

(194) Mr. Anſtis, in his Order of the Garter.

 [Though it cannot be denied that the arguments alledged, in note [E], againſt the ſtory of Corſellis's having been a printer at Oxford, ſo early as others naturally covet a ceſſation from labour, eſpecially of the brain; that he ſhould ſtill, after he had given between fifty and threeſcore teſtimonies of his indefatigable diligence, as the year 1468, are extremely forcible, we have ſeen, nevertheleſs, under the article of Richard Atkyns, that ſome things in favour of Atkyns's narration, have lately been ſuggeſted by Mr. Meerman and Mr. Bowyer. Whether the ſuggeſtions of theſe gentlemen are ſufficient to confirm the fact, may, however, juſtly be doubted. But ſhould it be granted that Corſellis exerciſed the art of printing in England at the time ſpecified, yet, ſince he only produced a ſingle book, which book muſt have been executed with ſeparate cut types in wood; and ſince, even according to Atkyns's relation, Caxton was one of the perſons principally concerned in bringing Corſellis over to this country; very little can, at any rate, be detracted from Caxton's glory. He it was who, by the uſe of fuſile types, here firſt carried the art to perfection, and who, by the number and variety of his works, gave full eſtabliſhment to this admirable invention. We have not, therefore, thought ourſelves authoriſed to change the language of our learned and laborious predeceſſor, in the beginning of the article.

With regard to the origin of the game of Cheſs, and the books upon it, mentioned in note [F], we may obſerve, that the moſt curious and learned diſquiſition concerning that and other games, which this country has produced, is to be found in Dr. Thomas Hyde's Opuſcula, a valuable edition of which hath appeared, within theſe few years, from the Clarendon preſs, under the inſpection of the late Dr. Gregory Sharpe, Maſter of the Temple. From Dr. Hyde's work, which is loaded with quotations from the Oriental languages, a perſon of leiſure and judgment might draw up ſuch an account of the games he hath treated upon, as would be of general uſe and entertainment. Caxton did not know that the French book, from which his "Game and Play of the "Cheſſe" was taken, was tranſlated from the Latin (195).

(195) Warton's Hiſtory of Poetry, vol. ii. p. 41.

As to what is ſaid, in note [L], concerning Juliana Barnes, or Berners, as ſhe was more properly called, we refer to our article upon that lady (196). Mr. Ballard and Mr. Thomas Warton have no doubt of her exiſtence; and the latter ingenious gentleman hath ſhewn, that, conſidering the manners of the times, there is nothing ſo extraordinary, as might otherwiſe be imagined, in an Abbeſs's writing a Treatiſe of Hawking and Hunting (197).

(196) Biog. Brit. vol. ii. p. 274, 2d edition.

(197) Idem ibid. Hiſt. of Poetry, ubi ſupra, p. 171, 172.

To the account of John Tiptoft, Earl of Worceſter, in note [M], as well as of Anthony Wydeville, Earl of Rivers, in the notes [H] and [I], many particulars might be added; but theſe two illuſtrious noblemen will deſerve to be treated of in diſtinct articles.

Mr. Tyrwhit hath very juſtly applauded the ingenuous temper which Caxton ſhewed with reſpect to his editions of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. It was to his honour that he choſe to make theſe Tales one of the earlieſt productions of his preſs; for Mr. Ames ſuppoſes that he firſt printed them in the year 1475 or 1476. The manuſcript, however, from which they were taken, happened unluckily to be one of the worſt, in all reſpects, that could poſſibly have been met with. But when Caxton was informed of the imperfections of his edition, he very readily undertook a ſecond, "for to ſatisfy the author," as he ſays himſelf, "whereas toſore by ignorrance he had "erred in hurting and diffaming his book." His own account of the matter is ſo much to the credit of his character, that it deſerves to be inſerted. "Whyche book I have dylygently oversen, and "duly examyned, to thende that it may be made "accordyng unto his owen makyng; for I fynde "many of the sayd bookes, whyche wryters have "abrydgyd it, and many thinges left out. ¶ And "in some places have sette certayn versys that he "never made ne sette in hys booke; of whyche "bookes, ſo incorecte, was one brought to me vi. "yere passyd, whyche I supposed had ben veray "true and correcte, and accordyng to the same I "dyde do enprynte a certayn nomber of them, "whyche anon were sold to many and dyuerse gentylmen, of whom one gentylman cam to me, and "sayd that this book was not according in many "places unto the book that Gefferey Chaucer had "made. To whom I answered, that I had made it "accordyng to my copye, and by me was nothyng "added ne mynusshyd. Thenne he sayd he knewe "a book whyche hys fader had and moche louyd, "that was very trewe, and accordyng unto hys owen "first book by hym made; and sayd more, yf I "wold enprynte it agayn he wold gete me the same "book for a copye. How be it he wyst well, that "hys fader wold not gladly departe fro it. To whom "I said, in caas that he coude gete me suche a book, "trewe and correcte, yet I wold ones endeuoyre me "to enprynte it agayn, for to satisfy thauctour, "where as to fore, by ygnoraunce, I erryd in hurtyng and dyffamyng his book in dyuerce places, in "setting in somme thynges that he neuer sayd ne "made, and leuing out many thynges that he made, "whyche ben requysite to be sette in it. And thus "we fyll at accord, and he ful gentylly gate of hys "fader the said book, and delyuered it to me, by "whiche I have corrected my book, as heere after "alle alonge, by thayde of almyghty God, shal "folowe" (198).

(198) Appendix to Mr. Tyrwhit's Preface to his Edition of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, p. vi.—viii. Ames's Typographical Antiquities, p. 55, 56.

Caxton was not only a printer, but a poet. Beſides his rhyming introductions and epilogues with which he frequently decorates his books, he has left a poem of conſiderable length, entitled the WORK OF SAPIENCE. It comprehends, not only an allegorical fiction concerning the two Courts of the Caſtle of Sapience, in which there is no imagination, but a ſyſtem of natural philoſophy, grammar, logic, rhetoric, geometry, aſtronomy, theology, and other topics of the faſhionable literature. Though Caxton appears, by the prologue, to be the author, yet Mr. Warton thinks it not improbable, that he might on this occaſion employ ſome profeſſed verſifier, at leaſt as an aſſiſtant, to prepare a new book of original poetry for his preſs. "The writer's deſign, is to "deſcribe the effects of wiſdom from the beginning "of the world: and the work is a Hiſtory of Knowledge or Learning. In a viſion, he meets the "Goddeſs SAPIENCE in a delightful meadow; who "conducts him to her caſtle, or manſion, and there "diſplays all her miraculous operations. Caxton, "in the poem, invokes the gylted Goddeſs and moſt "facundyous Lady Clio, apologiſes to thoſe makers "who delight in termes gay, for the inelegancies of "language, which as a foreigner he could not avoid, "and modeſtly declares, that he neither means to "rival or envy Gower and Chaucer" (199).

(199) Hiſt. of Poetry, ubi ſupra, p. 194, 195.

Caxton, by tranſlating, or procuring to be tranſlated, ſuch a number of books from the French, greatly contributed to promote the ſtate of literature in England. It was only in this way that he could introduce his countrymen to the knowledge of many valuable publications, at a time when an acquaintance with the learned languages was confined to a few eccleſiaſtics. Ancient learning had as yet made too little progreſs among us, to encourage him to publiſh the Roman authors in their original tongue. Indeed, had not the French furniſhed Caxton with materials, it is not probable, that Virgil, Ovid, Cicero, and many other good writers, would by the means of his preſs have been circulated in the Engliſh language, ſo early as the cloſe of the fifteenth century. It is remarkable, that from the time in which Caxton began to print, down to the year 1540, during which period the Engliſh preſs flouriſhed greatly under the conduct of many induſtrious, ingenious, and even learned artiſts, only the few following claſſics, ſome of which ſcarcely deſerve that name, were printed in England. Theſe were, "Boethius de Conſolatione," both Latin and Engliſh, for Caxton, without date: the Latin "Eſopian Fables," in verſe, for Wynkyn de Worde, 1503: "Terence," with the Comment of Badius Aſcenſius, for the ſame, 1504: "Virgil's Bucolics," for the ſame, 1512: "Tully's Offices," Latin and Engliſh, the tranſlation by Whittington, 1533. Of theſe books the "Eſopian Fables," and "Virgil's Bucolics" came to a ſecond edition. The diligence, in the publications he had made, which are computed to have amounted to that number; and now, as he could be little leſs than fourſcore years of age, that he ſhould be deſirous of giving ſtill freſh and farther inſtances of his zeal to promote or diſperſe the moſt virtuous examples and pious inſtructions among his countrymen; theſe, as they are no ordinary proofs of the painful ſervices he beſtowed upon them, ſo they have deſerved no common acknowledgments. It is eaſy to recollect, from what has been ſaid, that the novelty and uſefulneſs of his art, recommended him to the ſpecial notice and encouragement of three crowned heads, and their royal families, beſides ſome of the greateſt Noblemen in their reigns. And ſurely, as he juſtly merited thoſe honours, he has alſo, praiſes that might be equal to them. It was the leaſt then that Bale could beſtow upon him, and yet ſome ignorant or ungrateful Tranſlators have made it ſtill leſs, where he ſays that he was Vir non omnino ſtupidus, aut ignaviâ torpens; a man by no means dull, or benumbed with ſloth: Sed propagandæ ſuæ Gentis Memoriæ ſtudioſus admodum; but exceedingly intent upon ſpreading abroad the Hiſtory of his country (h), and ſuch other topicks, as we have ſeen, that he thought would moſt effectually inculcate religion, virtue, and good manners; to promote which, his great age ſeems not to have any ways abated his conſtant application. For he was now aſſiduouſly engaged in tranſlating from the French, a large volume of the Holy Lives of the Fathers Hermets living in the Deſerts; a work that ſtill, from the examples of quiet and ſolemn retirement therein ſet forth, might farther ſerve to wean his mind from all worldly attachments, exalt it above the ſolicitudes of this life, and inure him to that repoſe and tranquillity, with which he ſeems to have deſigned it. For we are informed by Wynkin de Worde, that this book was tranſlated in the year 1491, by William Caxton, and that he finiſhed it the laſt day of his life, as we have before obſerved in the preceding note. So that, nothing can be plainer, than that he finiſhed his life and tranſlation together, on the ſame day in that year; which, though others had alſo read, who have ſpoken of his death, yet has it been miſtaken by moſt of them, becauſe the book was not printed by the ſaid Wynkin till four years after, in 1495; which date, and the expreſſion of it's being tranſlated by W. Caxton, late deed, they regarding more than the date of the tranſlation, have concluded that he either died that year (i), or the year before (k). But Wynkin's account of his maſter's death is ſo true, that it agrees with the memorandum in being, of ſome expences at his funeral in St. Margaret's church at Weſtminſter, where, between the twenty-ſeventh of May 1490, and the third of June 1492, in the ſecond year of this account, viz. 1491 (l), it appears, in the Warden's account-book of the ſaid pariſh, that ſix ſhillings and eight-pence were charged for four torches, and ſix-pence for tolling the bell (m), at the burying of the ſaid William Caxton; and farther, in the ſame book, among the receipts ſix years after, that he had left (we ſuppoſe in his laſt Will, though it is not to be found in the Prerogative Office) thirteen copies of his Golden Legend; and by another book, preſerved alſo in the ſame place, (being a Regiſter of many particulars relating to the Abbey,) that his executors

University

(h) Bal. Script. Illuſtr. Major. Brytan. Catal. edit. Baſil. fol. 1557, Cent. 8. cap. 43.

(i) Mr. Bagford.

(k) Dr. Middleton.

(l) Mr. Lewis, p. 117, makes it 1492, which ſhould be corrected.

(m) Idem, p. 118.

Univerſity of Oxford, during this period, produced only the firſt book of "Tully's Epiſtles," at the expence of Cardinal Wolſey, without date, or printer's name. The Univerſity of Cambridge cannot boaſt, during the term ſpecified, the honour of having printed a ſingle claſſic. No Greek book, of any kind, had hitherto appeared from an Engliſh preſs. It is believed, that the firſt Greek characters uſed in any work printed in England, are in Linacer's tranſlation of Galen de Temperamentis, printed at Cambridge, in 1521. In this book a few Greek words, and abbreviatures, are here and there introduced. In the ſame author's treatiſe, De emendata Structura Latini Sermonis, printed by Pinſon in 1522, many Greek characters are intermixed; and in the ſixth book there are ſeven lines together in that language. But the printer apologiſes for his imperfections and unſkilfulneſs in the Greek types. Theſe, he ſays, were but recently caſt, and not in a ſufficient quantity for ſuch a work. "Æquo Animo feras ſiquæ "Literæ, in Exemplis Helleniſmi, vel Tonis vel "Spiritibus careant. His enim non ſatis inſtructus "erat Typographus, videlicet recens ab eo fuſis "Characteribus Græcis, nec parata ei Copia qua ad "hoc agendum opus eſt." The ſame embarraſſments appear to have happened with regard to Hebrew types, as might ſtill more be expected, from that language's being much leſs known. Doctor Robert Wakefield, Chaplain to Henry the Eighth, publiſhed in the year 1522, his Oratio de Laudibus & Utilitate trium Linguarum Arabicæ, Chaldaicæ, & Hebraicæ; but he was obliged to omit his whole third part, becauſe the printer, who was Wynkyn de Worde, had no Hebrew types. There are, however, ſome few Hebrew and Arabic characters introduced; but they are extremely rude, and evidently cut in wood. They are the firſt of the ſort uſed in England. It was a circumſtance favourable at leaſt to Engliſh literature, that the illiteracy of the times obliged our firſt printers to employ themſelves ſo little on books written in the learned languages. Moſt of the works printed by Caxton and his immediate ſucceſſors were Engliſh. The multiplication of Engliſh copies multiplied Engliſh readers, and theſe again produced new vernacular writers; the exiſtence of a preſs inducing many perſons to turn authors, who were only qualified to write in their native tongue (200).

(200) Ibid. p. 123, 124.

Soon after the article of Caxton was written by Mr. Oldys, Mr. Ames publiſhed his Typographical Antiquities. In the catalogue which is there given of the books printed by Caxton, we do not find any that have not been mentioned by our learned predeceſſor. There are, however, in Ames's publication, ſome farther extracts from the works of our famous printer, to which ſuch of our readers may have recourſe as are not already ſatisfied with the long and elaborate account of him given by Mr. Oldys (201).

(201) Ames's Typographical Antiquities, p. 1—75.

The apology which Mr. Oldys hath made, at the end of his laſt note, might, in ſome meaſure, be applied to his own ſtile. He had converſed ſo much with our old writers, that his language in general is very antique. We have corrected it in various particulars; but we muſt have written the whole article over again, in order to render the diction quite modern. Beſides, it would have loſt its race: it would not have been Mr. Oldys.] K.

gave

gave to it, thirteen years after his death, two copies of The Life of St. Katherine, and two of The Birth of our Lady. It is thought he died unmarried, as there is no intelligence of his leaving any other iſſue than thoſe of his preſs; which may ſerve as a MONUMENT of his induſtry and benevolence to poſterity, till ſome of his ſucceſſors in the art, ſhall, in juſtice to him, or in honour to themſelves, raiſe him one in marble.

CECIL (WILLIAM) Baron of Burghley, Burleigh, or Burly, Secretary of State in the reigns of Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth, and afterwards Lord High-Treaſurer of England; one of the ableſt Stateſmen, and one of the worthieſt Miniſters, that this, or perhaps any other nation, has produced (a). There is no doubt that he was deſcended of a very antient and honourable houſe, and therefore there was no need that he ſhould be flattered with a fabulous deſcent from an old Roman family. He was himſelf very knowing in genealogies, and made many of thoſe collections, which have enabled ſuch as have conſidered this matter ſince, to trace his pedigree with great perſpicuity and exactneſs (b) [A]. His father was Richard Cecil, Eſq; Maſter of the Robes to King Henry VIII. and his mother Jane, daughter and heireſs of William Hickington of Bourne in the county of Lincoln, Eſq; both perſons of very great character and worth (c), and for whoſe memories their ſon teſtified the higheſt reſpect, even in his moſt exalted fortune [B]. He was born in the houſe of his grandfather David Cecil, Eſq; at Bourn in Lincolnſhire,

(a) Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, chap. v.

(b) Camden's Remains under the title of ſurnames, p. 40. Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii. p. 405.

(c) Life of William Lord Burleigh by one of his Domeſticks, MS. differing in ſome particulars from that publiſhed.

[A] With great perſpicuity and exactneſs.] It is juſtly obſerved, by a very judicious author, that ſurnames in our country were a long time before they took any ſettled form, and that how well ſoever the deſcent of a family might be proved, there would be ſtill great variations in the manner of ſpelling the name by which it was diſtinguiſhed (1). As for inſtance, in the preſent caſe; Sitſilt, Sicelt, Seycil, Seiſel, after which it came to be wrote Cycele, then Cycyl, as it ſtands in many of the old manuſcripts of the reigns of King Henry VIII. and Edward VI; laſt of all, it came to be ſpelt Cecil as we write it now (2); and the reader will forgive me if I tell him, what I think he will not meet with any where elſe, that this new orthography ſeems to have been the invention of Polydore Virgil: at leaſt the firſt time I have met with it, appears in a letter of his addreſſed to the noble perſon who is the ſubject of this article (3). From hence ſome took occaſion to ſuggeſt, the deſcent of this family from a Patrician ſtock of the ſame name amongſt the Romans; and a certain writer upon our Antiquities ſpeaks of this very ſeriouſly (4): 'Of the families of the Camber Britons, ſays 'he, otherwiſe called Welſhmen, or of ſuch as being 'iſſued from Wales do now remain in England, I 'ſhall not need to ſpeak, conſidering their ſurnames 'are eaſily known, by being commonly according to 'their own moſt ancient cuſtom. With this people 'it is not to be doubted, but that during the ſpace 'of about five hundred years that they were ſubject 'to the Romans, divers of the Romans ſettled and 'mixed themſelves among them, whoſe poſterity hath 'ſince remained in account, as being of the ancient 'families of Wales; and I do find very probable 'reaſon to induce me to think, that, among others, 'the honourable family of the Cecils being iſſued 'from Wales, is originally deſcended from the Ro-'mans.'

(1) Camden's Remains, p. 95.

(2) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 405.

(3) Strype's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 145.

(4) Verſtegan's Reſtitution of decayed intelligence in Antiquities, p. 244. Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 473.

But the truth of the matter is, that this ſurname is as little Welſh as Roman; for the beſt Genealogiſts agree, that Robert Sitſilt, an aſſiſtant to Robert Fitz Hamon in the conqueſt of Glamorganſhire, in the fourth year of King William Rufus, anno 1091, was the anceſtor of the family (5); which Robert was rewarded with lands by the ſaid Robert Fitz Hamon, for his ſervices, and afterwards by marriage had Alterennes in that part of Herefordſhire called Ewyas land, with other lands in Herefordſhire and Glouceſterſhire (6). From this Robert Sitſilt the founder, the family is very clearly traced down to Philip Siſelt, who married Maud, daughter and heir of William Philip Vaughan of Tilliglaſſe, by whom he had two ſons, Philip, who enjoyed the eſtate of Alterennes in the pariſh of Walterſton, in the county of Hereford; and David, who was the grandfather of William Cecil Lord Burleigh, of whom we are ſpeaking (7).

This David Sifelt having purchaſed a fair eſtate in Lincolnſhire, founded, 22 Hen. VII. a chantry in St. George's in Stamford (8), and in 3 Hen. VIII. was conſtituted Water-Bayliff of Wittleſey-mere in the county of Huntington, and alſo Keeper of the Swans there, and throughout all the waters and fens in Huntingdon, Cambridge, Lincoln, and Northamptonſhire, for the term of thirty years (9). Alſo in 5 Hen. VIII. he was made one of the King's Serjeants at Arms, and having this employment at Court, obtained, for Richard his ſon and heir, the office of a Page of the Crown (10). Likewiſe in 8 Hen. VIII. he obtained a grant for himſelf and ſon, of the Keeperſhip of Clifford Park in the county of Northampton (11). And in 15 Hen. VIII. continuing ſtill Serjeant at Arms, he was conſtituted Steward of the King's Lordſhip of Coly Weſton in that county, and was Eſcheator of the county of Lincoln from 15 November 21 Hen. VIII. to 15 November 22 Hen. VIII. (12) In 23 Hen. VIII. on the death of Sir William Spencer, Knt. he was conſtituted Sheriff of Northamptonſhire for the remaining part of that year, and was alſo Sheriff the next enſuing year (13). And having been three times Alderman of Stamford, departed this life in the year 1541, the 32d of Hen. VIII. as ſhould ſeem by the probate of his laſt Will and Teſtament, which bears date that year (14). It is very remarkable, that in this Teſtament, he is ſtyled David Cyſſell of Stamford in the county of Lincoln, Eſq; and that it appears he left behind him two ſons, Richard and David, and a daughter Joan. His body, according to his directions, was interred in the pariſh-church of St. George at Stamford (15), and it was at this gentleman's houſe, that the great man of whom we are ſpeaking was born, as is mentioned above in the text; ſo that there was no kind of reaſon for recurring to art or contrivance, much leſs to fiction or forgeries, to entitle him to an ancient and honourable deſcent.

(5) Powel's Hiſt. of Wales, p. 124. 141, 142. Hollingſhed's Chronicle, p. 1255.

(6) Barnes's Hiſt. of Edward III. p. 75.

(7) From an ancient Pedigree of this Family, drawn by the hand of Camden.

(8) Pat. 22 Hen. VII. m. 1.

(9) Pat. 3 Hen. VIII. m. 11.

(10) Pat. 8 Hen. VIII. m. 11.

(11) Pat. 8 Hen. VIII. m. 13.

(12) Pat. 15 Hen. VIII. m. 1.

(13) Fuller's Worthies, in Com. Northam. p. 299.

(14) Butcher's Survey of Stamford, at the cloſe of Peck's Antiquarian Annals of that town, p. 27. Ex Regiſt. Spert. qu. 3. in Cur. Prerog. Cant.

(15) Peck's Antiquarian Annals of Stamford, in the cloſe.

[B] Even in his moſt exalted fortune.] It is requiſite that we ſhould here give ſome account of the parents of Lord Burleigh; and firſt then of his father, who, as we have ſhewn, was the eldeſt ſon of David Cyſſell of Stamford in the county of Lincoln, Eſq; and whoſe own name was Richard. By the intereſt of his father at Court, he was preferred, in the eighth year of Henry VIII. to be one of the Pages of the Crown (16). In 12 Hen. VIII. he waited on the King at that famous interview with the King of France, between Calais and Guiennes; and in 22 Hen. VIII. being Groom of the Robes to that King, obtained a grant of the office of Conſtable of Warwick-caſtle, then in the Crown (17). In 27 Hen. VIII. being one of the Grooms of the Wardrobe, he had a grant of the office of Bayliff of the King's water called Wittleſey-mere, and the cuſtody of the ſwans, and of thoſe waters called Great Crick and Merys, in the counties of Cambridge, Lincoln, Huntingdon, and Northampton, for the term of thirty years, after the expiration of the term granted to David Cyſſell his father (18). In 31 Hen. VIII. he was Sheriff of Rutlandſhire (19). In 32 Hen. VIII. being written Richard

(16) Pat. 8 Hen. VIII. m. 11.

(17) Pat. 22 Hen. VIII. m. 1.

(18) Privat. Sigill. 27 Hen. VIII.

(19) Wright's Hiſt. of Rutlandſhire, p. 12.

Lincolnſhire, September 13, 1520 (d), and received the firſt tincture of letters in the grammar-ſchool at Grantham, whence he afterwards removed to Stamford (e). About the year 1535 he was removed to the univerſity of Cambridge, and entered of St. John's college, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the regularity of his life, and a very ſtrict, indeed a very ſurpriſing, application to his ſtudies (f) [C]. When he had laid a ſolid foundation of ſound and uſeful learning, according to the laudable cuſtom of that age, his father thought fit to ſend for him up to London, and about the year 1541 placed him at Gray's-Inn (g), with an intention to have bred him in the profeſſion of the Law, which, though his fortunes afterwards took another turn, was a circumſtance very happy for him, as it led him to a perfect acquaintance with the conſtitution of his country, of which he was always a paſſionate admirer, and in every ſtation of life zealous in it's defence and protection. While he was thus employed, an accident introduced him to the knowledge and favour of his Sovereign. It fell out, that O-Neil, a famous Iriſh Chief, being at Court, brought with him two of his Chaplains, who were very great bigots, not only to the faith, but to the power of the Roman Pontiff, with whom Mr. Cecil, coming to ſee his father, chanced to have a very warm diſpute, which was managed in the Latin tongue, with ſo great ſkill and vivacity on the part of Cecil, that the two Prieſts, finding their deficiency in point of argument, fell into a downright paſſion. This being reported to the King, who, whatever failings he might have, was certainly one of the moſt learned Princes of his time, he had the curioſity to ſee the young man, and after a long converſation was ſo much taken with his abilities, that he directed his father to find out a place for him; but as there was nothing vacant, the old gentleman aſked the reverſion of the Cuſtos Brevium, which was readily granted, and ſome years afterwards came into his poſſeſſion (h). This early introduction at Court gave a new biaſs to Mr. Cecil's inclinations, and induced him to think of puſhing his fortune in that road which he had ſo happily entered. In all probability he was encouraged to this by the family to which he became allied by marriage; for having eſpouſed Mary, the ſiſter of Sir John Cheke, a gentleman of fair character and great learning, which ſeems

(d) Lord Burleigh's Diary.

(e) Life of William Lord Burleigh, by one of his Domeſticks.

(f) See this matter fully explained in the ſubſequent note.

(g) Camden. Annal. Eliz. p. 774.

(h) Life of William Lord Burleigh, by one of his Domeſticks.

Richard Cecyll of Burley in the county of Northampton, Eſq; he had a grant to him, his heirs and aſſigns for ever, of the ſcite of St. Michael's priory near Stamford, and the church, and 299 acres of arable land, lying in the pariſh of St. Martin's in Stamford, in the county of Northampton (20). In 34 Hen. VIII. being then Yeoman of the Wardrobe, he was made Yeoman of the King's manors of Naſſington, Yarwel, and Upton, in the county of Northampton, for life (21). In 36 Hen. VIII. he purchaſed the manor of Eſyngdon in the county of Rutland, then alſo in the Crown, as a parcel of the Earl of Warwick's lands (22). In 37 Hen. VIII. he ſurrendered his cuſtody of Warwick caſtle (23). He remained Yeoman of the Robes to King Edward VI. to the laſt day of his life, which was the nineteenth of May 1552 (24); and dying at Court, his body was interred in the pariſh church of St. Margaret's Weſtminſter. In the month of April, 1553, a commiſſion was iſſued to Sir Richard Cotton, Sir Ralph Sadler, and Sir Walter Mildmay, Knights, together with Edmund Pidgeon, Clerk of the Wardrobes, any three or two of them, to take an account of Jane Cecil, and Sir William Cecil, Knt. Adminiſtrators of the Teſtament of Richard Cecil, for certain robes, apparel, and jewels of the King, in the cuſtody of the ſaid Richard (25). As for his widow, who was the daughter of William Hickington of Bourn in the county of Lincoln, ſhe ſurvived, and remained his widow thirty-five years, and was a very grave, religious, and virtuous lady, delighting much in works of piety and charity, as well in her life-time as at her deceaſe; and ſhe had the comfort of ſeeing her children, and her childrens children, to the fourth and fifth generation; departing this life March 10, 1587, when ſhe had lived ſeven years above fourſcore. Beſides the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, theſe worthy perſons had three more children, all daughters, viz. Margaret, who married firſt Roger Cave of Stamford, Eſq; and after his deceaſe, Ambroſe Smith of Boſworth, Eſquire; Elizabeth, married firſt to Robert Wingfield of Upton, Eſq; afterwards to Hugh Allington, Eſq; and Anne, who was married to Thomas Whyte of Tucksford, Eſq; (26). The Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh cauſed to be erected at the upper end of the north chancel in St. Martin's church at Stamford, a noble monument to the memory of his parents, and by it is his own.

(20) Pat. 32 Hen. VIII. m. 7.

(21) Pat. 36 Hen. VIII. m. 7.

(22) Pat. 36 Hen. VIII. m. 28.

(23) Peerage of England, vol. ii. p. 134.

(24) As appears from the inſcription mentioned hereafter.

(25) Strype's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 491.

(26) Peck's Antiquarian Annals of Stamford, in the cloſe, p. 69.

[C] Indeed a very ſurpriſing application to his ſtudies.] He was entered of St. John's college May 27, 1535 (27), and finding ſeveral perſons of diſtinguiſhed parts then ſtudents there, this inſpired him with ſuch a thirſt for learning, that he made an agreement with the Bell-ringer to call him up at four o'clock every morning, applying himſelf with ſuch vigour to his ſtudies, that with much ſitting a humour fell into his legs, of which, not without difficulty, he was cured, though his Phyſicians conſidered it as one of the principal cauſes of that inveterate gout with which he was tormented in the latter part of his life (28). Dr. Nicholas Medcalfe, who was at this time Maſter of the college, was his great patron, and frequently gave him money to encourage him (29); but the ſtrong paſſion he had to excel his contemporaries, and to diſtinguiſh himſelf early in the univerſity, was the chief ſpur to his endeavours. At ſixteen he read a Sophiſtry Lecture, and at nineteen a Greek Lecture, not for any pay or ſalary, but as a Gentleman for his pleaſure; which was the more remarkable at that time, as there were but few who were maſters of Greek, either in that college or in the univerſity. But though he applied himſelf with ſo much aſſiduity to Greek literature, yet he always affected a general knowledge, as never intending to tie himſelf up to the ſtudy of any ſingle branch of ſcience (30). He purſued the ſame method when at Gray's-Inn, and took the aſſiſtance of converſation as well as books in both places, delighting very much in free diſputes upon all ſorts of ſubjects, by which he became very early both a copious and correct ſpeaker. He was very happy in two qualities which rarely meet, for he had a ſtrong memory and a ſound judgment. He aſſiſted both, by an indefatigable application, by recording every thing with his pen that occurred either in reading or from obſervation; and this in the moſt methodical manner, as is evident from the vaſt collections he left behind him upon a great variety of ſubjects (31). He addicted himſelf particularly to the Antiquities of his own country, and to the Hiſtories of the great families, which he underſtood better than moſt men of his time: neither did he forſake his ſtudies when he came into great employments, but was perpetually reviewing and adding to his notes, which gave him that admirable facility of writing, in which he ſurpaſſed moſt in his time, and was hardly excelled by any (32).

(27) Lord Burleigh's Diary.

(28) Life of William Lord Burleigh, by one of his Domeſticks.

(29) Fuller's Hiſt. of the Univerſity of Cambridge, p. 95.

(30) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(31) As appears from what are ſtill preſerved in ſeveral publick and private Libraries, beſides numbers that are loſt.

(32) The reader may find ample teſtimonies of this in the Appendixes to Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. Strype's Memorials, Annals, &c.

to have happened about this time (i) [D], he was by him recommended to the favour of the Earl of Hertford, uncle to his royal pupil, ſo well known afterwards by the title of Duke of Somerſet (k). In the beginning of the reign of Edward VI. he came into the poſſeſſion of his office of Cuſtos Brevium, which brought him in two hundred and forty pounds a year (l); and having married to his ſecond wife Mildred, daughter of Sir Anthony Cook the Director of the King's ſtudies, he found himſelf as well ſupported in his pretenſions at Court as he could deſire (m). In 1547, his noble patron, the Protector, gave him at once a great proof of his favour, and a high mark of his confidence, by appointing him Maſter of Requeſts, an office, not of diſtinction only, but of great truſt (n). He was quickly after favoured with another mark of the Protector's kindneſs, who took him with him in his expedition into Scotland, where he was preſent in the battle of Muſſleburgh, Sept. 10, in the ſame year (o); and his life was very narrowly ſaved there by the tenderneſs of one of his friends, who in puſhing him out of the level of a cannon, had his arm ſhattered to pieces by that ſhot, which otherwiſe had diſpatched Mr. Cecil (p). Upon his return to Court he grew into ſuch favour with his excellent maſter, that in 1548 he was advanced to the high poſt of Secretary, which he enjoyed twice in that reign, and for want of diſtinguiſhing this, ſome eminent writers have fallen into great confuſion (q) [E]. But as there is no courſe of life ſo ſubject to ſudden turns of fortune as that in a Court, ſo it was not long before Mr. Cecil learned this from experience; for the very year after, a ſtrong party being formed againſt the Lord Protector, many of whom were members of the Privy-Council, they aſſembled at London, while the King and the Lord Protector with his friends were at Hampton-Court, and finding themſelves ſupported by the city of London, they ſent a bold charge to the King, againſt the Duke of Somerſet, to Windſor-caſtle, whither he was then removed, which produced all that they expected; for that noble perſon being of a mild and gentle diſpoſition, and above all things apprehenſive of a civil war, ſuffered himſelf not only to be diveſted of his power, but alſo to be made priſoner (r). At the ſame time, his friends, Sir Michael Stanhope, Sir John Thynne, Edward Rolfe, and William Cecil, Eſqrs; were committed to cuſtody; and though it is aſſerted by ſome great Hiſtorians, that when the reſt were ſent to the Tower Mr. Cecil was diſcharged (s), yet we find in his own Diary that he was ſent to that priſon in November 1549; and we are alſo told, that he continued there about the ſpace of three months (t). His behaviour, however, having been always juſt and moderate, had procured him many friends, and (i) Lord Burleigh's Diary.

(k) Camden's Annal. Eliz. p. 774.

(l) As appears from his own computation in his Diary.

(m) Camden. Annal. Eliz. p. 774.

(n) Life of William Lord Burleigh, by one of his Domeſticks. Camden. Annal. Eliz. p. 774.

(o) Lord Burleigh's Diary. Life of William Lord Burleigh, by one of his Domeſticks. Camden. Annal. p. 774.

(p) Life of William Lord Burleigh, by one of his Domeſticks.

(q) Lord Burleigh's Diary.

(r) Sir John Hayward's Life and Reign of Edward VI. in the Compleat Hiſt. of England, vol. ii. p. 306, 307. Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, P. ii. p. 136, 137.

(s) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, P. ii. p. 138. Rapin's Hiſt. vol. viii. p. 71.

(t) Life of William Lord Burleigh, by one of his Domeſticks. The entry in his Diary runs thus: Menſe Novembris iii Ed. VI. fui in Turre.

[D] To have happened about this time.] The author of his Life tells us, that on the 8th of Auguſt, 33 Henry VIII. he took to wife Mary Cheke, ſiſter of Sir John Cheke, Knight, who lived with him not above a year and a quarter, by whom he had his firſt ſon Thomas. The ſame writer farther obſerves, that this was after he had ſpent ſome time at the Inns of Court (33). This does not very well agree with what Camden tells us, for he ſays expreſsly, that he married this lady in the twentieth year of his age, while he was at St. John's; that ſhe lived with him a year or two, and that after he came to Gray's Inn he married his ſecond lady (34). The truth of the matter is, that the former writer is ſomewhat, but Mr. Camden is almoſt in every particular miſtaken. Lord Burleigh, in his manuſcript diary, has ſet down the day of his birth, Sept. 13th, 1520. Mr. Camden places his birth in the year 1521. Lord Burleigh, in his diary, ſets down the time of his coming to Gray's Inn thus, May 6th, 1541, I came to Gray's Inn, when in my twenty-firſt year; and he marks the time of his marriage thus, Auguſt 8th, 1541, I married Mary Cheke at Cambridge; ſo that it is plain he married his firſt wife after he was at the Inns of Court, as the writer of his life ſays. In Lord Burleigh's diary we find, that this eldeſt ſon Thomas was born May 5, 1542, and that his firſt lady died Feb. 22, 1543, at two in the morning, ſo that ſhe muſt have lived longer with him than the writer of his life mentions.

(33) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(34) Camden's Annal. Eliz. p. 774.

[E] Some eminent writers have fallen into great confuſion.] It does not appear that any of our hiſtorians had the leaſt intimation of Mr. Cecil's being Secretary of State ſo early. The writer of his life ſays, that in the ſecond year of King Edward VI. he was committed to the Tower about the Duke of Somerſet's firſt calling in queſtion, that he remained there a quarter of a year, and was then enlarged: he then proceeds thus, The Duke of Somerſet perceiving the King's great liking to Mr. Cecil about the third year of the King's reign, preferred him to be Secretary of State, being but twenty-five years old, and Anno 5 Ed. VI. he was made a Knight (35). All which is equally confuſed and incorrect; for Mr. Cecil was much older than he ſpeaks of when King Edward came to the Crown; and it was not in the third, but in the ſecond year of his reign that Mr. Cecil was made Secretary of State, the firſt time; which we learn from his own diary, where he entered it thus——Sept. 1548, cooptatus ſum in Officium Secretarii, i. e. I was admitted to the office of Secretary in Sept. 1548. It appears from Biſhop Burnet, that when the great diſturbance happened in October 1549, Sir William Petre and Sir Thomas Smith were Secretaries (36); but as we hear nothing of his removal, it is very probable that Mr. Cecil was Secretary likewiſe; ſince as the reader will obſerve in the text, there were afterwards three Secretaries in this reign. It is plain, that Biſhop Burnet was miſtaken in affirming, that Mr. Cecil was diſcharged at Windſor, and not committed with the reſt to the Tower, ſince both himſelf and the writers of his life poſitively ſay the contrary (37). King Edward, in his Journal, makes no mention at all of Mr. Cecil's being removed from his poſt, or of his being ſent to the Tower; but he takes notice, that Dr. Wotton was made Secretary of State at this time (38); and though Biſhop Burnet is clear, that it was in the room of Sir Thomas Smith, yet it might as well be in the room of Mr. Cecil; for Mr. Camden, who mentions Sir Thomas Smith's being Secretary in this reign, ſays, that he was made ſo when Cecil was the other Secretary, and from thence it is not poſſible to diſtinguiſh when he was made (39). It appears from King Edward's Journal, that Mr. Cecil did not long continue in diſgrace, but was very ſoon brought into buſineſs again, though he was not reſtored to his office (40). When this happened we learn from thoſe words in the King's Journal, Sept. 6th (1550) Mr. Wotton gave up his Secretaryſhip, and Mr. Cecil got it of him (41). In the month of October following the King granted him an annuity of one hundred pounds, in conſideration of his ſaid office, during his Majeſty's pleaſure, to be paid from the augmentation from the Michaelmas preceding (42). And thus we have done all in our power to clear up this matter.

(35) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(36) Hiſt. of the Reformat. vol. ii. p. 135.

(37) Life of William Lord Burleigh. Lord Burleigh's Diary.

(38) See the King's Journal, in Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. vol. ii. Append. p. 9.

(39) Camden. Annal. Eliz. p. 318.

(40) See the King's Journal, as before, p. 17.

(41) Ib. p. 20.

(42) Strype's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 493.

theſe taking advantage of the King's perſonal regard for him, not only procured his liberty, but brought him again to Court, where his abilities were found ſo uſeful, that the Duke of Northumberland, who had now the greateſt credit, was willing that he ſhould be reſtored to his office; and accordingly, by the reſignation of Dr. Wotton, this was brought about (u). There are many writers who fix this promotion to the eleventh of October 1551, but his own Diary aſſures us it was in the month of September; and it appears from King Edward's Journal of his own reign, that it was upon the ſixth of that month (w). But it is true, that on the eleventh of October he was knighted, and ſworn of the Privy-Council (x). His credit and favour were now greater than ever, and his intereſt with his Royal Maſter was ſuch, that he was believed to have a great ſhare in thoſe productions that were ſaid to fall from the King's pen; for when a letter from his Majeſty, in relation to her perverſeneſs in religion, was preſented to the Princeſs Mary, ſhe could not help crying out, Ah! Mr. Cecil's pen took great pains here (y). He ſteered with all the caution and circumſpection that thoſe critical times required, and was particularly careful to avoid taking any ſhare in the Court quarrels that were ſo frequent during that ſhort reign. Yet it was not poſſible for him, with all his ſkill and diligence, to eſcape falling under ſome difficulties, more eſpecially in that fatal buſineſs of the death of the Duke of Somerſet, towards whom he is by ſome charged with much unkindneſs, for which, however, there is no viſible foundation (z) [F]. The Duke himſelf was a man, though of a tender nature, ſometimes intemperate in ſpeech; and there is reaſon to doubt, that ſome who were pretty near him, might take occaſion to excite and draw from him thoſe unguarded expreſſions, which were afterwards made uſe of as a pretence, though a very poor pretence it was, to take away his life (a). Sir William Cecil did indeed keep his ground at Court when his noble patron fell; but this was not owing to the Duke of Northumberland's favour, but to ſeveral other cauſes (b). In the firſt place his abilities were wanted, and his moderation eſteemed, the Duke of Northumberland being no enemy to men of capacity who did not oppoſe him. Sir William Cecil ſtood extremely well with the King, had his ear very much, and was the perſon to whom his Majeſty confided his moſt ſecret thoughts; ſo that, without ſome apparent offence in him, no wiſe man would ever entertain a thought of his removal: add to all this, that he lived in ſtrict friendſhip with the moſt eminent and worthy perſons about the Court, and more eſpecially with thoſe who were immediately about the King's perſon: and we ſhall eaſily diſcern, why Northumberland himſelf, with all his power and his peeviſhneſs, choſe

(u) Life of William Lord Burleigh, by one of his Domeſticks.

(w) See the King's Journal in Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. P. ii. in p. 20 of the Appendix.

(x) Stow's Annals, p. 604. Godwyn's Hiſt. p. 244, 245.

(y) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. P. ii. p. 174.

(z) Strype's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 476.

(a) Hayward's Hiſt. of the Life and Reign of Edward VI. in Kennet's Compleat Hiſt. of England, vol. ii. p. 321.

(b) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. vol. ii. p. 223.

[F] For which, however, there is no viſible foundation.] After what has been ſaid in the former notes, and the variety of authorities alledged in ſupport of the facts laid down in them, we may ſafely truſt the reader with a piece of libel which was tranſmitted to the Lord Burleigh himſelf, when he was High-Treaſurer of England, by one of his agents abroad, who extracted it from a Latin treatiſe, written and publiſhed by the Papiſts on purpoſe to defame him; in which there is collected all that had ever been whiſpered by his enemies to his prejudice, in regard to the firſt ſcenes of his life. Thus it runs; 'Of the 'Lord Treaſurer's pedigree they write in this manner: Cecil his father, groom of the Wardrobe, 'was never called maſter but in jeſt; and his mother 'would never ſuffer herſelf to be called miſtreſs, but 'when her ſon was made Baron of Burleigh. His 'grandfather, one of the King's guard, kept the 'beſt Inn in Stamford, himſelf firſt of all bell-ringer 'in St. John's College in Cambridge, and after grew 'by learning and cunning, by the help and favour of 'Sir John Cheke and Sir Anthony Cooke, to be 'Secretary to the Duke of Somerſet, Protector, to 'whom he was a ſtickler, to ſet him againſt his own 'brother, the Admiral, for pleaſing the Ducheſs, 'and to cut off his head as he did; the principal inſtrument to bring in Father Latimer to be an agent, 'as he was in that tragedy, and for this ſervice, by 'the Ducheſs of Somerſet's procurement to her huſband, Mr. Cecil was made Secretary to King Edward VI. After ſeeing Dudley Earl of Warwick 'more cunning and potent than the Duke of Somerſet 'his maſter, he ſecretly forſook him, and betrayed 'him, and gave matter of overthrow to Warwick 'againſt him; for which ſervice Mr. Cecil was ſet up 'by Warwick, and brought into the King's favour 'and council again; and he followed that man's fortune ſo long as he ſtood in proſperity, even to the 'deprivation of all King Henry VIII. his children, 'and penned the proclamation and oaths that the 'Duke of Northumberland and Suffolk ſet forth 'againſt them, and could have been content to have 'diſpatched them with his own hand, if Northumber'land would have put him to it (43).' As to his deſcent, and the eſtates of his family, when this noble perſon was born, they have been ſo fully ſet out from records, that no doubts can be entertained about them. As to the Lord Admiral it is very probable, that in his poſt of Secretary of State Mr. Cecil might draw ſome of the proceedings againſt him; but that either he or the Duke were inſtigated by the Ducheſs to put that great man to death, is a vulgar calumny; ſince it is certain his own crimes made it neceſſary, and there are very few acts of attainder that can be ſo well juſtified as that by which he fell. He endeavoured to ſupplant his brother the Duke of Somerſet, in the firſt year of his nephew's reign; he aimed at marrying the Lady Elizabeth, but being defeated in that, he privately eſpouſed the dowager Queen Catherine, who it was ſtrongly ſuſpected he poiſoned. He then renewed his addreſſes to the Lady Elizabeth, engaged the Maſter of the Mint to cheat the King of ten thouſand pounds a month, to enable him to raiſe a rebellion; and the very laſt words he ſpoke before his execution were, to direct his ſervant to carry two letters which he had written, to excite the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth to revenge his death upon the Protector. It was his own knowledge of this man's crimes, and not Mr. Cecil's inſinuations, that induced the pious martyr Latimer to ſpeak againſt him in his ſermons (44). As for Mr. Cecil's attachment to the Duke of Somerſet, he loſt his liberty and his office for him; and before his laſt troubles began, the Duke was ſo far from ſuſpecting Cecil, that he ſent for, and communicated his fears to him; upon which he made him this anſwer (45), That if he was innocent he might truſt to that, and if he was otherwiſe he could but pity him; which does indeed prove the Secretary's prudence, but without the leaſt prejudice to his integrity. As for the latter part of this libel, it will be cleared up by conſidering what is ſaid in the text of his diſlike to the whole proceeding, with regard to King Edward's will, founded upon inconteſtable authorities.

(43) Extract of a ſeditious Treatiſe, written in Latin, and publiſhed in the Low Countries under the feigned name of Philopatris, ſent by one of the Lord Treaſurer's ſervants by way of information.

(44) Strype's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 476, 477.

(45) King Edward's Journal of his own Reign.

rather rather to uſe the Secretary with the utmoſt civility, than to aim at giving him any uneaſineſs (c). Neither is there any neceſſity of recurring to any ſiniſter motives, to account for that high regard ſhown by this powerful favourite to our riſing Stateſman; ſince while all the reſt of the Courtiers almoſt were involved in factions and intrigues, he conſtantly attended the buſineſs of his office. He was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for eſtabliſhing a new body of Eccleſiaſtical Laws, and though Sir John Hayward affirms that this came to nothing (e), yet in that, as well as in many other things, he was miſtaken (f). Secretary Cecil was alſo very aſſiduous in ſettling the debts of the Crown (g), and in contriving ways and means for their diſcharge; and, which muſt appear ſomewhat ſtrange, conſidering the confuſion of the times, he, at this juncture, framed a ſcheme for the benefit of trade, which ought to render his memory immortal [G]. It appears plainly, that notwithſtanding the great favour the Secretary ſtood in with his maſter, and the court that was paid him upon this account by the greateſt men, yet he neither made private advantages to himſelf by grants, nor would he hinder in any manner the fortunes of other men, as is clear from his conſenting to the appointment of Sir John Cheke, Third Secretary, with Sir William Petre and himſelf; and as that gentleman was his brother-in-law, it is very probable that he was inſtrumental in his promotion (h). On the 12th of April, 1553, Sir William Cecil was made Chancellor of the Order of the Garter, with an annual fee of an hundred marks, a very moderate reward ſurely for his many and great ſervices (i). In reference to the diſpoſition of the Crown, made by the King his maſter to the Lady Jane Grey, eldeſt daughter of Frances Ducheſs of Suffolk, who was alſo the eldeſt daughter of Mary, Queen-Dowager of France, and Ducheſs of Suffolk, younger ſiſter to Henry VIII. it was an affair in contriving of which he had no concern; but, on the contrary, when he diſcovered it in agitation, he made ſuch a diſpoſition of his effects as he thought proper for their ſecurity, in caſe he was impriſoned or obliged to leave the kingdom (k). A certain author indeed charges him with having a great hand in it, and with drawing moſt of the papers relating to that ſettlement, but without any colour of juſtice; for the inſtrument was drawn by the Judges, who thought to ſecure themſelves from being anſwerable for what they did by taking out the King's pardon (l). Sir William Cecil, when he was deſired to ſign this inſtrument, as a Privy-Counſellor, by the King himſelf, refuſed to do it, but, at his Majeſty's earneſt entreaty, ſubſcribed ſimply as a witneſs of the King's ſigning (m). After the deceaſe of King Edward, the Duke of Northumberland would have had him draw the Proclamation of his daughter-in-law, declaring her title, and ſhewing the legality of it; but Sir William very judiciouſly obſerved, that this was entirely out of his province, and ſo transferred it upon the Attorney and Solicitor-General as better ſkilled in the Law. The Duke would afterwards have put him upon writing a letter in juſtification of the Lady Jane's title, in which Queen Mary was to be treated as a (c) See the Life of Sir Thomas Smith, by Mr. Strype.

(e) Hayward's Life and Reign of Edward VI. in Kennet's Compl. Hiſt. of England, vol. ii. p. 236, 237.

(f) Strype's Eccleſiaſtical Memorials, vol. ii. p. 479.

(g) A Compleat View of what the King owed in the month of Feb. 1551, from the MS. of Sir William Cecil, is inſerted in the 9th chapter of the ſecond Book of Strype's Memorials of the reign of Edward VI.

(h) See the Life of Sir John Cheke, p. 135.

(i) Strype's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 506. Rymer's Fœdera, tom. xv. p. 330.

(k) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. vol. ii. p. 223, 224.

(l) Sir John Hayward's Hiſt. of the Life and Reign of Edward VI. as before cited.

(m) This is taken from an account of that whole tranſaction drawn up by order of Sir William Cecil himſelf, for clearing up his conduct in that affair.

[G] Which ought to render his memory immortal.] It was at this juncture that the liberties of the Merchants of the Steel-yard were ſeized into the hands of the Crown, whence we may date all the beneficial trade of this kingdom (46). It is true, that our commodities and manufactures were exported before, and it is likewiſe true, that corporations multiplied apace; that new trades were continually ſpringing up, and that a ſpirit of induſtry began to diffuſe itſelf through the nation. Yet our commerce was in a bad ſituation, we had hardly any ſhipping, the ſtaple of our woollen trade was at Antwerp, the Italians remitted our money, and the Germans and Flemings carried on the whole trade of export and import; ſo that while we were in this wretched ſituation the people laboured and ſweated, and the ſtrangers ran away with all. A very few Engliſh merchants there were, and they took abundance of pains to give the government ſome light into this affair; and Sir William Cecil comprehending what they ſaid, ſupported their cauſe ſo well in council, that they carried their point againſt the foreign merchants; by which I may venture to ſay, the commerce of this iſland was ſet free: not that I concur in the common opinion, of there being little or no traffick before the reign of Queen Elizabeth, but becauſe I am ſatisfied, from a very laborious enquiry into this matter, that though the trade of England was very conſiderable even then, yet the trade of the Engliſh was very inſignificant, and muſt have continued ſo, if it had not been for this bold ſtep: which ſhows how much good ſtateſmen may do to their country, when they really mean it well, and take pains to inform themſelves how it's welfare may be promoted. But beſides this, Sir William Cecil was the patron of another project, which though it was not brought to bear, yet plainly ſhews how indefatigable he was in conſulting the publick good. This project conſiſted in aboliſhing the ſtaple at Antwerp, and opening two free ports in England, viz. Southampton and Hull. There is ſtill extant a paper, containing the whole of this ſcheme, digeſted in the cleareſt method poſſible; ſhowing upon what motives the ſtaple at Antwerp ought to be ſuppreſſed, how far that conjuncture was favourable to ſuch a deſign, the reaſons why Southampton and Hull were made choice of, in preference to other parts, the favourable conſequences that might be expected from ſuch eſtabliſhments, and the danger and difficulties that were to be apprehended in making this attempt, with their remedies. We may hence diſcern, that Sir William Cecil was none of thoſe haſty miniſters, who after taking a ſcheme into their heads, or having it propoſed to them, proceed all at once to carry it into execution, without weighing or conſidering it's conſequences; but a wiſe and prudent manager, who took care to examine every undertaking to the bottom, by viewing it in all the lights poſſible. The troubles and perplexities of that reign ariſing from factions at home, and the unſettled ſtate of things abroad, prevented him at this time from performing, what, upon mature deliberation, he judged beneficial for the nation. But he never loſt ſight of his deſign, or abandoned his care of trade, till by degrees, and as occaſions offered, he delivered it from moſt of thoſe difficulties and embarraſſments with which, till this time, it had been encumbered; and therefore we had reaſon to ſay in the text, that his conduct in this reſpect ought, amongſt a wiſe, free, and grateful people, to render his memory immortal.

(46) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. vol. ii. p. 207. Sir John Hayward's Life and Reign of Edward VI. p. 326. Strype's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 330.

baſtard;

baſtard; but he plainly refuſed him, and his example being followed by every body elſe, the Duke was forced to draw it himſelf (n). All this time the Privy-Counſellors were in the Tower, and looked upon themſelves as little better than priſoners, which put Sir William upon contriving means for their eſcape, which was effected after the Duke of Northumberland's march into Cambridgeſhire, by aſſembling the Privy-Council at the Earl of Pembroke's houſe, called Baynard Caſtle, where moſt of thoſe who met declared for Queen Mary, the Earl of Arundel and Lord Paget going off to her that very night, and Sir William Cecil followed the next day; and though ſome attempts had been made to prejudice him in her Majeſty's favour, yet he was very graciouſly received, and with very good reaſon (o) [H]. But as he very well knew that he had many powerful enemies, and foreſaw the complexion of the enſuing reign, he made uſe of this early favour to obtain a general pardon (p). It is ſcarcely to be doubted, that if he would have changed his religion, he might have continued in his office, but he choſe to loſe this that he might keep that. He did not however apprehend, that his having no ſhare in the miniſtry, obliged him either to oppoſe thoſe who had, or to forget the perſonal friendſhip and great intimacy in which he had lived with many of them, which therefore he kept up; and being well acquainted with the moderate and mild diſpoſition of Cardinal Pole, he conſented to go with the Lord Paget and Mr. Haſtings to invite him to England; which he accordingly did, and returned with him November 23, 1554 (q), in hopes that he might balance the power of Dr. Stephen Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, Lord High-Chancellor, and Prime-Miniſter to Queen Mary; a Prelate of great abilities, but very zealous for the religion and power of the Church of Rome, though he had not been always of that opinion (r). In the month of May 1555, he attended the Cardinal, with other Lords commiſſioned to treat of a peace, and remained beyond the ſeas two months (s). After his return, a Parliament being ſummoned to meet the twenty-firſt of October following, he was choſen Knight of the Shire for the county of Lincoln, and behaved in the Houſe of Commons, not only with great freedom and firmneſs, but with much ſpirit and vivacity, having a large ſhare in a debate which produced the rejecting of a bill from the Houſe of Lords, for confiſcating the eſtates of ſuch as had quitted the kingdom on the ſcore of religion (t). This behaviour, as it might be naturally expected, created him ſome trouble, out of which however he extricated himſelf by his great addreſs, without the loſs either of liberty or of reputation (u) [I]. He was again choſen to repreſent the county (n) Strype's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 476.

(o) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(p) Sir William Cecil's Vindication of his own conduct.

(q) Lord Burleigh's Diary.

(r) Sir Thomas Smith's Life, by Mr. Strype.

(s) Lord Burleigh's Diary.

(t) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(u) See this matter clearly explained in the note.

[H] And with very good reaſon.] There is ſomething very ſingular in the account which a celebrated hiſtorian has been pleaſed to give us of Sir William Cecil's behaviour: for after telling us, that he waited upon the Queen, was graciouſly received, and might have kept his employment, if he would have complied ſo far as to have declared himſelf of her Majeſty's religion, he cloſes theſe matters of fact with the following remark (47). 'He was nevertheleſs expoſed to 'no perſecution on account of his religion, whether 'his artful behaviour gave no advantages againſt him, 'or his particular merit procured him a diſtinction 'above all other Proteſtants.' As to the artfulneſs of his behaviour, it will beſt appear from the anſwer he gave to thoſe honourable perſons, who by command of the Queen communed with him on this ſubject, to whom he declared, 'That he thought himſelf bound 'to ſerve God firſt, and next the Queen; but if her 'ſervice ſhould put him out of God's ſervice, he hoped 'her Majeſty would give him leave to chuſe an ever-'laſting, rather than a momentary ſervice; and as 'for the Queen, ſhe had been his ſo gracious Lady, 'that he would ever ſerve and pray for her in his 'heart, and with his body and goods be as ready to 'ſerve in her defence as any of her loyal ſubjects, ſo 'ſhe would pleaſe to grant him leave to uſe his con-'ſcience to himſelf, and ſerve her at large as a pri-'vate man, which he choſe rather than to be her 'greateſt counſellor (48).' The Queen took him at his word, and this was all the art Sir William uſed to procure liberty of conſcience for himſelf; unleſs we ſhould call it art, that he behaved himſelf with much prudence and circumſpection afterwards. We may add to this however, that the remark is falſe in fact, as well as capable of being taken in a ſiniſter ſenſe; for there were many other Proteſtants treated with the like indulgence, ſuch as Sir Thomas Smith, who had been alſo Secretary of State, and who had treated both Gardiner and Bonner roughly enough in the days of King Edward, and yet was not only ſuffered to live in peace, but alſo had a penſion given him of one hundred pounds per annum (49). The famous Roger Aſcham alſo, who had been Latin Secretary to King Edward, enjoyed both his freedom and his employment; and this by the favour of Stephen Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, as is plain from the letter he wrote to that prelate, to deſire his favour (50). It is therefore not unkind barely, but unjuſt, to repreſent Sir William Cecil as the only Proteſtant unperſecuted under the reign of Queen Mary, and as particularly diſtinguiſhed in that reſpect; whereas others ſhared the ſame liberty, and were even better treated than he.

(47) Rapin's Hiſt. of England, vol. ii. p. 62.

(48) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(49) Strype's Life of Sir Thom a Smith.

(50) Aſchami Epiſtolæ, p. 263.

[I] Without the loſs either of liberty or of reputation.] The buſineſs particularly mentioned in the text was occaſioned by Sir William's oppoſition to the bill, for confiſcating Proteſtants eſtates, and ſome warm ſpeeches the ſame day on other ſubjects, but more eſpecially in relation to a money-bill, in all which Sir William Cecil delivered himſelf frankly againſt the conduct of the adminiſtration. One day, ſays the author of his life, when he had ſpoken with more than ordinary applauſe, Sir Anthony Kingſton, Sir William Courtney, Sir John Pollard, and ſeveral other members, invited themſelves to dinner with him. Sir William ſaid they ſhould be welcome, provided they ſaid nothing at table of parliamentary affairs, to which they agreed. At dinner, however, ſome of them talked a little too freely, for which Sir William reproved them, and charged them with breach of promiſe. The Privy-Council had intelligence of all that paſſed, and ſending for the knights and gentlemen committed them all, reſerving Sir William Cecil to be laſt examined. As ſoon as he came into the room, and had paid his obedience to the Council, he made it his humble requeſt, that they would not treat him as they had done the reſt, which he owned he thought was a little ſevere, viz. in committing them firſt, that they might hear them afterwards; whereas it was his ſuit, to be heard firſt, and if then there ſhould appear juſt cauſe he was content to be committed. 'You ſpeak, Sir William, 'ſaid Lord Paget, like a man of experience, go on.' Sir William making uſe of this licence proceeded to ſet the affair in ſuch a light, that by the conſent of all the Council he was diſcharged (51). But neither the riſque he ran upon this occaſion, or the violent county of Lincoln in the laſt Parliament of this reign, in which he obſerved the ſame ſteady conduct; and while he was thus employed in the ſervice of his country openly, he entertained a private correſpondence with the Lady Elizabeth, the preſumptive heir of the Crown, to whom he gave ſuch notices from time to time, as were highly uſeful to her in her diſtreſſed circumſtances (w). As this could not be done without danger to himſelf, ſo it was very gratefully as well as graciouſly acknowledged by that Princeſs on her acceſſion to the throne, November 16, 1558 (x). The firſt ſervice that he rendered her was, upon the very day that ſhe became Queen, by preſenting her with a paper, conſiſting of twelve particulars which were neceſſary for her to diſpatch immediately (y). At the time of her ſiſter's deceaſe, Queen Elizabeth was at her manor of Hatfield, whither before it was long, moſt of the great men repaired to her; and on the twentieth of the ſame month her Council was formed, when Sir William Cecil was firſt ſworn Privy-Counſellor and Secretary of State; and as he entered thus early into his Sovereign's favour, ſo he continued in it as long as he lived; which if in one ſenſe it does honour to the abilities and ſervices of Cecil, it was in another no leſs glorious to the Queen his miſtreſs, who, in this reſpect, did not act from any ſpirit of partiality or of prepoſſeſſion, but with that wiſdom and prudence which directed her judgment in all things (z). She ſaw plainly that Sir William Cecil's intereſts were interwoven with her own, and ſhe very judiciouſly diſcerned, that he was fitteſt to be her Counſellor, whoſe private ſafety muſt depend upon the ſucceſs of the counſel he gave. It was neceſſary to make theſe remarks, becauſe it ſhews the reader the true ſtate in which he ſtood with his miſtreſs; for though there were other perſons, who were ſometimes as great or greater favourites than Cecil, yet he was the only miniſter whom ſhe always conſulted, and whoſe advice ſhe very rarely rejected (a). The very firſt thing he adviſed was to call a Parliament, and the firſt thing he propoſed to be done there was the ſettlement of religion; in reference to which he cauſed a plan of Reformation to be drawn, with equal circumſpection and moderation; for though no man was a more ſincere Proteſtant, yet he had no vindictive prejudices againſt Papiſts; nor did he, on the other hand, lay any greater weight upon indifferent things, than he judged abſolutely neceſſary for preſerving decency and order; for he very well knew, that without an Eſtabliſhed Church the State could not at that time ſubſiſt: and whoever conſiders the ſhare he had in eſtabliſhing it, and has a juſt veneration for that wiſe and excellent eſtabliſhment, cannot but allow, that the moſt grateful reverence is due to his memory (b) [K]. The conſtant and daily buſineſs of his office, which,

(51) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(w) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(x) Camden. Annal. p. 26.

(y) Strype's Annals, vol. i. p. 5.

(z) Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia.

(a) Life of Lord Burleigh.

(b) Strype's Annals, vol. i. p. 82. Oſborne's traditional Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. Strype's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 246.

counſels that prevailed in the latter part of Queen Mary's reign, could deter him from rendering his country ſervice in that ſtation in which he had alone power to act, ſince Popery became again the eſtabliſhed religion. His own account of this matter, ſet down by way of remark in his diary, will at once ſhow the ſituation he was in, and his ſentiments on that ſituation, and therefore I ſhall tranſcribe it, as more ſatisfactory than any thing that could be offered on this head by another pen (52). xxi Octobris 1555, comitia erant celebrata Weſtmonaſterio in quibus ego interfui, aliquo eum periculo. Nam quamquam invitus electus fueram, ut eques conſularis pro Lincolnicenſi provincia, tamen in illo conſeſſu libere ſententiam dixi, unde odium mihi peperi. Sed melius fuit obedire Deo quam hominibus. 'On the 21ſt of October the parliament 'met at Weſtminſter, in which, not without ſome 'danger, I diſcharged my duty as a member. For 'though I ſought it not, yet being returned knight 'for the county of Lincoln, I ſpoke my mind freely, 'whereby I incurred ſome diſpleaſure. But better 'it is to obey God than men.' It may not be amiſs to obſerve here, that this voluntary choice of Sir William Cecil for the county of Lincoln, both in this and in the ſucceeding parliament, which was the laſt of that reign, does equal honour to him, and to thoſe who choſe him; for even at that time of day, the court exerted both art and power in order to carry it's point in parliament; and it plainly appears, from the collections of ſtate papers (53), and private letters relating to thoſe times, that both the influence of miniſters, and downright corruption, were employed to gain the members to compliance, as alſo to engage the people to chooſe members that would comply (54). The proceeding therefore of ſo great a county as Lincoln in ſuch a caſe, was a clear proof, that the men of property therein had eſcaped the contagion; and that theſe uncorrupt perſons ſhould without any ſolicitation, or even application, of Sir Wiliam Cecil, fix upon him to be knight for their ſhire, is a noble teſtimony of his merit; as it very clearly proves, that he was thought a man of the greateſt candour and courage by thoſe who knew him beſt, and who, as they were incorruptible themſelves, would moſt certainly take care in their choice to have ſuch a repreſentative as they thought above corruption.

(52) Lord Burleigh's MS. Diary.

(53) Strype's Memorials, vol. iii. in the Collection of Records.

(54) Collection of State Papers in the hands of J.C.

[K] The moſt grateful reverence is due to his memory.] We have an account from Camden of the wiſdom and prudence of this reformation, and he gives a ſuccinct account of the heads of that famous paper which was drawn up for the management of it (55). This paper is alſo mentioned by Burnet in his Hiſtory of the Reformation (56), and is actually inſerted in his collection of records (57), and there is another copy of it printed by Strype (58); but it is not yet agreed who was the author of this paper. Some think it was John Hales, others aſcribe it to Mr. Beale, Clerk of the Council; but Strype is rather inclined to think it was penned by Sir Thomas Smith: the title of it is, The Device for the alteration of religion in the firſt year of Queen Elizabeth, offered to Secretary Cecil. It conſiſts of ſeven queſtions, all of them very ſhort, propounding the principal things to be done towards a Reformation, with their anſwers, at large. Two things are certain with regard to this paper, firſt, that it was the baſis of all that was afterwards done in parliament; and ſecondly, that it was offered to the Queen, and ſome of her principal miniſters, by Secretary Cecil. To me, I muſt confeſs, it is very apparent, that it was either written by, or under the direction of, Sir William Cecil himſelf, though he took the neceſſary precaution of making it paſs for a thing propoſed to him, that he might not ſeem too aſſuming, and that he might not be obliged to enter into the defence of every particular in it, if the Queen or her miniſters, had thought proper to vary it in any reſpect. In parliament he argued for every part of it learnedly and clearly, and it was his advice that all ſuch as were affected to Popery, might be allowed to ſpeak freely upon that occaſion; which they did, and fiercely too, but with very little weight; ſo that all that was done had not only the outward form and appearance of a legal and conſtitutional ſanction, but really and truly received it, without any interpoſition of force, of influence, or of corruption (59). This great ſtateſman himſelf, in a treatiſe upon the Felicities of the Queen his Miſtreſs's reign, ſets down, as one of the firſt, her ſettlement of religion, of which he

(55) Annal. Eliz. p. 30, 31, 32.

(56) Hiſt. Reformation, vol. ii. p. 377.

(57) Collection of Records, p. 327.

(58) Annals of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 4. in the Appendix.

(59) Memoirs of the Adminiſtration of William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, p. 29, 30.

which, to have diſpatched in the manner he did, would have taken up all another man's time, and actually took up a very large proportion of his, did not, however, hinder him from interpoſing in all the great affairs that related to the ſervice of the Crown and the welfare of the nation. Amongſt theſe he very juſtly reckoned the regulation of the coin, which had been debaſed in the reign of Henry VIII. and had been alſo practiſed upon in that of Edward VI. to ſuch a degree, as to be thought paſt reſtoring; and an attempt being made for that purpoſe which miſcarried, in the reign of Queen Mary, the impoſſibility of doing any good in it, paſſed, at this time, for a thing certain (c). But it was Cecil's maxim that whatever was neceſſary muſt be expedient, and therefore he perſuaded the Queen to ſet about it without delay, which ſhe did; and though the deſign was not immediately brought to perfection, yet the ſucceſs that attended this firſt ſtep gave very great hopes, and at laſt his ſcheme took effect entirely; which, to thoſe who are proper judges, will not only appear a great felicity, but one of the moſt important in this reign [L]. As he contributed by this ſtep very much to the ſettling of affairs at home, by removing many of the difficulties, which, though they were ſeverely felt, had never been underſtood, or their true cauſe diſcovered, ſo he was very far from neglecting affairs abroad, which were alſo exceſſively embroiled, Spain being already a ſecret, and France a declared, enemy, with the advantage of having Scotland much in her power, and a very plauſible pretence from the Queen of Scotland's marriage to have it wholly; ſo by Cecil's advice the Queen looked cloſely to what was neareſt, and took thoſe under her protection who ſtood up for the Reformed Religion in Scotland; well knowing that ſhe had it in her power to ſupport her friends there with much leſs trouble and expence than the French, and in the mean time ſuffered the buſineſs of a general peace to proceed in the ſlow way of a negociation, in which Spain pretended to have the Queen's concerns at heart, but with little ſincerity (d). When the French found that the oppoſition in Scotland was not to be got over by any force that they could ſpare, they began to try another method, and their Ambaſſador at London was directed to propoſe to Queen Elizabeth the yielding up of Calais. The loſs of this town was ſaid to have broken Queen Mary's heart, the reſtitution had been vigorouſly inſiſted upon by Queen Elizabeth, and the Spaniards themſelves, to keep up a ſhew of good intention, for ſome time ſupported her inſtances upon this head; yet now, when ſhe might have had it without any obligation to the Spaniard, ſhe anſwered very ſteadily and wiſely, That ſhe would not deſert her friends for a paltry fiſhing-town (e). The French, upon this, finding ſhe would not go their way were obliged to go her's, and to offer a negociation in Scotland for reſtoring the peace of that kingdom. This was very readily accepted; Sir William Cecil and other Commiſſioners were diſpatched into that country, and by concluding the convention of Leith, and the treaty of Edinburgh, raiſed their miſtreſs's reputation, and ſecured the peace of the kingdom on that ſide (f). Upon his return he was received with great marks of eſteem by his Sovereign, who, upon the death of her good ſervant and faithful Counſellor Sir Thomas Perry, beſtowed his place of Maſter of the Wards, Jan. 10, (c) Life of Lord Burleigh.

(d) Camden. Annal. p. 40.

(e) Life of Lord Burleigh.

(f) Camden. Annal. p. 66, 67.

he ſpeaks with great modeſty, and moderation, affirming, that the Queen ever declined the title of Head of the Church, though ſhe deſired to be eſteemed, what of right ſhe was, the ſovereign of all her ſubjects, eccleſiaſtical as well as civil. Of his own concern in this buſineſs he is altogether ſilent; but it appears from the moſt authentick papers, that he was the principal manager of it, both in reſpect of matter and manner (60). He was the promoter of all things in the Houſe of Commons; by his direction bills were propoſed in the Houſe of Peers; he thought of Dr. Parker for Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and upon the whole, Strype had reaſon to ſay as he does, 'There was indeed great oppoſition made to the 'formation of religion by many men at court; and 'had it not been for Cecil's diligence, wiſdom, and 'intereſt with the Queen, in all likelihood, it had 'not proceeded with that roundneſs it did.' This, ſays he, I ſet down here as a debt of gratitude, owing from this Church to his memory (61).

(60) Life of Lord Burleigh. Meditation on the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, by Lord Burleigh, MS.

(61) Annals of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 82.

[L] But one of the moſt important in this reign.] We are told by the author of his life, that it was a common ſaying of this great man, That a kingdom cannot be rich while it's coin is baſe (62). He had indeed extraordinary judgment in things of this kind; and even in King Edward's time he had conſidered the matter very maturely; for it was with a view to this that he engaged his learned and worthy friend, Sir Thomas Smith, to write a treatiſe on the value of Roman money; which he accordingly did, and addreſſed it to Sir William Cecil (63). The truth of the matter was, that the coin had been ſcandalouſly debaſed; for the ſhilling, which in the firſt of Henry VIII. contained one hundred and eighteen grains of fine ſilver, was in the latter part of his reign reduced to forty, and in the reign of Edward VI. it was brought down to twenty grains (64). And this was the true cauſe of the ſuppoſed dearneſs of moſt commodities, which though in reality very little raiſed in their value, were however in appearance ſold for four or five times as much money as in former times. But this alteration, like every other meaſure of which he had the direction, was not brought about haſtily, and with violence, but in ſo eaſy, and ſo gentle a manner, that while both the Crown and people bore a ſhare in the burthen of the reformation, yet they eaſed one another ſo much, that the load was hardly felt. By proclamation (65) the value of baſe money was reduced, though not ſo low as it's intrinſick worth. At this rate, which was ſufficient to encourage the ſubject to bring it in, the Queen received it at her mint, and thence iſſued again ſterling ſilver; for during the whole courſe of her Majeſty's reign, gold and ſilver only were coined, and the money of England, from being as bad as any, became very ſoon the faireſt and fineſt in Europe (66). This having opened a paſſage, and made ſuch a thing practicable, the prices of moſt neceſſaries were reduced, that the publick might reap the advantage of ſo wiſe a regulation. There was likewiſe due care taken, that ſoldiers, ſervants, and day-labourers, ſhould be juſtly and regularly paid, and have a ſhort and ſecure remedy againſt any that might attempt to oppreſs them. As to the firſt, it was a common ſaying in the army, during her whole reign, and it was ſurely a ſaying that did honour to her adminiſtration, viz. The Queen pays bountifully, though ſhe rewards ſparingly (67).

(62) Life of Lord Burleigh.

(63) Life of Sir Thomas Smith, by Strype, and the heads of the treatiſe itſelf, which is now loſt, are to be found in the Appendix.

(64) Mr. Lowndes's Extract from the Mint, in Locke's Diſcourſe upon the Coin, p. 69.

(65) Life of Lord Burleigh.

(66) Camden. Annal. Eliz. p. 75.

(67) Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, cap. i.

1561,

1561, on Sir William Cecil. As there never was a Princeſs more frugal of honours or ſlow in preferments than Queen Elizabeth, ſo the examples of pluralities under her reign were ſo very few, that it is not at all ſurpriſing they were attended with much envy (g). Sir William had his ſhare of this while he was Secretary only; but when he was alſo made Maſter of the Wards the clamour grew louder, but without much affecting him, for having enough to do with the Queen's buſineſs and his own, he troubled not himſelf with people's ſpeeches. His new office brought upon him freſh cares and an additional load of buſineſs, which however he went through with patience and diligence, and diſcharged it to the ſatisfaction of all, but thoſe who were reſolved not to be ſatisfied (b) [M]. It is generally agreed, that Parliaments in this reign were very different from what they have been ſince, and that great points of State were ſeldom ſuffered to come under the conſideration of the Houſe of Commons. There wanted not, however, ſome buſy ſpirits then as well as in ſucceeding times, who flattered themſelves with the hopes of becoming conſiderable, either by pretending to an extraordinary degree of loyalty, or a flaming zeal for their country; and theſe gave the Queen and her Miniſters no ſmall trouble, more eſpecially with regard to the ſucceſſion, a point of which they were very tender, and with very good reaſon; for the Queen being the laſt of her family and unmarried, there wanted not ſome who were deſirous to preſs the change of her condition upon their Miſtreſs, under a colour of love and reſpect; and others again were very ſolicitous to have the ſucceſſion proviſionally ſettled, as a thing equally neceſſary for the Queen's ſecurity, and the tranquillity of her ſubjects (i). But Elizabeth was too wiſe to conceive very highly of the fidelity of either of theſe parties, and therefore made it her conſtant ſtudy to quiet both, having very ſubſtantial reaſons againſt declaring in favour of either (k). This too was her Miniſter's point, which, though he managed in the Houſe of Commons with great dexterity, and, generally ſpeaking, with good effect, yet he raiſed himſelf thereby many warm enemies amongſt both parties, who perſecuted him with all the bitterneſs and venom imaginable, by defaming him both to his Sovereign and to the people. Sir William Cecil was very ſenſible of this, and yet he was very far from retorting this uſage on his enemies: on the contrary, he was extremely courteous to men of all parties, received whatever informations or complaints were addreſſed to him, and did what he could towards giving every body ſatisfaction, meddling as little as it was poſſible in Court intrigues, and neglecting nothing that fell properly under his care, as a Secretary of State or Privy-Counſellor (l) [N]. It was very early diſcovered, that, notwithſtanding all his fair pretences, King Philip II. of Spain was very far from being ſincerely well-affected to Queen Elizabeth; nor was that Princeſs appriſed of it earlier by any body than by her Secretary, Cecil, who from time to time

(g) Life of Lord Burleigh.

(b) See this point fully juſtified in the notes.

(i) Camden. Annal. p. 125. Strype, Hollinſhed, Stowe, &c.

(k) Camden, ubi ſupra. Oſborne's Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. Strype's Annals.

(l) Life of Lord Burleigh.

[M] Who were reſolved not to be ſatisfied.] His enemies were in hopes that this preferment would have been fatal to him. The poſt of Maſter of the Wards had been always executed by a Lawyer, and becauſe Sir William Cecil profeſſed himſelf none, they were ready to take him at his word, and flattered themſelves they ſhould ſoon find him tripping. Their hopes were much increaſed upon his firſt coming into the court, where it is allowed that he turned all things upſide down; for finding the forms and practice very different from, or rather directly oppoſite to, the rules preſcribed by former maſters, he firſt conſidered them, and finding they were juſt and right, he obliged the practiſers to conform to them (68). They ſtruggled vehemently at the beginning, and talked loudly of the known forms; but Sir William Cecil told them, they muſt ſtick to the known rules, for that theſe would regulate both his conduct and theirs. Whereas by the other method they were parties, practiſers, and judges, all at once, which for his own dignity, the eaſe of the ſuitors, and the credit of the court, he could not allow (69). His method was, to hear patiently all that could be alledged without haſtily declaring his own opinion; but he held the Lawyers to the point, and would not let them digreſs to ſhow their eloquence or their wit. His decrees were ſhort and plain, which he delivered firſt ſlowly, and with much ſolemnity; and then in a clear and regular method, he delivered the reaſons of his decree, from point to point, and would always have the latter entered with the former. He raiſed the Queen's revenue, and reformed many abuſes, but without bearing hard upon the ſubject, or making his court odious to the nobility. Contempts of the court, which before had been regarded as matters of practice, he treated ſeriouſly and ſeverely; for he ſaid, that even thoſe who could not do, were under no neceſſity of declining juſtice; and that, as he did not ſit there to oppreſs, ſo he would not be trifled with, or ſuffer the Queen's authority to be deſpiſed. He kept alſo the ſheriffs, and all the officers of the court, in great awe; and as he was very exact himſelf, ſo he loved and expected punctuality in others (70). He willingly heard the Lawyers argue in any court where he ſat, and would often argue himſelf, with great weight and perſpicuity. Yet his ſkill in the Law ſerved, in his private capacity, to no other purpoſe, than to keep clear of it; for it is ſaid, that in his whole life-time he never ſued or was ſued (71). So exact was his regard to juſtice, and ſo extenſive his patience.

(68) Life of Lord Burleigh.

(69) Remarks on the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, and upon the Character of her principal Miniſters. Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(70) Memoirs of William Cecil Lord Burleigh, p. 35, 36.

(71) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

[N] As a Secretary of State or Privy-Counſellor.] It might be imagined, that the great reſerve which Sir William Cecil conſtantly kept upon the ſubject of the ſucceſſion, might poſſibly ariſe from his complaiſance, or deference, for the behaviour of the Queen his miſtreſs; but it ſeems more likely, that his advice influenced her behaviour, in reference to this ticklish point. There were no leſs than three claimants publickly mentioned, viz. the Queen of Scots, the family of Haſtings, and the family of Suffolk; and the partizans of each of theſe were equally vehement and loud (72). The Queen obſerved a kind of neutrality, but ſtill in ſuch a manner, as ſufficiently intimated ſhe favoured the firſt title, or rather looked upon it as the beſt, notwithſtanding the jealouſies ſhe had of her preſumptive ſucceſſor. This appeared by her confining John Hales, who wrote a book in defence of the Suffolk line (73), and by impriſoning one Thornton, upon the complaint of the Queen of Scots (74), for writing againſt her title. The Secretary kept himſelf clear of theſe buſineſſes, and never gave the leaſt intimation of his own ſentiments, farther than that he wiſhed the queſtion of the ſucceſſion might reſt during the Queen's life, or till ſhe thought proper to determine it in a legal way; for thus much we find delivered in ſome of his diſcourſes, all, or moſt of which, I ſuppoſe, to have been brought to the Queen's ear or eye, as being calculated entirely for her ſervice (75).

(72) See Leiceſter's Commonwealth. Doleman's Treatiſe of the Succeſſion, and other pieces of the like kind.

(73) Strype's Annals, vol. i. p. 410.

(74) Camd. Annal. Eliz. p. 128.

(75) A Meditation of the State of England during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, by the Lord Treaſurer of England, the Lord Burleigh, MS.

laid before her the diſcoveries that were made of his Catholick Majeſty's practices, and the reaſons ſhe had to apprehend, that he meant to do her ſtill worſe offices than thoſe he had done already. Yet the Secretary conſtantly adviſed the Queen not to break with that Monarch, but to diſſemble her ſenſe of his ill uſage; and at the ſame time propoſed ſending the Lord Vicount Montacute at the head of an embaſſy into Spain, that from time to time ſhe might find new pretences for negociations, rather than be obliged to commit hoſtilities (m). This the enemies of Cecil repreſented as the effects of a weak and timorous diſpoſition, detrimental to the Queen's credit abroad, and injurious to the glory of the nation. But in regard to the French, Sir William Cecil purſued quite another conduct; for he had adviſed the Queen to liſten to the propoſals made by the Proteſtants in that kingdom, and to aſſiſt them with ſhips, men, and ammunition, as well as money, which ſhe accordingly did; and this proved the cauſe of new clamours; for thoſe who before held him fearful and puſillanimous, charged him now with raſhneſs and diſregard of the public ſafety; whereas, in fact, he acted very conſiſtently in both buſineſſes (n). He thought the power of the King of Spain too great to be diſputed with till that of his Miſtreſs was better eſtabliſhed: but he judged otherwiſe of the ſtate of the French, and was willing that the Engliſh troops ſhould gain experience, and the navy ſtrength, at the expence of a foreign power, that for many years had been practiſing againſt the ſafety of his country (o). It is very probable, that the moſt potent of his enemies were well enough appriſed of the reaſons by which he ſupported the advices he gave to the Queen: but, as parties are very ſeldom guided by any principle, when they found themſelves, as they thought, ſtrong enough, they made no ſcruple of attacking him with all the violence imaginable; in order to which, they repreſented the ſtate of public affairs as very dangerous, and in a manner deſperate, and charged him with being the author of all the meaſures by which they became ſo: but the Queen was too wiſe to be deceived by ſuch ſtories, and a Princeſs of too great ſpirit, to give up a Miniſter who had ſerved her faithfully, to reſentments which he had drawn upon himſelf by his fidelity in her ſervice (p) [O]. One would have imagined, that this would have ſecured Sir William Cecil from any future attacks of the like kind; but it was very far from having this effect; for as it ſhewed the Queen's high eſteem of his perſon and counſels, ſo it raiſed the malice and jealouſy of the Earl of Leiceſter, his principal competitor, to the utmoſt height; and therefore he was a conſtant ſpy upon all his actions, and left no method untried to bring about his diſgrace. Some years after, another opportunity preſented itſelf which Leiceſter determined to make uſe of (q). Some Spaniſh ſhips, having great treaſure on board, put into the Engliſh ports to ſecure it from the French, and afterwards landed it, the Queen's officers aſſiſting, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador ſolemnly affirming it was his maſter's money, and that he was ſending it into the Netherlands for the pay of his army. The Secretary, in the mean time, received advice, that not one piece of eight belonged to the King of Spain; but that it was the money of ſome Genoeſe Bankers, who were in the greateſt terror leſt the Duke of Alva ſhould convert the ſame to his Maſter's uſe, in order to carry on ſome great deſign, which the Court of Spain kept as an impenetrable ſecret. Sir William Cecil therefore adviſed the Queen to take the money herſelf and give the Genoeſe ſecurity for it, by which method he ſhewed her, that ſhe would greatly advantage her own affairs, diſtreſs the Spaniards, relieve the Netherlands, and wrong no body (r). The Queen took his advice, upon which the Duke of Alva ſeized the effects of the Engliſh in the Netherlands, the Queen made repriſals, and out of them immediately indemnified her own merchants. The Spaniſh Ambaſſador at London kept no meaſures upon this occaſion. He gave Secretary Cecil ill language at the Council-Table, and libelled the Queen, by appealing to the people againſt their Sovereign's adminiſtration (s). This produced a great deal of diſturbance, and Leiceſter and his party took care to have it publiſhed every where, that Cecil was the ſole author of this counſel. While things were in this ferment, Leiceſter held a private conſultation with the Lords he had drawn to his intereſt, wherein he propoſed that they ſhould take this occaſion of removing a man, whom they unanimouſly hated. Some of the Lords enquiring How this could be done? Sir Nicholas Throgmorton anſwered, 'Let him be charged with ſome matter or other in Council when the Queen is not pre-'ſent, commit him to the Tower thereupon, and when he is once in priſon we ſhall find

(m) Camden's Annal. p. 70.

(n) Strype, Hollinſhed, Stow, &c.

(o) Life of Lord Burleigh.

(p) See this point clearly explained in the notes [O] and [P].

(q) Memoirs of the Life and Adminiſtration of William Cecil Baron Burleigh, p. 47.

(r) Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia.

(s) Camden. Annal. p. 177.

[O] By his fidelity in her ſervice.] It is not a little uncertain when this firſt attempt was made againſt Sir William Cecil; but in all probability, as it aroſe on the ſcore of the ſuccours and money which the Queen ſent to France, it might be in the year 1562, when that matter was upon the carpet; for at that time there were abundance of ſtories ſpread about to the Secretary's diſadvantage; and this not only without regard to truth, but even with manifeſt contempt of probability; as for inſtance, that he had changed his religion in Queen Mary's time, and laboured to be Secretary, if that Princeſs would have conſented; and that, being diſappointed of his hopes, he correſponded with the Princeſs Elizabeth, and was new modelling the Court entirely to his own mind. Theſe ſtories were circulated by his enemies at home and abroad, to juſtify the attempts that were to be made to drive him out of the Queen's favour: but as ſhe knew better than any body, that what was alledged was directly falſe, that he had never diſſembled his religion, and that the motives to his conduct were very different from thoſe which were ſuggeſted, ſhe readily gueſſed at the true ſources of theſe intrigues, and gave her favourites to underſtand, that ſhe was miſtreſs of her own reſolutions, and would keep, or remove, her Miniſters as ſhe thought proper (76).

(76) Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, chap. i.

(t) Life of Lord Burleigh.

'things enow againſt him (t).' It ſo happened, that about this time a flagrant libel being publiſhed againſt the Nobility, Lord Leiceſter cauſed Cecil to be charged before the Council, with either being the author of it, or it's patron; of which he offered no other proof than this, that it had been ſeen on Cecil's table. This the Secretary readily confeſſed, but inſiſted that he looked upon it in the ſame light they did, as a moſt ſcandalous invective; in ſupport of which he produced his own copy with notes on the margin, affirming that he had cauſed a ſtrict enquiry to be made after the author and publiſher of the work (u). All this however would have been but of little uſe to him, if the Queen had not had private notice of their deſign. While therefore the Secretary was defending himſelf, ſhe (little expected, and leſs wiſhed for) entered the Council-Room, and having in few words expreſſed her diſlike of ſuch cabals, preſerved her Miniſter, and ſhewed even Leiceſter himſelf that he could not be overthrown: another ſingular inſtance of the Miniſter's good fortune, and of the Queen's firmneſs (w)[P]. The affair of the Duke of Norfolk's ruin followed, not long after he had been embarked in the faction againſt Cecil; and therefore we find this Miniſter ſometimes charged, though very unjuſtly, with being the author of his misfortunes, a calumny from which he vindicated himſelf with candour, clearneſs, and vivacity (x), as equally abhorring the thoughts of revenge, and hazarding the public ſafety, to facilitate his private advantage. The truth of the matter is, that Cecil had no greater ſhare in the Duke's misfortune, than was neceſſarily impoſed upon him by his office of Secretary, and which conſequently it was not in his power to avoid; to which we may add, that the Duke himſelf was in ſome meaſure acceſſary thereto, by acting under the deluſive influence of his capital enemy as well as Cecil's (y)[Q]. In the mean time that furious rebellion broke out in the North, which in part juſtified the truth of what he ſuggeſted to have been the real deſign of his enemies, when they laid that deep plot for his de-(u) Memoirs of the Life and Adminiſtration of the Lord Burleigh, p. 48, 49.

(w) Camden. Annal. p. 178.

(x) See the particulars of this in the note.

(y) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 542.

[P] And of the Queen's firmneſs.] This ſecond ſcheme, which was carried to a much greater length than the former, or than any of the former, for Camden intimates, that there was more than one deſigned before this againſt Cecil (77), was concerted by the greateſt men in the kingdom, and may be truly conſidered as the ſtrongeſt attack that was ever made upon a Miniſter without bringing him to ruin. The beſt way of repreſenting facts of this nature is, from original writers, who lived in the times when they happened, and of theſe I ſhall produce two: the firſt is a Popiſh writer, who ſets down the matter thus, 'Cecil 'being rejected by Queen Mary got to ſerve the Lady 'Elizabeth, and entered with her when ſhe came to 'the crown, to the change of religion, &c. the Earl 'of Arundel was cozened by him and Bacon, with 'hopes of having the Queen in marriage, &c. Theſe 'proceedings of Cecil and Bacon ſeeming intolerable 'to the antient nobility of the realm, they joined in 'the old Lord Treaſurer's houſe to pull them both from 'her Majeſty by violence, and to hang them at the 'Court gate; but Cecil eſcaped, by abuſing the Duke 'of Norfolk with weeping and fair promiſes, and paid 'him afterwards with cutting off his head, &c (78).' The other account I ſhall mention is from Camden, who, very probably, ſpoke from his own knowledge: he ſays the pretence was, the adviſing the Queen to ſeize the money that was going to the Low-Countries; but that the true reaſon was, that the great men who were concerned in this buſineſs looked upon him as a favourer of the houſe of Suffolk. Theſe great men were the Marquis of Wincheſter, Lord Treaſurer; the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Weſtmorland, Pembroke, Leiceſter, and others, and at a ſecret council held by them, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton gave it as his advice, to clap the Secretary into the Tower (79), and when he was once in priſon they ſhould find matter enough againſt him; but the Queen coming in ſuddenly upon them ſpoiled all their projects, and protected her Miniſter from their intended malice. The writer of his life makes this to have ariſen from a ſeditious book that was publiſhed at that time, in which moſt of the Miniſters, and many of the nobility were traduced; and becauſe he had it very early in his cloſet his enemies would have ſuggeſted, that either by his direction, or at leaſt with his privity, it was written; whereas in fact, he procured the book only with an intent to anſwer it: upon this, he ſays, he was called before the Council, with an intention to commit him whatever defence he might make; but that the Secretary being informed of this wrote to the Queen, who thereupon ſent orders that nothing ſhould be done to him without her knowledge, which prevented his being ſent to the Tower (80). As to the book, it is very probable, they knew more of it than he: for it was a libel penned by the Spaniſh Ambaſſador under the feigned name of Amadis Oriana, and contained abundance of ſcandalous reflections upon the Queen herſelf. It is moſt likely, that the Secretary eſcaped this dangerous contrivance, by diſcovering to the Queen what was at the bottom of it, and that was the proclaiming the Queen of Scots heir to the crown, which he well knew was a thing ſhe could not bear (81). The writer of his life ſays, that he had another, and narrower eſcape ſoon after; for a perſon being hired to ſit at the bottom of the ſtairs that led from the Queen's cloſet, and to ſtab him as he came down from thence, he had notice of it barely time enough to ſave himſelf, by going another way (82). Such were the perilous times in which this ſtateſman lived, and ſuch the deſperate politicks of thoſe who were his enemies.

(77) Annal. Eliz. p. 178.

(78) Extract of a Treatiſe written in Latin by John Philopatris.

(79) Camd. Annal. ubi ſupra.

(80) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(81) Camden. Annal. Eliz. p. 178.

(82) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

[Q] Of his capital enemy as well as Cecil's.] This Duke of Norfolk, then the only man of that quality in England, was a perſon as much admired for his virtues, and beloved for his amiable qualities, as reſpected for his high birth, and the great influence his rank, and large fortune, gave him (83). He was not, however, without his failings, and certainly he made but an indifferent judgment of men, who truſted Leiceſter and ſuſpected Cecil; which he did to ſuch a degree, that his marriage to the Queen of Scots being ſpoken of in the preſence of the Secretary, the Duke bid him go prattle that in the Queen's ears; to which Sir William Cecil mildly anſwered, That though he was no tale-bearer, yet he ſhould be ready at any time to carry what might render him ſervice, for whom he had as great a regard as for any nobleman in the kingdom (84). The Duke, who was naturally a worthy and well-natured man, took this kindly, and explained himſelf freely; upon which Sir William Cecil adviſed him to open himſelf to the Queen; and he procured him an opportunity for that purpoſe, which if he had taken, Leiceſter's ſchemes had been overturned, and the Duke had very probably ſaved his own head, and that of the Queen of Scots (85). But he was fatally blinded, and betrayed by Leiceſter. Nor did his once getting out of the Tower, and procuring the Queen's pardon, in which Cecil had a great ſhare, prevent his dipping again into the ſame dangerous practices, which in the end brought him to the ſcaffold in 1572 (86). In ſeveral papers written long after the Duke's death, the Lord Burleigh lamented his fate, and profeſſed the ſincerity of his affection towards him ſo far, as conſiſted with the care of the publick, and his duty to his ſovereign (87).

(83) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 540.

(84) Memoirs of the Adminiſtration of William Lord Burleigh, p. 50.

(85) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 540.

(86) Camden. Annal. p. 255.

(87) Particularly in his Diſcourſe of the Felicities of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, under the title of A Meditation, &c.

struction (z); and he returned the Queen his miſtreſs the kindneſſes ſhe had ſhown him in preſerving him from ſo powerful a confederacy, by confounding the devices of his and her enemies, and extinguiſhing the flame of rebellion, though powerfully fomented from abroad, and ſecretly abetted by numbers at home, almoſt as ſoon as it blazed (a); and this, rather by the aſſiſtance afforded by his intelligence, for he was then ſole Secretary, and by the wiſe diſcourſes he penned, for he delighted in ſhowing the nation that they were governed by reaſon, and not by the Queen's will or that of her Miniſters, than by the troops that were employed, which were militia, whoſe cauſe rather than diſcipline was better than that of the rebels. Thus the prudence of Cecil prevailed more than arms, and hindered that defection from becoming general, which the Earl of Weſtmorland's influence in the North made dangerous enough in every particular (b) [R]. After ſo glorious an inſtance, not of his zeal and ability only, but of his ſucceſs in her ſervice, the Queen could not well avoid rewarding him, how ſparing ſoever ſhe might be in conferring honours; and, therefore, in February 1571, ſhe created him Baron of Burleigh, with the univerſal approbation of her ſubjects (c). At this time, as it appeared that he ſtood firm in the Queen's favour, of which none had intereſt enough to diſpoſſeſs him, many who had been formerly either ſecretly or openly his enemies, ſhewed an earneſt deſire of being reconciled, and living for the future upon good terms with him, which, as he was a man of a benevolent diſpoſition, and a great lover of peace, muſt have given him peculiar ſatisfaction (d). Amongſt theſe was Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, of all his adverſaries, the Earl of Leiceſter excepted, the moſt able and the moſt active: but this ſtep is ſaid to have coſt that gentleman dear, for he died not long after ſuddenly, and ſome ſay violently alſo (e). But notwithſtanding this, our great Stateſman was very far from being ſafe; ſince, within a very ſhort time after his being raiſed to the title of Lord Burleigh, another conſpiracy againſt his life was diſcovered by one of the accomplices, which made a very great noiſe, on account of the ſhare that the Spaniſh Ambaſſador had in it, upon whom the two aſſaſſins, Barney and Mather, charged it at their execution (f). For this, and other offences, the ſaid Ambaſſador was ordered to depart the kindom. To comfort the Lord Burleigh under the ſenſe he muſt have of his danger, as well as to reward him for his diligence and fidelity, the Queen, in the month of June 1572, made him Knight of the Garter (g); and in the month of September following, upon the death of the Marquis of Wincheſter, Lord High-Treaſurer, Lord Burleigh was raiſed to that great office (h), which brought with it a new acceſſion of cares, and an additional load of buſineſs; which however he went through with ſo much prudence and patience, as amazed that age, and will hardly be believed in this (i) [S]. If we ſhould particularly take notice of all the great tranſactions in which he had a principal ſhare, this article would ſwell into a Hiſtory; but it is ſufficient for our purpoſe

(z) Biſhop Carleton's thankful Remembrances of God's Mercies, p. 15.

(a) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(b) See an extract of the Life of Pope Pius V. written by Jerom Catena, in Carleton's Remembrances, p. 17.

(c) Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii. p. 406. Pat. 14 Eliz. p. 9. Fuller's Holy State, p. 256.

(d) Memoirs of the Adminiſtration of William Lord Burleigh, p. 55.

(e) Camden. Annal. Eliz. p. 221, 222.

(f) Carleton's Remembrances, p. 33.

(g) Aſhmole's Order of the Garter, p. 715.

(h) Rymer's Fœd. vol. xvi. p. 716. Stowe's Annals, p. 672. Hollinſhed's Chronicle, p. 1864.

(i) See this explained in the note.

[R] Made dangerous enough in every particular.] It has been ſaid, and that from inconteſtable authorities, that in the ſuppreſſing of this rebellion Sir William Cecil exerted his abilities to the utmoſt, in three different methods, all of which were extremely well calculated for extinguiſhing this dangerous flame, and for ſecuring the publick peace (88), viz. I. By procuring intelligence of the manner in which theſe northern Lords intended to proceed, and of the foreign aids they hoped for, whereby their own meaſures were baffled, and the arrival of foreign troops prevented, as alſo the Queen's forces eaſier raiſed, and better poſted, than they could otherwiſe have been. II. By the publication of honeſt and pathetic writings, addreſſed to the Commons of England, wherein they were ſhewn the folly and danger of ſuch wicked proceedings, the wretched characters thoſe men had on whom they depended, and the miſerable condition they would be in when their attempts ſhould be overthrown, whereby numbers who were inclined to the party were reſtrained within the bounds of their duty, and inclined rather to keep their lives and eſtates in peace, than to hazard both in other folks quarrels. Theſe pieces are yet extant, and ſhew clearly what ſort of writings are beſt ſuited to the minds of the Engliſh nation, as well as what may be expected from an honeſt explanation of meaſures well deſigned. III. The Secretary exerted a ſkill in politicks unknown to any other man or times. He laid hold of the information from various counties of ſtrollers, vagabonds, and idle perſons, and directing a private ſearch on a day certain throughout the kingdom, he ſhut up ſome thouſands of diſorderly people, and thereby preſerved the public peace, and the priſoners themſelves. It was by theſe wiſe, legal, and gentle methods, that he extricated the Queen and the nation, from the terrors of this public calamity, which if it recommended him to his ſovereign's favour, procured alſo the people's applauſe.

(88) Camden, Strype, Stowe, Hollinſhed, Rapin.

[S] And will hardly be believed in this.] We will ſtate at once the facts themſelves, and the evidence by which they are ſupported, and this by citing what is ſaid by the writer of his life, who ſpoke only of what he ſaw and knew. This then is his account (89).

(89) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

'The reputation of his juſtice, and of his integrity, 'drew upon him ſuch a multitude of ſuits as was in-'credible, except to us who ſaw it. For beſides all 'buſineſs in Council, or other weighty cauſes, and 'ſuch as were anſwered by word of mouth, there was 'not a day in Term wherein he received not three-'ſcore, fourſcore, or a hundred petitions, which he 'commonly read that night, and gave every man an 'anſwer the next morning as he went to the hall. 'Whence the excellence of his memory was greatly 'admired; for when any of theſe petitioners told him 'their names, or what countrymen they were, he 'preſently entered into the merit of his requeſt, and 'having diſcuſſed it gave him his anſwer. Nor was 'this his practice towards perſons of condition only, 'but he would anſwer the pooreſt ſoul in the world by 'word of mouth: and when at any time he was forced 'to keep his chamber, or his bed, he took order that 'poor ſuitors ſhould ſend in their petitions ſealed. 'Upon every petition he cauſed his anſwer to be writ-'ten on the backſide, and ſubſcribed it with his own 'name. Thus he held on his courſe like himſelf, 'prayed for the poor, honoured by the rich, 'feared by the bad, and loved by the good. To his 'Prince, and country, loyal, and to the ſubjects moſt 'pleaſing. For wondering at his great wiſdom and 'gravity, praiſing his juſtice and integrity, moſt men 'honoured him with the title of Father of the 'Commonwealth.

poſe

poſe to obſerve, that though few Princes ſhewed a greater jealouſy than Queen Elizabeth did of her authority, yet there hardly ever was a Miniſter in this kingdom that had a larger ſhare of power than the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh (k). It was by his advice that all foreign affairs were tranſacted, excepting the ſending over the Earl of Leiceſter into Holland, which was the pure effect of that Nobleman's own contrivance (l). In all affairs of the Church he was applied to as its ſteady friend and conſtant protector, which was very probably the reaſon, that his competitor Leiceſter ſet himſelf at the head of the Puritans (m). As Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge, the Lord Treaſurer had a large province under his peculiar inſpection; and the reſpect which he had for that learned body, ſhewed itſelf by a diligence in promoting their intereſts, compoſing their differences, and preferring their members in ſuch a degree, that upon the peruſal of the addreſſes made to him on this head only, one cannot help admiring, how he could find time to take ſuch conſtant and particular notice of them as he did (n). Beſides all this, the buſineſs of the Treaſury was done with the utmoſt ſtrictneſs and punctuality; the diſburſements from thence were made with the greateſt exactneſs, ſo that every body who had any thing to do with the Crown was ſecure of juſtice, as well as obliged to do juſtice (o). His Lordſhip heard cauſes alſo in the Exchequer and in the Star-Chamber, aſſiſted conſtantly at the Privy-Council, and in the time of Parliament managed the buſineſs of the Crown in the Houſe of Peers (p). The diſcharge of ſuch a variety of duties muſt have been very fatiguing, and yet they were much heightened by other difficulties he had to ſtruggle with. The Popiſh and Spaniſh emiſſaries, but more eſpecially the Jeſuits, were his mortal enemies, and not contented with aſperſing and defaming him at home, publiſhed voluminous libels abroad, of which he had conſtant intelligence, and to which he never failed to give ſober and ſuitable anſwers, and in them defended not only his own cauſe, but the cauſes of other Miniſters, and of his Queen and country alſo (q) [T]. At Court likewiſe, he was for many years in a ſtate of continual apprehenſion, (k) Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, chap. v.

(l) Leiceſter's Commonwealth, p. 195.

(m) Strype's Annals. Life of Archbiſhop Parker. Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift.

(n) See the Letters to, and Anſwer by, the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, in the Appendixes to the ſeveral books cited in the foregoing note.

(o) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(p) Memoirs of the Adminiſtration of William Lord Burleigh, p. 69.

(q) Of theſe there are many publiſhed by Strype and others, but there are many more in MS.

[T] And of his Queen and country alſo.] There never was a Miniſter, that with ſo much power as Lord Burleigh had, piqued himſelf ſo much upon acting always according to reaſon. We have already mentioned his declaring conſtantly in the Court of Wards, in the Court of Exchequer, and in the Star Chamber, the motives of his decrees; and whenever his public actions were queſtioned, he was no leſs ready to juſtify himſelf in reſpect to them. In general, there came out nothing abroad, there was nothing tranſlated ſent over privately, and diſperſed here at home, to the diſcredit of the Queen's government, or that might contribute to heighten the ſpirit of diſaffection amongſt her ſubjects, but he preſently wrote, or cauſed to be written, an anſwer to it, in which every point was diſtinctly conſidered, and either fully juſtified, or clearly refuted. Of theſe there are many extant in print, ſome known to be his, others not; but there are others which now remain only in manuſcript, though I ſuppoſe that theſe were printed and diſperſed, but being ſmall pieces were very quickly loſt, ſo that nothing but the originals remains. As for inſtance, upon the coming out of a large Latin libel abroad, the Lord Burleigh wrote a ſhort, and clear anſwer to it, which I have now lying before me, and I take it to be the very libel from whence the reader has already ſeen ſome extracts. The title of his Lordſhip's anſwer (90), for though the libel was printed whilſt he was Secretary, yet it did not appear till he was Lord Treaſurer, ran in theſe words: 'Slanders and lies, 'maliciouſly, groſsly, and impudently, vomited out, 'in certain traiterous books and pamphlets, con-'cerning two counſellors, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord 'Keeper of the Great Seal, and Sir William Cecil, 'Principal Secretary of State to her Majeſty.' He then ſtates, in few words, the amount of what is aſſerted, under the title of objections; and that the reader may the better conceive the nature of his Lordſhip's deſign, we will mention theſe objections in his own words. I. That they are of baſe degree, and the firſt gentlemen of their genealogy. In anſwer to this he remarks, on behalf of Sir William Cecil, that there were very few gentlemen capable of proving a better deſcent than he; for as he obſerves, when King Edward III. was in Scotland, there aroſe a diſpute between Sir John Sitſilt and Sir William Fakenham about their arms, upon which a duel would have enſued, if the King had not forbidden it, and left the deciſion to the Lord Mowbray, and another Lord; who, upon a fair hearing, certified under their hands, that Sir John Sitſilt was lineally deſcended from James Sitſilt, Baron of Beauport, who was ſlain at the ſiege of Wallingford Caſtle, in the reign of King Stephen; that from this John Sitſilt, Sir William Cecil lineally deſcended, not indeed of the elder line, for the grandfather of the ſaid Sir William was the younger brother of Richard Cecil of Alterennes in Hertfordſhire, and fled to Henry VII. in Britanny, when he was only Earl of Richmond, and for his ſervice there was rewarded, by that prince, with certain lands in Lincolnſhire, in fee-farm, which lands are now, by deſcent, in poſſeſſion of Sir William Cecil. This David Cecil, his grandfather, married an heireſs, and ſo did his ſon Richard; which lady, mother of Sir William Cecil, is living, and proofs are in the hands of the family of three hundred years old; not to mention the Welſh books, wherein they are recorded to be of the ſtock of the antient Britons; ſo far is he from being the firſt gentleman of his family. II. They abaſe the Nobility of this realm. It is ſaid in anſwer to this, that theſe two counſellors act in conjunction with many of the nobility, from whom, upon all occaſions, they have received the higheſt aſſurances of friendſhip and good-will, which would never have happened had this been true; that neither of theſe counſellors have, or ever ſought to have Lands, Houſes, or Goods, of any nobleman attainted; nor do they enjoy any of the offices by ſuch formerly poſſeſſed. If any of the noblemen, who have brought themſelves to diſaſters, who were formerly their friends, had followed their advice and counſels, they had undoubtedly avoided their ill fate, as ſome have confeſſed; and that thoſe mentioned in the libel, and adviſed to be wary of theſe counſellors, have publickly declared, that they are ready to defend the integrity of the ſaid two counſellors, to the Queen and ſtate, with their tongues and ſwords, againſt whoever ſhall defame them. III. They two attempt to alter the ſucceſſion of the Crown, and to ſet up the houſe of Suffolk, with whom they are allied, and their children incorporated. It is aſſerted, in diſproof of this, that both theſe counſellors laboured heartily, and ſincerely, to perſuade her Majeſty to marriage, that the dominions of her royal anceſtors might deſcend to iſſue of her body; and that none were ſo much prejudiced by her Majeſty's rejecting that advice, as theſe two counſellors. That as to the houſe of Suffolk, it is a ſtrange reaſon given for their partiality, that they are allied to it, becauſe no allowance is made for their alliance to the Duke of Norfolk, though the daughter of one of theſe counſellors married the couſin-german of this Duke, and the Duke left his ſon, the Earl of Surry, at the time of his deceaſe, to (90) Taken from a Copy of this Diſcourſe, a MS.

henſion, having to do with men that ſtuck at nothing to ſerve their purpoſes, who as ſoon as one ſcheme was detected invented another; and when their old inſtruments were either puniſhed, or deſerted their ſervice, always knew where to find out others (r). By their intrigues and oppoſition, the Treaſurer found himſelf often in ſuch perilous circumſtances, that he had thoughts of reſigning, and ſeeking in privacy and retirement that peace, which, from experience he learned, was incompatible with power. But the Queen hindered him from this, and was ſo far from liſtening to any propoſals of that ſort when he made them, that ſhe was wont to treat them as the effects of low ſpirits and the ſpleen, upon which ſhe ſometimes wrote him letters (s) with great vivacity and freedom [U]. But his diſquietudes were confined to his hours of privacy; he never ſuffered them to break in upon the public buſineſs; nor is there a ſingle mark of timidity viſible in the long courſe of his adminiſtration. On the contrary, his counſels were remarkably vigorous, for he maturely weighed things before he came himſelf to any ſettled determination; but when that was once fixed he was againſt delays, and laboured for a briſk and ſpeedy execution (t). He was no diſſembler himſelf, and he hated thoſe that were, as appears by the plainneſs with which he wrote his mind to the potent Earl of Leiceſter, when he thought he had evidence of his treating him in an unfriendly manner (u). Neither was he deterred from doing whatever he thought became him in his offices, by any conſideration of the conſequences; as is moſt evident from his conduct in the moſt critical ſervice in which he ever engaged, viz. the trial, condemnation, and execution of the Queen of Scots. It is certain, that this meaſure was very ſtrongly promoted, if not originally propoſed, by the Lord Treaſurer (w), after the diſcovery of that called Babington's Conſpiracy; from a perſuaſion, that the Queen his miſtreſs could never be ſafe in her perſon and government, while her competitor was living. It was from him that Popham, the Queen's Attorney-General, received his inſtructions, as to the method of forming the commiſſion, and of drawing the indictment, as well as every other ſtep that was of particular weight or moment in that whole tranſaction (x). He aſſiſted alſo at her trial in quality of one of the Lords Commiſſioners (y); and it is plain enough, from what paſſed upon that occaſion, that the Queen of Scots looked upon him as one of the principal inſtruments of her deſtruction (z) [W]. There was a conſiderable

(r) Leiceſter's Commonwealth, p. 201.

(s) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 166.

(t) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 475.

(u) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 496.

(w) Camden's Annals, p. 485.

(x) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 362, 363.

(y) State Trials, vol. i. p. 145.

(z) Manner of proceeding againſt the Queen of Scots at Fotheringay-Caſtle, &c.

the care of one of theſe counſellors. That in regard to the houſe of Suffolk, neither of them had interfered for the preſervation of the Earl of Hertford, or of the Lady Catherine, who was the immediate heir of that houſe; the former lying in priſon many years, and the latter till ſhe was releaſed by death, the marriage between them diſſolved by ſentence, and the Earl himſelf fined twenty thouſand pounds for his offence; from all which it is very clear, that either theſe counſellors have not that power which in this libel they are ſuggeſted to have, or elſe far from ſhowing their attachment, they have given no great proofs of their good-will to the houſe of Suffolk.

[U] With great vivacity and freedom.] At ſuch a diſtance of time as this it is almoſt impoſſible to gueſs, what were the particular cauſes that made the Lord Treaſurer, at this time, ſo very uneaſy; and yet, conſidering the vaſt number of hiſtories, annals, memoirs, and political treatiſes, relating to that reign, this ſhould ſeem but an indifferent excuſe. We will therefore uſe our endeavours to give the reader ſome hints of what might probably create in the Lord Treaſurer a deſign of retiring (91). In the firſt place, the Spaniſh and Popiſh faction clamoured againſt him loudly at home and abroad, repreſenting him as the ſole author of their perſecution in England; and the Puritans alſo were very little ſatisfied, becauſe of his great regard for the Biſhops, his preſerving the revenues, and ſupporting the authority of the Church upon all occaſions. In the next place, there was a ſtrong party againſt him in the Queen's council, who made falſe and malicious comments upon every thing he advanced or approved; which party he began now to fear, more eſpecially as the Earl of Leiceſter had ſet himſelf openly at their head; and laſtly, he thought the Queen herſelf did not ſuſtain him in things of very great importance, but on the contrary affected to ſtand neuter, and even to endure a behaviour which he thought injurious to her authority; and beſides all this, we have ſome hints of other uneaſineſſes in the ſpring of 1583; for while he was railed at abroad as the enemy, his miſtreſs ſometimes affected to ſuſpect him of a ſecret friendſhip for, and intelligence with, the Queen of Scots (92); in the ſame manner as before ſhe had hinted at his great affection for the Duke of Norfolk, and yet after that Nobleman was beheaded, placed that to his account, as we ſhall hereafter ſee ſhe did the death of the Queen of Scots; ſo that reflecting on the dangers and difficulties paſt, finding himſelf in preſent trouble, and foreſeeing new perils that were to come, he ſolicited his miſtreſs for leave to reſign in the month of April; upon which ſhe wrote him the following letter, which it appears, by an endorſement in his own hand-writing, he received on the 8th of May (93). It is impoſſible to give any key to the particular expreſſions in it, or why ſhe calls him Spirit, which in the manuſcript is written Sprite; and I cannot help thinking, the Queen uſed it in the ſame ſenſe as we do the word Ghoſt, alluding to the vulgar opinion, that there is no touching or ſtriking a ghoſt; but this I leave to the reader's deciſion, when he has read the letter, which runs thus (94).

(91) Theſe particulars are collected by comparing Camden, Hollinſhed, Stowe, and the private Memoirs and State Papers of that Reign.

(92) Strype's Annals, vol. ii. p. 383, 384, 385.

(93) Ibid. vol. iii. p. 166.

(94) Memoirs of the Adminiſtration of Lord Burleigh. See alſo another inſtance of this kind in note [Z].

'Sir Spirit,

'I Doubt I do nickname you: For thoſe of your 'kind, they ſay, have no ſenſe; but I have of late 'ſeen an Ecce ſignum, that if an aſs kick you, you 'feel it ſoon. I will recant you from being Spirit, if 'ever I perceive that you diſdain not ſuch a feeling. 'Serve God, fear the King, and be a good fellow 'to the reſt. Let never care appear in you for ſuch a 'rumour, but let them well know, that you rather de'ſire the righting of ſuch wrong, by making known 'their error, than you to be ſo ſilly a ſoul as to fore'ſlow that you ought to do, or not freely deliver 'what you think meeteſt, and paſs of no man ſo much 'as not to regard her truſt, who putteth it in you.

'God bleſs you, and long may you laſt omnino.'

E. R.

[W] As one of the principal inſtruments of her deſtruction.] It will be requiſite, in order to render what is ſaid in the text abſolutely perſpicuous, to give here a ſuccinct account of the principal ſteps taken in this myſterious affair. In the firſt place, after the general aſſociation for the defence of Queen Elizabeth's perſon, the ſame was confirmed by an Act of Parliament in the 27th of that Queen's reign, Anno Domini 1585, intituled, An Act for the ſecurity of the Queen's royal derable interval between the time of paſſing the ſentence and the putting it in execution, during which, ſeveral applications were made to Queen Elizabeth that the ſentence might take effect; to which her Majeſty, either through prudence, pity, or an affectation of clemency, ſeemed always very averſe; and frequently intimated, that ſome other way ſhould be taken for the ſecurity of her own perſon, than this, of publicly executing a Lady of her own blood, whom ſhe had ſo often honoured with the appellation of ſiſter (a). At laſt, however, ſhe, of her own motive, ſent for Daviſon, who was Secretary of State, and directed him to prepare a warrant, which was to be carried to the Chancellor, that the mandate for her execution might paſs the Great Seal (b). This was accordingly done, and ſhe ſigned it, and Daviſon thereupon acquainted the Lords of the Privy-Council, of whom the Lord Treaſurer was the chief, and by their direction it was ſent to Fotheringay-Caſtle, where the Queen was actually put to death (c), Feb. 8, 1586-7. It is impoſſible to ſay what were the real ſentiments of Queen Elizabeth in reference to this affair; for when ſhe firſt heard it ſhe ſhowed exceſſive concern, broke out into tears, put on mourning, and in her letters to King James, ſolemnly and poſitively denied her giving orders for his mother's execution, or that ſhe had it at all in her intention (d); adding, however, that the thing was juſt, and that therefore if ſhe had commanded, ſhe would have avowed it. To give the greater colour of truth to what ſhe affirmed, ſhe directed Secretary Daviſon to be proſecuted, as he was, in the Star-Chamber (e); forbad Lord Burleigh's appearing in her preſence; and behaved towards him in other reſpects with ſuch ſeverity, as ſeemed calculated to prove, that ſhe was truly much offended at what he had done; nor was it without great difficulty, and many ſubmiſſions, that he recovered her favour, and this very ſlowly, and as it were with reluctancy (f) [X]. After (a) Carleton's Remembrances, p. 123.

(b) See Daviſon's Apology.

(c) Camden. Annal. p. 537.

(d) Hiſt. of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, p. 335.

(e) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 625.

(f) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 374.

royal perſon, and the continuance of the realm in peace. By which Law her Majeſty was enabled, in caſe any perſon pretending title to the Crown after her deceaſe, ſhould compaſs or imagine any thing to the hurt of her Majeſty's perſon; or if any other ſhould compaſs or imagine ſuch a deſign, with the privity of a perſon ſo claiming, to iſſue a commiſſion under her Great Seal, to the Lords of her Privy-Council, and other Lords of Parliament, to the number of twenty-four at leaſt, who, with the aſſiſtance of the Judges, ſhould have power to examine all the offences aforeſaid, and circumſtances thereof, and thereupon to give ſentence, or judgment, as upon good proof to them ſhould appear; and after ſuch ſentence and declaration thereof, publiſhed by proclamation under the Great Seal, all perſons againſt whom ſuch ſentence ſhould be given, were diſabled for ever to have or claim the Crown; and thereupon her Highneſs's ſubjects may lawfully, by virtue of this act, and her Majeſty's direction, purſue to death, by all poſſible means, every ſuch wicked perſons (95). On the 14th of Sept. 1586, Anthony Babington was condemned, and on the 20th of the ſame month executed for a conſpiracy againſt the Queen, to which the Queen of Scots was ſuppoſed to be privy (96). In the month of October following, the Queen granted a commiſſion for the trial of the Queen of Scots, directed to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Sir Thomas Bromley, Knight, Chancellor of England, William Lord Burleigh, Lord Treaſurer, &c (97). In purſuance of that ſtatute, and on the 11th of October the Commiſſioners came to Fotheringay-Caſtle in Northamptonſhire, before whom the Queen was brought, and a long charge exhibited againſt her; at which time the Lord Treaſurer delivered himſelf in very ſtrong terms, and particularly ſaid, Many things you have propounded time after time concerning your liberty: that they have failed of ſucceſs is along of you or the Scots, and not of the Queen. For the Lords of Scotland actually refuſed to deliver the King as an hoſtage, and when the laſt treaty was held concerning your liberty, Parry was ſent privately by Morgan, a dependant of your's, to murder the Queen. At theſe words the Queen of Scots cried out, Ah! you are my adverſary. To whom the Lord Treaſurer anſwered, Yea, I am adverſary to Queen Elizabeth's adverſaries. At the ſame time the Lord Treaſurer mentioned her intention to convey her title to the Spaniard, and then took occaſion to ſhew, that the kingdom of England could not be conveyed (98). The Court was then prorogued to the twenty-fifth of October at the Star-chamber at Weſtminſter, and on that day ſentence was given againſt the Queen of Scots, agreeably to the ſtatute before-mentioned. Upon this, in the enſuing Parliament, applications were made to the Queen both by the Lords and Commons, that the ſentence might be publiſhed and executed, which ſhe declined; but afterwards, in the month of December, it was proclaimed by the Queen's orders as the Act of Parliament directed (99), and in the February following it was executed.

(95) State Trials, vol. i. p. 145.

(96) Carleton's Remembrances, p. 119.

(97) See the commiſſion at large in Camden, and from him in the State Trials.

(98) Camd. Annal. p. 504.

(99) State Trials, vol. i.

[X] And as it were with reluctancy.] In order to apprehend clearly what ſhare the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh had in this tranſaction, and what reaſon her Majeſty might derive from thence to be offended with him, it will be neceſſary to look upon Secretary Daviſon's Apology, in which there is the beſt and moſt authentic account of this matter any where extant (100).

(100) Ap. Camd. Annal. p. 545.

'The Queen (ſays he) after the departure of the 'French and Scottiſh Ambaſſadors, of her own motion, 'commanded me to deliver her the warrant, for exe- 'cuting the ſentence againſt the Queen of Scots; 'when I had delivered it, ſhe ſigned it readily with 'her own hand; when ſhe had ſo done, ſhe com- 'manded it to be ſealed with the Great Seal of Eng- 'land, and, in a jeſting manner, ſaid, Go tell all this 'to Walſingham, who is now ſick, although I fear he 'will die for ſorrow when he hears it. She adding 'alſo the reaſons of deferring it ſo long, namely, leſt 'ſhe might ſeem to have been violently or maliciouſly 'drawn thereto, whereas, in the mean time, ſhe was 'not ignorant how neceſſary it was. Moreover ſhe 'blamed Powlet and Drury that they had not eaſed 'her of this care, and wiſhed that Walſingham would 'feel their pulſes touching this matter. The next day, 'after it was under the Great Seal, ſhe commanded 'me, by Killigrew, that it ſhould not be done; and 'when I had informed her that it was done already, 'ſhe found fault with ſuch great haſte, telling me, 'that in the judgment of ſome wiſe men another 'courſe might be taken. I anſwered, that that courſe 'was always beſt and ſafeſt which was moſt juſt. 'But fearing leſt ſhe would lay the fault upon me (as 'ſhe had laid the putting of the Duke of Norfolk to 'death upon the Lord Burleigh) I acquainted Hatton 'with the whole matter, proteſting that I would not 'plunge myſelf any deeper in ſo great a buſineſs. He 'preſently imparted it to Lord Burleigh, and the 'Lord Burleigh to the reſt of the Council, who all 'conſented to have the execution haſtened, and every 'one of them vowed to bear an equal ſhare in the 'blame, and ſent Beale away with the warrant and 'letters. The third day after, when, by a dream 'which ſhe told of the Queen of Scots death, I per- 'ceived that ſhe wavered in her reſolution, I aſked 'her, Whether ſhe had changed her mind? ſhe an- 'ſwered, No, but another courſe (ſaid ſhe) might 'have been deviſed; and withal ſhe aſked me, Whe- 'ther I had received any anſwer from Powlet? whoſe 'letter, ter this ſtorm was blown over, he had the ſame credit and power as ever, and was the perſon to whom almoſt all kind of intelligence was addreſſed, and by whom all matters of importance, of what nature ſoever, were commonly diſpatched; and though his ſtrength began to decline, and his conſtitution was greatly impaired by ſuch a ſeries of continual labours, yet he was to the full as careful and aſſiduous as ever, drawing moſt of the State-papers of importance with his own hand, and giving conſtant attendance both at the Council and in the Star-Chamber (g). All theſe high employments and arduous cares, did not, however, hinder him from entering with the utmoſt tenderneſs into the duties of private life; ſo that we find him deeply affected with the death of his mother, which happened March 10, 1587, upon which the Queen ſent to condole with him; but being at the ſame time mindful of her own affairs, adviſed him to ſeek relief from his melancholy, not by ſhutting himſelf up, but by engaging more earneſtly in public buſineſs (h). In the ſucceeding troubleſome year, when the Spaniſh invaſion threatened the kingdom with a dangerous war at home, the Lord Treaſurer drew up thoſe ſchemes for the defence of England, that were followed with ſo great ſucceſs; and his eldeſt ſon Thomas, by his own choice, as well as his father's command, ventured his life freely in that fleet, which, under the command of the Lord High Admiral Howard, gloriouſly defeated that, which had been ſo falſely, as well as fooliſhly, ſtiled the Invincible Armada (i). It was not long after this, the Lord Treaſurer met with the ſevereſt ſtroke in his family that he had ever yet felt, by the death of his beloved wife, April 4, 1589, after they had lived together in the ſincereſt harmony and affection for three and forty years (k). She is allowed to have been one of the moſt extraordinary women of her time, in point of piety, learning, and prudence, of which poſterity has received many, and thoſe too unexceptionable, teſtimonies, of which, in the note, ſome notice ſhall be taken (l) [Y]. The loſs of her affected the Treaſurer to a great degree, as appears plainly by many of his writings, and made a great alteration in his temper; ſo that, notwithſtanding the death of ſome whom he took to be his adverſaries, by which undoubtedly his authority was augmented, and the promotion of his ſon Robert, who grew daily more and more into the Queen's favour, he became very thoughtful and melancholy, and, about two years after, was very earneſt and ſolicitous for leave to quit his employments, that he might ſpend the remainder of his days in quiet (m). But the (g) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(h) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 488.

(i) Camden. Annal. p. 582.

(k) Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 337.

(l) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(m) Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 77.

(101) See both Walſingham's and Daviſon's Letter to Sir Amias Paulet and Sir Drue Drury, and their Anſwer, in Robert of Glouceſter's Chronicle, publiſhed by Thomas Hearne, vol. ii. p. 673.

'letter, when I had ſhewed her (101), wherein he 'flatly refuſed to undertake that which ſtood not with 'honour and juſtice, ſhe, waxing angry, accuſed him 'and others (who had bound themſelves by the aſſo-'ciation) of perjury, and breach of their vow, as thoſe 'that had promiſed great matters for their Prince's 'ſafety, but would perform nothing. Yet there are '(ſaid ſhe) who will do it for my ſake. But I ſhewed 'her how diſhonourable and unjuſt a thing this would 'be; and withal, into how great danger ſhe would 'bring Powlet and Drury by it. For if ſhe approved 'the fact, ſhe would draw upon herſelf both danger 'and diſhonour, not without cenſure of injuſtice; 'and if ſhe diſallowed it, ſhe would utterly undo men 'of great deſert, and their whole poſterity. And 'afterwards ſhe gave me a light check, the ſame day 'that the Queen of Scots was executed, becauſe ſhe 'was not yet put to death.' It ſeems from hence, that the Lord Burleigh was to bear only his ſhare of this offence, the whole load of which however devolved ſolely upon him. So that he was a fortnight reſtrained from Court and from the Queen's preſence, notwithſtanding that in that ſpace he wrote ſeveral letters to the Queen, ſome parts of which have been publiſhed, and ſhow them to be very ſubmiſſive at leaſt, if not ſomething more (102). At laſt, upon his coming to Court, he was very ſtrangely treated, ſo that he thought fit of himſelf to refrain coming to the Council-Table; and, to juſtify his behaviour in that point, he wrote a paper which he ſent to the Vice-Chamberlain, dated March 15, beginning with theſe words (103): 'I am 'ſo wounded in the heart, with the late ſharp and 'piercing ſpeeches of her Majeſty to myſelf, in the 'hearing of my Lord of Leiceſter and Mr. Secretary 'Walſingham, expreſſing therewith her indignation, 'at ſuch time as I was called to her preſence for mat-'ters of the Low-Countries, myſelf giving no occaſion 'by any ſpeech of the matter of the Queen of Scots, 'until her Majeſty did charge me therewith; as ſince 'regarding in great anguiſh of heart the weight of her 'Majeſty's diſpleaſure ſo ſettled and increaſed, as I 'then deeply conceived, and mine own humility not 'being able to abide the continuance of ſuch her diſ-'pleaſure, I am therefore moſt careful how by any 'means poſſible I may ſhun all increaſe of the weight 'thereof; knowing it very true, that was ſaid by the 'moſt wiſe King, Indignatio Principis Mors eſt. And 'though my conſcience doth certainly bear witneſs 'with me in the ſight of God, that I never had 'thought, nor did ever any act, with mind to offend 'her Majeſty. But now finding this heavy burthen of 'her Majeſty's diſpleaſure in mine old years, ſo long 'faithfully, painfully, and dangerouſly ſpent only 'for her ſervice, to be lately rather increaſed, ſince 'her Majeſty's princely compaſſion permitted me to 'her preſence, a few days paſt, I have great cauſe to 'fear, that this increaſe groweth more by means of 'ſome ſecret enemies to myſelf, than of any influence 'of her own princely nature.'

(102) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 370.

(103) Strype's Appendix, p. 145.

[Y] Some notice ſhall be taken.] This Lady, who was the daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, died in the ſixty-third year of her age, having been the faithful companion of her huſband in all his fortunes, from the firſt riſe of them in the reign of Henry VIII. to the completion under Queen Elizabeth (104). She was wonderfully learned, eſpecially in the Greek tongue, as appears from the teſtimony of the Lord Burleigh himſelf, and of ſeveral other great men, and of which ſhe left clear evidence, in a letter penned by her in that language to the Univerſity of Cambridge, upon her ſending thither a Hebrew Bible, by way of preſent to the Library (105). She had read moſt of the Greek Fathers with great diligence and critical accuracy, and was one of the greateſt patroneſſes of her time, maintaining for many years two ſcholars at St. John's College in Cambridge; and before her death rendered this perpetual, by procuring lands to be bought in the name of the Dean of Weſtminſter, and by him aſſigned to the College. She likewiſe gave the Haberdaſhers company in London, a ſum to enable them to lend to ſix poor men twenty pounds a-piece every two years; and a charity of the like kind of twenty marks, to ſix poor people at Waltham and Cheſhunt in Hertfordſhire. Four times every year ſhe relieved all the poor priſoners in London, and many other acts of benevolence ſhe did, with as great ſecrecy as generoſity; ſo that ſhe ſeems to have well deſerved all the praiſes that have been, by different writers, beſtowed upon her memory (106).

(104) Extract from Lord Burleigh's Latin inſcription intended for his Lady's tomb.

(105) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. p. 595—597.

(106) Dedication of the Hiſtory of France to one of her daughters, in which is a large character of this Lady.

Queen,

Queen, who ſaw no decay in his abilities, and who willingly granted all the indulgences poſſible to his infirmities, would by no means conſent to that: on the contrary, as ſhe had formerly rallied him out of a deſign of the ſame kind, ſo ſhe had now recourſe again to the like method, and by a paper written with great wit and ſpirit, diverted him abſolutely from this ſerious purpoſe (n) [Z]. The remaining part of his life was ſpent in the diſcharge of his high and painful office, with all the care and diligence, all the ſtudy and application poſſible: nor do we find that he gave himſelf any relaxations, even in his laſt days, beyond what the weakneſs of his body, and the diſeaſes he laboured under, abſolutely required (o). In the year 1592, beſides all the great pains he took in the Treaſury and in the Privy-Council, he was alſo charged with the management of the Queen's concerns in the Houſe of Peers, more eſpecially with a view to obtain ſuch a ſupply from Parliament, as her Majeſty's occaſions at that time neceſſarily required; in furtherance of which we have a copy of the ſpeech he made in the Upper Houſe, in which there is a very large, diſtinct, and curious detail, of the general ſtate of affairs in Europe at that time, and which affords us a much better notion of the ſtate of things at that ſeaſon, than almoſt any of the Hiſtories that are extant (p) [AA]. In the next year

(n) See this paper at large in the note.

(o) Life of William Lord Burleigh. Lloyd's Worthies, p. 484, 485. Oſborne's Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth.

(p) Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 106.

[Z] From this ſerious purpoſe.] It would be a very difficult, perhaps an impracticable, taſk, ſhould one endeavour to write a commentary capable of explaining the following ſingular piece, and therefore we ſhall leave it entirely to the contemplation of the reader; obſerving only, that it is a ſtrong piece of irony throughout, in which the Queen ſeems to rally the pains taken by her Miniſter, in the more vigorous part of his life, to adorn and beautify his villa for the ſake of recreation, and when older, and wanting that recreation moſt, wiſhed to turn it into a gloomy retreat, where he might wear away his loneſome hours in brooding over his cares (107).

(107) Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 77.

'ELIZABETHA Anglorum, id eſt, a nitore Angelorum Regina formoſiſſima & feliciſſima:
'To the diſconſolate and retired Spryte, the Heremite of Tybole, and to al oother diſaffected ſowles, claiming by, from, or under, the ſaid Heremit, ſendeth greeting: Whereas in our high Coourt of Chanceri it is given us to underſtand, that you Sir Heremite, the abandonate of nature's fair works, and ſervaunt to Heaven's woonders, have, for the ſpace of two years and two moonthes, poſſeſſed yoorſelf of fair Tybollet, with her ſweet roſary the ſame tyme, the recreation of our right truſty and right wel beloved Sir William Sitſilt, Knt. leaving to him the old rude repoze, wherein twice five years (at his coſt) yoor contemplate life was releived, which place and fate inevitable hath brought greefs innumerable (for lover greef biddeth no compare) ſuffering yoor ſolitary eye to bring into hiz houſe deſolation and moorning, joyes deſtroyers, and annoye frendes, whereby Paradice is grown wilderneſs, and for green graſs are comen gray hearz, with cruel baniſhment from the frute of long laboure, the poſſeſſion whereof he hath holden many yearz, the want of the mean profit thereof (health and gladneſs) having been greatly to his hindrance, which toocheth us much in the intereſt we have in his faithful ſervicez, beſides the law of his looving neibours and frends infinite, as by the record of their countenaunce moſt plainly may appear.

'Wee, upon adviſed conſideration, have commanded you Heremit to yoor old cave, too good for the forſaken, too bad for oour worthily belooved Coouncillour. And becauz we greatly tender yoour comfort, we have given poour to oour Chauncillour to make oout ſuch and ſo many writs, as to him ſhal be thought good, to abjure deſolations and mourning (the conſumer of ſweetneſs) to the frozen ſeas, and Deſerts of Arabia Petroſa, upon pain of 500 deſpights to their terror and contempt of their torments, if they attempt any part of yoour hoous again: Enjoyning you to the enjoyment of yoour own hoous and delight, without memory of any mortal accident or wretched adverſary.

'And for that you have been ſo good a ſervaunt to common tranquility, we command ſolace to give the ful and pacific poſſeſſion of al and every part thereof: Not departing until oour favour (that ever hath inclined to your meek nature) have aſſured you peace in the poſſeſſion thereof. Wherein we command al 'cauſez within the prerogative of oour high favour to 'give you no interruption. And this under the paine 'aforeſaid they ſhal not omit. Teſte meipſa apud Tyboles, 10mo. die Maii Regni noſtri 33°.

On the backſide of this charter is Per Chancellor. Angl.

CHR. HATTON.

[AA] Of the hiſtories that are extant.] It cannot but afford ſome ſatisfaction to the modern reader, to ſee in what manner the great buſineſs of the State was tranſacted in thoſe times, of the wiſdom of which fame ſpeaks ſo loudly. The ſpeech mentioned in the text was delivered in that Parliament of Queen Elizabeth, which met November the 19th, 1592, and was diſſolved April 10th 1593 (108), and in all probability in the beginning of it. At the entrance of his ſpeech the Lord High-Treaſurer takes notice (109), of the many injuries, and acts of injuſtice, done by the King of Spain, and thoſe acting under him, to the Queen his Sovereign, and her ſubjects; but not to fatigue their lordſhips with too long a detail, he is content to paſs by all particulars preceding the year 1588, and alledges, that what he has to offer from that time is not at all to lead, or to direct their opinions, but purely to obtain the aſſiſtance of their counſels in aid of an old man broken with age, feeble with infirmities, and oppreſſed with a load of buſineſs. He then explains the nature of the King of Spain's deſigns, and of the wars into which he entered, which, he ſays, were not like thoſe of former times, for ſtrong fortreſſes, or for convenient provinces, but for whole kingdoms: That Philip II. had already uſurped Portugal, and all the dominions of that crown, both in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies: That by fomenting a barbarous and bloody rebellion in France, he had at this juncture a great part of that kingdom at his devotion, more eſpecially the provinces of Britanny and Normandy, by which he was become a frontier enemy to all the Weſt of England; and to all the South parts, ſuch as the counties of Suſſex, Hampſhire, and the Iſle of Wight; and by his intereſt in St. Maloes a very dangerous neighbour to the iſlands of Jerſey and Guernſey: That by this means he had a vaſt additional force ariſing from his power in France, of which he meant to make himſelf King, or to make his daughter Queen, and appoint her a huſband to be his vaſſal: That theſe vaſt deſigns alone ought ſufficiently to alarm the Engliſh nation, even if he had not diſcovered any formal intention to invade them: That however this was ſo far from being the caſe, that the chief aim of this ambitious Prince, for the two laſt years, was to prepare every thing neceſſary for ſuch an invaſion; in order to which he had built a great number of ſhips of war, of the ſize and ſtrength of Engliſh ſhips, that they might be the fitter to navigate the narrow ſeas; that he had a ſtrong fleet of gallies on the coaſt of Brittany, which he intended to ſend this ſummer to Newhaven; that for two years paſt he had bought and built many great ſhips in the Eaſt Countries, and that by the corruption of our faint and covetous neighbours in Holland, he had recovered, with ſilver hooks, mariners, ſhips, cordage, and proviſions; that year we find him extremely occupied, as well in providing for the ſucceſs of his Miſtreſs's arms abroad, as for preſerving the peace and tranquillity of the nation at home; in reference to which there are many papers of his ſtill preſerved, which, at the ſame time that they ſhow he really occupied the poſt of Prime-Miniſter, and directed whatever was undertaken in almoſt every branch of the adminiſtration, demonſtrate alſo, that he did this with equal diligence and exactneſs, conſidering every head by itſelf, ſetting down under it the ſeveral points to be provided for, and the means by which they might be provided (q). To him we find all degrees of people addreſſing themſelves to the very laſt; the Biſhops and Clergy, ſome for encouragement, ſome for protection, and many for preferment; the Puritans and Sectaries, for favourable treatment and compaſſion; many of the fugitives abroad for pardon, in conſideration of the intelligence they gave him of the deſigns of the King of Spain, and of others the Queen's enemies; the Lieutenants of ſeveral counties for inſtructions and advice; the Lord High-Admiral for aſſiſtance and ſupplies; the great Sir Walter Ralegh, in public and private concerns, ſometimes for favour, ſometimes for juſtice; the principal officers in the Cadiz expedition, with accounts of its execution and ſucceſs: in a word, to him was addreſſed whatever regarded the State; and it appears by his indorſements upon ſome papers, and ſhort marginal notes upon others, that nobody addreſſed him in vain, or without notice; ſo that it is not eaſy to conceive, how he could poſſibly find time to go through ſuch a variety of extraordinary buſineſs, beſides what belonged to his poſt at all, much leſs in the cautious and circumſtantial manner he did: for every thing that came before him ſeems to have been conſidered with as much leiſure and attention, as if he had no other thing in view; agreeably to his own favourite and excellent maxim, That the ſhorteſt way to do many things, was to do only one thing at once (r). The laſt memorable act of his life, was to endeavour the giving a peace to his country, when reaſonable terms might have been obtained from Spain. This was vehemently oppoſed by the Earl of Eſſex, who, as Camden ſays, having been bred to the ſword, and gained ſome reputation by it, was unwilling to ſheathe it. The arguments he made uſe of were, the implacable hatred of the Spaniards to the Engliſh, their being bigotted Papiſts, and a people naturally both obſtinate and ſubtle: in ſpeaking to theſe he delivered himſelf in ſuch terms, that the Treaſurer was moved to ſay, He ſeemed intent upon nothing but blood and ſlaughter. At the cloſe of the debate Lord Burleigh pulled out a Prayer-Book, and without ſpeaking pointed to the following words, Men of blood ſhall not live out half their days (s). This ſhews that our Stateſman preſerved his courage and integrity to the very verge of life; for at this time it was more dangerous to be a friend to peace at home, than to ſhare in the war abroad. As this was his laſt effort in Council, ſo when confined to his bed by his laſt ſickneſs, he ſettled a new treaty between the Queen and the States, whereby the nation was eaſed of an expence of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds per annum (t). As to his end it was conformable to his life, eaſy, natural, in the midſt of his family, full of years and of glory. In a word, he died poſſeſſed of the favour of his Prince,

(108) Index Parliament. tempor. Eliz. Regin. p. 31.

(109) This Speech is amongſt the Cecilian MS. from whence it was printed in Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 107.

(q) Collections from the MS. of Lord Treaſurer Burleigh.

(r) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(s) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 483. Life of William Lord Burleigh. Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 324.

(t) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

that all theſe preparations muſt be neceſſarily againſt England; for having already the whole ſea-coaſt of France at his devotion, he could have no need of a naval force to proſecute his deſigns againſt that kingdom. That a farther proof of his intention was, the inexpreſſible diligence he uſed to ſecure to himſelf a party in this kingdom to ſecond his invaſion; and he was ſorry to ſay, this was not without effect. That however, there was yet behind a ſtronger and clearer proof, which was his intrigues in Scotland, into which he had promiſed to ſend twenty-five thouſand men, upon a promiſe of ſome diſcontented Lords to join them with ten thouſand; that of theſe, thirty thouſand were to march into England, and the five thouſand Spaniards were to remain in that kingdom, to aſſiſt the Papiſts in depoſing their King. That this information came from no ordinary hand, and was attended with the moſt extraordinary proofs; that King James himſelf was the diſcoverer; that he had ſeized the meſſenger, intruſted with the bonds of the Earls of Errol, Huntley, and Angus, to the King of Spain, for the performance of their engagements; that theſe Lords were fled into the Weſtern Iſlands in hopes of being ſupported there from Spain; that the King was gone in perſon in purſuit of them; and, that the very day before he marched with what forces he could raiſe, he had cauſed one Fentry, a man of good family, and great eſtate, to be hanged, for the ſhare he had in this conſpiracy. This very long ſpeech he concluded with theſe words, 'Thus far have I obſerved my purpoſe, to ſhew the 'danger; and to give counſel to the remedy, Hoc opus 'hic labor eſt. And I would moſt gladly have ſome 'company, of whom I might have ſome light how to 'find out the darkneſs of the queſtion: Wherein when 'time ſhall ſerve I will not be ſilent, but deliver mine 'own opinion, and reform it upon good ground.'

But this was not all our ſtateſman did upon this important occaſion; for having taken ſo much pains to ſet before the houſe of Lords the true ſtate of the nation in this perilous conjuncture, he was no leſs careful that the houſe of Commons ſhould be acquainted therewith; and that all the circumſtances and particulars of the account given there, ſhould perfectly agree with what he had already ſet forth in the upper houſe. It was with this view that he drew up a paper, which is ſtill remaining in his own hand-writing, conſiſting of fourteen ſeparate heads, made up, for the moſt part, of matters of fact, and the ſubſtance of the intelligence which the Queen, the Privy-Council, and himſelf, had received. The meaning and intent of this paper, the reader will eaſily perceive by the title, which runs thus (110), Inſtructions for the Speaker's ſpeech: Drawn up in ſeveral articles by the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, Feb. 13th, 1592. To render this note as compleat as it is poſſible, it may be proper to ſhew, what the effects were of all this diligence, and how theſe wiſe and wary methods conduced to the end propoſed by them (111). To this there is nothing more requiſite, than to inform the reader, that the Clergy in 1593 granted to the Queen two ſubſidies, of four ſhillings in the pound, to be paid in two years; and the Temporality three ſubſidies, and ſix fifteenths and tenths; by which ſeaſonable ſupply her Majeſty was enabled to defeat all the deſigns of her enemies, and to defray the expences of a war, both by ſea and land, without having recourſe again to her ſubjects for upwards of four years.

(110) Amongſt the ſame MSS. and printed in the ſame work, p. 124.

(111) Hiſtory of Taxes, p. 257.

the love of the people, the reſpect even of his enemies. He had alſo, what he often ſought to reſign, the greateſt and moſt honourable offices in the kingdom, beſides a large eſtate, and dutiful and excellent children. Thus bleſſed with all that a man could deſire, on the fourth of Auguſt 1598, about four in the morning, in the preſence of twenty children, friends, and ſervants, he yielded up the ghoſt with wonderful ſerenity, being upwards of ſeventy-ſeven years of age (u). It would be a very unneceſſary, indeed a very needleſs attempt, ſhould we proceed to ſwell this article with the character of this great perſon, which has been already drawn ſo fully: we will conclude therefore with a very few obſervations, that will enable us to give the reader ſome uſeful and curious particulars in the notes. His exterior form was very anſwerable to the diſpoſition of his mind; and it might be truly ſaid, that no man's temper ſuited better with the eaſe and gracefulneſs of his perſon than his did [BB]. In reference to his manner of living, it was ſuitable to the high rank he held, and the cuſtom of the times in which he lived; for though he was a man diſtinguiſhed both for his virtue and learning, as well as by his exemplary probity, yet he did not think that any of theſe, or all taken together, could juſtify a ſingular and reſerved behaviour, or the paſſing through life in a manner altogether inconſiſtent with that, which others had led when in his ſtation. It was from theſe reaſons, and not from vanity or oſtentation, that he kept up an extraordinary degree of ſplendor and magnificence in his houſes, gardens, and every thing belonging to him [CC]. Yet he was, in other reſpects, a man of ſtrict œconomy, and ſhowed

(u) Camden. Anal. p. 773. Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 334. Stowe, Hollinſhed, &c.

[BB] Than his did.] We learn from the author of his life, and from other contemporary writers (112), that though he was not remarkably tall, nor eminently handſome, yet his perſon was always agreeable, and became more and more ſo, as he grew in years, age becoming him better than youth. The hair of his head and beard grew perfectly white, and he preſerved almoſt to his dying day a fine and florid complexion. His temper contributed much towards making him generally beloved, for he was always ſerene and chearful; ſo perfect a maſter of his looks and words, that what paſſed in his mind was never diſcoverable from either; patient in hearing, ready in anſwering, yet without any quickneſs, and in a ſtile ſuited to the underſtanding of him to whom he ſpoke. Idleneſs was his averſion; and though from twenty-five years of age, at which he was ſworn a Privy-Counſellor, being then the youngeſt, as at his death the oldeſt in Europe, he laboured under a great weight of public buſineſs; yet when he had any vacant moments he ſpent them not in trifles, or in purſuit of ſenſual pleaſures, but in reading, meditating, or writing. He had a perfect knowledge, not only of foreign countries, but of foreign courts; knew the genius of every Prince in Europe, his counſellors and favourites. At home he kept exact liſts of all the great officers, and particularly of the ſages in the Law. He was acquainted with the courſe of every court of judicature in England, knew it's riſe, juriſdiction, and proper ſphere of action; within which he took care that it ſhould act with vigour, and was no leſs careful that it ſhould not exceed it's bounds. He wrote not only elegant Latin in proſe, but alſo very good verſe in that, and in the Engliſh language. He underſtood Greek as well as moſt men in that age; and was ſo learned in Divinity, that Divines of all perſwaſions were deſirous of ſubmitting to his judgment. His peculiar diverſions were the ſtudy of the ſtate of England, and the pedigrees of it's nobility and gentry: of theſe laſt he drew whole books with his own hand, ſo that he was better verſed in deſcents and families, than moſt of the Heralds; and would often ſurprize perſons of diſtinction at his table, by appearing better acquainted with their manors, parks, woods, &c. than they were themſelves. To this continual application, and to his genius, naturally comprehenſive, was owing that fund of knowledge, which made him never at a loſs in any company, or upon any ſubject. It was alſo owing to this that he ſpoke with ſuch wonderful weight on all public occaſions, generally at the end of the debate, but without repetition of what was ſaid before, ſtating the matter clearly, ſhowing the convenience ſought, the inconveniencies feared; the means of attaining the former, and the methods by which the latter might be avoided, with a ſuccinctneſs and accuracy which, perhaps, hardly ever fell to any other man's ſhare. But what was ſtill more ſurprizing, was the great facility with which he did this; for he required no preparation, no time for his moſt laboured ſpeeches, nor ever turned a book for his moſt learned writings, but thought, and ſpoke, digeſted, and dictated, without any heſitation, with the greateſt perſpicuity of ſentiment, and the utmoſt fulneſs of diction.

(112) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

[CC] And every thing belonging to him.] He had, during Queen Elizabeth's reign, four places of reſidence; his lodgings at court, his houſe in the Strand, his family ſeat at Burleigh, and his own favourite ſeat at Theobalds (113). At his houſe in London he had fourſcore perſons in family, excluſively of thoſe who attended him at court. His expences there, as we have it from a perſon who lived many years in his family, were thirty pounds a week in his abſence, and between forty and fifty when preſent. At Theobalds he had thirty perſons in family; and beſides a conſtant allowance in charity, he directed ten pounds a week to be laid out in keeping the poor at work in his gardens, &c. The expences of his ſtables were a thouſand marks a year: ſo that as he had a great income, and left a good eſtate to his children, he was not afraid of keeping up alſo a port ſuited to his offices, though it provoked the envy of his enemies, and did, as it will always do, engage many mouths to murmur at him, becauſe they were not fed by him. He carried things ſtill farther: he kept a ſtanding table for gentlemen, and two other tables for perſons of meaner condition, which were always ſerved alike, whether he were in town or out of town. About his perſon he had people of great diſtinction, inſomuch that our author tells us, that while in his ſervice he could reckon up twenty gentlemen retainers, who had each a thouſand pounds a year; and as many among his ordinary ſervants, who were worth from 1000*l.* to 3, 5, 10, and 20,000. Twelve times he entertained the Queen at his houſe for ſeveral weeks together, at the expence of 2 or 3000*l.* each time. Three fine houſes he built, one in London, another at Burleigh, and the third at Theobalds: all of which were leſs remarkable for their largeneſs and magnificence, than for their neatneſs and excellent contrivance. Yet with all this mighty expence, it was the opinion of competent judges, that an avaritious man would have made more of his offices in ſeven years, than he did in forty. At his death he left about 4000*l.* a year in land, 11,000*l.* in money, and in valuable effects about 14,000*l.* I crave leave to add to this note, a few very curious particulars from a private letter of Lord Burleigh's to an intimate friend, written in the month of Auguſt 1585 (114), on account of ſome calumnies, that the perſon to whom this letter was addreſſed acquainted him, flew about, as to his power and fortune. 'They that ſay in a raſh and malicious mockery, that England is become Regnum Cecilianum, may pleaſe their own cankered humour with ſuch a device; but if my actions be conſidered, if there be any cauſe given by me of ſuch a nick-name, there may be found out in many other juſter cauſes to attribute (113) Fuller's Holy State. Winſtanley's Lives. Lloyd's State Worthies. Life of William Lord Burleigh. Memoirs of the Adminiſtration of Lord Burleigh.

(114) From a much more correct MS. than that uſed by Strype.

ſhowed very plainly, from his conſtant practice in private life, that he was very little attached to the pleaſures of ſenſe or ſhow, but was wholly bent upon enjoyments of the mind, and preſerving that peace which is the inſeparable attendant of a clear conſcience, and of a ſoul ſuperior to ordinary gratifications [DD]. It was with great reaſon, therefore, that Mr. Camden concluded his character with this obſervation, 'That 'he was one of thoſe few who lived and died with equal glory. Such a man, as while 'others regard with admiration, I, after the antient manner, am rather inclined to 'contemplate with the ſacred applauſe of ſilent veneration.' We have ſo many accounts of the manner in which his funeral was performed, that they have created ſome doubts about where he lies interred. There is no doubt that a very ſolemn funeral was performed for him at Weſtminſter, on the 29th of Auguſt 1598; after which we are told that his body was privately conveyed to Stamford, and placed in the vault under that 'tribute other names than mine. If my buildings 'create diſlike in them, I confeſs my folly in the 'expences, becauſe ſome of my houſes are to come, 'if God ſo pleaſe, to them that ſhall not have land 'to maintain them; I mean my houſe at Theobalds, 'which was begun by me with a mean meaſure, but 'increaſed by occaſion of her Majeſty's often coming; 'whom to pleaſe, I never would omit to ſtrain myſelf 'to more charges than is that of my building. And 'yet not without ſome ſpecial direction of her Ma'jeſty, upon fault found with the ſmall meaſure 'of her chamber, which was in good meaſure for 'me, I was forced to enlarge a room for a larger 'chamber, which need not be envied of any for riches 'in it, more than the ſhew of old oaks, and ſuch 'trees, with painted leaves and fruit. I thank God I 'owe nothing to theſe backbiters, though indeed 'much to many honeſt perſons, whom I mind to pay 'without bribery or villainy. For my houſe in Weſt'minſter, I think it ſo old as it ſhould not ſtir any, 'many having of later times built larger by far, both 'in city and country. And yet the building, altera'tions, and repairs thereof, coſt me the ſale of lands 'worth 100*l.* a year in Staffordſhire, that I had of 'good King Edward. My houſe of Burghley is of 'my mother's inheritance, who liveth, and is the 'owner thereof; and I but a farmer. And for the 'building there, I have ſet my walls upon the old 'foundation. Indeed I have made the rough ſtone 'walls to be of ſquare, and yet one ſide remaineth as 'my father left it me. I truſt my ſon ſhall be able to 'maintain it, conſidering there are in that ſhire a 'dozen larger houſes of men under my degree.' In the poſtſcript to this letter he adds, 'For myſelf, I 'have not made nor obtained any ſuit from her Majeſ'ty theſe ten years. In my whole time I have not, 'for theſe twenty-ſix years, been beneficed from her 'Majeſty, ſo much as I was within four years of King 'Edward. I have ſold as much land in value as ever 'I had of gift of her Majeſty. I am at charges by at'tendance in court, and by keeping of my houſhold, 'eſpecially in Term times, by reſort of ſuitors, at more 'than any counſellor in England. My fee, for the 'Treaſureſhip, is no more than it hath been theſe 'thirty years. Whereas the Chancellor, and others, 'have been doubly augmented within theſe few years. 'And this I do affirm, that my fees of my Treaſure'ſhip do not anſwer to my charge of my ſtable, I 'mean not my table. And in my houſhold I do ſel'dom feed leſs than an hundred perſons. And for 'that purpoſe I buy in London my bread, my drink, 'my achates, my fewel. And in the country I buy 'my grain, my beef, my mutton, and all achates; 'and for my ſtable, I buy my hay for the greateſt 'part; my oats, my ſtraw totally. For my ſervants, 'I keep none to whom I pay not wages, and give li'veries; which I know many do not.'

[DD] And of a ſoul ſuperior to ordinary gratifications.] In regard to his private life, he was conſidered as the beſt parent of his time: for he had all his children, and their deſcendants, conſtantly at his table; and in their converſation lay the greateſt pleaſure of his life, more eſpecially while his mother lived, who was able to ſee the fifth deſcent from herſelf, there being no degree of relation, or conſanguinity, which at feſtival times were not to be found at Lord Burleigh's table (115). It was there that, laying aſide all thoughts of buſineſs, he was ſo affable, eaſy, and merry, that he ſeemed never to have thought of any, and yet this was the only part of his life which was entirely free therefrom; and his frankneſs and familiarity brought ſuch, and ſo many, perſons of high rank to his houſe, as did him great credit and ſervice. In reſpect to his friends, he was always eaſy, chearful, and kind; and whatever their condition was, he talked to them, as if they had been his equals in every reſpect; yet it is ſaid, that he was held a better enemy than friend; and that this was ſo well known, that ſome oppoſed him from a view of intereſt. It is certain, that thoſe who were moſt intimate with him, had no ſort of influence over him, and did not care to aſk him for any thing; becauſe he did not readily grant, and was little pleaſed with ſuch ſort of ſuits. One reaſon of this was, that moſt of thoſe whom he preferred became his enemies, becauſe he would not gratify them in farther pretenſions. His ſecrets he truſted with none, indulged a general converſation, and would not ſuffer affairs of ſtate to be canvaſſed in mixed company, or when friends were met to divert themſelves. With reſpect to his enemies, he never ſaid any thing harſh of them, farthered on every occaſion their reaſonable requeſts, and was ſo far from ſeeking, that he neglected all opportunities of revenge; always profeſſing, that he never went to bed out of charity with any man; and frequently ſaying, that patience, and a calm bearing of aſperſions and injuries, had wrought him more good than his own abilities. He was far, however, from being an ungrateful man, for without intreaty he would ſerve his friends as far as it was juſt; and for his ſervants, and thoſe about him, he was very careful of their welfare, moſtly at his own expence. He never raiſed his own rents, or diſplaced his tenants; and as the rent was when he bought land, ſo it ſtood; inſomuch, that ſome enjoyed, for twenty pounds a year, during his whole life, what might have been let for two hundred: yet in his public character he was very ſevere; and as he never meddled with the Queen's treaſure himſelf, ſo he would ſee that it was not embezzled by others; for it was his ſaying, that whoever cheated the Crown oppreſſed the people. In the midſt of all his grandeur he was ever eaſy of acceſs, free from pride, and alike complaiſant to all degrees of people: for as he was grave in council, exact in courts of juſtice, familiar towards his friends, outwardly and inwardly fond of his children, ſo when he went into the country he would converſe with all his ſervants as kindly as if he had been their equal; talk to country people in their own ſtile and manner, and would even condeſcend to ſooth little children in their ſports and plays; ſo gentle was his temper, and ſo abundant his good-nature. At Theobalds he had fine gardens, which coſt him a great deal of money, and which were laid out according to his own directions. He had a little mule, upon which he rode up and down the walks; ſometimes he would look on thoſe who were ſhooting with arrows, or playing with bowls; but as for himſelf, he never took any diverſion, taking that word in its uſual ſenſe. He had two or three friends, who were conſtantly at his table, becauſe he liked their company; but in all his life he never had one favourite, or ſuffered any body to get an aſcendant over him. His equipage, his great houſe-keeping, his numerous dependance, were the effects of his ſenſe, and not at all of his paſſions, for he delighted little in any of them; and whenever he had any time to ſpare, he fled, as his expreſſion was, to Theobalds, and buried himſelf in privacy.

(115) Life of William Lord Burleigh. Lloyd's State Worthies. Memoirs of the Adminiſtration of William Lord Burleigh.

magnificent

(x) Stowe's Annals, p. 737. Holland's Heroologia Anglicana.

magnificent tomb erected to his memory (x). Yet in the parish-register it is expressly said, that William Lord Burleigh was buried there (y), August 29, 1598; from whence one would imagine, that his body was not conveyed to Westminster at all, but rather sent immediately to Stamford. As in other things he was happier than most great Ministers, so particularly in this, that his descendants have continued, for a long series of years, in the quiet possession of high titles and large estates; and the female branches of this family have intermarried with the noblest houses in this island, which were blessings, that, of all others, this noble and venerable person most esteemed [EE]. Besides, his fame

(y) Register of St. Martin's parish in Stamford.

[EE] This noble and venerable person most esteemed.] We have already shewn, that he had by his first wife, Mary Cheke, daughter of Peter Cheke, Esq; and sister of Sir John Cheke, his eldest son Thomas, a nobleman of great courage, and of unblemished probity, who in the last year of Queen Elizabeth's reign was honoured with the Garter: in the third year of King James he was created Earl of Exeter, which was in those days thought a very extraordinary favour, since it was the first instance, where the title of a county town was given to one family, while the title of the county remained in another, as it then did, in Mountjoy Earl of Devonshire (116). His Lordship married first Dorothy, one of the daughters and coheiresses of John Lord Latimer, by whom he had issue five sons and eight daughters. His second wife was Frances, daughter to the Lord Chandois, by whom he had only one daughter, who died in her infancy. He died February 7th, 162$\frac{1}{2}$, and was buried in St. John's chapel (117), in the collegiate church of St. Peter at Westminster. By his second wife, Mildreda, eldest daughter of Sir Anthony Coke, of Giddy-Hall in Essex, the Lord Burleigh had issue one son and two daughters, viz. Robert, who succeeded him gradually in his employments, and of whom at large in the next article. Anne was married to Edward Earl of Oxford, who, when he could not prevail upon his father-in-law to save his friend, the Duke of Norfolk's life, told him in great wrath, He would do all he could to ruin his daughter; and he kept his word, for he deserted her bed, spent most of his own great estate, and by a series of ill usage broke her heart (118). Elizabeth, who married William Wentworth, Esq; Both these ladies his lordship out-lived, and by his will provided generously for the children of the former. As for the latter her husband died before her, and by him she had no issue (119). By his will the Lord Burleigh constituted Dr. Gabriel Goodman, Dean of Westminster, his old faithful friend, and Thomas Bellot, his Steward, who had lived long in his family, his executors (120); and left them a very large sum of money to be distributed in charitable uses, which was most punctually and faithfully performed (121). By the care of these two diligent and faithful persons, his college at Stamford was duly settled; and many other things, according to that worthy person's desire, who was yet so far from affecting to appear charitable in his last moments, or to dispose of what he could no longer keep, that he left nothing to be done then which it was before in his power to do; for he raised the commons of the students at St. John's College in Cambridge, a third in his life-time, as I have seen in a letter of his to his son, Sir Robert Cecil; wherein he mentions it as a reason, why the Queen should allow him more freely to intercede for that college. It was also by his procurement, that his kind master, King Edward VI. left also a legacy to that college; but whether it was complied with or not, does not appear. By the fidelity also of his lordship's executors, his real and personal estate was preserved intire and untouched; though a very exact account was taken of it by Queen Elizabeth's order, who, very probably, might have a notion, that being so long in her service he died in her debt. In this respect she had been remarkably exact, or rather severe: she caused the Earl of Leicester's goods to be sold for the money due to her, though he had stood so high in her favour; she is said to have broken Chancellor Hatton's heart, by demanding of him suddenly an old debt; and though at the request of the Lord Treasurer she granted Sir John Perrot's estate, who died under sentence, to his son, yet after that son's death she resumed the forfeiture; though it was upon very good grounds believed, that old Sir John Perrot was her brother. But Lord Burleigh knew her disposition so well, that he took care to guard against it, by keeping the accounts in the Treasury in constant order, never paying any thing without her express warrant, and never touching a penny of public money for his private use, during his whole administration, though it had been the custom of his predecessors to borrow money out of the Treasury, and pay it again. But he was too wise to follow any example of so dangerous a nature; and by this caution, and the great integrity of his executors, who were perfectly acquainted with his management, there was no room left so much as for a suspicion that any of the Queen's money was in his hands; and therefore the inspection into the estates and effects of which he died possessed, the record of which is still extant, turned only to the benefit of his heirs and his family, and to heighten that high reputation which for prudence and probity he had acquired while living; so that in private, as well as in public life, after, as well as before his decease, all researches into his conduct brought nothing to light, but what added to the general esteem for his person, or to that veneration which was borne, and will be ever borne to his memory, so long as regard is paid to unspotted virtue, exalted abilities, and unparalleled application.

(116) Yorke's Union of Honour, p. 144.

(117) Antiquities of St. Peter's, Westminster, vol. i. p. 169.

(118) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 199.

(119) Life of William Lord Burleigh.

(120) Memoirs of William Lord Burleigh.

(121) Camden. Annal. p. 775.

 [The preceding account of Lord Burleigh is so full, as well as so excellently written, that it may be thought not to require, or, indeed, to admit of much enlargement. We shall mention, however, some additional circumstances that have occurred to us, with regard to his personal history, the representations which have been given of his character, and the farther publications of any of his letters.

It appears, from the Earl of Hardwicke's state papers, that, in 1561, Lord Burleigh (then Sir William Cecil) laboured under some disgust, though of what nature it is now impossible to explain. In a letter to Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, at that time Ambassador in France, he expresses himself in the following terms: "I might lament my place that I "hold, being, to outward appearance, because of "frequentation with her Majesty, of much credit; "and indeed, of none at all. But my remedy is "only to leave the place; wherein my only grief is, "to see the likelihood of such successors, as I am "sure shall or will destroy all my good purposes. I "may not write, but yet I may lament. What is "my credit to help any body, may appear in myself, "that have been forced to sell off the land which I "had when I came to this place with the queen; one "hundred and fifty pounds of good known land; "and, at this instant, I am with burden of debt "compelled to ask leave of her Majesty to sell away "my office in the Common Pleas, that hath been "the only stay of my living these fifteen years, and "her Majesty doth license me so to do." However the case might be with Sir William Cecil at that particular time, it is notorious, as the Earl of Hardwicke justly observes, that he raised a very considerable fortune out of his long course of service (122.) That Lord Burleigh, notwithstanding the general excellence of his character and administration, had many enemies, and many accusations brought against him, is sufficiently apparent from his article. We find, from Dr. Birch, that, in 1592, our great Statesman was charged with a design of marrying his son to the Lady Arabella (123.) He was accused, likewise, of dealing hardly with a Mr. Edmund Palmer, who, though he had exhausted his substance in obtaining intelligence, could not procure from the Treasurer one penny for his expence and labour (124.) The Queen's (122) Miscellaneous State Papers, vol. i. p. 170. 178.

(123) Birch's Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, vol. i. p. 84.

(124) Ibid. p. 95.

fame hath not only triumphed over the envy of his contemporaries, and the calumnies that were ſpread by his adverſaries, who were alſo thoſe of this nation, over all Europe, but Queen's regard to Lord Burleigh, though ſincere and permanent, was occaſionally intermixed with no ſmall degree of petulance and ill humour. He was ſeverely reproached by her, in 1594, on account of the ſtate of affairs in Ireland (125); and, on another occaſion, when he perſiſted, againſt her will, in a deſign of quitting the court for a few days, for the purpoſe of taking phyſic, ſhe called him "a froward old fool (126)." He fell, alſo, under her Majeſty's diſpleaſure, becauſe he diſagreed with her in opinion concerning an affair which related to the Earl of Eſſex. Having ſupported the Earl's claim, in oppoſition to the Queen, her indignation was ſo much excited againſt the Treaſurer, that ſhe treated him as a miſcreant and a coward (127). Lord Burleigh being in the latter part of his life much ſubject to the gout, Sir John Harrington obſerves, in a letter to his Lordſhip, that he did not invite the ſtay of ſuch a gueſt, by rich wines, or ſtrong ſpices (128). It is probable that the frequent return of this diſorder, in conjunction with the weight of buſineſs, and the general infirmities of age, contributed to the peeviſhneſs into which he was ſometimes betrayed. In a converſation which he had with Monſ. de Fouquerolles, an agent from Henry the Fourth, King of France, he loſt himſelf ſo much, as to reflect in the groſſeſt terms upon that Monarch. This was, indeed, an aſtoniſhing act of imprudence, in a man of his years and experience (129); and affords a ſtriking inſtance of the errors and inadvertencies to which the wiſeſt and beſt perſons are liable. When the Lord Treaſurer died, Queen Elizabeth was ſo much affected with the event, that ſhe took it very grievouſly, ſhed tears, and ſeparated herſelf, for a time, from all company (130).

(125) Ibid. p. 169.

(126) Ibid. p. 448.

(127) Birch, ubi ſupra, vol. ii. p. 146, 147.

(128) Nugæ Antiquæ, vol. ii. p. 82.

(129) Birch's Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth, vol. ii. p. 328, 329.

(130) Ibid. p. 390.

We cannot omit the characters which have been drawn of his Lordſhip by ſome of our recent hiſtorians. Mr. Guthrie hath ſpoken of him in high terms of applauſe. "He poſſeſſed, ſays this writer, "a ſagacity that was maſter of both fortunes; in "the dejected, never without reſources; in the "proſperous, never without caution; and in both "preſerving equanimity. Than him, no man had "ever leſs reaſon to worſhip fortune for his riſe. "His application, without diſcernment, would have "made him wealthy in a low ſphere; his diſcern-"ment, with application, made him great in the "higheſt. Of all men of genius, he was the moſt of "a drudge; of all men of buſineſs, he was the moſt "of a genius. He was too penetrating to be ſunk "by the ſtorms of a court; for he weathered them "by managing his ſails, rather than by altering his "courſe. He was a ſincere proteſtant, but knew "how to preſerve both his intereſt and his conſci-"ence; and he had a yet greater art, that of avoid-"ing to put either of them into hazard. He often "made uſe of diſſimulation, ſeldom of deceit; for "he knew how to conceal, without counterfeiting "truth.—All parties had an opinion of his abilities, "few had any diſtruſt of his virtues (131)." If Mr. Hume's character of our Stateſman be not equally advantageous, it is, notwithſtanding, much in his favour. "Lord Burleigh," ſays this elegant hiſtorian, "died in an advanced age; and by a rare for-"tune, was equally regretted by his ſovereign and "the people. He had riſen gradually, from ſmall "beginnings, by the mere force of merit; and "though his authority was never entirely abſolute, "or uncontrouled with the Queen, he was ſtill, "during a courſe of nearly forty years, regarded as "her Miniſter. None of her other inclinations or "affections could ever overcome her confidence in ſo "uſeful a Counſellor; and as he had had the gene-"roſity or good ſenſe to pay aſſiduous court to her, "during her ſiſter's reign, when it was dangerous to "appear her friend, ſhe thought herſelf bound in "gratitude, when ſhe mounted the throne, to per-"ſevere in her attachments to him. He ſeems not "to have poſſeſſed any ſhining talents of addreſs, "eloquence, or imagination; and was chiefly diſtin-"guiſhed by ſolidity of underſtanding, probity of "manners, and indefatigable application to buſineſs: "Virtues, which, if they do not always enable a "man to riſe to high ſtations, do certainly qualify "him beſt for filling them. Of all the Queen's "Miniſters he was the only one who left a conſide-"rable fortune to his poſterity; a fortune not ac-"quired by rapine or oppreſſion, but gained by the "regular profits of his offices, and preſerved by fru-"gality (132)."

(131) Guthrie's Hiſtory of England, vol. iii. p. 69.

(132) Hume's Hiſtory of England, vol. v. p. 408, 409. Edition of 1763.

We cannot avoid obſerving, by the way, that Mr. Hume, in another part of his hiſtory, hath miſrepreſented Sir William Cecil's argument, in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, concerning the eſtabliſhment of the reformation. He deſcribes him as ſaying, among other things, that the nation had of late been ſo accuſtomed to revolutions in religion, that men had loſt all idea of truth and falſehood in ſuch ſubjects. For the authority of what he hath written, Mr. Hume refers to Burnet and Camden; but no ſuch ſentiment, as that we have ſpecified, is to be found either in Burnet or Camden, or in the original paper from which theſe two hiſtorians have drawn their account of the reaſons that were given for the abolition of popery (133). Indeed, it was impoſſible that any ſentiment of that kind could have been delivered by Sir William Cecil. It would have been equally contrary to his own ideas of things and the ſpirit of the times. There were, no doubt, in that age, as there are in every age, many perſons of worldly or timid diſpoſitions, who would conceal their private opinions, and bend their outward behaviour to the dictates of power; and there might be others, who entertained a high idea of the reverence that was to be paid to the ſupreme authority of the ſtate. But ſtill, there have been few periods with regard to which it could with leſs juſtice have been aſſerted, that men had loſt all idea of truth and falſehood in religious ſubjects. On the contrary, the minds of people were extremely agitated on ſuch ſubjects, and they laid a ſtreſs upon them, of which, at preſent, we have little conception. They thought that their eternal ſalvation or their eternal damnation, depended upon the truth or falſehood of tenets which we now look upon with much indifference. Mr. Hume is doubly blameable; firſt, in aſcribing to Sir William Cecil what there is no evidence of his having ſpoken; and ſecondly, in putting ſentiments into his mouth that were repugnant to his real principles. Such a conduct is a flagrant falſification of hiſtory, and deſerves to be ſeverely cenſured. The writer of the Britiſh Biography hath very properly pointed out and condemned Mr. Hume's behaviour in this reſpect (134).

(133) Ibid. p. 5, 6. Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reform. vol. ii. p. 377. and Appendix to ditto; and Camden, in Kennett's Compleat Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 370.

(134) Britiſh Biography, vol. iii. p. 197, note.

To return to Lord Burleigh's general character, the Earl of Hardwicke, than whom no one can be a better judge of our eminent Stateſman's real merit, hath expreſſed his high opinion of him in one or two places. Speaking of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, he ſays, that Cecil, "who went by plain ways to direct ends," diſliked his intriguing ſpirit, and dreaded his abilities. Lord Hardwicke farther obſerves, that in the letters which he hath pnbliſhed from Cecil, the reader will have ample proofs of his wiſdom, integrity and moderation (135). But whilſt both our older and later writers ſo generally concur in giving the higheſt character of Lord Burleigh, there is one modern hiſtorian, Dr. Smollet, who hath endeavoured to detract from his fame, and hath ſpoken of him in the following diſparaging terms. "In the midſt of theſe "broils, the Lord Burleigh died in extreme old "age, having preſerved his influence to the laſt "moment of his life, againſt all the intrigues of "Leiceſter, Eſſex, and other perſons who ſhared "the Queen's favour. He was one of thoſe cold, "plodding, illiberal Stateſmen who think honeſty "and plain dealing are incompatible with the art of "Government. He had ordinary parts, was capa-"ble of incredible application, and inculcated upon "Elizabeth the maxim which influenced her whole "conduct; namely, that it was her intereſt to keep "all the ſtates of Chriſtendom embroiled by domeſtic "diſſenſions. He was an excellent Miniſter for the "revenue, which he managed with equal frugality

(135) Miſcellaneous State Papers, vol. i. p. 121. 170.

but lives freſh in the memory of good men, and is recorded with the higheſt ſtrains of praiſe in the moſt authentic of our Hiſtories; ſo that it may ſafely, and without the leaſt exag-

" and addreſs. In his private behaviour he was cloſe, " covetous, ill-bred, and ungracious. He died un- " regretted by the people, and was ſucceeded in " office by the Lord Buckhurſt (136)." There is ſcarcely any part of this character (excepting what is ſaid concerning Lord Burleigh's management of the revenue) which is not liable to animadverſion and cenſure. That he thought honeſty and plain dealing incompatible with the art of Government, is refuted by the whole tenor of his conduct. That his parts were but ordinary, is contradicted by the long courſe of his able and ſucceſsful Adminiſtration, and by his Letters and State Papers. With regard to his embroiling the States of Chriſtendom, it was wiſe in him to encourage the Proteſtants of Scotland, to ſupport the Huguenots in France, and to aſſiſt the Hollanders in their ſtruggles for liberty. That he was cloſe, covetous, ill-bred, and ungracious, is by no means generally true; though, in the latter part of his life, his numerous infirmities ſometimes expoſed him to a peeviſhneſs of diſpoſition. That he died unregretted by the people, is inconſiſtent with the teſtimony of hiſtory. It is not eaſy to collect a greater number of miſrepreſentations and falſehoods in a ſmall compaſs, than what Dr. Smollet has accumulated in one ſhort paſſage. To complete the abſurdity of it, he aſſerts, in another place, that Lord Burleigh " was a Miniſter " of conſummate judgment, extenſive knowledge, " indefatigable, impenetrable, and implicitly at- " tached to the intereſt of his Sovereign." Whether, obſerves the author of the Britiſh Biography, the hiſtorian be entirely conſiſtent with himſelf, particuculary whether a man can with much propriety be ſaid to have but ordinary parts, and at the ſame time poſſeſs conſummate judgment, we leave to the determination of our readers (137). A farther inſtance may be mentioned of Dr. Smollet's diſregard to hiſtorical truth, where Lord Burleigh is concerned. Having deſcribed the ſtorm that was brewed againſt him, in 1569, he ſays, that Elizabeth eſpouſed the cauſe of Cecil, becauſe he had always flattered her private animoſity againſt the Queen of Scotland (138). But ſurely there were many other very important reaſons for her Majeſty's attachment to ſo able and faithful a ſervant.

(136) Smollet's Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. iv. p. 478. Third edition.

(137) Britiſh Biography, vol. iii. p. 215. note.

(138) Smollet, ubi ſupra, p. 366.

As Lord Burleigh took ſo decided a part againſt Mary, Queen of Scots, it is not ſurpriſing that he ſhould not be a favourite character with Dr. Gilbert Stuart, the late ingenious and ſpirited Apologiſt of that unfortunate princeſs. The Doctor ſpeaks of Cecil as capable of exerciſing an unremitting and unſcrupulous aſſiduity in the gratification of the moſt malignant paſſions of his royal Miſtreſs; as treating the Duke of Norfolk with diſſimulation; and as guilty of acrimonious pertinacity, in his accuſations of Queen Mary (139). Whatever may be thought of his treatment of that Queen, and we do not intend to vindicate every part of his conduct in this reſpect, it muſt be allowed, that he acted from a ſincere attachment to Elizabeth, and from a view to what he believed was required by the good of the kingdom, and the ſafety of the Proteſtant religion. Though he was ſo zealous againſt Mary, an occaſion was once taken, from the accidental circumſtance of his having ſeen her at Buxton, to inſinuate that he had entered into deſigns in her favour. The inſinuation came from the Earl of Leiceſter; and ſuch was the effect of this frivolous artifice upon the paſſions of Elizabeth, that it nearly overſet her opinion of the fidelity of Burleigh. It obliged him, at the ſame time, to be more than uſually active againſt the unfortunate Queen of Scotland (140).

(139) Stuart's Hiſtory of Scotland, vol. i. p. 155, 156. vol. ii. p. 33. 341.

(140) Ibid. vol. ii. p. 152.

Mr. Walpole has given Lord Burleigh a place in his Catalogue of noble Authors; but, at the ſame time, juſtly obſerves, that he is one of thoſe great names, better known in the annals of his country than thoſe in the republic of letters. His Lordſhip's anſwer to a large Latin libel, publiſhed abroad, is particularly taken notice of in the note [T]; and it is there aſſerted, that there were many pieces of the like kind written by him, ſome of which were in print, and others in manuſcript. There is likewiſe, in note [N], a reference to an unpubliſhed tract of his, entitled, " A Meditation of the State of Eng- " land, during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth." The other writings of Lord Burleigh, mentioned by Mr. Walpole, are as follows: " La Complainte de " l'Ame pechereſſe," in French verſe, extant in the King's library. " Carmina duo Latina in Obitum " Margaretie Nevillæ, Reginæ Catherinæ à Cubi- " culis." " Carmen Latinum in Memoriam Tho. " Challoneri Equitis aurati, præfixum ejuſdem Li- " bro de reſtauratâ Republica." " A Preface to " Queen Catherine Parr's Lamentation of a Sinner." When Sir William Cecil accompanied the Duke of Somerſet on his expedition to Scotland, he furniſhed materials for an account of that war, which was publiſhed by William Patten, under the title of " Dia- " rium Expeditionis Scoticæ." Lond. 1541, 12mo. This is ſuppoſed to be the reaſon why Lord Burleigh is reckoned by Hollinſhed among the Engliſh Hiſtorians. " The firſt paper or memorial of Sir William Cecil, anno primo Eliz." This, which is only a paper of memorandums, hath been printed in Somers's tracts, from a manuſcript in the Cotton library. " A Speech in Parliament, 1592." This is the ſpeech of which an abſtract is given in note [AA]. It was firſt publiſhed by Strype, in his Annals, and hath ſince been inſerted in the Parliamentary Hiſtory, vol. iv. p. 356—363. " Lord Burleigh's Precepts, " or Directions for the well-ordering and carriage " of a Man's Life," 1637. " A Meditation on " the Death of his Lady." Mr. Ballard, in his Memoirs of Britiſh Ladies, (p. 129—132, octavo edition) hath printed this Meditation from an original formerly in the poſſeſſion of James Weſt, Eſq; but now belonging to the Earl of Shelburne. Lord Burleigh was ſuppoſed to be the author of a thin pamphlet, in defence of the puniſhments inflicted on the Roman Catholics in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It is called, " The Execution of Juſtice in England, " for Maintenance of public and chriſtian Peace, " againſt certain Stirrers of Sedition, and Adherents " to the Traytors and Enemies of the Realm, with- " out any Perſecution of them for Queſtions of " Religion, as it is falſely reported, &c." Lond. 1583. Second edition. Other political pieces were aſcribed to him, and even the celebrated libel, entitled " Leiceſter's Commonwealth." It was aſſerted, that the hints, at leaſt, were furniſhed by him for that compoſition. But no proof hath been given of this aſſertion, and it was not founded on any degree of probability. His Lordſhip drew up, alſo, a number of pedigrees, ſome of which are preſerved in the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's library at Lambeth. Theſe contain the genealogies of the Kings of England, from William the Conqueror to Edward the Fourth; of Queen Anne Boleyn; and of ſeveral princely houſes in Germany (141).

(141) Walpole's royal and noble Authors, vol. i. p. 122—127.

Out of the large multitude of Lord Burleigh's letters, which are extant in various places, many have found their way to the preſs. Thirty-three are printed in Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, and three in Howard's Collections (142). Many more may be met with in Dr. Forbes's, Haynes's, and Murdin's State Papers. The two laſt publications are ſpecifically taken from the original letters, and other authentic memorials left by Lord Burleigh, and now remaining at Hatfield-Houſe, in the library of the Earl of Saliſbury. Haynes's Collection, which was publiſhed in 1740, extends from the year 1542 to 1570. Murdin's, which appeared in 1759, reaches from 1571 to 1596. Both theſe publications throw great light on the period to which they relate, and have been of eminent ſervice to our recent Hiſtorians. The whole courſe of the proceedings, relative to Mary Queen of Scots, is particularly diſplayed in theſe collections; on which account much uſe hath lately been made of them by Dr. Gilbert Stuart. In the original papers of Mr. Anthony Bacon, are ſeveral exaggeration, be affirmed, that his fortune, in all reſpects, is the faireſt reward that can be propoſed, in order to move future Miniſters to follow his example. C.

(142) Ibid. p. 126.

veral letters of Lord Burleigh, from which ſundry extracts have been given by Dr. Birch, in his Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth (143). There is, alſo, in the Nugæ Antiquæ, a letter of advice, written by his Lordſhip, in 1578, to Mr. Harington, (afterwards Sir John Harington) then a ſtudent at the Univerſity of Cambridge (144). In the Earl of Hardwicke's miſcellaneous State Papers, beſides a number of letters addreſſed to Cecil, there are ſeven of his own writing, relative to important public concerns (145). One of them ſhews, in a ſtriking view, the friendly behaviour of Lord Burleigh to the Earl of Leiceſter, when that Nobleman laboured under the Queen's diſpleaſure, and reflects great honour on the old Treaſurer's memory. It is ſtrange, ſays the Earl of Hardwicke, that Camden paſſes it over in ſilence: but, indeed, adds his Lordſhip, that Hiſtorian's omiſſions are very unpardonable, conſidering the lights he had (146). As to Lord Burleigh's unpubliſhed papers, they are ſtill exceedingly numerous, and are extant in the Britiſh Muſeum, in the libraries of the Earls of Saliſbury, Hardwicke, and Shelburne, and in other places.

(143) Memoirs, &c. vol. i. p. 63—66. 69. 123. 188. vol. ii. p. 74—76. 146—348.

(144) Nugæ Antiquæ, vol. ii. p. 282—286.

(145) Miſcellaneous State Papers, vol. i. p. 170—174. 176—179. 297, 298. 324—329. 334—340.

(146) Ibid. p. 329.

Some farther particulars might be added to the account which is given, in note [Y], of Lady Burleigh; but we purpoſe to take notice of Sir Anthony Cooke's four learned daughters together, when we come to that gentleman's article.

We ſhall conclude our note with the ten precepts which Lord Burleigh gave to his ſecond ſon, Robert Cecil. They are well worthy of being inſerted in this place, as they afford a farther diſplay of the High Treaſurer's character, caſt ſome light on the manners of the age, and may ſuggeſt very uſeful cautions to any young Nobleman or Gentleman who may chance to peruſe them.

" Son Robert,

" THE virtuous inclinations of thy matchleſs mother, by whoſe tender & godly care thy infancy was governed; together with thy education under ſo zealous & excellent a tutor; puts me in rather aſſurance than hope, that thou art not ignorant of that ſummum bonum, which is only able to make thee happy as well in thy death as life; I mean, the true knowledge & worſhip of thy Creator and Redeemer: without which all other things are vaine & miſerable. So, that thy youth being guided by ſo ſufficient a teacher, I make no doubt but he will furniſh thy life with divine & moral documents. Yet, that I may not caſt off the care beſeeming a parent towards his child; or that thou ſhouldeſt have cauſe to derive thy whole felicity & welfare rather from others than from whence thou receivedſt thy breath & being; I think it fit & agreeable to the affection I beare thee, to help thee with ſuch rules & advertiſements for the ſquaring of thy life, as are rather gained by experience than by much reading. To the end, that entring into this exorbitant age, thou mayeſt be the better prepared to ſhunne thoſe ſcandalous courſes whereunto the world, & the lack of experience, may eaſily draw thee. And, becauſe I will not confound thy memory, I have reduced them into ten precepts; &, next unto Moſes tables, if thou imprint them in thy mind, thou ſhalt reap the benefit, & I the content. And they are theſe following.

" 1. When it ſhall pleaſe God to bring thee to man's eſtate, uſe great providence & circumſpection in chuſing thy wife. For from thence will ſpring all thy future good or evil. And it is an action of life, like unto a ſtratagem of warre; wherein a man can erre but once. If thy eſtate be good, match neere home & at leiſure; if weak, far off & quickly. Enquire diligently of her diſpoſition, & how her parents have been inclined in their youth. Let her not be poore, how generous ſoever. For a man can buy nothing in the market with gentility. Nor chuſe a baſe & uncomely creature altogether for wealth; for it will cauſe contempt in others & loathing in thee. Neither make choice of [a] dwarfe, or [a] fool; for, by the one thou ſhalt beget a race of pigmies; the other will be thy continual diſgrace; and it will yirke thee to hear her talk. For thou ſhalt find it, to thy great grief, that there is nothing more fulſome than a ſhe-foole.

" And, touching the guiding of thy houſe, let thy hoſpitallitie be moderate; &, according to the meanes of thy eſtate, rather plentifull than ſparing, but not coſtly. For I never knewe any man grow poore by keeping an orderly table. But ſome conſume themſelves through ſecret vices, & their hoſpitalitie bears the blame. But baniſh ſwiniſh drunkards out of thine houſe, which is a vice impairing health, conſuming much, & makes no ſhew. I never heard praiſe aſcribed to the drunkard, but [for] the well-bearing [of] his drink; which is a better commendation for a brewers horſe or a dray-man, then for either a gentleman, or [a] ſerving-man. Beware thou ſpend not above three of four parts of thy revennewes; nor above a third part of that in thy houſe. For the other two parts will do no more than defray thy extraordinaries, which alwayes ſurmount the ordinary by much: otherwiſe thou ſhalt live, like a rich beggar, in continual want. And the needy man can never live happily nor contentedly. For every diſaſter makes him ready to mortgage or ſell. And that gentleman, who ſells an acre of land, ſells an ounce of credit. For gentility is nothing elſe but antient riches. So that if the foundation ſhall at any time ſinke, the building muſt need followe—So much for the firſt precept.

" 2. Bring thy children up in learning & obedience, yet without outward auſterity. Praiſe them openly, reprehend them ſecretly. Give them good countenance & convenient maintenance according to thy abilitie; otherwiſe thy life will ſeeme their bondage, & what portion thou ſhalt leave them at thy death, they will thank death for it, & not thee. And I am perſwaded that the fooliſh cockering of ſome parents, & the over-ſtern carriage of others, cauſeth more men & wemmen to take ill courſes, then their own vicious inclinations. Marry thy daughters in time, leſt they marry themſelves. And ſuffer not thy ſonnes to paſs the Alpes. For they ſhall learne nothing there, but pride, blaſphemy, & atheiſm. And if by travell they gett a few broken languages, that ſhall profit them nothing more than to have one meat ſerved in divers diſhes. Neither, by my conſent, ſhalt thou train them up in warres. For he that ſets up his reſt to live by that profeſſion, can hardly be an honeſt man or a good chriſtian. Beſides it is a ſcience no longer in requeſt then uſe. For ſouldiers in peace, are like chimneys in ſummer.

" 3. Live not in the countrey without corn & cattle about thee. For he that putteth his hand to the purſe for every expence of houſehold, is like him that keepeth water in a ſieve, And, what proviſion thou ſhalt want, learn to buy it at the beſt hand. For there is one penny ſaved in four, betwixt buying in thy need, & when the markets & ſeaſons ſerve fitteſt for it. Be not ſerved with kinſmen, or friends, or men intreated to ſtay; for they expect much, & doe little: nor with ſuch as are amorous, for their heads are intoxicated. And keep rather two too few, than one too many. Feed them well, & pay them with the moſt; & then thou mayſt boldly require ſervice at their hands.

" 4. Let thy kindred & allies be welcome to thy houſe & table. Grace them with thy countenance, & farther them in all honeſt actions. For by this means thou ſhalt ſo double the band of nature, as thou ſhalt find them ſo many advocates to plead an apology for thee behind thy back. But ſhake off thoſe glow-wormes, I mean, paraſites & ſycophants, who will feed & fawn upon thee in the ſummer of proſperitie, but, in an adverſe ſtorme, they will ſhelter thee no more then an arbour in winter.

" 5. Beware of ſuretyſhip for thy beſt friends. He that payeth another mans debts, ſeeketh his own decay. But, if thou canſt not otherwiſe chuſe, rather lend thy money thy ſelf upon good bonds, although thou borrow it. So ſhalt thou ſecure thy ſelf, & pleaſure thy friend. Neither borrow money of a neighbour or a friend, but of a ſtranger; where paying for it, thou ſhalt hear no more of it. Otherwiſe thou ſhalt eclipſe thy credit, loſe thy freedom, & yet pay as dear as to another. But in borrowing of money be precious of thy word. For he that hath care of keeping dayes of payment is lord of another mans purſe.

&

" 6. Undertake no ſuit againſt a poor man with receiving much wrong. For, beſides [that] thou makeſt him thy compeer, it is a baſe conqueſt to triumph where there is ſmall reſiſtance. Neither attempt law againſt any man before thou be fully reſolved that thou haſt right on thy ſide: and then ſpare not for either money or paines. For a cauſe or two ſo followed & obtained, will free thee from ſuits a great part of thy life.

" 7. Be ſure to keep ſome great man thy friend, but trouble him not for trifles. Compliment him often with many, yet ſmall, gifts, & of litcle charge. And if thou haſt cauſe to beſtow any great gratuity, let it be ſomething which may be daily in ſight. Otherwiſe, in this ambitious age, thou ſhalt remaine like a hop without a pole; live in obſcurity, & be made a foot-ball for every inſulting companion to ſpurn at.

" 8. Towards thy ſuperiors, be humble, yet generous. With thine equals, familiar, yet reſpective. Towards thine inferiours ſhew much humanity, & ſome familiarity: as to bow the body; ſtretch forth the hand; & to uncover the head: with ſuch like popular compliments. The firſt prepares thy way to advancement. The ſecond makes thee knowne for a man well bred. The third gains a good report; which, once got, is eaſily kept. For right humanitie takes ſuch deep root in the minds of the multitude, as they are eaſilier gained by unprofitable curteſies then by churliſh benefits. Yet I adviſe thee not to affect, or neglect, popularitie too much. Seeke not to be Eſſex: ſhunne to be Rawleigh.

" 9. Truſt not any man with thy life, credit or eſtate. For it is meer folly for a man to enthrall himſelf to his friend, as though, occaſion being offered, he ſhould not dare to become the enemie.

" 10. Be not ſcurrilous in converſation, nor ſatyricall in thy jeſts. The one will make thee unwelcome to all company; the other pull on quarrels, & get the[e] hatred of thy beſt frends. For ſuſpitious jeſts (when any of them ſavour of truth) leave a bitterneſs in the mindes of thoſe which are touched. And, albeit I have already pointed at this incluſively; yet I think it neceſſary to leave it to thee as a ſpeciall caution. Becauſe I have ſeene many ſo prone to quip & gird, as they would rather leeſe their friend then their jeſt. And if perchance their boiling braine yield a quaint ſcoffe, they will travell to be delivered of it as a woman with child. Theſe nimble fancies are but the froth of wit (147)."

(147) Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, vol. i. p. 47—49. Edition of 1779.

It is remarkable, that what Lord Burleigh hath ſaid, in the preceding paper, concerning the danger and evil of foreign travel beyond the Alpes, was verified in his own family. His grandſon, William, the ſecond Earl of Exeter, and his great-grandſon, Lord Roos, were both of them, when at Rome, perverted to the Popiſh religion (148). The ſame zeal for making converts doth not, at preſent, ſubſiſt among the Roman Catholics; but, perhaps, there may ſtill be a danger of acquiring, in certain countries abroad, ſome other principles which are unfavourable to piety, virtue, and true happineſs.] K.

(148) Birch's Life of Prince Henry, p. 213—215.

CECIL, or CECYLL (ROBERT), the firſt Earl of Saliſbury, and one of the ableſt Stateſmen in Europe, in the end of the ſixteenth, and beginning of the ſeventeenth Century, was the ſon of William Lord Burleigh, by his ſecond Lady, Mildred, eldeſt daughter of Sir Anthony Cook (a). He was born about the year 1550[A], and being of a weakly conſtitution was tenderly brought up by his mother. Afterwards, he was educated by a careful and excellent Tutor, under whom he very much improved in every branch of Learning (b). For his farther improvement, he was ſent to St. John's College Cambridge, the fame in which his father the great Lord Burleigh had received his education. He there took, or had conferred upon him, the degree of Maſter of Arts: for he was incorporated in the ſame at Oxford, Auguſt 30, 1605 (c). But his greateſt advantage, was, that he was a Courtier from his cradle; and being trained under his excellent father, became a very great proficient in the knowledge of all State-affairs. As he was the inheritor of the Lord Burleigh's wiſdom, ſo by degrees he ſucceeded him in his places and favour at Court. For, living in thoſe times, when Queen Elizabeth had moſt need of the ableſt perſons, and being ſuch an one himſelf, ſhe employed him in affairs and negotiations of the higheſt conſequence (d). Having conferred on him the honour of Knighthood, ſhe ſent him aſſiſtant to the Earl of Derby, Embaſſador to the King of France. At his return, ſhe made him, in 1596, ſecond Secretary of State with Sir Francis Walſingham; after whoſe deceaſe he continued Principal, as long as he lived (e). Whilſt he continued in that office, he was, as one expreſſes it (f), a Craftſmaſter in foreign intelligence, which he had from all parts of the world; holding, at his own charge, a correſpondence with all Embaſſadors, and neighbouring States (g): By which means he diſcovered Queen Elizabeth's enemies abroad, and private conſpiracies at home. For this the Queen extremely valued him, and the Papiſts hated him as much[B]. He was one of the chief inſtruments in the diſgrace and fall of Robert, Earl of Eſſex, who had all along oppoſed his promotion (h). In 1597, he was conſtituted Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaſter (i), and was alſo Lord Privy-Seal (k). In 1598, he was one of the Commiſſioners (l) ſent into France, to negotiate a peace between that Crown and Spain (m): and in 1599, ſucceeded his father, the Lord Burleigh, in the office of Maſter of the

(a) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 407. and Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, edit. 1732, in Life of William Lord Burleigh, vol. i. B. i. p. 7.

(b) See Ten Precepts, which William Lord Burleigh gave to his ſecond ſon Robert Cecil, in Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, edit. 1732, fol. B. i. p. 7.

(c) Wood, Faſti, edit. 1721, vol. i. col. 171.

(d) Sir Robert Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, edit. 1653, 12*mo*. p. 78, 79. and Aulicus Coquinariæ, edit. 1650, 8*vo*. p. 50.

(e) Aulicus Coquinariæ, ibid. and Camden's Ann. of Queen Elizabeth, under the year 1596.

(b) See Camden's Annals as above, under the years 1596, 1597, &c.

(f) Naunton, ubi ſupra.

(g) Aulicus Coquinariæ, p. 59.

(i) Ibid. under the year 1597. Memorials of Affairs of State, &c. publiſhed by Edm. Sawyer, Eſq; Lond. 1725, fol. vol. i. p. 41.

(k) Deſiderata Curioſa, publiſhed by Fr. Peck, vol. i. Book ii. p. 1. edit. 1732.

(l) The others were, Sir Tho. Wilks, and John Herbert, Eſq; Maſter of Requeſts.

(m) Camden's Annals, as above, under the year 1598, and Wood, edit. 1721. Faſti, vol. i. col. 106.

[A] He was born about the year 1550.] We have not been able to diſcover any where the exact time of his birth; but have reaſon to conjecture it was about the year ſpecified here. For his father married Mildred Cook, December 21, 1546: Robert was the ſecond child by her, and therefore born about 1549, or 1550 (1). He was one of the young Nobility, that went on board the Engliſh fleet againſt the Spaniſh Armada (†): and was one of the Repreſentatives in Parliament for the county of Hertford, 34 and 39 Elizabethæ (‖).

(1) Life of William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, as above, p. 7.

(†) See Ar. Collins's Peerage under the title of Earl of Exeter.

(‖) Sir H. Chauncey's Hiſt. of Hertfordſhire, p. 17.

[B] The Papiſts hated him.] And vented their malice againſt him in ſeveral libels, both printed and manuſcript: reflecting in them very groſsly, upon his birth and honour; and threatning to murder him. He returned an anſwer to ſome of them, both in Engliſh and Latin, intitled, Adverſus Perduelles; wherein he declares, That he deſpiſed all their threats, for the ſervice of ſo good a cauſe he was engaged in; namely, that of his Religion and Country (2).

(2) Aulicus Coquin. p. 52; and Memorials of Affairs of State, &c. vol. ii. p. 192. 293.

Wards,

Wards [C]; for which he reſigned a better place, that of Chancellor of the Duchy (n) He ſucceeded him alſo in the high poſt of Prime Miniſter, and from that time the publick affairs ſeem to have been entirely under his direction; which he conducted with a capacity worthy of his Prince and Country, and an integrity ſo firm and conſtant, as more than once expoſed his life to the implacable malice of the Spaniards and Jeſuits, as will preſently appear. During the laſt years of the reign of his glorious Miſtreſs, he ſupported her declining age with that vigour and prudence, as at once enabled her to aſſiſt her allies the States, when they were ingloriouſly abandoned by France, and to baffle a dangerous Rebellion in Ireland, fomented and cheriſhed by a ſtrong aſſiſtance from Spain (o). Though he was a faithful ſervant to his Miſtreſs Queen Elizabeth, yet, like many others, he adored the riſing Sun, and kept a correſpondence with her Succeſſor King James I. (p). At one time, he was very near being diſcovered [D], but by uncommon preſence of mind he avoided the danger (q). His private ſervices to that Monarch, or elſe the intereſt of Sir George Hume (r), ſo effectually recommended him to King James, that he took him into the higheſt degree of favour [E], and continued him in his office of Prime-Miniſter (s). And though, in that reign, the publick affairs were not carried on with the ſame ſpirit as in the laſt, the fault cannot with juſtice be charged on this great Miniſter, but on the King; who, being of a fearful and unenterprizing temper, was reſolved to have peace with all the world, and eſpecially with Spain, at any rate (t). But, notwithſtanding Sir Robert Cecil was far from approving in his heart the meaſures taken for obtaining that inglorious peace, yet he ſo far ingratiated himſelf with his Sovereign, that he was raiſed by him to great honours. For, on the 13th of May 1603, he was created Baron of Eſſenden in Rutlandſhire; on the 20th of Auguſt 1604, Viſcount Cranborne in Dorſetſhire (being the firſt of that degree that ever uſed a Coronet;) and, on the 4th of May 1605, Earl of the city of Saliſbury [F] (u). Auguſt 30, 1605, he was incorporated Maſter of Arts at Oxford, as he ſtood at Cambridge (w). And alſo was Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge (x), and May 20, 1605, inſtalled Knight of the Garter (y). He ſhewed himſelf all along a true ſervant to his Prince, but without neglecting at the ſame time the real Intereſt and Advantage of his Country. As an inſtance of which, he never heartily eſpouſed the Spaniſh Intereſt, though it was the only one countenanced by King James; and ſome of our Courtiers, by encouraging it, got immenſe riches [G]. The court of Spain were ſo ſenſible of his little inclination, or rather extreme averſion, to them [H], that they endeavoured

(n) Memorials of Affairs of State, &c. as above, p. 41.

(o) Memorials, &c. as above. Preface to vol. i.

(p) See Life of King James, by W. Sanderſon, p. 258, edit. 1656, fol.

(q) Life and Reign of King James I. by A. Wilſon, in Complete Hiſt. of England, edit. 1706, vol. ii. p. 662.

(r) Weldon's Court and Character of King James, Lond. 1650, p. 10.

(s) Preface to vol. i. of Memorials, &c. as above.

(t) Memorials, &c. in Preface, as above.

(u) Pat. 1 Jac. p. 14; Pat. 2 Jac. p. 12; and Pat. 3 Jac. p. 12. See alſo Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 407. Rafe Brooke's Catalog. in the Earls of Saliſbury.

(w) Wood, Faſti, edit. 1721, vol. i. col. 171.

(x) Dugdale, ibid.

(y) Liſt of the Knights of the Garter, in Aſhmole; and Camden's Annals of King James I. under the year 1606.

[C] He ſucceeded his father——in the office of Maſter of the Wards.] In which he was ſo reſtrained by new orders, that he was a Ward himſelf; as he expreſſes it (3).

(3) Memorials, &c. as above, p. 41.

[D] At one time he was very near being diſcovered.] For, as the Queen was taking the air upon Blackheath, near Greenwich, a Poſt riding by, her Majeſty enquired from whence it came; and being told, 'From Scotland,' ſhe ſtopped her coach to receive the packet. Sir Robert Cecil, who was in the coach with her, fearful leſt ſome of his ſecret conveyances ſhould be diſcovered; having a ready wit, calls for a knife ſuddenly to open it, that delays and puts-off might not beget ſuſpicion. When he came to cut it open, he told the Queen, It looked and ſmelt very ill, coming out of many naſty budgets; ſo that it was proper to open and air it before ſhe ſaw what it contained. Now, the Queen having an extreme averſion to ill-ſcents, that ſudden thought of the Secretary's hindered her from ſmelling out his underhand contrivances (4). After the Queen's deceaſe, it was he who firſt publickly read her will, and proclaimed King James (5).

(4) Wilſon, as above.

(5) Ibid.

[E] His private ſervices,——or elſe the intereſt of Sir George Hume (afterwards Earl of Dunbar) recommended him to King James.] One author, if he deſerves credit (6), relates the following ſtory. 'Sir 'George Hume being the only man that was the 'guider of the King, and his affairs, all the wiſer 'ſort of Engliſh made their addreſſes unto him; 'amongſt thoſe Sir Robert Cecill, a very wiſe man, 'but much hated in England, by reaſon of the freſh 'bleeding of that univerſally beloved Earle of Eſſex, 'and for that was clouded alſo in the King's favour. 'He came to Yorke, but lay cloſe, unſeene, or ſcarce 'known to be in the city, untill he knew what entertainment he ſhould receive from the King; for he 'was in his owne, and all men's opinions, ſo under 'the hatches, as not ever to appear above-aboard 'againe (nor did any of the counter-faction to Eſſex, 'beſides himſelfe, ever attain to the King's favour); 'but thoſe friends raiſed by his wit, and purſe, did 'ſo co-operate (of which Sir Roger Aſton, that plaine 'man was principal, for which he loſt not his labour) 'that Sir Geo. Hume, and Sir Robert Cecill had 'many ſecret meetings; and did ſo comply, that Sir 'Robert Cecill, to the admiration of all, did appeare, and come out of his chamber like a giant, 'to run his race for honour, and fortune; and who 'in ſuch dearneſs and privacy with the King, as Sir 'Robert Cecill: as if he had been his faithful ſervant many years before.' But Dr. Goodman, author of Aulicus Coquinariæ (7), thinks, That Sir Robert Cecill's merit; his perpetual correſpondence by emiſſaries of his own into Scotland; and the great want King James had of his advice and directions, how to render himſelf moſt acceptable to his new ſubjects, were recommendation enough with that Monarch, without any need of Sir George Hume's intereſt or interpoſition.

(6) Weldon, Court and Character of King James, p. 10, 11.

(7) Page 51.

[F] Earl of the city of Saliſbury.] He, and his elder brother, Thomas, Earl of Exeter, were both created Earls in one day; but Sir Robert was created firſt, and by that means had the precedence: which, it ſeems, occaſioned for ſome time great uneaſineſs between theſe two noble families.

[G] Some of our Courtiers, by encouraging it, got immenſe riches.] We are told (8), 'That there was 'not one Courtier of note, who taſted not of Spain's 'bounty, either in gold or jewels; and among them, 'not any in ſo large a proportion as the Counteſs of 'Suffolk, who ſhared in her Lord's intereſt, being 'then a potent man, and in that intereſt which ſhe 'had, in being miſtreſs to that little great Secretary '(||) (little in body and ſtature, but great in wit and 'policy) the ſole manager of ſtate-affairs.'

(8) Weldon, ubi ſupra, p. 27.

(||) The Earl of Saliſbury.

[H] The Court of Spain were ſenſible of his little inclination, or rather averſion, to them.] He received intimations of it from Sir Charles Cornwallis, Embaſſador in Spain; who thus writes to him: '——'Great doubt they [the Spaniards] make of your 'Lordſhip's diſpoſition towards them: but, I have 'ſo well reſolved them, as they ſeem to ſhew more 'confidence; yet more they deſire, if by any means they deavoured to alienate the King his Maſter's favour from him, by means of the Queen (z); and it was moved there in Council, to ſend complaints to England of his malignant humour, or enmity, to the Spaniſh nation: upon which, if he did not alter his conduct, then a ſhorter courſe ſhould be taken with him; that is, they would deſtroy him (a). Afterwards, they came to have great hopes of him, and reſolved to omit no means to gain him over to their ſide (b). But when all the Popiſh deſigns happened to be blaſted by the diſcovery of the Gunpowder-plot; a plot in the diſcovery of which this Lord was very active; ſo enraged thereupon was the body of the Roman Catholicks, that ſome of them formed a combination againſt him (c). That however taking no effect, they attempted to ruin him in the King's favour, by reporting, that he had a penſion of forty thouſand Crowns from the States of the United Provinces, for being their ſpecial favourer, friend, ſupporter, and patron (d). Moreover, they branded him with the appellation of a Puritan [I], a name very odious to King James (e). Finally, they plotted to murder him, by a muſket-ſhot, out of the Savoy, or ſome other houſe near, as he ſhould be going by water to Court (f). But all their wicked machinations proved unſucceſsful [K]. In the Parliament which met at Weſtminſter, November 9, 1605, he got much reputation, love, and honour, for the zeal he then expreſſed for the Proteſtant Religion (g). In the year 1606, he entertained King James, and the King of Denmark who was then in England, four days together, at his ſeat at Theobalds (h). Upon the death of Thomas Sackville, Earl of Dorſet, Lord High-Treaſurer of England, in April 1608, he ſucceeded him in that moſt eminent office, on the 4th of May (i): and the choice the King made of him for that place was univerſally applauded; a great reformation being expected from him in the Exchequer (k); which he accordingly effected. And finding it almoſt totally exhauſted, he deviſed theſe ſeveral means to repleniſh it with money, namely, by cauſing the Royal Manors to be ſurveyed, which before were but very imperfectly known: by reviving the cuſtody of Crown lands, by commiſſions of Aſſerts: by taking care to have the King's woods and timber viewed, numbered, marked, and valued: by having an exact ſurvey made of the Copy-hold lands held of the Crown, which he ordered to be printed: by compounding with the Copy-holder of inheritance, and the poſſeſſors of waſtes and Commons originally appertaining to the King: by appointing Commiſſioners, to gather in the fines ariſing from penal laws, and ſuch as accrued from the King's manors; and alſo to ſurvey the eſtates that were extended, or ſeized, for debts to the Crown: by improving the cuſtoms, from eighty-ſix thouſand, to one hundred and twenty thouſand, and afterwards to an hundred and thirty-five thouſand pounds per annum; by bargaining, for the New-River water to be conveyed to London, which brought a great yearly revenue: by ſurrendering up his patent of Maſter of the Wards to the King, for his benefit and advantage (l): and likewiſe by Privy-Seals; and by ſelling ſome of the Crown-Lands (m). While he thus ſtudied his Maſter's advantage, he did not, at the ſame time, neglect his own; but got a conſiderable eſtate for himſelf [L], and exchanged his ſeat of Theobalds with the King, for the noble manor of Hatfield

(z) Memorials of Affairs of State, &c. as above, vol. ii. p. 159.

(a) Ibid. p. 130.

(b) Ibid. p. 159.

(c) Ibid. p. 170, 171, 172. 193. 202, 203.

(d) Ibid. p. 229. 440.

(e) Ibid. p. 464.

(f) Ibid. p. 230. 236.

(g) Ibid. p. 216. 219.

(h) Edmund Howes's Continuation of Stow's Annales, edit. 1631, p. 885.

(i) Pat. 6 Jacobi, p. 30.

(k) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. ii. p. 399.

(l) Aulicus Coquin. p. 55—61.

(m) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. iii. p. 239. 301. 309.

'they might obtain it. I tell them, that the beſt 'advice is, Ama & amaberis: I aſſure them ſuch to 'be your Lordſhip's noble diſpoſition, as where you 'find a ſoundneſs in good will to the King and your 'Country, you need not be ſollicited for your af- 'fection (9) —— And elſewhere —— This State, 'though admiring your worthe, and ſetting the true 'eſteem upon your abilities, yet reſts ſettled in a 'prejudicate opinion of your affection to them. For 'myne own parte,——I have travelled to myne ut- 'termoſt to perſuade them the truthe, viz. That 'your onely Blancke is the honor and ſafety of your 'King and Country, not paſſion or partial inclina- 'nation (10).'

(9) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. ii. p. 119.

(10) Ibid. p. 316. See alſo vol. iii. p. 43.

[I] They branded him with the appellation of a Puritan.] But Sir Charles Cornwallis fully reſolved them to the contrary, 'Giving them (to uſe his own words 'to his Lordſhip) to underſtand your noble temper 'and integritye in all your actions:———ending 'with theſe words, That God having bleſſed you 'with ſo great wiſdom, ſoe highe a place in your 'Prince's favours, and ſo happy an eſtate; might 'alſoe, being a meane of a peace to the univerſall 'Church, lay a perpetuall foundation to your Houſe 'and Fame (11).' The anſwer his Lordſhip made, with regard to theſe and the like calumnies, was every way worthy of his noble mind. 'I have learned 'to deſpiſe the malicious ſtinge of evill tongues, 'which hate me for my Religion, and my Coun- 'trye (12).'

(11) Ibid. vol. ii. p. 464.

(12) Ibid. p. 293.

[K] All their wicked machinations proved unſucceſsful.] They had not made an end, even in the year 1609. For in June that year, Sir Ch. Cornwallis adviſed his Lordſhip, 'That four Jeſuites lately ſent 'into England, had in charge, for one of their 'eſpecial Commiſſions, to acquaint themſelves with 'ſome neere attendants to my Lords of Canterbury 'and Saliſbury; and whatſoever it ſhould coſt to 'drawe them by poyſon, or other private meanes 'or practice to make an end of thoſe two Lords, as 'the greateſt obſtacles and enemies to the holy Ca- 'tholique Cauſe in England (13).'

(13) Ibid. vol. iii. p. 43. 48, 49.

[L] Got a conſiderable eſtate for himſelf.] We are told (14), that he fleeted off the cream of the King's manors in many counties, not any two lying in any one county; and made choice of moſt in the remoteſt counties: moreover (15), that he had one trick to get the kernel, and leave the Scots but the ſhell, yet caſt all the envy on them. He would make them buy books of Fee-farms, ſome one hundred pounds per annum, ſome one hundred marks, and then would compound with them for a thouſand pounds; which they were willing to embrace, becauſe they were ſure to have them paſs without any controul or charge; and one thouſand pounds appeared to them that never ſaw ten pounds before, an inexhauſtible treaſure: then would he fill up this book with ſuch prime land, as ſhould be worth ten or twenty thouſand pounds, which was eaſy for him to do, being Treaſurer. By this means his Lordſhip inriched himſelf infinitely, yet caſt the envy on the Scots, in whoſe names theſe books appeared, and are ſtill upon record to all poſterity; though they had but part of the wax, and the Earl of Saliſbury the honey. The ſame author obſerves farther (16), That the advantage the Lord Treaſurer had, in exchanging Theobalds with the King, was as great, as if he had ſold

(14) Weldon, as above, p. 51.

(15) Ibid. p. 60.

(16) Ib. p. 51, 52.

(n) Weldon, as above.

field in Hertfordshire (n). However, this just commendation is due to him, That he consulted in general the interest of the nation, more than most Prime Ministers, before or since him, have done. For, he always encouraged industry and manufactures: as the home-making of Allum; salt by the Sun; busses for fishing; salt upon salt, by new fires and inventions; copper and copperas of iron and steel; that the subjects at home might be kept on work, and the small treasure of the nation hindred from going abroad. He likewise took great care of improving Ireland; by plantations there, and transplantations of the natives, to advance the customs, and to abate the charges of the garrisons: and introduced an universal course of law and justice, in the most barbarous and remote parts of that nation (o). In 1609, he asserted the prerogative of the Crown of England in restraining foreigners from fishing upon our coasts (p). The same year, he made a remarkable speech in Parliament, wherein he demanded a yearly revenue of two hundred thousand pounds for his Majesty [M]. The House of Commons desiring to know, before they made any answer to that demand, what return the King would make them for the same, were checked for it by the Lord Treasurer, as guilty of want of respect (q). This Lord's extreme and indefatigable application to business threw him at length into a consumption of the lungs. After having for some time been in a declining condition, he was attacked, in the beginning of the year 1612, with a tertian ague, which turned to a complication of dropsy and scurvy (r). Being advised to go to the Bath, for the recovery of his health, he set out for that place the 27th of April, and continued there till the 21st of May following (s). The King visited him before his departure (t), and expressed the utmost value for him [N]. But the Bath not doing him the service that was expected, he set out again for London on the 21st of May: however he did not live to reach that city; for he died, in Mr. Daniel's house at St. Margaret's in Marleburgh [O],

(o) Aulicus Coquin. p. 59, 60.

(p) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. iii. p. 49, 50.

(q) Ibid. p. 123. 125.

(r) Ibid. p. 332. 338. 363. Aulicus Coq. p. 62.

(s) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. iii. p. 367. Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, vol. i. edit. 1732, B. vi. p. 9, &c.

(t) Aulicus Coquinariæ, p. 62.

sold his Majesty Theobalds for fifty years purchase. And also, that he had reserved to himself and his posterity the being perpetual keepers of the house and parks adjacent. Finally, that, to satisfy his revenge upon some neighbouring gentlemen, that formerly would not sell him some convenient parcels of land bordering on Theobalds, he put the King on enlarging the park, walling and storing it with red deer.

[M] He made a speech in Parliament, wherein he demanded a yearly revenue of 200,000l. for his Majesty.] Amongst other reasons and inducements which he used then, he alledged this; That at the time of his coming into the office of High-Treasurer, he found the King indebted thirteen hundred thousand pounds, whereof part grew in the late Queen's time, for supplying of the wars of Ireland under the Earls of Essex and Devonshire, and the rest since the King's coming to the crown; specifying particularly the manner and occasions of the expence. That since the said time there had been nine hundred thousand pounds of the said debts acquitted, so that there remained yet four hundred thousand pounds to discharge. He shewed moreover, that the ordinary expence of the King amounted to eighty one thousand pounds yearly more than his whole revenue, besides the incidents of extraordinaries; which he said, there is no man but in the supputation of his private accounts did commonly find to amount to the fourth part of his ordinary charges. So that both for the discharging of the remainder of the King's debts, and the due supplying hereafter of his expences (whereof he did not omit to represent the new increase coming upon him by the installation and emancipating of the Prince) his conclusion and demand was, That the House would yield to a yearly and perpetual Grant, and that without necessity of new consents and assemblies, of two hundred thousand pounds for a subvention to his Majesty's charges. And the better to incline and encourage the House to the granting this high and extraordinary demand, he willed every one of them to bring and proffer freely any such griefs as they had, and promised in the King's name, that his Majesty would redress the same, and give them all satisfaction therein, as far as should lie in his power (17).

(17) Memorials, &c. as above, p. 41.

[N] The King visited him before his departure, &c.] His Majesty visited him twice, soon after the beginning of his illness, and gave charge to the Physicians upon their heads to be careful of him; and commanded all men for four days to forbear speaking to him upon any business (18). Immediately before his departure, his Majesty visited him again at Salisbury-house, and with tears, at parting, protested to the Lords attending, his great loss of the wisest counsellor and best servant, that any Prince in Christendom could parallel (19). And when a report came from Bath, of his being likely to recover, the King sent purposely the Lord Hay to him, with a token, which was, a fair diamond, set, or rather hung, square in a gold ring without a foil, and this message, 'That the favour 'and affection he bore him, was, and should be ever, 'as the form and matter of that Ring, endless, pure, 'and most perfect.' From the Queen he received by the same hand another gracious message, and a token; and at the same time the like remembrance from the Prince delivered by Sir John Hollis: All which were comforts and confirmations of his never otherwise than most faithful and best deserving service (20). And this by the by seems to be a sufficient confutation of the story told by Sir Anthony Weldon (21), That the Duke of Bouillon, who was then in England, about the overture of that unfortunate match between the Palsgrave and the Lady Elizabeth, had so done the Lord Treasurer's errand, and discovered his juggling, that it is most certain, he had been stript of all his great places, if he had lived to return to Court.

(18) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. iii. p. 338.

(19) Aulicus Coquin. p. 62.

(20) Memorials, &c. as above, p. 368.

(21) Court and Character of King James, edit. 1650, 8vo. p. 13.

[O] He died at Mr. Daniel's house at St. Margaret's in Marleburgh.] Some authors of very slender credit, and much given to detraction, give the following account of his death. That he died of the Herodian disease [vermin]; and, for all his great honours and possessions, and stately houses, found no place but the top of a mole-hill (22), near Marleburgh, to end his miserable life; so that it might be said of him, and truly, he died of a most loathsome disease, without house, without pity, without the favour of that master that had raised him to so high an estate (23). —— The other writer here referred to (24), speaks thus— 'Nor was his death, by prejudice, looked upon as 'Herod's, nor the place it attacked him on, viz. 'Sarisbury-plain in his Coach, nor Po his physician 'then present (a mere empirick, and celebrated for 'no skill but in the cure of the ——) small inducement to the reports which followed:——Moreover, 'his body burst the lead it was wrapped in, with so 'much noise and stench as affrighted the by-standers; 'which his calumniators esteemed an effect of God's 'vengeance.' But, besides that these accounts vary in several material circumstances from the text above, which is taken from very authentick writers; it is certain, there is not the least hint of what is asserted by these two scandalous authors, in the relation of this Lord's last moments, minutely given in a letter by his domestic Chaplain Dr. Bowles (25); and by Mr. Fynett, who was one of his constant attendants (26). One author suspects (27), that his Lordship died not without suspicion of poison from Sir Robert Carr.

(22) The ground of this aspersion is, That the day before his death, swooning in the way, he was taken out of his litter, and laid into his coach. Naunton, p. 84.

(23) Weldon, ubi supra, p. 13, 14.

(24) Osborne, as above, p. 86, 87.

(25) See Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, vol. i. B. vi. p. 9, &c.

(26) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. iii. p. 367, 368.

(27) First 14 years of King James, edit. 1651, 4to. p. 11.

on Sunday the 24th of May 1612 (u). His body being embalmed was brought to Hatfield in Hertfordſhire, where it was magnificently buried (w): and a ſumptuous monument was ſome time after erected to his memory [P]. By his Lady, Elizabeth, daughter of William Brooke Lord Cobham, he had William, who ſucceeded him in his honours and dignities; and a daughter named Frances, married to Henry Lord Clifford, ſon and heir apparent to Francis, Earl of Cumberland (x). As to Robert Earl of Saliſbury's perſon and character; for the firſt he was not much beholding to nature, for he was very much crooked. But he had a good face, which indeed was the beſt part of his outſide. What he wanted in ſhape, was amply made up in prudence, and exquiſite good ſenſe; in which reſpect he was his father's own ſon. For, as one expreſſes it (y), upon his little crooked body he carried a head, and a head-piece of a vaſt content. And therein it ſeems nature was ſo diligent to compleat one and the beſt part about him, as that, beſides the perfection of his memory, ſhe took care alſo of his ſenſes, and gave him very quick and ſharp eyes. In his temper, he was of a ſweet diſpoſition, full of mildneſs, courteſy, honeſt mirth, bounty, kindneſs, and gratitude (z): but, in what he found to touch the honour and intereſt of his Sovereign, it was his cuſtom to ſpeak roundly and plainly (a). In his political capacity, he was the moſt ſufficient and able Counſellor that ever King was ſerved with (b): of noble endowments of mind, of a great genius, and perfectly acquainted with the ſtate and intereſt of this nation (c): a perſon of great dexterity, ſincerity, and judgment, in the diſpatch of publick affairs (d). This is abundantly evident not only from his whole conduct, but alſo from his many Letters to our Embaſſadors abroad [Q]; in which he expreſſes himſelf like a perſon of great abilities, and like an honeſt man, and a good Chriſtian. But ſince, as all other officers of State, he hath had a double character, it will therefore be proper to ſee what hath been ſaid to his diſadvantage. He is charged by ſome (e), with having done ill offices to this nation, in diſcovering the nature of the people; and ſhowing the King the way, how to enhance his prerogative ſo above the laws, that he might inſlave the nation: which, though it took well then, yet hath been of ſad and dangerous conſequence in after-times. For, firſt, he cauſed a whole cart-load of Parliament-precedents, that ſpake the ſubjects liberty to be burnt (f). Next, he raiſed two hundred thouſand pounds for making two hundred Baronets; telling the King, 'He ſhould find his Engliſh ſubjects like aſſes, on whom 'he might lay any burden, and ſhould need neither bit nor bridle, but their aſſes ears.' And when the King ſaid, 'It would diſcontent the generality of the gentry;' he replied, 'Tuſh, Sir, you want the money, that will do you good, the honour will do them very 'little.' And by theſe courſes he raiſed himſelf, friends, and family, to offices, honours, and great poſſeſſions. He is alſo accuſed (g), of having ſold great quantities of Crown-timber. But, the perſon who brings this accuſation, does in a great meaſure diſcharge the Lord Treaſurer from it; by obſerving, that millions of oaks were felled and ſold at vile prices, not only during the life of the Earl of Saliſbury, but all the reign of King James. He is likewiſe blamed, for having raiſed money by ſeveral means which were looked upon as oppreſſive. But in reality, the blame of this muſt be laid upon the extravagance, and, in conſequence of that, upon the indigence, of his maſter King James. Whenever he had an opportunity, he endeavoured to curb his Majeſty's extreme profuſeneſs [R]. His greateſt blemiſh, was, the being a promoter of the unfortunate Sir Walter Raleigh's fall (b). And, before that, his ſharp proceedings againſt the Earl of Eſſex, and his incloſures of Hatfield-chace, had created ſuch a hatred to him in the generality, that the black cloud of detraction fell upon all he ſaid or did: to which the misfortunes accompanying him from his birth did not add a little. Upon all theſe accounts he hath been reviled and libelled. But, how many ſoever his faults were, he is univerſally allowed, even by his enemies, to have been of an incomparable prudence: and is highly extolled

(u) Ibid. and Memorials, &c. and Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, &c. as above.

(w) Aulicus Coquinariæ, p. 63. Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii. p. 408.

(x) Dugdale, ibid.

(y) Naunton, Fragmenta Regalia, &c. p. 78, 80.

(z) From the Lord Treaſurer Dorſet's Character of him, in Collins's Peerage, 8vo. 1734, vol. ii. P. i. p. 79.

(a) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. ii. p. 440.

(b) Ibid. p. 74.

(c) Rapin's Hiſt. of Engl. edit. 8vo. 1729, vol. ix. p. 239, 310.

(d) Collins's Peerage, ubi ſupra, p. 78.

(e) Weldon, as above, p. 11, 12.

(f) Dr. Goodman obſerves, That no man can be ſo ſottiſh as to believe this, who knows how ſtrictly the Records are kept by ſworn officers. Aulicus Coquin. p. 53.

(g) Traditional Memoryes, &c. as above, by F. Osborne, p. 92.

(b) Arth. Wilſon's Life and Reign of King James, in Complete Hiſt. vol. ii. edit. 1706, p. 663.

[P] A monument was ſome time after erected to his memory.] It is in a Chapel, built by this Lord, on the North-ſide of the Chancel. The monument, is, a table of black marble, with his Lordſhip's effigies in white marble, lying upon it with his ſtaff. This is ſupported by the four cardinal virtues, in virgin-habits, on their knees, carved in white marble, each with her proper emblem. Underneath is another table of black marble, upon which lies the ſkeleton of the Earl curiouſly carved (28).

(28) Hiſtory of Hertfordſhire, by N. Salmon, fol. Lond. 1718, p. 213.

[Q] His many letters to our Embaſſadors abroad.] There are great numbers of them in the three volumes of Memorials of State, publiſhed by Edmund Sawyer, Eſq; in three volumes, fol. Lond. 1725. There is alſo one letter of his to his father, printed in the Cabala, or Myſteries of State, &c. Lond. 1663, fol. pag. 133.

(29) Wilſon ſays, it was only 5000*l.* Life of King James, in Complete Hiſtory. edit. 1706, vol. ii. p. 688.

[R] He endeavoured to curb his Majeſty's extreme profuſeneſs.] Particularly once, the King having given a peremptory warrant to Sir Robert Carr, afterwards Earl of Somerſet, for twenty thouſand pounds (29), the Lord Treaſurer (who, in his exquiſite prudence, found that not only the Exchequer, but the Indies themſelves would want fluency to feed ſo immenſe a prodigality, and not without reaſon apprehending, that the King was ignorant of the value of the gift he had made to his favourite) cauſed the ſum above-mentioned, all in ſilver, to be laid upon the ground (30), in a room through which his Majeſty was to paſs, being invited to dinner at Saliſbury-houſe. The King amazed at the quantity, and probably having never ſeen the like before, aſked the Treaſurer, 'Whoſe 'money it was?' He replied, 'Your Majeſty's, be-'fore you gave it away.' Whereupon the King fell into a paſſion, and proteſted he was abuſed, never intending ſuch a gift: and caſting himſelf upon the heap, ſcrabled out the quantity of two or three hundred pounds, and ſwore Carr ſhould have no more. However it being the King's minion, Cecil durſt not provoke him farther, than by permitting him only to have the half of that ſum (31).

(30) According to R. Coke, the money was laid upon four tables, in a gallery thro' which the King was to paſs, 5000*l.* upon each table; and the King ſuffered Carr to have but 5000*l.* of it. Detection, &c. edit. 1719, vol. i. p. 65, 66.

(31) Fr. Oſborne, as above, p. 84, 85.

for

for other excellencies by his friends [S]. Coming ſo near ſuch an unadviſed ſcatterer as King James, he might have enriched his family better than he did, but that he looked upon low things with contempt, leaving much to the gleaning of his ſervants. What was ſaid

[S] And is highly extolled for other excellencies by his friends.] Sir Charles Cornwallis writes to his Lordſhip from Spain in the following words. —— 'Well may your Lordſhip's hearte be comforted in 'this, That the infallible teſtymonies you have given 'of your love to truthe and temper, your watchfull 'eye over the Maſter you ſerve, and your inceſſant 'cares and travails for the ſafety of your countrye, 'cannot but breed you favour with God, love and 'reſpect with the King, and make you deare to as 'many of your countrye as have eyther eyes or judg-'ment to diſcerne your true and rare deſervings (32).' And in another place (33), —— 'That my Lord of 'Saliſburye was ſo compleate and perfect a ſervante 'and lover of his King and countrye, as there were 'no meanes uppon earth to draw him to enclyne to 'any the leaſt poynte that ſhould not ſoundly agree 'with their honnor and ſecurity.' M.

(32) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. ii. p. 316.

(33) Ibid. p. 319.

 ["This man," ſays Mr. Walpole, ſpeaking of the Earl of Saliſbury, "who had the fortune or "misfortune to pleaſe both Queen Elizabeth and "James the Firſt; who, like the Son of the Duke of "Lerma, had the uncommon fate of ſucceeding (34) "his own father as Prime Miniſter, and who, unlike "that ſon of Lerma, did not, though treacherous to "every body elſe, ſupplant his own father, this man "is ſufficiently known. His public ſtory may be "found in all our hiſtories, his particular in the Bi-"ographia; and if any body's curioſity is ſtill unſa-"tisfied about him, they may ſee a tedious account "of his laſt ſickneſs in Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa "(35)." The public ſtory of Sir Robert Cecil muſt, indeed, be left to general hiſtory; but, without having recourſe to Peck, ſome additional perſonal circumſtances may be collected concerning him, which, perhaps, will not be found totally unworthy of notice. It is remarkable, with regard to ſo eminent a man, and who flouriſhed in a period ſo well known, that there ſhould be any conſiderable difficulty in aſcertaining the time of his birth. It is ſaid, in the article above, that he was born in 1550; and, in note [A], reaſons are given to ſhew that this event muſt have taken place either in that year or in the year preceding. Such, too, is the account generally adopted by our Biographical writers. But in the laſt edition of Collins's Peerage, Sir Robert Cecil is ſaid to have been born on the firſt of June 1563 (36). Upon what authority this aſſertion is made, doth not appear; and the difference of thirteen years in the two accounts is very extraordinary. The relation, however, of the editor of Collins is much confirmed by a converſation we have inſerted from Birch's Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth, in note [LLL] of Lord Bacon's Article. In that converſation, which paſſed between the Earl of Eſſex and Sir Robert Cecil on the ſubject of Bacon's promotion, Sir Robert objected to his couſin Francis's being appointed Attorney General, becauſe there was no precedent of ſo raw a youth's having been promoted to an office of ſuch great moment. Upon this the Earl, fired with indignation, reproached Sir Robert, that being himſelf younger than Francis Bacon, of leſs learning, and of no greater experience, he was endeavouring to obtain a place of far higher importance (37.) This narration, we ſee, perfectly agrees with the account given of Sir Robert Cecil's birth by the laſt Editor of Collins's Peerage. For, according to that account, Sir Robert muſt have been more than two years younger than Bacon, who was born on the 22d of January, 1560-61. It is not probable, that the Earl was ignorant of the fact which he aſſerted; neither is it denied by Sir Robert Cecil. He admits the charge, but endeavours to parry it off by arguments of another kind. We may conſider it, therefore, as a decided point, that his birth was many years later than hath commonly been imagined.

(34) After a ſhort interval.

(35) Catalogue of royal and noble Authors, vol. i. p. 167, 168.

(36) Collins's Peerage, vol. iii. p. 144. Edition of 1779.

(37) Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth, vol. i. p. 153.

Several farther circumſtances relative to Sir Robert Cecil, might be extracted from Birch's Memoirs; but moſt of them are too minute to merit particular attention, and ſome of them, which regard his conduct to the two Bacons, Anthony and Francis, are noticed under their proper articles. We cannot paſs over in ſilence a Letter of Sir Robert's to the Earl of Eſſex, accompanied with a prayer which the Queen had made for her private uſe, in 1596, when the expedition was going to be undertaken againſt Cadiz. In this letter, his adulation ſo far gets the better of his theology, that he aſſerts the ſupplications of Princes to be more acceptable to the ſupreme Being, and to have a greater influence with him, than thoſe of other men. It is as follows:

"My very good Lord,

"I Send you herein a worthy encouragement for "you that go forth, with an exceeding comfort "for us that remain: for there is nothing that ſo "much pleaſeth the ears of the Almighty as prayers; "no prayer ſo fruitful as that, which proceedeth "from thoſe, who do neareſt in nature and pow-"er approach him; none ſo near approach his "place and eſſence, as a celeſtial mind in a princely "body. And as his divine Majeſty hath an eye more "ſingular to actions of Princes, ſo doubtleſs hath he "an ear more gracious to their prayers. Put forth "therefore, my Lord, with comfort and confidence, "having your ſails filled with her heavenly breath "for your forewind. You have left alone in her "ſufficient wiſdom at home for the ſecurity of the "ſtate, and godlineſs, which is great riches, both "perfectly united in her royal breaſt. That, which "was meant a ſweet ſacrifice for one, I have pre-"ſumed (not of truſt) to participate with two. It "came to my hands accidentally. I dare ſcarce "juſtify the ſight, much leſs the copy. Conſider "herein my condition, and, if I may reap ſilence "for my adventure, I will ever be found

"your Lordſhip's humble to do you ſervice (38)." (38) Birch, ubi ſupra, vol. ii. p. 18.

The diſlike which there was, in general, between the Earl of Eſſex and Sir Robert Cecil, is ſufficiently known from all our hiſtories. The Earl, in a letter to Mr. Anthony Bacon, written on the 18th of September 1596, ſays, "this day I was more braved "by your little couſin than ever I was by any man "in my life (39)." Sir Walter Raleigh endeavoured to mediate a peace between them (40), and probably with ſome ſucceſs; for we afterwards find ſeveral teſtimonies of their being upon good terms with each other (41). So great was the ſeeming kindneſs between them, that before Sir Robert Cecil's departure for France, when he went Embaſſador there, in the beginning of the year 1598, he had procured the Queen to ſign a Privy Seal for the Earl of Eſſex, for ſeven thouſand pounds, to be paid to him out of cochineal, as her Majeſty's free gift to his Lordſhip (42). It is even aſſerted, that Sir Robert performed friendly and honeſt offices for the Earl, after that Nobleman's return from Ireland, and that he was concerned at their having no better an effect (43). How far our Stateſman was ſincere in his profeſſions, we pretend not to determine. According to Mr. Walpole, he was treacherous to every body but his father; and the famous Antonio Perez uſed to ſtile him, "Robert the Devil (44)."

(39) Ibid. p. 131.

(40) Ibid. p. 282.

(41) Ibid. p. 341. 350. 372. 380.

(42) Ibid.

(43) Ibid. p. 438. 442. 456.

(44) Ibid. vol. i. p. 352. vol. ii. p. 227.

There is now no longer any doubt of Cecil's having correſponded with the King of Scotland, during the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign. This correſpondence, which hath been preſerved in the Advocate's library at Edinburgh, and among the Archives of the family of Marr, now in Lord Hardwicke's poſſeſſion, was publiſhed at large in 1766, by Sir David Dalrymple. From theſe deſpatches it is evident, how deeply Sir Robert Cecil was engaged with the Scottiſh Monarch; and what a firm foundation he laid for having his offices and his power continued to him, upon James's acceſſion to the Throne of England. The correſpondence was carried on through the hands of the Lord Henry Howard, afterwards Earl of Northampton.

ſaid of Gregory the Great in another caſe, was not improperly applicable to him, 'That 'he was the firſt ill Treaſurer, and the laſt good, ſince Queen Elizabeth's days;' he not ſtanding charged with any groſſer bribery or corruption, than what lay incluſive under the ceremony of new-years-gifts, or his own, or ſervants, ſharing with ſuch as by importunity, rather

The Earl of Saliſbury's character was not ſo great and reſpectable as that of his father, Lord Burleigh; nor hath it been honoured, by our hiſtorians, with equal praiſes. His capacity and talents were, perhaps, not much inferior; but the ſame eſtimation hath not been formed of his integrity. "Among the "loſſes," ſays Mrs. Macaulay, "which James ſuſtained this year (1612), the Earl of Saliſbury's "death was not the leaſt conſiderable. This Miniſter was a careful ſervant, and, if the intereſt of "the Crown is to be conſidered in contradiſtinction "to that of the people, a faithful one. His abilities "as a Stateſman were not deſpicable; his qualities "as a Courtier were fawning and pernicious; but "they are too common in that ſtation to be worthy "any farther remark (45)." Mr. Granger's account of his Lordſhip, though not equally ſevere, reflects more honour on the qualities of his head than of his heart. "He diſcharged," obſerves that Biographer, "his high offices with great abilities; and was, indeed, in induſtry and capacity ſcarcely inferior to "his father; but more artful, more inſinuating, and "far more inſincere. King James uſed to call him "his 'Little Beagle,' alluding to the many diſcoveries he made, of which he ſent him intelligence "(46)." The Author of the Britiſh Biography pays the ſame compliments to the abilities of the Earl of Saliſbury, and adds, that he had extraordinary political talents; that he was well acquainted with the ſtate and intereſts of this nation; that he was the ableſt Miniſter King James ever had; and that he was thoroughly verſed in all the arts and intrigues of a court (47). But the moſt elaborate character that hath been drawn of the Earl, by any of our modern hiſtorians, is that with which the public has been favoured by Dr. Birch; and which, as being the reſult of particular knowledge and inveſtigation, we ſhall infert at large. "The Earl of Dorſet, in a letter to Sir "Thomas Edmonds, ſpeaks with ſome ſeverity of "memory. When great men die, ſays he, ſuch is either "their deſert, or the malice of people, or both together, "as commonly they are ill ſpoken of; and ſo is one, that "died but lately; more, I think, than ever any one was, "and in more ſeveral kinds: and his death hath wiped "away the memory of others miſdeeds, and, as it were, "extinguiſhed their faults, his being, if not greater, yet "freſher in every man's mouth and memory. But it "will be but juſtice to the character of ſo eminent a "perſon as the Earl of Saliſbury, to conſider him, as "he now appears to us from fuller and more impartial lights, than the ignorance or envy of his own "time would admit of; and which may be oppoſed "to the general invectives and unſupported libels of "Weldon and Wilſon, the ſcandalous chroniclers of "the laſt age.

"He was evidently a man of quicker parts, and "a more ſpirited writer and ſpeaker, than his father, "to whoſe experience he was at the ſame time obliged "for his education and introduction into public buſineſs, in the management of which he was accounted, and perhaps juſtly, more ſubtle, and leſs open. "And this opinion of his biaſs to artifice and diſſimulation was greatly owing to the ſingular addreſs, "which he ſhewed in penetrating into the ſecrets "and reſerved powers of the foreign Miniſters with "whom he treated; and in evading, with uncommon "dexterity, ſuch points, as they preſſed, when it "was not convenient to give them too explicit an "anſwer.

"His correſpondence with King James, during "the life of Queen Elizabeth, was ſo cloſely and "artfully managed, that he eſcaped a diſcovery, "which would have ruined his intereſt with his "Royal Miſtreſs, though he afterwards juſtified that "correſpondence from a regard to her ſervice. 'For 'what, ſays he, could more quiet the expectation of 'a ſucceſſor, ſo many ways invited to jealouſy, than 'when he ſaw her Miniſtry, that were moſt inward 'with her, wholly bent to accommodate the preſent 'actions of State for his future ſafety, when God 'ſhould ſee his time!' "He was properly a ſole "Miniſter, though not under the denomination of a "favourite, his Maſter having a much greater awe "of than love for him; and he drew all buſineſs, "both foreign and domeſtic, into his own hands, "and ſuffered no Miniſters to be employed abroad, "but who were his dependents, and with whom he "kept a moſt conſtant and exact correſpondence: "but the men, whom he preferred to ſuch employments, juſtified his choice, and did credit to the "uſe he made of his power. He appears to have "been invariably attached to the true intereſt of his "country, being above corruption from, or dependence upon, any foreign Courts; which renders it "not at all ſurpriſing, that he ſhould be abuſed by "them all in their turns; as his attention to all the "motions of the Popiſh faction made him equally "odious to them. He fully underſtood the Engliſh "conſtitution, and the juſt limits of the prerogative; "and prevented the fatal conſequences, which might "have ariſen from the frequent diſputes between "King James I. and his Parliaments. In ſhort, he "was as good a Miniſter, as that Prince would ſuffer "him to be, and as was conſiſtent with his own ſecurity in a factious and corrupt Court; and he was "even negligent of his perſonal ſafety, whenever "the intereſt of the public was at ſtake. His poſt of "Lord Treaſurer, at a time when the Exchequer "was exhauſted by the King's boundleſs profuſion, "was attended with infinite trouble to him, in concerting ſchemes for raiſing the ſupplies; and the "manner in which he was obliged to raiſe them, "with the great fortune which he accumulated to "himſelf, in a meaſure beyond perhaps the viſible "profits of his places, expoſed him to much detraction and popular clamour, which followed him to "his grave; though experience ſhewed, that the nation ſuſtained an important loſs by his death; ſince "he was the only Miniſter of State of real abilities, "during the whole courſe of that Reign. He has "been thought too ſevere and vindictive in the "treatment of his rivals and enemies: but the part "which he acted towards the Earl of Eſſex, ſeems "intirely the reſult of his duty to his Miſtreſs and "the Nation. It muſt, however, be confeſſed, that "his behaviour towards the great, but unfortunate "Sir Walter Ralegh is an imputation upon him, "which ſtill remains to be cleared up; and it probably may be done from the ample memorials of "his adminiſtration in the Hatfield Library, which, "with thoſe of his illuſtrious father, are a treaſure, "which the public has reaſon to regret ſhould be "longer confined there (*)."

We learn from Dr. Birch, that Henry, Prince of Wales, had conceived ſome diſlike againſt our Stateſman; which, however, Cecil took great pains to remove; uſing all his addreſs to obtain the favour and confidence of that young Prince (48).

Mr. Gutch hath lately publiſhed, in his "Collectanea Curioſa," an apology for the Earl of Saliſbury, written ſoon after his deceaſe, by Sir Walter Cope, and addreſſed to King James. The expreſs deſign of it is to vindicate the memory of the Lord Treaſurer from the reproaches which had been caſt upon it; and Sir Walter aſſerts, that, for wiſdom and integrity, he exceeded the moſt, or all, that went before him. "He was," adds the apologiſt, "by nature mild, "courteous, and affable: and if, tired with affairs, "or impatient of idle motions, or impertinent anſwers, he had been moved to make a ſour reply, "he was in this like his father, ever proud of opportunity to give unto the meaneſt due ſatisfaction. "In his wiſdom, he was able to diſtinguiſh between "truth and falſehood: his eyes could pierce through "the miſts and veils of the darkeſt cauſes; quick "of conceipt, eaſy of delivery, ſo full of providence, "and (45) Hiſt. of England, vol. i. p. 74, 75. 8vo edition.

(46) Biographical Hiſt. of England, vol. i. p. 321. Second edition.

(47) Vol. iv. p. 90, 91.

(*) Birch's Hiſtorical View of the Negotiations between the Courts of England, France, and Bruſſels, from the year 1592 to 1617, p. 347—349.

(48) Life of Henry, Prince of Wales, p. 76. 109. 126—138.

rather than merit, had obtained Debentures out of the Exchequer (i). In a word, by the confeſſion of all parties, he had great parts, was very wiſe, full of honour and bounty, a great lover and rewarder of virtue, and able parts in others, ſo as they did not aſpire too high

(i) Fr. Oſborne, as above, p. 90, 91.

" and induſtry, as he never ſuffered occaſion to turn " her back. He was plentiful in alms, charity, and " good works; full of honour, and honeſt to his " friends, and no malicious perſecutor of his ene- " mies. He loved juſtice as his life, and the laws " as his inheritance. He loved equity, as the true " umpreſs between them both, as moderatrix of " extremes. The heart of man was never more free " from baſeneſs, or bribes: he hated the bribe, and " the taker. He was one of thoſe of whom King " David ſpeaketh Qui munera ſuper innocentem non " accepit. So clear his hands were from thoſe baſe " corruptions, that I ſuppoſed rumor and report " would have been afraid once to have raiſed ſuch " ſlanders on him." Sir Walter Cope proceeds to examine the Earl of Saliſbury's conduct, in his three great offices of Lord Treaſurer, Secretary of State, and Maſter of the Court of Wards. As Lord Treaſurer, he is ſhewn to have been a very uſeful ſervant to his Majeſty, in his management with reſpect to lands, (meaning the royal manors) cuſtody lands, woods, copyholders for lives, copyholders of inheritance, waſtes and commons, caſual fines, extended lands, alum, baronets, water-works from London, and induſtry and manufactures. His character, as Secretary of State, is thus deſcribed. " What in- " telligence he had from all parts of the world, what " correſpondence he kept with all Embaſſadors and " foreign States, and at how eaſy a rate he main- " tained the current of all your letters and affairs, " if your Majeſty were truly informed, you ſhould " find in this title eſtabliſhed a great providence. " And in this his place, unto how great reputation " he had raiſed your ſervices, and how confident all " parts grew out of the long experience of his juſt " conſideration; the United Provinces eſpecially, " (whoſe friendſhip moſt concerneth your Majeſty) " your own Embaſſadors, and your Miniſters abroad " can beſt deliver. Beſides, what by his Treaſurer's " and Secretary's place he did in Ireland, in the " plantation of the country, and tranſplantation of " the people; what in advancing your cuſtoms, and " abating the charges, and the garriſons; and how " induſtrious he was to ſettle an univerſal courſe of " law and juſtice in the moſt barbarous and remote " places of that moſt unfortunate kingdom, they " that know the country can beſt witneſs." Sir Robert Cecil's apologiſt, having briefly ſtated his tranſactions as Maſter of the Court of Wards, mentions, and endeavours to refute ten objections which had been made to his character and conduct. Theſe objections are, his ingroſſing of offices, his having been the author of all the miſeries of the nation, the ſale of mills and chantries, the ſale of leaſes, the ſale of timber trees, the ſale of the royal lands, his pilling the people to ſupport the waſteful expences of the ſtate, his maintaining his private factions by conſumption of the public treaſure, his impoſing upon the ſubjects, and his falſehood in friendſhip. With regard to the laſt circumſtance, that the Earl of Saliſbury often made his friends fair promiſes, and underhand laid rubs in the way of their preferment, we ſhall inſert Sir Walter Cope's anſwer, as a ſpecimen of his reaſoning. " The ſecret paſſage " of things I knew not. Suſpicion ever lieth at the " gate of great actions. And they which received " the greateſt favours from him, are (as I hear) the " moſt ready to make report of him. The courts of " Kings are many times the markets of words and " ceremonies; and they that live therein muſt ſome- " times 'Verba dare.' Beſides, great counſellors " have their private and their public ends; and their " private affections do oftentimes yield to their pub- " lic judgments, and make them remoral in their " friends ſuits. And therefore noble natures will " rather be thankful for good turns received, than " ungrateful that they enjoy not all their own hearts " deſire." From this paſſage it is apparent, that Sir Walter Cope was not an apologiſt of the firſt order. His anſwers to objections, though not unworthy of attention, are, in other inſtances, not ſo compleat as might have been expected; and, in ſeveral caſes, the amount of the vindication of the Earl of Saliſbury is comprized in what is expreſsly aſſerted towards the cloſe of the paper, that he loſt the love of the people only for the King's ſake, and for his Majeſty's ſervice (49).

(49) Gutch's Collectanea Curioſa, vol. i. p. 119—132.

We cannot paſs over a ſpeech of the Earl, in his laſt illneſs, to Sir Walter Cope. " Eaſe and plea- " ſure," ſaid the dying Stateſman, " quake to hear " of death; but my life, full of cares and miſeries, " deſireth to be diſſolved (50)." It might be imagined, that if theſe words were read by an aſpiring candidate for power, they would be ſufficient to repreſs his inordinate ambition. But they would probably be attended with no ſuch effect; and, perhaps, it is wiſely ordered, in the ſcheme of providence, that it ſhould be ſo; ſince the buſineſs of the world might be impeded, if men permitted themſelves to reflect too cloſely upon the difficulties and diſtreſſes which are often the concomitants of exalted ſtations.

(50) Ibid. p. 133.

Sir Walter Raleigh allowed Sir Robert Cecil to be an excellent ſpeaker, but ſaid that he was no good penman. But Dr. Birch obſerves, that the truth of the laſt aſſertion is confuted by his letters (51). As to Cecil's talents for ſpeaking, ſeveral ſpecimens of his abilities in this reſpect may be ſeen in the Parliamentary Hiſtory. The ſpeeches there recorded ſeem, however, to be many of them given in a very imperfect manner. Sir Robert appears to have taken an active part in every ſubject of debate that occurred, in the Houſe of Commons, during the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign; and he particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the affair of the monopolies. Like a true courtier, he defended the cauſe and prerogative of his royal Miſtreſs as long as he could; but, at length, he was obliged to yield up the point; and when, referring to the patents, he ſaid, " Would " that they had never been granted; I hope there " ſhall never be more;" all the Houſe cried, Amen! (52). Some few inſtances are, likewiſe, mentioned in the Parliamentary Hiſtory, in which the Earl of Saliſbury diſplayed his eloquence in the Houſe of Peers; but the ſpeeches themſelves are not given at large (53).

(51) Hiſtorical View, p. 100.

(52) For Robert Cecil's Speeches in the Houſe of Commons, ſee Parliamentary Hiſtory, vol. iv. p. 377, 378. 381, 382. 390, 391. 417. 432—434. 437. 440. 444, 445, 446, 447. 464—468. 469—474. 475, 476, 477.

Since the appearance of the firſt edition of the Biographia Britannica, many additional letters of Sir Robert Cecil, or extracts from them, have been laid before the public. For theſe we are principally indebted to the diligent inveſtigation of the ingenious and learned Dr. Birch. That gentleman, in his Hiſtorical View, hath publiſhed Cecil's deſpatches relative to his embaſſy in France, and they throw far more light on the treaty of Vervins, than hath been done by Camden, or any of our general Hiſtorians (54). The ſame gentleman, in his Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth, hath given, from the original papers of Mr. Anthony Bacon, a number of Cecil's letters, written on different occaſions (55). One of them we have already inſerted. Thirteen more may be ſeen in Dr. Birch's Life of Prince Henry (56). In the Nugæ Antiquæ, there is a letter from Sir Robert Cecil to Sir John Harrington, written in 1603, part of which deſerves to be tranſcribed, as it expreſſes, in a ſtriking manner, the infelicity of a Courtier's life, and the dangers to which his virtue is expoſed. " Good Knight, reſt content, and give heed to one " that hath ſorrowed in the bright luſtre of a court, " and gone heavily even on the beſt ſeeming fair " ground. 'Tis a great taſk to prove one's honeſty, " and yet not ſpoil one's fortune. You have taſted " a little hereof in our bleſſed Queen's time, who " was more than a man, and, in troth, ſometimes " leſs than a woman. I wiſh I waited now in your " preſence chamber, with eaſe at my food, and reſt " in my bed. I am puſhed from the ſhore of com- " fort, and know not where the winds and waves of " a court will bear me. I know it bringeth little " comfort (53) Ibid. vol. v. p. 89. 218. 222. 225. 227. 231.

(54) Hiſtorical View, p. 100—102. 105—139. 141—156. For other letters of Sir Robert Cecil, or extracts from them, ſee p. 183. 187. 231, 232. 242—246. 252. 262, 263. 291, 292.

(55) Memoirs, &c. vol. i. p. 124. 165, 166. 171. 185, 186. 189. vol. ii. p. 18. 68, 69. 73. 80. 102, 103. 149. 337, 338. 350. 353, 354. 374—379. 468, 469.

(56) P. 126—138. 240—242.

high in places, or look too narrowly into his actions (k). Beſides his book againſt the Papiſts, and his letters and diſpatches, already mentioned; he was author of ſeveral ſpeeches in Parliament (l), and of ſome notes on Dr. John Dee's Diſcourſe about the reformation of the Calendar (m).

(k) Weldon, as above, p. 14.

(l) Memorials, &c. as above, vol. iii. p. 159. 194.

(m) Strype's Annals, vol. ii. edit. 1725, p. 355.

" comfort on earth; and he is, I reckon, no wiſe " man that looketh this way to heaven (57)." In Murdin's Collection, there is only one letter of Sir Robert Cecil's. It was the deſign of that editor to have included, in his volume, the State Papers of the Earl of Saliſbury; but he found himſelf not able to do it without injury to the memory of Lord Burleigh, whoſe papers were too numerous and too important to be reduced into narrower limits (58). The manuſcripts, relative to Sir Robert Cecil, preſerved in the library at Hatfield Houſe, would probably throw farther light on his hiſtory; and a judicious and ſelect publication of them, could not fail of being entertaining and uſeful. Several of his letters are in the Britiſh Muſeum; and there can be no doubt, but that many of them ſtill ſubſiſt in other collections.] K.

(57) Nugæ Antiquæ, vol. ii. p. 263, 264.

(58) Murdin's Collection, p. 588, 589. Ibid. Preface, p. vii.

 [CENTLIVRE (SUSANNAH), an ingenious dramatic writer, was daughter of Mr. Freeman, a gentleman of Holbeach in Lincolnſhire (a), and was born about the year 1667 (b). Her father had been poſſeſſed of an eſtate of no inconſiderable value; but being a diſſenter, and having diſcovered a zealous attachment to the cauſe of the parliament, it is ſaid that he was ſo much perſecuted about the time of the reſtoration, that he was laid under a neceſſity of flying into Ireland, and his eſtate was confiſcated. Our Poeteſs's mother was daughter of Mr. Markham, a gentleman of fortune at Lynn Regis in Norfolk, who is repreſented as having encountered ſimilar misfortunes with thoſe of Mr. Freeman, in conſequence of his political principles, which were the ſame with thoſe of that gentleman, and he alſo was obliged to take refuge in Ireland (c). The ſubject of this article is aſſerted to have been born in Lincolnſhire (d); but ſome have conjectured that ſhe was born in Ireland, which may, not improbably, have been the caſe, if her birth was ſo late as 1667. The Editor, however, of Sir James Ware's works, doth not lay claim to her as an Iriſh writer. She had the unhappineſs to loſe her father before ſhe was three years old, and her mother before ſhe had completed her twelfth year. At an early period ſhe diſcovered a propenſity to poetry, and is ſaid to have written a ſong before ſhe was ſeven years old (e).

(a) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, vol. iv. p. 58.

(b) Liſt of Dramatic Authors, and their Works, annexed to Cibber's Apology for his own Life, vol. ii. p. 265. edit. 12mo. 1756.

(c) Biographia Dramatica, vol. i. p. 65. edit. 8vo. 1782.

(d) Liſt of Dramatic Authors, and their Works, ut ſupra

(e) Jacob's Lives of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, vol. i. p. 32.

Being harſhly treated by thoſe to whoſe care ſhe was committed after the death of her mother, ſhe reſolved, whilſt very young, to quit the country, and to go up to London to ſeek her fortune. The circumſtances of her life at this period are involved in much obſcurity, and the particulars which are related ſeem ſomewhat romantic. It is ſaid that ſhe attempted her journey to the capital alone, and on foot, and on her way thither was met by Anthony Hammond, Eſq; father of the Author of the Love Elegies, in imitation of Tibullus. This gentleman, who was then a member of the Univerſity of Cambridge, was ſtruck with her youth and beauty, and offered to take her under his protection. Her diſtreſs and inexperience inducing her to comply with his propoſal, ſhe accompanied him to Cambridge, where, having equipped her in boy's clothes, he introduced her to his intimates at College, as a relation who was come down to ſee the Univerſity, and to paſs ſome time with him. Under this diſguiſe an amorous intercourſe was carried on between them for ſome months; but at length, being probably apprehenſive that the affair would become known in the Univerſity, he perſuaded her to go to London. He provided her, however, with a conſiderable ſum of money, and recommended her by letter to a lady in town with whom he was acquainted. He aſſured her at the ſame time, that he would ſpeedily follow her, and renew their amorous connection. This promiſe appears not to have been performed: but notwithſtanding her unfavourable introduction into life, ſhe was married in her ſixteenth year to a nephew of Sir Stephen Fox (f). That gentleman did not live more than a twelvemonth after their marriage; but her wit and perſonal attractions ſoon procured her another huſband, whoſe name was Carrol, who was an officer in the army, but who was killed in a duel about a year and a half after their marriage, when ſhe became a ſecond time a widow. She is repreſented as having a ſincere attachment to Mr. Carrol, and conſequently as having felt his loſs as a ſevere affliction.

(f) Biographia Dramatica, ut ſupra.

It was at this period of her life that ſhe commenced dramatic Author; to which ſhe was probably in ſome degree induced by the narrowneſs of her circumſtances. Some of her earlier pieces were publiſhed under the name of Carrol. Her firſt attempt was in tragedy, in a play called, " The Perjured Huſband," which was performed at Drury-lane Theatre in 1700, and publiſhed in 4to, the ſame year (g). In 1703, ſhe produced " The Beau's Duel, or a Soldier for the Ladies, a Comedy;" and " Love's Contri- " vances," which is chiefly a tranſlation from Moliere; and the following year another Comedy, intitled, " The Stolen Heireſs, or The Salamanca Doctor Outwitted." In 1705, her Comedy of " The Gameſter" was acted at Lincoln's-Inn Fields, which met with conſiderable ſucceſs, and has ſince been revived at Drury-lane. The plot of this piece was chiefly borrowed from a French Comedy, called Le Diſſipateur. The Prologue was written by Mr. Rowe (b).

(g) Biographia Dramatica, vol. ii. p. 277.

(b) Ibid. p. 131.

Her attachment to the Theatre was ſo great, that ſhe not only diſtinguiſhed herſelf as a writer for it, but alſo became a performer on it; though ſhe probably did not attain to any great merit as an actreſs, as ſhe ſeems never to have played at the Theatres of the Metropolis. But in 1706, we are told, ſhe performed the part of Alexander the Great, in Lee's Rival Queens, at Windſor, where the Court then was; and, in this heroic character, ſhe made ſo powerful an impreſſion upon the heart of Mr. Joſeph Centlivre, Yeoman of the Mouth, or Principal Cook to Queen Anne, that he ſoon after married her, and with him ſhe lived happily till her death(i).

(i) Ib. vol. i. p. 66.

The ſame year in which ſhe entered into the matrimonial ſtate with Mr. Centlivre, ſhe produced the Comedies of the "Baſſet-Table," and "Love at a Venture." The latter was acted by the Duke of Grafton's Servants, at the New Theatre at Bath (k). In 1708, her moſt celebrated performance, "The Buſy Body," was acted at Drury-lane Theatre. It met at firſt with ſo unfavourable a reception from the players, that for a time they even refuſed to act in it, and were not prevailed upon to comply till towards the cloſe of the ſeaſon; and even then Mr. Wilks ſhewed ſo much contempt for the part of Sir George Airy, as to throw it down on the ſtage, at the rehearſal, with a declaration, "that no audience would endure ſuch ſtuff (l)." But the piece was received with the greateſt applauſe [A] by the audience, and ſtill keeps poſſeſſion of the ſtage. In 1711, ſhe brought on at Drury-lane Theatre, "Marplot, or the ſecond part of the Buſy Body." This play, though much inferior to the former, met with a favourable reception; and the Duke of Portland, to whom it was dedicated, made Mrs. Centlivre a preſent of forty guineas (m). Her Comedy of "A Bold Stroke for a Wife," was performed at Lincoln's-Inn Fields in 1717. She was aſſiſted in this play by Mr. Mottley, who wrote a ſcene or two entirely. It was extremely well received, and is ſtill frequently performed; though Mr. Wilks had alſo entertained ſo unfavourable an opinion of this Comedy, that he is reported to have ſaid concerning it, that "not only Mrs. Centlivre's play would "be damned, but ſhe herſelf would be damned for writing it (n)." Beſides thoſe which have been already mentioned, ſhe alſo produced ſeveral other Dramatic pieces, which will be mentioned in the notes [B].

(k) Ibid. vol. ii. p. 196.

(l) Ibid. p. 39.

(m) Ibid. p. 220.

(n) Ibid. vol. i. p. 67.

Mrs. Centlivre enjoyed, for many years, the intimacy and eſteem of ſome of the moſt eminent wits of the time, particularly Sir Richard Steele, Mr. Rowe, Dr. Sewell, and Mr. Farquahar. Euſtace Budgell was alſo of the number of her acquaintance (o). But ſhe had the misfortune to incur the diſpleaſure of Mr. Pope, who introduced her into the Dunciad [C]. She died in Spring-garden, Charing-croſs, on the firſt of December, 1723, (o) Id. ibid.

[A] The piece was received with the greateſt applauſe.] It is obſerved by the writer of the Biographia Dramatica, that, to do juſtice to the Author of the Buſy Body, 'it muſt be confeſſed, that although 'the language of it is very indifferent, and the plot 'mingled with ſome improbabilities, yet the amuſing 'ſprightlineſs of buſineſs, and the natural impertinence in the character of Marplot, make conſiderable amends for the above-mentioned deficiencies, 'and render it even to this hour an entertaining and 'ſtanding performance.' The ſame writer adds, that 'the dumb ſcene of Sir George with Miranda, 'and the hiſtory of the garden-gate, are both borrowed from Ben Jonſon's Comedy of "The "Devil's an Aſs (1)."

(1) Vol. ii. p. 39.

[B] She alſo produced ſeveral other dramatic pieces, &c.] Theſe were the following: I. The Platonic Lady, a Comedy, acted at the Theatre in the Haymarket, and printed in 4to, in 1707. The prologue was written by Farquhar.

II. The Man's bewitched, or, The Devil to do about her, a Comedy, acted at the Haymarket, and printed in 4to, in 1710.

III. The Wonder, a Woman keeps a Secret, a Comedy, acted at Drury-lane in 1714. The author of the Biographia Dramatica ſays, that 'this Comedy 'had very good ſucceſs at firſt, is ſtill frequently 'acted, and is indeed one of the beſt of Mrs. Centlivre's plays. The plot is intricate and ingenious, 'yet clear and diſtinct both in its conduct and cataſtrophe; the language is in general more correct 'than ſhe generally renders it; and the characters, 'particularly thoſe of the jealous Don Felix, and 'Colonel Briton's Highland ſervant Gibby, are juſtly 'drawn, and very well finiſhed.' It is obſerved by the ſame writer, 'that Mr. Garrick threw a new 'luſtre on this Comedy, by reviving it with ſome 'judicious alterations, and by his inimitable performance of Don Felix.'

IV. Bickerſtaff's Burying, or Work for the Upholders. This is a Farce of three long ſcenes, which was acted at the Haymarket. It was printed in 4to, in 1717, and dedicated to "the magnificent Company of "Upholders."

V. The Perplexed Lovers, a Comedy, acted at Drury-lane, and printed in 4to, in 1712.

VI. Gotham Election, a Farce of one long act. This was never performed, but was printed, in 12mo, in 1715, and dedicated to Mr. Secretary Craggs, who returned the compliment by ſending Mrs. Centlivre twenty guineas.

VII. A Wife well managed, a Farce, acted at Drury-lane, and printed in 12mo, in 1715.

VIII. The cruel Gift, or the Royal Reſentment, a Tragedy, acted at Drury-lane, and printed in 12mo, in 1717.

IX. The Artifice, a Comedy, acted at Drury-lane, and printed in 8vo, in 1721 (2).

(2) Biographia Dramatica, ut ſupra.

It has been obſerved of Mrs. Centlivre, that 'as a 'writer, it is no very eaſy thing to eſtimate her rank. 'It muſt be allowed, that her plays do not abound 'with wit, and that the language of them is ſometimes even poor, enervate, incorrect, and puerile; 'but then her plots are buſy, and well conducted, 'and her characters in general natural and well 'marked. But as plot and character are undoubtedly 'the body and ſoul of Comedy; and language and 'wit, at beſt, but the clothing and external ornaments, it is certainly leſs excuſeable to ſhew a deficiency in the former, than in the latter (3).' The ſame writer afterwards gives it as his opinion, that 'if we do not allow her to be the very firſt of our 'female writers, ſhe has but one above her, and may 'juſtly be placed next to her predeceſſor in dramatic 'glory, the great Mrs. Behn (4).'

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Id. ibid.

[C] Mr. Pope introduced her into the Dunciad.] In the ſecond book are the following lines:

'What dulneſs dropt among her ſons impreſt,
'Like motion from one circle to the reſt:
'So from the mid-moſt the nutation ſpreads
'Round and more round, o'er all the ſea of heads.
'At laſt Centlivre felt her voice to fail,
'Motteux himſelf unfiniſhed left his tale (5).'

(5) L. 407—411.

(p) Id. ibid.

1723, and was buried at St. Martin's in the Fields (p). She poſſeſſed a conſiderable ſhare of beauty, was of a friendly and benevolent diſpoſition, and in converſation was ſprightly and entertaining. Her literary acquiſitions appear to have been merely the reſult of her own application; but ſhe is ſuppoſed to have underſtood the French, Dutch, and Spaniſh languages, and to have had ſome knowledge of the Latin (q). An extenſive acquaintance with men and manners is exhibited in her Dramatic writings; but they are ſometimes juſtly cenſurable for their licentiouſneſs. In 1761, her Dramatic works were collected together, and printed in three volumes, 12mo. She was alſo the Author of "ſeveral copies of verſes on divers ſubjects and occaſions, and many ingenious letters, "entitled, Letters of Wit, Politics, and Morality," which were collected and publiſhed by Mr. Boyer (r).] T.

(q) Id. ibid.

(r) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, vol. iv. p. 58.

In the third book were alſo the following lines:

'Lo next two ſlip-ſhod muſes traipſe along,
'In lofty madneſs meditating ſong,
'With treſſes ſtaring from poetic dreams,
'And never waſh'd, but in Caſtalia's ſtreams,
'Haywood, Centlivre, glories of their race.'

But theſe lines are altered and tranſpoſed in the latter editions, and Mrs. Centlivre's name omitted. The reaſon of her being attacked by Mr. Pope appears to be ſtated in the notes to the Dunciad, where it is ſaid, that ſhe wrote "a ballad againſt Mr. Pope's "Homer before he began it."]

CHALONER (Sir THOMAS) a gallant Soldier, an able Stateſman, and a very learned Writer in the XVIth century. He was deſcended from a good family in Wales, and born at London about the year 1515 (a). His quick parts diſcovered themſelves even in his infancy; ſo that his family, to promote that paſſionate deſire of knowledge for which he was ſo early diſtinguiſhed, ſent him to the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he remained ſome years, and obtained great credit, as well by the pregnancy of his wit as his conſtant and diligent application, but more eſpecially by his happy turn for Latin Poetry, in which he exceeded moſt of his contemporaries (b). Upon his removing from College he came up to Court, and being taken notice of there for his extraordinary abilities and excellent behaviour, which recommended him to the eſteem of the beſt, and the friendſhip of the greateſt men about it, he was ſoon ſent abroad into Germany with Sir Henry Knevet, as the cuſtom was in the reign of Henry VIII. when young men of great hopes were frequently employed in the ſervice of Embaſſadors, that they might at once improve and poliſh themſelves by travel, and gain ſome experience in buſineſs (c). He was ſo well received at the Court of the Emperor Charles V. and ſo highly pleaſed with the noble and generous ſpirit of that great Monarch, that he attended him in his journies, and alſo in his wars, particularly in that fatal expedition againſt Algiers, which coſt the lives of ſo many brave men, and was very near cutting ſhort the thread of Mr. Chaloner's; for in that great tempeſt by which the Emperor's fleet was ſhattered on the coaſt of Barbary in 1541, the veſſel, on board of which he was, ſuffered ſhipwreck, and Mr. Chaloner having quite wearied and exhauſted himſelf by ſwimming, and that too in the dark, at length beat his head againſt a cable, of which laying hold with his teeth, he was providentially drawn up into the ſhip to which it belonged, though with the loſs of ſome of them (d). He returned ſoon after into England, and as a reward of his learning and ſervices, was promoted to the office of Firſt Clerk of the Council, in which poſt he ſerved during the remainder of that reign (e). In the beginning of the next he came into great favour with the Duke of Somerſet, whom he attended into Scotland, and was in the battle of Muſſleburgh, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo remarkably in the preſence of the Duke, that he conferred upon him the honour of knighthood 28 Sept. 1547, and after his return to Court, the Ducheſs of Somerſet preſented him with a rich jewel (f). The firſt cloud that darkened his patron's fortune, proved fatal to Sir Thomas Chaloner's pretenſions; for being a man of a warm and open temper, and conceiving the obligation he was under to the Duke as a tie that hindered his making court to his adverſary, a ſtop was put to his preferment, and a vigilant eye kept upon his actions. But his loyalty to his Prince, and his exact diſcharge of his duty, ſecured him from any farther danger, ſo that he had leiſure to apply himſelf to his ſtudies, and to cultivate his acquaintance with the worthieſt men of that Court, particulary Sir John Cheke, Sir Anthony Coke, Sir Thomas Smith, and more eſpecially Sir William Cecil, with whom he always lived in the ſtricteſt intimacy (g). Under the reign of Queen Mary he paſſed his time, though ſafely, yet very unpleaſantly; for being a zealous Proteſtant, he could not practiſe any part of that complaiſance which procured ſome of his friends an eaſier life. He intereſted himſelf extreamly in the affair of Sir John Cheke, and did him all the ſervice he was able, both before and after his confinement. This had like to have brought Sir Thomas himſelf into trouble, if the civilities he had ſhewn in King Edward's reign, when they were in a ſtate of humiliation, to ſome of thoſe who had the greateſt power under Queen Mary, had not moved them, from a principle of gratitude, to protect him. Indeed, it appears from his writings, that as he was very honeſt in his own friendſhips, ſo he was particularly happy in them; and as he was never wanting to his friends when he had power, he never felt the want of them when he had

(a) Bale, de Script. Britan. p. 108.

(b) See this matter explained in note [A].

(c) Strype's Memorials. Lloyd's Worthies. Herbert's Hiſt. of the Reign of Henry VIII.

(d) Camden. Annal. p. 121.

(e) Bale, Script. Britan. p. 108.

(f) Lloyd's Worthies, p. 564.

(g) As appears from ſeveral letters and papers amongſt the Cecilian MS.

it not, and, which he esteemed the greatest blessing of his life, he lived to return those kindnesses to some who had been useful to him in that dangerous season (b) [A]. Upon the demise of Queen Mary and the accession of Elizabeth, he appeared at Court with his former lustre; and it must afford us a very high opinion of his character as well as his capacity, that he was the first Embassador named by that wise Princess, and that also to the first Prince in Europe, Ferdinand I. Emperor of Germany (i). In this negotiation, which was of equal importance and delicacy, he acquitted himself with great reputation, and not only did all that was expected from him but much more, which his Mistress very gratefully acknowledged (k) [B]. After his return from this embassy, he was very soon thought

(b) Remarks upon the Reign of Queen Mary, p. 95.

(i) Camden. Annal. p. 21.

(k) Strype's Annals, vol. i. p. 75.

[A] Who had been useful to him in that dangerous season.] It is a very great pity, that more care has not been taken to preserve the personal and literary history of this truly great man; the rather, because such diligence seemed to be in a peculiar manner due to his memory, on account of that constant respect he shewed for the characters of others, whether distinguished by their extraordinary merit towards the public, or recommended by the more immediate connection of private friendship (1); so that a certain writer, in his short character of him, had reason to say, that 'a true friend was the best picture of this 'gentleman's mind, since his love knew no bounds, 'could not be diverted by any danger, or divorced 'even by death itself.' Of this he gave variety of instances, by the tribute he paid to the fame of those he either esteemed or loved, that were far enough from being happy in their fortunes. But because we have not much room to spare, and therefore cannot dwell upon a variety of instances, we will content ourselves with the mention only of one, as being of all others the most proper for our purpose. He wrote then a long and beautiful poem upon the tragical death of that most excellent person, the Lady Jane Gray, in which are contained a multitude of curious and instructive passages; so that it is very hard to say, whether it is more valuable for the matter or manner of its composition. But surely it is a noble testimony of the virtue and honesty, and at the same time of the tenderness of its author's disposition (2). He opens it with a most admirable description of the elegant form of this fair victim to the ambition of others; and having painted, in the brightest colours, the beauties of her person, he celebrates her great learning and wisdom, which, considering she was scarcely eighteen when she died, nothing but the unimpeached sincerity of the author could induce us to credit. He observes, that besides her mother-tongue, she was not superficially, but perfectly well skilled in seven languages, viz. Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Arabick, Italian, and French. She wrote a very fine hand, and with incomparable facility upon all subjects, possessing the philosophy of Plato perfectly, and having a happy tincture of the eloquence of Demosthenes. Her natural abilities were very great, and they were heightened by an application so assiduous, that, her sex and quality considered, we may safely say was unequalled. She played admirably on several instruments of music, and, if we may add to such accomplishments one that may seem trivial, she was excellent at her needle. Yet, with all these rare endowments, all these high and extraordinary qualities, she was of a mild, an humble, and a modest spirit, and never discovered any thing of the height and grandeur of her mind; but in the last act of her life, a fearless and noble, though at the same time a pious and a Christian-like, contempt of death. Our author very justly observes, that, considering all that had the colour of crime in her conduct was cast upon her by others, it gave no great idea of the Queen's justice, that sparing some who were deeply guilty, she suffered the full weight of punishment to fall upon this Innocent. To this, in a high strain of poetic justice, he attributes the shortness and the uneasiness of Queen Mary's reign, her long and languishing sickness, her disturbed government, and her distraction of mind, occasioned chiefly by shedding this poor Lady's blood. He likewise takes in the chief authors of this dire counsel, and shows, that notwithstanding their seeming escape in this world, they were nevertheless severely and justly punished, few of them surviving long, and most of them undergoing more painful deaths than they had inflicted upon her; one sinking under the pressure of a dropsy, another brought to his end by the excruciating torments of the stone, a third by the slow progress of an incurable consumption, and others by diseases equally cruelly in their kind, and fatal in their events. A great part of this admirable Latin poem has been re-published as an Appendix to the History of that reign under which this unfortunate Lady suffered; and it is really a great pity that it has not been translated, for the information as well as satisfaction of the English reader, very few things of the kind deserving it so well (3).

(1) This is meant of the large Collections of Elogies, Epigrams, and Epitaphs, in Latin Verse, written by our author in honour of the worthiest persons of his time.

(2) In lib. suo cui tit. est De illustrium quorundam Encomiis & Epitaphis nonnullis, &c. Lond. 1579, p. 296.

(3) Strype's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 93. and the Poem, at least the best part of it, in the Appendix, No. IX.

[B] Which his Mistress very gratefully acknowledged.] It was very natural, as well as necessary, at the beginning of a new reign, and especially in the circumstances the Queen was in at the entrance of her's, to think of preserving a good correspondence with all the Princes of Europe, but more especially with the Emperor, for various reasons. She therefore charged Sir Thomas Chaloner with a letter to him, the substance (4) of which was to the following effect: 'That her sister was dead, and that through the 'goodness of God, and in virtue of her own hereditary right, and the people's consent, she was now 'invested in the succession, and that she desired nothing more than the preservation and improvement 'of that antient friendship, which had been so long 'kept up between the Crown of England and the 'House of Austria.' The great service that he did in this embassy, was to divide the views of the Emperor and King Philip, by hinting the possibility of a marriage between the Archduke of Austria and Queen Elizabeth, which at that juncture was a very great and important service; since there was nothing the Queen wanted so much as to gain time, and to prevent the Popish powers from associating against her before she was well fixed upon the throne, or the kingdom thoroughly settled. How dexterously he managed this, and how well he secured the confidence of the Emperor and his Ministers, will best appear from the following passage, in an author who took what he wrote from the papers of the great Lord Burleigh (5). 'George van Helfenstein, Baron of 'Gundelfingen, was in England with the Queen, 'soon after her first coming to the Crown, in quality 'of Agent or Embassador from the Emperor. Then 'there happened communication between him and 'Sir Thomas Chaloner about the Queen's marriage, 'which Chaloner and all good men then had their 'thoughts much bent upon. They talked together 'of the Emperor's son, the Arch-duke of Austria. 'And now Van Helfenstein being departed, and at 'Brussels, wrote, Mar. 21, 1558, to Chaloner, and 'sent him the picture of that Duke, which he might 'shew as he should think most convenient. This 'representation of him shewed him to be a most 'comely person, but his mind and inward abilities 'exceeded his person,' as the noble German told Chaloner in his letter: 'that if the most virtuous and 'gallant endowments of his soul were known, as well 'to him as they were to himself and others, he would 'soon acknowledge, they did by many degrees surpass the beauty of his body. But that picture receiving some damage by the waggon in which it 'was brought, he promised to send Chaloner another of the Duke's whole body, and of his brother 'also; wishing that he might have a sight of them 'both alive, without the help of paint and colour. 'He told him, all the report at Brussels was, that 'the King of Spain was to marry the Queen, although, as he subjoined, men of great authority, 'when

(4) Camden. Annal. p. 21.

(5) Strype's Annals, vol. i. p. 95, 96.

thought of for another, which was that of Spain; and though it is certain the Queen could not give a ſtronger proof than this of her confidence in his abilities, yet he was very far from thinking that it was any mark of her kindneſs, more eſpecially conſidering the terms upon which ſhe then ſtood with King Philip, and the uſage his predeceſſor, Chamberlain, had met with at that Court (l). But he knew the Queen would be obeyed, and therefore undertook the buſineſs with the beſt grace he could, and embarked for Spain in 1561. On his firſt arrival he met with ſuch a piece of rudeneſs, as made him weary of the country before he was well in it. This was the ſearching of all his trunks and cabinets, of which he complained loudly: for having been treated at the Court of the Emperor with the utmoſt reſpect, he could not bear ſuch an act of inſolence, which he thought equally injurious to himſelf as a gentleman, and to his character as a publick Miniſter (m). His complaints, however, were fruitleſs; for at that time there is great probability that his Catholick Majeſty was not over deſirous of having an Engliſh Miniſter, and more eſpecially one of Sir Thomas's diſpoſition, at his Court, and therefore gave him no ſatisfaction. Upon this Sir Thomas Chaloner wrote home, ſet out the affront that he had received in the ſtrongeſt terms poſſible, and was very earneſt to be re-called: but the Queen his Miſtreſs contented herſelf with letting him know, that it was the duty of every perſon who bore a publick character, to bear with patience what happened to them, provided no perſonal indignity was offered to the Prince from whom they came (n). Yet for all this, the ſearching Sir Thomas Chaloner's trunks, was, many years afterwards, put into that publick Charge which the Queen exhibited againſt his Catholick Majeſty, of injuries done to her before ſhe intermeddled with the affairs of the Low Countries (o). But notwithſtanding this, he kept up his ſpirit, and ſhewed the Spaniſh Miniſters, and even that haughty Monarch himſelf, that the Queen could not have entruſted her affairs in better hands than his. There were ſome perſons of very good families in England, who, for the ſake of their religion, and no doubt out of regard to the intereſt to which they had devoted themſelves, deſired to have leave from Queen Elizabeth to reſide in the Low-Countries or elſewhere, and King Philip and his Miniſters made it a point to ſupport their ſuit. Upon this, when a Conference was held with Sir Thomas Chaloner, he anſwered very roundly, that the thing in itſelf was of very little importance, ſince it was no great matter where the perſons who made this requeſt ſpent the remainder of their days; but that conſidering the rank and condition of the Princes intereſted in this buſineſs, it was neither fit for the one to aſk, nor for the other to grant (p). It appeared that he ſpoke the ſenſe of his Court, for Queen Elizabeth would never be brought to hearken to the propoſal. In other reſpects however he was very grateful and agreeable to the principal perſons of the Spaniſh Court, who could not help admiring his talents as a Miniſter, his bravery as a Soldier, with which in former times they were well acquainted, his general learning and admirable ſkill in Latin poetry, of which he gave them many proofs in ſeveral elegant performances, written during his ſtay in their country (q). It was here, at a time when, as himſelf ſays in the Preface, he ſpent the winter in a ſtove, and the ſummer in a barn, that he compoſed his great work of The Right Ordering of the ENGLISH REPUBLICK, and thus endeavoured to ſooth his cares, and diſpel his melancholy, by his converſations with the muſes. But though theſe might in ſome meaſure alleviate his chagrin, yet they were far enough from expelling it; ſo that by degrees it broke his conſtitution, and he fell into a very grievous fit of ſickneſs, which brought him ſo low that his Phyſicians deſpaired of his life (r). In this condition he addreſſed his Sovereign in an elegy after the manner of Ovid, ſetting forth his earneſt deſire to quit Spain and

(l) Camden. Annal. p. 85.

(m) A ſhort Account of the Injuries done her Majeſty by the King of Spain. MS. amongſt the Collections of Lord Burleigh.

(n) Camden. Annal. p. 85.

(o) As appears from ſeveral papers amongſt the MSS. of Lord Burleigh.

(p) Strype's Annals, vol. i. p. 131. Lloyd's Worthies.

(q) Miſcellanea Chaloneri, p. 334. 342. 348.

(r) Strype's Annals, ubi ſupra.

'when he was in England, ſeemed to miſdoubt it. 'But he prayed Chaloner, out of their great friend-'ſhip, to give ſome account of that whole matter. 'For that indeed was the very reaſon, why the Em-'peror, who intended to offer to the Queen either 'of his ſons, did forbear at preſent to do it, becauſe 'he would not any ways diſoblige one ſo nearly re-'lated. But if the King's ſuit ſucceeded not, he 'then requeſted his friend, the ſaid Sir Thomas 'Chaloner, to give him, with all ſecrecy, an account 'of it, and then would the Emperor put in ſtrongly 'for one of his ſons; and ſo he did afterwards.' But this was not all. Sir Thomas Chaloner ſo well underſtood the Queen's mind, the advantages that might be gained by managing and keeping up this treaty, of which there was not the leaſt ſhadow of ſucceſs or reality, for the Queen diſliked the perſon of this German Prince as much as ſhe ſlighted his pretenſions, that when he had made as much of it as was poſſible in one ſhape, he very artfully ſhifted the ſcene, and made no leſs of it in another. We will give this part of the ſtory in the words of the learned Camden, who had his information from the ſame ſource as Mr. Strype; that is, from the memoirs and papers of the Lord Treaſurer: 'The King of Spain having caſt off all 'pretenſions to Elizabeth, and being upon his mar-'riage with the French King's daughter, was not, 'however, a little perplexed about England, which 'he had no mind to ſee united to the Crown of 'France. And the better to retain the honour of ſo 'conſiderable a kingdom in his own family, he per-'ſwaded the Emperor Ferdinand, his uncle, to offer 'one of his ſons in marriage to Queen Elizabeth; 'which he did, by letters full of reſpect, and preſſed 'the affair very cloſely by Gaſpar Preinor, Free-'Baron in Stibing; and the King of Spain himſelf 'offers her Majeſty his beſt and heartieſt offices to 'bring it about, whilſt ſhe, in return, has both her 'ſhips and ports at his ſervice, to facilitate his in-'tended voyage into Spain; and pays him other 'ſervices and compliments, by the hands of Sir 'Thomas Chaloner.' This introduced our Stateſman to an acquaintance with the Spaniſh Miniſtry; and his having ſucceeded ſo happily in negotiating with both branches of the Houſe of Auſtria, upon ſo tender a point, looked like a demonſtration, that nothing could be too hard for him, aud brought upon him his Spaniſh journey.

return to his native country, before care and ſickneſs forced him upon a longer journey (s). The Queen granted his petition, and having named Dr. Man his ſucceſſor in his negotiation, at length gave him leave to return home from an embaſſy, in which he had ſo long ſacrificed his private quiet to the publick conveniency (t) [C]. He accordingly returned to London in the latter end of the year 1564, and publiſhed the firſt five books of his large work before-mentioned, which he dedicated to his good friend Sir William Cecil; but the remaining five books were not publiſhed, as I apprehend, in his life-time; which I gather from what Camden has left us concerning this worthy perſon, who particularly mentions this great work, and ſpeaks of it as containing five books and no more (u). He reſided in a fair large houſe of his own building in Clerkenwell-Cloſe, over-againſt the decayed nunnery; and a very induſtrious perſon has preſerved from oblivion an elegant fancy of his, which was penciled on the frontiſpiece of his dwelling (w) [D]. Whether it was the diſeaſe he contracted in Spain that hung about him, or that after living ſo long in a warm country, his body was leſs able to endure the inclemency of our moiſter air, ſo it was, that on the ſeventh day of October 1565, he yielded to nature (x), to the regret of the beſt and greateſt men of his time. His body was ſoon after buried in the cathedral church of St. Paul with great funeral ſolemnity, Sir William Cecil, then Principal Secretary of State, aſſiſting (y) thereat as chief mourner, who alſo honoured his memory with a very fine copy of Latin verſes, in which he obſerves, that the moſt lively imagination, the moſt ſolid judgment, the quickeſt parts, and the moſt unblemiſhed probity, which are commonly the lot of different men, and when ſo diſperſed frequently create great characters, were, which very rarely happens, all united in Sir Thomas Chaloner, juſtly therefore reputed one of the greateſt men of his time (z). But this was not all, he encouraged Mr. William Malim, formerly Fellow of King's College in Cambridge, and then Maſter of St. Paul's ſchool (a), to collect and publiſh a correct edition of our author's poetical Works; which he accordingly did, and addreſ-

(s) Miſcellanea Chaloner. p. 291.

(t) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 566.

(u) Camden. Annal. p. 121.

(w) Weaver's Funeral Monuments, p. 430.

(x) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 149.

(y) Camden. Annal. p. 121.

(z) See this copy of verſes, prefixed to Sir Thomas Chaloner's book.

(a) From a MS. note in Sir Thomas Chaloner's book, written by Biſhop Carleton.

[C] To the publick conveniency.] It is very certain, that a man could hardly paſs his days leſs at eaſe than Sir Thomas Chaloner did, while he continued in Spain. He had been in that country many years before, and diſliked it, ſo that he went thither with the utmoſt regret (6). The inſult offered to him on his firſt arrival, gave him great diſpleaſure, which was far from being removed by the Queen's giving him to underſtand, that there he was to ſtay. He very well knew, that the Biſhop of Aquila, the Spaniſh Embaſſador at London, was daily drawing upon himſelf deſerved ill uſage for his intrigues with the Papiſts and Malecontents; and he found by experience, that much of the ill-treatment this eccleſiaſtick ſuffered was revenged upon him (7). When the Queen ſent forces over to aſſiſt the Proteſtants in France, Sir Thomas Chaloner was ordered to give that matter the beſt face it could receive at the Court of Spain; which he did. But King Philip anſwered him plainly, that if the Queen, his miſtreſs, meant no more than to keep Havre-de-Grace till Calais was reſtored, he was content; but that, if under colour of oppoſing the Guiſes, and providing for her own ſafety, ſhe meant to begin a religious war, and to become the head of a Proteſtant league, he ſhould find himſelf obliged to defend the old religion, and to take part with the monarch of France (8). But all this time, the great and important buſineſs of the trade between England and the Low-Countries remained ſuſpended; nor could any method that hitherto had been contrived, engage the governors of the Low-Countries to recall the prohibition of Engliſh commodities, though ſeveral attempts had been made for that purpoſe, by particular applications to thoſe who had authority there. But Sir Thomas Chaloner perceiving that his Catholick Majeſty's favourite, the famous Roderick Gomez, was at the head of a faction directly oppoſite to that of the Duke of Alva, he very artfully procured ſome of the correſpondents of the latter in Spain, to repreſent to him, that the enmity expreſſed by Gomez towards the Engliſh, did not at all ariſe, as he gave out, from their being hereticks, and having views different from thoſe of his maſter, but from an apprehenſion, that if the intercourſe between England and the Low-Countries were revived, it would produce a briſk circulation of money throughout all the cities in thoſe provinces, and thereby facilitate his motions, which he deſired to retard. The Duke of Alva having conſidered this, ſoon ſaw, or thought he ſaw, ſufficient evidence to prove it; and thereupon changed the whole of his conduct, diſcourſing often of the old friendſhip ſubſiſting between the houſe of Burgundy and the Kings of England, affecting a particular regard for the nation, and at length opening a free trade proviſionally, till contrary orders ſhould be received from Spain (9). Theſe, and other things of a like nature and importance, employed the thoughts, and exerciſed the induſtry, of our able and indefatigable Miniſter, while he remained in Spain; and therefore it is an idle and ridiculous ſuggeſtion of a certain writer, that he made it his buſineſs to amuſe King Philip with the hopes of marrying Queen Elizabeth (10), which, as we have ſhewn, was a thing given up on both ſides, and impracticable, before he was ſent to Spain. But when men write from fancy, and without reſpect to authorities, they eaſily fall into ſuch miſtakes as theſe.

(6) This appears by his pathetick Poem addreſſed to Queen Elizabeth, to obtain leave for his return.

(7) Strype's Annals, vol. i. p. 395.

(8) Camden. Annal. p. 97.

(9) This appears from the Burleighan MSS. compared with the Hiſtorians of thoſe times. Camden. Annal. p. 107.

(10) Lloyd's Worthies, p. 565.

[D] On the frontiſpiece of his dwelling.] The priory of Clerkenwell belonged to Nuns, who, from their habit, were called Black Nuns, and was founded by one Jordan Briſet: it was a very fair and handſome houſe, and had revenues to the amount of nearly three hundred pounds a year at the time of the diſſolution (11). I cannot find that Sir Thomas Chaloner had any grant, either of the lands belonging to this nunnery, or to the adjacent hoſpital, of the order of St. John of Jeruſalem; and, therefore, I preſume, he had a leaſe from the Cavendiſh family, who were in poſſeſſion of the ſcite of the diſſolved nunnery, upon which he erected this new houſe, directly oppoſite to the ruins of the old building, to which the inſcription he placed thereon manifeſtly referred. His lines were theſe:

(11) Weaver's Funeral Monuments, p. 430.

Caſta fides ſupereſt, velatæ tecta ſorores
Iſta relegatæ, deſeruere licet:
Nam venerandus Hymen, hic vota jugalia ſervat;
Veſtalemque focem mente fovere ſtudet.

In Engliſh thus:

Their houſe no more, the veil-clad virgins grace,
Yet faith unſpotted, ſtill maintains her place:
For ſacred Hymen's rites, like honours claim;
And his bright torch illumes the veſtal flame.

To him alſo is aſcribed the following line, under a ſun-dial, at the entrance into the nunnery.

Non aliter pereo ſpecies quam futilis umbræ.

The fleeting ſhade deſcribes its day and mine,
For life and light by the ſame ſteps decline.

ſed it in an epiſtle from St. Paul's ſchool, dated 1 Auguſt 1579, to that noble perſon now become Lord Burleigh, Lord High-Treaſurer of England, &c. But of this and his other works, the reader will receive ſome farther account in the notes [E]. Sir Thomas Chaloner married Ethelreda, daughter of Edward Frodſham of Elton in the County Palatine of Cheſter, Eſq; (b) by whom he had iſſue his only ſon Thomas, of whom briefly in the next article. This Lady, not long after Sir Thomas's deceaſe, married Sir * * * Brockett, notwithſtanding which the Lord Burleigh continued his kindneſs to her, out of reſpect to that friendſhip which he had for her firſt huſband (c). We cannot conclude this ſhort Life of ſo worthy a man better, than by adding his epitaph, written by one of the beſt Latin Poets of that age, Dr. Walter Haddon, Maſter of Requeſts to Queen Elizabeth (d).

(b) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 398.

(c) As appears from Mr. Tho. Chaloner's Epiſtle Dedicatory, prefixed to his father's book.

(d) Miſcellanea Chaloner, p. 379

Natura Thomas Chalonerus, & arte valebat,
Utilis & patriæ vir fuit illæ ſuæ.
Publica cum magna ſuſcepit munera laude,
Laude pari libros ſcripſerat ille domi.
Sic patriæ vixit magno, dum vixit, honore,
Sic patriæ magno concidit ille malo.

In Engliſh thus:

Nature and art in CHALONER combin'd,
And for his country form'd the Patriot's mind.

[E] Some farther account in the notes.] He began very early to employ his pen for the ſervice of the publick; and indeed there is ſcarcely an author who has written in our language, to whom we may juſtly aſcribe a larger degree of this noble diſpoſition, than to Sir Thomas Chaloner; who from firſt to laſt employed his abilities, either in ſerving his country, or in celebrating the praiſes of thoſe who had ſerved it, that this might prove an encouragement to others. All that can now be diſcovered of his writings are theſe, viz.

I. A little Dictionary for Children. This is mentioned by the induſtrious Bale (12), and ſeems to have been the firſt thing our author publiſhed. In his preface to it he ſhows the utility of ſuch a work, and from thence infers, that no learned man need be aſhamed of undertaking it, becauſe employing learning for the promoting of learning, is diſcharging the duty of a man of letters; and whatever is a man's duty muſt be honourable.

(12) De Scriptor. p. 108.

II. The Office of Servants. Tranſlated from the Latin of Gilbert Cognatus, London, 1543, 8vo. This book he dedicated to his honourable patron Sir Henry Knevet (13), whom he attended in his Embaſſy to the Emperor Charles V. and whoſe death he afterwards celebrated, which is preſerved amongſt the reſt of his poems of the ſame nature (14).

(13) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 149.

(14) Miſcellanea, p. 377.

III. Moriæ Encomium, i. e. The Praiſe of Folly. Tranſlated from Eraſmus, and printed at London, 1549, in 4to (15). It is not impoſſible that he may have been the author alſo of ſome other tranſlations, or little treatiſes rela ing to morals; but of theſe we find no account, nor at this diſtance of time has tradition tranſmitted to us the titles of any of his pieces.

(15) He was a diſciple and friend to its famous author.

IV. In laudem Henrici octavi, Regis Angliæ, præſtantiſſimi, carmen panegyricum, i. e. In praiſe of Henry VIII. the moſt worthy King of England, a Panegyrick. This poem was addreſſed to Queen Elizabeth, in the beginning of her reign (16), but was not publiſhed till many years after the author's deceaſe, by the care of the ſame worthy perſon who was the editor of the reſt of his poetical works.

(16) It ſtands between the large Poem, de Repub. Anglor. inſtauranda, and his Miſcellanea.

V. De Rep. Anglorum inſtauranda, libri decem, i. e. Of the reforming or reſtoring the Engliſh Republick, in ten books, Lond. 1579, 4to. This edition is moſt correctly and elegantly printed by Thomas Vautroller. There is prefixed to it the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh's poem on the work and its author, with other commendatory verſes. We are told by the editor, that he was encouraged to the undertaking by the Lord Burleigh, who was very deſirous that this noble work, of his deceaſed friend, might appear in a manner ſuitable to its worth, and to the high reſpect he bore his memory. We have already told the reader, when and how it was compoſed; but it may not be amiſs to add, Sir Thomas Chaloner's account in his own words; by which it appears, that it was begun on Chriſtmas-day 1562, and finiſhed the 21ſt of July 1564, which he remembered, in the firſt leaf of the manuſcript, in the following terms.

'Deo auſpice, Thomas Chalonerus, Londinenſis, 'Equeſtris ordinis vir, ſereniſſimæ Angliæ, &c. Re-'ginæ Elizabethæ, ad potentiſſimum Hiſpaniarum 'Regem Philippum legatus, animi recreandi, cum 'otio abundaret, cauſa, libros hoſce decem de Repub. 'Anglorum inſtauranda incepit 25 die Decembris, 'Anno Domini 1562, perfecit verò 21 die Julii '1564, quum horis tantùm ſucceſſivis, idque ferè an-'te lucanis, ad componenda carmina ſe conferret. 'Atque hunc archetypum manu propria conſcripſit.'

VI. De illuſtrium quorundam encomiis miſcellanea cum epigrammatis ac epitaphiis nonnullis. This collection of panegyricks, epigrams, and epitaphs, is printed with the book before-mentioned, and contains many teſtimonies of his loyalty and friendſhip, as well as of his great genius and extenſive learning. We have already mentioned ſeveral of the pieces that are inſerted in this collection, and ſhall only take notice here, amongſt others, that he has celebrated the memory of his friend, Sir John Cheeke, of his old patrons Sir Thomas Parrye, and Lord Paget; of Dr. Thomas Phayer, a learned Phyſician, and ſome foreigners. Thus we have endeavoured to recover, as far as it was in our power, the memory of ſo great a man from oblivion, who, in the judgment of his contemporaries, joined to the quickeſt wit, and the moſt ſolid learning, the politeſt manners, and the moſt inflexible probity. As to religion, he was a zealous Proteſtant; which, as he never diſſembled in the days of Queen Mary, ſo in the dawn of Queen Elizabeth's government, he very earneſtly preſſed the publick owning of the Reformation, as a thing ſafeſt, as well as moſt honourable for the State (17); and the ſame principles he conſtantly and warmly recommended in all his writings. C.

(17) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 535.

 [In Haynes's collection of State-Papers, we find a joint letter from Dr. Wotton and Mr. Chaloner to Sir William Cecil, written from Monſtruel, in April, 1553; and two letters from Sir Thomas Chaloner, when Embaſſador in Spain, to Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, Embaſſador in France, dated in May, 1562. The firſt of theſe letters contains an account of the motions of the Imperial and Spaniſh troops; and the two others relate to the deſigns and conduct of the Spaniards, with regard to the ſupport of the party of Guiſe, in the civil conteſts of France. After a careful peruſal of the letters, we do not meet with any thing curious enough to juſtify our enlarging the article with extracts from them (18).] K.

(18) Hayne's Collection of State Papers, p. 147, 148. 382, 383. 384—386.

With

With praiſe deſerv'd his publick poſts he fill'd;
And equal fame his learned labours yield.
While yet he liv'd, he liv'd his country's pride,
And firſt his country injur'd when he dy'd.

CHALONER (Sir THOMAS) the younger, the ſon of the former by his wife Ethelreda, daughter of Mr. Frodſham of Elton in Cheſhire (a). He was born ſome time in the year 1559 (b), and being very young at the time of his father's deceaſe, and his mother ſoon after marrying a ſecond huſband, he owed his education chiefly to the care and protection of the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh, by whom he was firſt put under the care of Dr. Malim Maſter of St. Paul's ſchool, and afterwards removed to Magdalen College in Oxford, where he cloſely purſued his ſtudies at ſuch times as his father's poetical works were publiſhed; and as a proof of his veneration for his father's friend, and gratitude for the many kindneſſes himſelf had received, he prefixed a dedication to this work to his patron the Lord Burleigh (c). He left the College before he took any degree, but not before he had acquired a great reputation for parts and learning. He had, like his father, a great talent for poetry, which he wrote with much facility both in Engliſh and in Latin, and it is ſaid that he had a particular inclination for Paſtoral (d). But it does not appear that he publiſhed any thing of this, or indeed of any kind before he left England, which, from a compariſon of circumſtances, ſeems to have been about the year 1580. He viſited ſeveral parts of Europe, but made the longeſt ſtay in Italy, where he addicted himſelf to the converſation of the graveſt and wiſeſt men in that country; and being naturally of a very ſerious temper, agreed with them ſo well, that they very readily imparted to him their moſt important diſcoveries in Natural Philoſophy, for which he had always a great affection, ſtudied it with much diligence, and, by the quickneſs of his apprehenſion, wonderful penetration, and great ſolidity of judgment, gained a very deep inſight into the operations of nature (e), which he continually augmented by a variety of experiments. At his return home, which was ſome time before 1584, he appeared very much at Court, and was eſteemed and careſſed by the greateſt men there, as well on account of his great learning as his polite behaviour. About this time he married his firſt wife, who was the daughter of his father's old friend Sir William Fleetwood, Recorder of London, by whom he had ſeveral children (f). In the year 1591 he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him, as well in regard to his own perſonal merit as the great ſervices of his father (g); and ſome years after, the firſt alum mines that were ever known to be in this kingdom, were diſcovered, by his great ſagacity, not far from Giſborough in Yorkſhire, where he had a very fair eſtate. It was with infinite difficulty and trouble, attended with a very large expence, that theſe mines were ſo wrought as to become valuable, and then, by ſome extraordinary ſtretch of Law, he was deprived of them. Of all theſe circumſtances, ſo far as we have been able to inform ourſelves, the reader will have an account in the notes (b) [A]. In the latter end

(a) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 398.

(b) This date I have met with in ſome MS. notes upon Wood, but cannot tell whether it may be fafely relied on, though it ſeems to agree very well with the events of his life.

(c) This Dedication is dated 1 Aug. 1579.

(d) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 398.

(e) Camden. Brit. in Brigant.

(f) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 398.

(g) Liſt of Knights made in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

(b) Childrey's Britannia Baconica, p. 162.

[A] Will have an account in the notes.] We propoſe to give the reader here a ſuccinct account of this gentleman's great abilities as a naturaliſt, his happy diſcovery of the art of making alum from the ſtone, and the conſequences of that diſcovery, of which hitherto there is no connected relation any where to be met with. It is very certain, that in his travels he addicted himſelf very much to philoſophical enquiries, and that with the nobleſt view of rendering them beneficial to mankind; of which he gave a ſpecimen in a ſmall work of his, the only one, I believe, he ever publiſhed, bearing the following title:

The virtue of Nitre, wherein is declared the ſundry cures by the ſame effected. Lond. 1584. 4°. In which he diſcourſes largely of the nature, production, and uſes of nitre; and diſcovers a very ſingular acquaintance with minerals, and their component parts, from whence he deduces all their natural properties, and ſhows, how they may be applied medicinally by the aſſiſtance of the Chymiſts.

This diſcovers the temper and diſpoſition of our author's mind, always attentive, always meditating, and always contriving, to carry that knowledge he acquired by attention and meditation into practice. Amongſt the other places he had viſited in Italy, he ſpent ſome time at Puzzoli, or, as ſome write it, Puteoli (1), where he ſaw after what manner they made alum, and to how great an account it turned. On the Solfatara, near that place, they collect a kind of ſaltiſh flour, or duſt, that covers the ſurface in the ſummer time: this, when thus collected, they throw into large veſſels full of water, which are ſet in the earth, and being placed over certain ſubterraneous ſpiracles, the water being evaporated by the heat, the alum is left behind. How well he obſerved the nature of the ſoil, and its effects upon the vegetables produced in the neighbourhood, will beſt appear from the learned Camden's account of the diſcovery (2), made by him in England, which we ſhall give in that great man's own words, in as much as they afford at the ſame time the cleareſt relation, and carry with them the moſt inconteſtable authority.

(1) Miſſon's Voyage and Travels, vol. i. p. 433.

(2) Camden's Britannia, p. 766.

'Four miles from the mouth of the Tees ſtands 'Giſborough, upon a riſing ground, at preſent a ſmall 'town. While it was in it's prime it was very much 'graced by a beautiful and rich monaſtery, built about 'the year 1119 by Robert de Brus, lord of the town. 'It has been the common burial-place for all the nobi-'lity of theſe parts, and has produced Walter de He-'mingford, no unlearned Hiſtorian. The place is 'really fine, and may, for pleaſantneſs, a curious va-'riety, and the natural advantages of it, compare 'with Puteoli in Italy; and then for a healthful and 'agreeable ſituation, it certainly far ſurpaſſes it. The 'coldneſs of the air, which the ſea occaſions, is quali-'fied and broken by the hills between [illegible] ſoil is 'fruitful, and produces graſs and fine f[illegible]reat 'part of the year; it richly abounds wi[illegible]f 'metal and alum earth of ſeveral colours, (but ſpeci-'ally with thoſe of ochre and murray) from which 'they now begin to extract the beſt ſort of alum and 'copperas in great plenty. This was firſt diſcovered 'a few years ſince by the admirable ſagacity of that 'learned Naturaliſt Sir Thomas Chaloner, Knight (to 'whoſe end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, Sir Thomas Chaloner made a journey into Scotland, whether out of curiosity, with a view to preferment, or by the direction of Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury, who was his great friend, is not now to be discovered: but this is very certain, that he soon grew into such credit with King James, that the most considerable persons in England addressed themselves to him for his favour and recommendation. Amongst the rest, Sir Francis Bacon, afterwards Chancellor, wrote him a very warm letter, which is still extant, which he sent him by his friend Mr. Matthews, who was also charged with another to the King; a copy of which was sent to Sir Thomas Chaloner, and Mr. Matthews was directed to deliver him the original, if he would undertake to present it (i). He accompanied the King in his journey to England, and by his extensive learning, pleasant conversation, and admirable address, fixed himself so effectually in that Monarch's good graces, that, as one of the highest marks he could give him of his kindness and confidence, he thought fit to intrust him with the care of Prince Henry's education, August 17, 1603 (k) [B]. He enjoyed this honour, under several denominations, during the life-time of that excellent Prince, whom he attended in 1605 to Oxford, and upon that occasion was honoured with the degree of Master of Arts, as many other persons of distinction were (l). I cannot find that he had any grants of lands, or gifts in money, from the Crown, in consideration of his services, though Sir Adam Newton, who was Preceptor to Prince Henry, appears, from a list

(i) Bacon's Works, vol. iv. p. 557. Collection of Letters by Sir Tobie Matthews, p. 16.

(k) Pat. 1 Jac. I. p. 23. m. 10.

(l) Wood's Fasti, Oxon. p. 173.

' whose tuition his present Majesty has committed the ' delight and glory of Britain, his son Prince Henry)
' by observing, that the leaves of trees were of a more
' weakly sort of green here than in other places; that
' the oaks shot forth their roots very broad, but not ' deep, and that these had much strength but little sap
' in them; that the soil was a white clay speckled ' with several colours, namely, white, yellowish, and
' blue; that it never froze, and, that in a pretty clear
' night it shin'd and sparkled like glass upon the road ' side. Next Ounesbery Topping, a steep mountain,
' and all over green, riseth so high, that it appears at
' a great distance, and it is the land-mark that directs
' sailors, and a prognostick to the neighbours here-
' abouts; for when it's top begins to be darkened
' with clouds, rain generally follows. Near the top of
' it a fountain issues from a great stone, very good for ' sore eyes; and from hence the vallies round it, the ' grassy hills, green meadows, rich pastures, fruitful
' corn fields, fishy rivers, and the creeky mouth of the ' Tees, low and open shores, yet free from inunda' tion, and the sea with the ships in it, render the pro' spect very delicate.'

The time when this discovery was made is not fixed in this account; but from a comparison of circumstances it appears to have been about 1600, or perhaps a little earlier (3). But the invention and the perfection of this art were at some distance, and very considerable sums of money were spent before the project was brought to bear; which, probably, was owing to the difference of climates, and that different manner of working, which this rendered necessary. But at length, by the bringing over privately Lambert Russell, a Walloon, and two other workmen, employed in this business at Rochelle in France, the matter was compleated, but very little to the profit of the proprietors, since upon this it was adjudged to be a mine royal, and so came into the hands of the Crown (4). It was then granted to Sir Paul Pindar, under the following rent, viz. twelve thousand five hundred pounds a year to the King, one thousand six hundred and forty pounds a year to the Earl of Mulgrave, and six hundred pounds a year to Sir William Pennyman. But notwithstanding these high rents, and that no less than eight hundred persons were employed in the manufacture at a time, the farm of the alum mines produced a vast profit to Sir Paul Pindar, who kept up the commodity at the rate of twenty-six pounds a ton (5). The Long-Parliament voted this a monopoly, and restored the alum works to their original proprietors. About the time of the Restoration we find there were five works carried on, viz. one at Sands-End, another at Ash-Holme, both belonging to the Earl of Mulgrave; a third at Slapy-Wash, then belonging to the Darcies, formerly to the Pennymans; the fourth at Dunsly, which was Mr. Fairfax's; the last at Whitby, belonging to Sir Hugh Cholmley. By thus opening different works, and that emulation that it naturally occasioned, the commodity sunk in value, for the proprietors under sold one another, till the price of alum was brought down to thirteen pounds a ton (6). In the end, the last of these works, by the conveniency of it's situation, triumphed over the rest, so that the original mines at Gisborough fell into disuse; but the present consumption of alum is at least as great, if not greater, than ever (7). It is considered as a drug, and from it's astringent quality is much used in physick, and enters into the composition of various medicines. But the great vent of it arises from it's prodigious utility in fixing colours, and in preparing stuffs for dying, which makes it a valuable commodity to Clothiers, Glovers, Dyers, and many other artificers (8). The Roman alum is looked upon as rather better than ours, but ours much exceeds other alums, and more especially that of Sweden, which of late years great pains has been taken to improve; and some persons (9), as I have been informed, were not many years ago sent over hither on purpose to look into the management of our alum works, and if possible to steal the secret.

(2) It was certainly in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, but it was not inserted in the Britannia till the last edition.

(4) Hist. of the Reign of Charles I. p. 339.

(5) Fuller's Worthies in Yorkshire, p. 186.

(6) Case of the Alum Works in Yorkshire.

(7) Ray's Collection of English Words not generally used, p. 144, 145.

(8) Dictionaire de Commerce.

(9) They were recommended by the Archbishop of Upsal to a Clergyman, from whose mouth I had it.

[B] Of Prince Henry's education, August 17th, 1603.] In most of our historians Sir Thomas Chaloner is generally called Prince Henry's tutor, but that is a very improper appellation, for one who was absolutely intrusted with the care of that young Prince's education, and of his household; so that he was rather his governor, though it does not appear that he ever had this title. But that he was by no means his tutor, is evident from Mr. Newton's holding that office for several years, who was afterwards Dean of Durham, though a layman, and created a Baronet (10); and then John Wilkinson, Master of Arts (11), and others, though Sir Thomas Chaloner remained in his charge all the while; and it was out of respect to him, that when Prince Henry was matriculated at Oxford, he chose to enter as a Member of Magdalen-College. To put this matter out of dispute, we shall give the reader a clause out of the patent, by which Sir Thomas held his office (12), which will fully explain it's nature.

(10) Baronetage of England, vol. v. p. 271.

(11) Wood's Fasti, Oxon. vol. i. col. 127.

(12) Rymer's Fœd. vol. xvi. p. 545.

' For the good proof we have long had of your sin' gular affection to our person, and for the trust we
' repose in you, as well in regard of your zeal to reli' gion, as also for your discretion, we have made ' choice of you to have the principal charge and custo' dy, as well of the person of our said son, as also the ' oversight of all his household and family attending
' him, who being to us so dear a jewel as he is, the ' charge is likewise of great weight and care to you.
' Wherefore we have thought good to accompany so ' great a burthen with sufficient authority to you, for
' the execution and discharge thereof, and do there' fore direct these our letters patents to you, under our ' Great Seal of England, whereby we do give you
' power and authority for the better execution of this ' charge committed to you, to command, rule, and ' direct, as well all persons, which shall be of ordinary
' attendance about our son the Prince, in his house, in
' all things that may concern the safety of his person,
' or the observation of good rule in his house, as also
' all Justices of Peace, Mayors, Bailiffs, Headboroughs,
' Constables, &c.'

that

that I have ſeen, to have received at ſeveral times the ſum of four thouſand pounds by way of free gift (m). Sir Thomas Chaloner had likewiſe very great intereſt with Queen Anne, and appears to have been employed by her in her private affairs, and in the ſettlement of that ſmall eſtate which ſhe enjoyed (n). What relation he had to the Court after the death of his gracious Maſter Prince Henry, does no where appear; but it is not at all likely that he was laid aſide (o). He married ſome years before his death his ſecond wife Judith, daughter to Mr. William Blount of London, and by this lady alſo he had children, to whom, if my author does not miſlead me (p), he left a conſiderable eſtate, which he had at Steeple-Claydon in the county of Buckingham. All we know of him farther is, that he died on the 17th of November 1615, and was buried in the pariſh-church of Chiſwick in the county of Middleſex. His eldeſt ſon William Chaloner, Eſq; was, by letters patents dated July 20, in the 18th of King James I. A. D. 1620, created a Baronet, by the title of William Chaloner of Giſborough in the county of York, Eſq; (q) which title I find was extinct in 1681 (r). Yet the poſterity of ſome of the younger brothers of this Baronet are ſtill remaining in that county, and are poſſeſſed of the family eſtate at Giſborough (s), as the reader will be informed in the notes [C]. It was judged neceſſary to give as full and diſtinct an account of this worthy perſon as poſſible, becauſe few or none, either of our Hiſtorians or Biographers, Anthony Wood (t) excepted, have taken any notice of him, though he was ſo conſiderable a benefactor to this nation, by diſcovering the alum mines, which have produced vaſt ſums of money, and ſtill continue to be wrought with very great profit, though, as I am informed, this family have long ſince loſt the benefit of them (u). We ſhall have a better notion of this matter, I mean the advantage which this nation has gained by making and vending alum, if we reflect, that in the firſt place it is a commodity of great uſe in various manufactures; ſo that we muſt have had it from abroad whatever it coſt, and therefore all that is conſumed at home, is ſo much clear gains to this nation as the value of it amounts to. On the other hand, the quality of our alum putting it in our power to ſet a very high price upon it, this was alſo very beneficial to the nation, inaſmuch as every ounce of it exported, added ſo much as it was worth to the general balance of our trade; whence it ap-

(m) Abſtract of King James's Revenue, p. 18, 19. 26.

(n) Letters and Memorials of State, collected out of the papers belonging to the Sidney Family, vol. ii. p. 307.

(o) Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 87.

(p) Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 398.

(q) Engliſh Baronetage, vol. v. p. 271.

(r) Dugdale's Catalogue of Baronets, as they ſtood July 4, 1681, p. 89.

(s) From the information of a Reverend Clergyman in that county.

(t) Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 398.

(u) From private information.

[C] Will be informed in the notes.] We have already ſpoken in the text of Sir Thomas Chaloner's eldeſt ſon, Sir William Chaloner of Giſborough, in the county of York, and therefore here we are to ſpeak of his younger children only. His ſecond ſon Edward was educated in the ſame College where his father had been formerly bred at Oxford, and entering into holy orders became Doctor in Divinity, Principal of St. Alban's Hall, Chaplain to King Charles the Firſt, and one of the moſt eminent preachers of his time, though he died at the age of thirty-four, being carried off by the plague that then raged at Oxford, July 26th, 1625 (13).

(13) Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 281.

Thomas Chaloner was younger brother to Edward, but whether the next to him we cannot determine. He was alſo ſent to Oxford, and ſpent ſome time there at Exeter College, after which he went abroad, and having travelled through France and Italy, returned home a very well-accompliſhed gentleman, being much diſtinguiſhed for the vivacity of his wit, and his extenſive knowledge in all kind of polite literature: but having contracted a diſlike to the royal family, on the ſcore of the alum mines, of which his father had been deprived, he ſtruck in with the malecontents, and being elected member for Aldborough in the county of York, became an active member of the Long-Parliament (14). He ſat as one of the King's judges, and was elected one of the members of the Council of State. Upon a proſpect of the King's return he printed a paper, entitled, A Speech, containing a Plea for Monarchy (15), in which he hinted at ſome limitations and reſtrictions. He ſoon after thought fit to retire to Holland, in which he acted prudently, for he was excepted (16) out of the Act of Oblivion, and very ſoon after died at Middleburg in Zealand.

(14) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 264.

(15) Printed in 4to. at London, 1659.

(16) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 43.

James Chaloner, younger brother to Thomas, was a Commoner of Brazen-Noſe College in Oxford, and afterwards ſtudied in the Inns of Court. He was a man of great learning, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an Antiquary, as alſo by writing the Hiſtory of the Iſle of Man, a manuſcript copy of which was in the valuable Muſæum of Mr. Thoreſby, of Leeds, but it has been alſo printed (17). He was likewiſe a member of the Long-Parliament, deep in the tranſactions of thoſe times, and one of the King's Judges; for which, at the Reſtoration, he was excepted from the benefit of his eſtate, but his life ſpared; and this diſtinction ſeems to have been owing to his not having ſigned the warrant for the King's death, which his brother Thomas did (18). He married Urſula, daughter of Sir William Fairfax, of Seeton, in the county of York, and dying in the year 1661, was ſucceeded in his eſtate by his only ſon Edmund (19).

(17) Thoreſby's Antiq. of Leeds, p. 525.

(18) State Trials, vol. i. p. 1042.

(19) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 252.

C.

 [Dr. Birch, in his Life of Henry Prince of Wales, hath given a ſhort account of Sir Thomas Chaloner, which differs in no material reſpect from the article above. In the ſame work, are two letters written by Sir Thomas, one to Sir Robert Cotton, and the other to the Prince, both of which ſhew him to have been a man of ſagacity and reflection (20). We may obſerve, by the way, that Dr. Birch doth not ſcruple to call him Prince Henry's governor: ſuch he really was, and he appears to have diſcharged his truſt with equal wiſdom and fidelity. Among other things, he was anxious that the eſtabliſhment of his royal Pupil's houſhold ſhould be kept within a moderate degree of ſplendour and expence (21). In the manuſcript papers of Anthony Bacon, Eſq; preſerved in the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's library at Lambeth, tranſcripts and extracts from which, by Dr. Birch, are now lodged in the Britiſh Muſeum, there are ſome letters of Sir Thomas Chaloner's to Mr. Bacon and the Earl of Eſſex. All of them, one excepted, were written from Italy, and chiefly from Florence, when Sir Thomas was upon his travels. Theſe letters are taken notice of by Dr. Birch, in his Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth; and we learn from them, that Mr. Anthony Bacon recommended Sir Thomas Chaloner to the Earl of Eſſex's favour, who at firſt doubted of his attachment, but ſeems afterwards to have received him into his confidence (22). Among the heraldic manuſcripts of the Britiſh Muſeum, is one with the following title. "The true and perfect Genealogy of the ancient Families of Middletons, of Middleton, in the County of Salop, Gwynenock, and Lord of Cherle, within the County of Denbigh, gathered out of many ancient Evidences and Records, by the Induſtry and Travell of Thomas Chaloner, late of the City of Cheſter, Gent. and Student in the Law of Arms (23)." Who this Thomas Chaloner was, we are not able, with any degree of exactneſs, to determine.]

(20) Life of Henry Prince of Wales, p. 32—34. 203—207.

(21) Ibid. p. 97.

(22) Ayſcough's Catalogue, p. 153. 157, 158, 159. Birch's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 150. 182. 226. 236. 269, 270. 304.

(23) Ayſcough's Catalogue, p. 284.

K.

pears, that we both ſaved and got by this diſcovery. But then, thirdly, the reader will be told in the notes, how great a number of perſons have been at one time employed in theſe works (w), which will enable us to form ſome ſort of eſtimate, of the many families that in ſo long a tract of time have been maintained, and ſome of them enriched, by the ſame means. Taking therefore all things together, it muſt appear highly juſt to celebrate the memory of every man who is thus uſeful to his country; and it would have been no diſgrace to our Hiſtorians, if, in this reſpect, they had followed the example of honeſt John Stowe, and his Continuator Edward Howes, who have very carefully collected, and very faithfully ſet down, many inſtances of the like nature (x); and have alſo given a very particular account of this diſcovery, though it does not altogether agree with what is met with in other authors; for it ſeems to make King James an encourager of this work, and mentions his prohibiting the importation of alum from abroad, that it might turn to better account in the hands of Sir Thomas Chaloner and his aſſociates (y).

(w) Fuller's Worthies, in Yorkſhire.

(x) Stowe's Annals, p. 1038.

(y) Ibid. p. 895, 896.

CHAMBER or CHAMBRE (JOHN) a learned Phyſician in the XVIth century, noted chiefly for being one of the founders of the College of Phyſicians, London (a), was educated in Merton-College in Oxford, of which he was Fellow (b). He took his degree of Maſter of Arts about the year 1502; after which travelling into Italy, he ſtudied Phyſick at Padua, and there took the degree of Doctor in that Faculty. After his return, he became Phyſician to King Henry VIII; and, with Thomas Linacre, Fernandes de Victoria, Nicolas Halſewell, John Fraunces, and Robert Yaxley, Doctors of Phyſick, founded the College of Phyſicians [A]. Being in Holy Orders, he became, in 1510, Canon of Windſor, and in 1524 Archdeacon of Bedford, and was likewiſe Prebendary of Comb and Harnham in the cathedral church of Sarum (c). In 1525 he was elected Warden of Merton-college (d); and, about the ſame time, was made Dean of the Royal Chapel and College adjoining to Weſtminſter-Hall, dedicated to the Virgin Mary and St. Stephen (e). He built to it a very curious cloyſter (f), and gave the Canons of that Chapel ſome lands, which he ſaw, upon the diſſolution of the monaſteries, taken into the King's hands. Afterwards he was made Treaſurer of Wells cathedral, beneficed in Somerſetſhire and Yorkſhire, and probably had other dignities and preferments (g). October 29, 1531, he was incorporated Doctor of Phyſick at Oxford (h). In May 1543 he reſigned his Treaſurerſhip of Wells; and his Wardenſhip of Merton-college in 1545. He died in 1549 (i). He never publiſhed any thing.

(a) Wood, Faſt. edit. 1721, vol. i. col. 50. Stowe's Survey of London, with Strype's Additions, edit. 1720, vol. i. p. 132, of Book i.

(b) Wood, ibid.

(c) Wood, ibid.

(d) Idem, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 86. He ſays elſewhere, that it was in 1526. Faſti, ubi ſupra.

(e) Now the Houſe of Commons.

(f) The Charge of which amounted to eleven thouſand marks. Stowe's Survey of London, &c. with Strype's Additions, edit. 1720, Book vi. p. 54, vol. ii.

(g) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra.

(h) Wood, Faſti, ubi ſupra.

(i) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra.

[A] Founded the College of Phyſicians.] Henry the VIIIth's charter, for the foundation of this College, bears date at Weſtminſter, September 23, 1518, and is ſaid to have been obtained at the requeſt of Dr. John Chamber, Thomas Linacre, Fernandez de Victoria, his Phyſicians; and of Nicolas Halſewell, John Fraunces, and Robert Yaxley, of the ſame faculty: but eſpecially through the interceſſion and intereſt of Cardinal Wolſey. The firſt College of this Society was in Knights Riders-ſtreet, being the gift of Dr. Linacre. Afterwards they removed to Amen-corner, where they bought an houſe and ground: but the houſe being burnt down in 1666, the Fellows purchaſed, with their own money, a large piece of ground in Warwick-lane, upon which they erected the preſent College. The number of Fellows at firſt was but thirty. King Charles II. at their requeſt, augmented the number to forty. And King James II. in their new charter, was pleaſed to increaſe the number to eighty, and not to exceed. To the College belong, at preſent, a Preſident, four Cenſors, and twelve Electors (1). M.

(1) Stowe's Survey of London, with Strype's Additions, Lond. 1720, vol. i. B. i. p. 130, 131.

CHAMBERLAYNE (EDWARD) author of The Preſent State of England, was deſcended from an eminent and ancient family [A] and born at Odington in Glouceſterſhire, on the 13th of December 1616 (a). He had his firſt education at Glouceſter (b): and in Michaelmas-term 1634 became a Commoner of St. Edmund-Hall in Oxford (c). On the 20th of April 1638, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (d); and that of Maſter in 1641, and was appointed Rhetorick Reader of the Univerſity for part of that and the year following (e). During the Civil Wars, he travelled into France, Spain, Italy, Hungary, Bohemia, Germany, the Low-Countries, Denmark, and Sweden (f). In 1658 he married Suſannah, only daughter of Richard Clifford, Eſq; deſcended from the ancient and noble family of the Cliffords, Lords of Frampton in the county of Glouceſter (g). After the reſtoration of King Charles II. he became Fellow of the Royal Society; and in 1669 Secretary to Charles Earl of Carliſle, when he was ſent to Stockholm, to carry the Order of the Garter to the King of Sweden. In January 1670, he had the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law conferred on him at Cambridge; and on the 22d of June 1672, was incorporated in the ſame at Oxford (h). About the year 1679 he was appointed Tutor to Henry Duke of Grafton, one of the natural ſons of King Charles II. Afterwards, he became Inſtructor in the Engliſh tongue to Prince

(a) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 355; and Athenæ Oxon. edit. 1721, vol. ii. col. 1130.

(b) From his epitaph, which ſee below.

(c) Athenæ, as above.

(d) Idem, Faſti, vol. i. col. 275.

(e) Athenæ, as above.

(f) From his epitaph.

(g) From her epitaph.

(h) Wood, Ath. as above; and Faſti, vol. ii. col. 189.

[A] Deſcended from an eminent and ancient family.] His father, Thomas Chamberlayne, Eſq; was ſon of Sir Thomas Chamberlayne, Knt. ſome time Embaſſador in Flanders, where he married a Lady of the houſe of Naſſau. The family derive their deſcent from the Counts, or at leaſt Barons, of Tanquerville, in Normandy. And John Count of Tankerville being made Chamberlain to the King of England above four hundred years ago, his deſcendants thence took the ſurname of Chamberlayne. They branched out into the ſeveral houſes of Sherborne-caſtle, in Oxfordſhire, lately extinct, and of Preſtbury, Maugerbury, and Odington, in Glouceſterſhire; from the latter of which, Edward, whom we are ſpeaking of, was deſcended (1).

(1) Wood, Ath. as above; and The Preſent State of England, by J. Chamberlayne, Eſq; P. i. B. iii. ch. iii. under the title Surnames.

George

George of Denmark (i). In the latter part of his life he lived at Chelſey near London; where he died in the year 1703. He was buried in a vault in the church-yard of that pariſh, where a monument was ſoon after erected to his memory [B]. He was a learned and ingenious man, and wrote ſeveral uſeful books [C]. His wife, mentioned above, died ſoon after him, on the 17th of December 1703, and was buried in the ſame vault with him (k). By her he had nine children.

(i) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra.

(k) From her epitaph.

[B] A monument was ſoon after erected to his memory.] On which the inſcription is as follows:

Poſteritati Sacrum.

More majorum, extra urbis pomoeriâ, juxta viam publicam, in Tumulo editiore, heic prope inhumari voluit Edwardus Chamberlayne, Anglus, Chriſticola, L. D. Ex antiqua Comitis Tanquervillæ proſapiâ Normanicâ oriundus, Odingtoniæ natus, 1616. Gloceſtriæ Grammaticâ, Oxonii Juriſprudentiâ, Londini Humanitate imbutus fuit. Per Galliam, Hiſpaniam, Italiam, Hungariam, Bohemiam, utramque Germaniam, Daniam, & Sueciam migravit. Suſannam Clifford equeſtri familiâ prognatam in matrimonium duxit 1658. Novem liberos genuit, ſex libros compoſuit: Tandem 1703 in terram oblivionis demigravit. Benefaciendi Univerſis, etiam & Poſteris, adeo ſtudioſus fuit, ut ſecum condi juſſerat (*) libros aliquot ſuos cera abſolutos, ſeræ forſan poſteritati aliquando profuturos. Abi Viator fac ſimile. Deus te ſervet incolumem. Hoc Monumentum, non impune temerandum, in honoris juxta ac moeroris teſtamentum (†), poni curavit Gualterus Harris, M. D. Amicus amico. What is hiſtorical in this epitaph is included in the text, and for that reaſon we have not thought neceſſary to tranſlate it. Only we ſhall take notice of one remarkable particular mentioned therein; namely, 'That he [Dr. Chamberlayne] was ſo 'very deſirous of doing good to all, and even to poſ-'terity, that he ordered ſome books of his own 'compoſition, covered over with wax, to be buried 'with him, which may poſſibly be of uſe to future 'ages (2).

(*) So 'tis in our copy inſtead of juſſerit.

(†) Forſan, teſtimonium.

(2) Monumenta Anglicana, by J. le Neve, from 1700 to 1715, 8vo. p. 65.

[C] And wrote ſeveral uſeful books.] Namely, theſe; I. 'The preſent War parallel'd; or, a brief Relation 'of the five Years Civil Wars of Henry III. King of 'England, with the Event and Iſſue of that unnatural War, and by what Courſe the Kingdom was 'then ſettled again; extracted out of the moſt authentick Hiſtorians and Records,' in five ſheets 4*to.* Lond. 1647. It was reprinted in the year 1660, under this title, 'The late War parallel'd; or, a 'brief Relation, &c. 8*vo.* II. England's Wants; 'or, ſeveral Propoſals probably beneficial for England, offered to the Conſideration of both Houſes of 'Parliament.' Lond. 1667, 4*to.* III. 'The converted Preſbyterian, or the Church of England juſtified in ſome Practices, &c.' Lond. 1668. IV. 'Angliæ Notitia; or, the preſent State of England, 'with divers Reflections upon the ancient State 'thereof.' Lond. 1668, 8*vo.* The ſecond part was publiſhed at London, 1671, &c. 8*vo.* And both together were ſeveral times reprinted during the author's life, with additions and amendments. It was tranſlated into Latin by Thomas Wood (3), and into French by ſome other hand. The author's ſon, John Chamberlayne, Eſq; continued it, and made very large additions and improvements thereto; ſo that it is the beſt book of the kind extant. The 36th edition was publiſhed many years ſince. One Guy Miege publiſhed another in imitation of it; but it is a very indifferent and faulty performance. V. 'An 'Academy or College, wherein young Ladies and 'Gentlewomen may, at a very moderate Expence, be 'educated in the true Proteſtant Religion, and in all 'virtuous Qualities that may adorn that Sex, &c.' Lond. 1671, 4*to.* two ſheets. VI. 'A Dialogue be-'tween an Engliſhman and a Dutchman, concerning 'the laſt Dutch War.' Lond. 1672, 4*to.* He alſo wrote ſome other things, to which he did not ſet his name. And tranſlated out of Italian, Spaniſh, and Portugueze, into Engliſh, 1. 'The Riſe and Fall 'of Count Olivares, the Favourite of Spain. 2. 'The unparallel'd Impoſture of Mich. de Molina, 'executed at Madrid, an. 1641. 3. The Right and 'Title of the preſent King of Portugal, Don John 'the Fourth.' Theſe three tranſlations were printed at London, 1653, 4*to* (4). M.

(3) See Wood, Athen. vol. ii. col. 995.

(4) Wood, Ath. as above, col. 1129.

CHAMBERLAYNE (JOHN) ſon of the former, was a learned and worthy perſon. He was admitted into Trinity-college in Oxford in 1685: but it doth not appear that he took any degree (a). He tranſlated I. from French and Spaniſh, 'The manner of 'making Tea, Coffee, and Chocolate.' London. 1685, 8*vo.* II. From Italian into Engliſh, 'A Treaſure of Health,' Lond. 1686, 8*vo*, written by Caſtor Durant de Gualdo, Phyſician and citizen of Rome (b). III. 'The Arguments of the Books and 'Chapters of the Old and New Teſtament, with practical Obſervations. Written originally in French, by the Reverend Mr. Oſtervald, Profeſſor of Divinity, and one of 'the Miniſters of the Church at Neutfchatel in Swiſſerland: And by him preſented to 'the Society for promoting Chriſtian Knowledge.' 3 Vols. 8*vo*, Lond. 1716, &c. Mr. Chamberlayne was a Member of that Society. IV. The Lives of the French Philoſophers [or Members of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris] tranſlated from the French of M. de Fontenelle. Republiſhed ſince, in 1721, under the title of Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences in Paris, epitomized, with the Lives of the late Members of that Society, 8*vo.* V. 'The Religious [or Chriſtian] Philoſopher: or, the right uſe 'of Contemplating the Works of the Creator, &c.' tranſlated from the original Dutch of Dr. Nieuwentyt, in 3 Vols. 8*vo*, adorned with cuts, Lond. 1718, &c. reprinted ſeveral times ſince in 8*vo*, and once in 4*to.* VI. 'The Hiſtory of the Reformation in and 'about the Low-Countries, tranſlated from the Low Dutch of Gerrard Brandt, in four 'Vols. fol. Lond. 1721, &c. VII. The Lord's Prayer in 100 Languages, 8*vo.* VIII. 'Diſſertations Hiſtorical, Critical, Theological, and Moral, on the moſt memorable 'Events of the Old and New Teſtaments: wherein the Spirit of the Sacred Writings 'is ſhewn, their Authority confirmed, and the Sentiments of the Primitive Fathers, as 'well as the modern Criticks, with regard to the difficult paſſages therein, conſidered 'and compared. Vol. I. Compriſing the Events related in the Books of Moſes. To 'which are added Chronological Tables, fixing the Date of each Event, and connecting 'the ſeveral Diſſertations together.' Fol. 1723. He likewiſe was Fellow of the Royal Society, and communicated three pieces, which are inſerted in The Philoſophical Tranſactions. One, concerning the Effects of Thunder and Lightning at Sampford-Courtney in (a) See Wood Faſti, vol. ii. and Catalogue of Graduates.

(b) Wood, Ath. as above.

in Devonshire, Octob. 7, 1711 (c). The second, is an account of the sunk-islands in the Humber, recovered from the sea (d). And the third, contains remarks on the Plague at Copenhagen in 1711 (e). It was said of him that he understood sixteen languages; but it is certain, that he was master of the Greek, Latin, French, High and Low Dutch, Portugueze, and Italian. Though he was well qualified for employment, he had none, but that of Gentleman-Usher to George Prince of Denmark. After a useful and well-spent life he died in the year 1724. He was a very pious and good man, and earnest in promoting the advancement of religion, and the interest of true Christianity: for which purpose, he kept a large correspondence abroad. M.

(c) No. 336, p. 528; and in Mr. Henry Jones's Abridgment, vol. iv. P. ii. p. 131.

(d) No. 361, p. 1114; and Abridgment, as above, p. 251.

(e) No. 337, p. 279; and Abridgment, as above, vol. v. P. i. p. 380.

 [CHAMBERS (Ephraim), Fellow of the Royal Society, and Author of the Scientific Dictionary which goes under his name, so well deserves, on that account, an honourable place in this work, that we are concerned at not having it in our power to give a more particular relation of his Life. He was born at Kendal, in the county of Westmoreland. His parents, who were Quakers, bred him up in the principles of their profession; to which, however, he shewed no attachment when he came into the world. His education, we suppose, was no other than that common one which is intended to qualify a youth for trade and commerce. When he became of a proper age, he was put apprentice to Mr. Senex the Globe-Maker, a business which is connected with Literature, and especially with Astronomy and Geography. It was during Mr. Chambers's residence with this skilful mechanic, that he contracted that taste for science and learning which accompanied him through life, and directed all his pursuits (a). It was even at this time that he formed the design of his grand work, the Cyclopædia; and some of the first articles of it were written behind the counter (b). Having conceived the idea of so great an undertaking, he justly concluded that the execution of it would not consist with the avocations of trade; and, therefore, he quitted Mr. Senex, and took Chambers at Gray's-Inn, where he chiefly resided during the rest of his days. The first edition of the Cyclopædia, which was the result of many years intense application, appeared in 1728, in two volumes, folio. It was published by subscription, the price being four guineas, and the list of subscribers was very respectable. The dedication, which was to the King, is dated on the fifteenth of October, 1727 (c). The reputation that Mr. Chambers acquired, by his execution of this undertaking, procured him the honour of being elected into the Royal Society, on the sixth of November, 1729. In less than ten years time, a second edition became necessary; which accordingly was printed, with corrections and additions, in 1738. It having been intended, at first, to give a new work, instead of a new edition, Mr. Chambers had prepared a considerable part of the copy with that view, and more than twenty sheets were actually printed off. The purpose of the proprietors, according to this plan, was to have published a volume in the winter of 1737, and to have proceeded annually in supplying an additional volume, till the whole was compleated. But from this design they were diverted, by the alarm they took at an act then agitated in parliament, in which a clause was contained, obliging the publishers of all improved editions of books to print the improvements separately. The bill, which carried in it the appearance of equity, but which, perhaps, might have created greater obstructions to the cause of literature than a transient view of it could suggest, passed the House of Commons, but was rejected in the House of Lords. In an advertisement, prefixed to the second edition of the Cyclopædia, Mr. Chambers endeavoured to obviate the complaints of such readers as might have been led to expect (from a paper of his published some time before) a new work, instead of a new edition (d). Whilst this edition was in agitation, Mr. Bowyer, the learned printer, had conceived some extensive ideas of improving the Dictionary; but the plan, whatever it was, doth not appear to have been reduced to practice. Mr. Clarke of Chichester, writing to his friend Bowyer upon the occasion, said, "your project of improving and correcting Chambers is a very good one; but alas! "who can execute it? You should have as many undertakers, as professions; nay, "perhaps, as many antiquaries, as there are different branches of ancient learning." Mr. Bowyer had, also, a dispute with Mr. Chambers concerning the title of the work. We shall give the former gentleman's account of it in his own words. "While the "second edition of Chambers's Cyclopædia, the pride of Booksellers, and the honour "of the English nation, was in the press, I went to the Author, and begged leave "to add a single syllable to his magnificent work; and that for Cyclopædia, he would "write Encyclopædia. To talk to the writer of a Dictionary, is like talking to the "writer of a Magazine: every thing adds to his parcel; and, instead of contributing "one syllable, I was the occasion of a considerable paragraph. I told him, that the "addition of the preposition En made the meaning of the word more precise; that "Cyclopædia might denote the instruction OF a circle, as Cyropædia is the instruction of "Cyrus; but that, if he wrote Encyclopædia, it determined it, to be from the dative of "Cyclus, instruction IN a circle. I urged, secondly, that Vossius had observed, in his "book "De Vitiis Sermonis," that Cyclopædia was used by some authors, but Ency-

(a) Nichols's Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, p. 557, 558.

(b) From information of Mr. Longman.

(c) Nichols, ubi supra.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Ibid.

" clopædia by the beſt. This deſerved ſome regard, and he paid it the beſt he could;
" he made an article of his title to juſtify it (e)." Though we may concur in opinion with Mr. Bowyer, it is but reaſonable to hear what Mr. Chambers, in his dictionary, under the word, Cyclopedia, hath alledged in his own defence. " CYCLOPÆDIA, from " κυκλος and παιδία, Inſtruction, the circle or compaſs of Arts and Sciences; more ordi" narily called Encyclopædia. The word Cyclopædia is not of claſſical authority, though " frequent enough among modern writers to have got into ſeveral of our dictionaries.
" Some have cenſured us for calling the preſent work by this name; not conſidering,
" that names and titles of books, engines, inſtruments, &c. are in a great meaſure ar" bitrary; and that authors make no ſcruple even of coining new words on ſuch occa-
" ſions, when there are no old ones to their mind. Thus it is Dr. Hook calls his " fine book of Microſcopical Obſervations, Micrographia; Wolfius his Book on the " Air, Aerometria; Drake his Book of Anatomy, Anthropologia, &c. all of them words
" of modern, if not of their own fabric: and on no better authority ſtand the names of " half our later inventions, as Microſcope, Teleſcope, Barometer, Thermometer, " Micrometer, &c. But it is ſuggeſted, the word Cyclopædia is ambiguous, and may " denote the Science of a Circle, as well as the Circle of Sciences: We anſwer, that as " cuſtom, the only ſovereign rule of language, has determined the word to the latter-
" ſenſe, it is no more chargeable with ambiguity than a thouſand other words of re" ceived uſe; no more, for inſtance, than Micrometer, which might either denote a " little meaſure, or a meaſure of little things." So favourable was the public reception of the ſecond edition of Chambers's Dictionary, that a third was called for in the very next year, 1739; a fourth two years afterwards, in 1741; and a fifth in 1746 (f). This rapid ſale of ſo large and expenſive a work, is not eaſily to be paralleled in the hiſtory of Literature: and muſt be conſidered, not only as a ſtriking teſtimony of the general eſtimation in which it is held, but, likewiſe, as a ſtrong proof of its real utility and merit.

(e) Nichols, ubi ſupra, p. 148, 149.

(f) Ibid. p. 558.

Although the Cyclopædia was the grand buſineſs of Mr. Chambers's Life, and may be regarded as almoſt the ſole foundation of his fame, his attention was not wholly confined to this undertaking. He was concerned in a periodical publication, entitled " The Literary Magazine," which was begun in 1735. In this work he wrote a variety of articles, and particularly, a review of Morgan's Moral Philoſopher. He was engaged, likewiſe, in conjunction with Mr. John Martyn, Fellow of the Royal Society, and Profeſſor of Botany at Cambridge, in preparing for the preſs a tranſlation and abridgment of the " Philoſophical Hiſtory and Memoirs of the Royal Academy of " Sciences at Paris; or an Abridgment of all the Papers relating to natural Philoſophy " which have been publiſhed by the members of that illuſtrious ſociety." This undertaking, when compleated, was comprized in five volumes octavo, which did not appear till the year 1742, ſome time after our author's deceaſe, when they were publiſhed in the joint names of Mr. Martyn and Mr. Chambers (g). Mr. Martyn, in a ſubſequent publication, hath paſſed a ſevere cenſure upon the ſhare which his fellow-labourer had in the abridgment of the Pariſian papers (h). The only work beſides, that we find aſcribed to Mr. Chambers, is a tranſlation of the " Jeſuit's Perſpective," from the French; which was printed in quarto, and hath gone through ſeveral editions (i). How indefatigable he was in his literary and ſcientific collections, is manifeſt from a circumſtance which uſed to be related by Mr. Airey, who was ſo well known to many perſons by the vivacity of his temper and converſation, and his bold avowal of the principles of infidelity. This gentleman, in the very early part of his life, was five years (from 1728 to 1733) amanuenſis to Mr. Chambers; and, during that time, copied nearly twenty folio volumes, ſo large as to comprehend materials, if they had been publiſhed, for printing thirty volumes in the ſame ſize. Mr. Chambers, however, acknowledged, that if they were printed, they would neither be ſold nor read (k). His cloſe and unremitting attention to his ſtudies at length impaired his health, and obliged him occaſionally to take a lodging at Cannonbury-Houſe near Iſlington. This not having greatly contributed to his recovery, he made an excurſion to the South of France, but did not reap that benefit from it, which he had himſelf hoped, and his friends wiſhed (l). Returning to England, he died at Cannonbury-Houſe, and was buried at Weſtminſter; where the following inſcription, written by himſelf, is placed on the North ſide of the Cloyſters of the Abbey:

(g) Ibid.

(h) Ibid.

(i) New and general Biograph. Dict. vol. iii. p. 152.

(k) Nichols's Biograph. Anecdotes, ubi ſupra.

(l) From Mr. Longman's Information.

Multis pervulgatus,
Paucis notus;
Qui vitam, inter lucem & umbram,
Nec eruditus, nec idiota,
Literis deditus, tranſegit; ſed ut homo
Qui humani nihil à ſe alienum putat.
Vita ſimul, & laboribus functus,
Hic requieſcere voluit,
Ephraim Chambers, R. S. S.
Obiit xv. Maii, M.DCC.XL (m)."

(m) Nichols, ubi ſupra. Popham's Elogia Sepulchralia, p. 48.

" Heard of by many,
Known to few;
Who being neither very celebrated nor yet obſcure,
Neither very learned nor yet ignorant,
Paſſed a life devoted to ſtudy;
And paſſed it as a man
Who was not inattentive
To any of the offices of humanity:
Having ended his days and his labours together,
Here wiſhed to repoſe,
EPHRAIM CHAMBERS, F. R. S.
He died on the xvth of May,
M.DCC.XL."

The intellectual character of Mr. Chambers was ſagacity and attention. His application was indefatigable, his temper chearful, but ſomewhat haſty and impetuous; and in his religious ſentiments he was no ſlave to the opinions commonly received. His mode of life was reſerved; for he kept little company, and had not many acquaintance. He deſerved, by his literary labours, much more than he acquired; the compenſations of bookſellers to authors being at that time far inferior to what, in certain inſtances, they have lately riſen. This deficiency he ſupplied by œconomy; and in pecuniary matters he was remarkably exact. In his laſt will, made not long before his death, but which was never proved, he declared that he owed no debts, excepting to his taylor for a rocquelaure (n).

(n) Nichols, ubi ſupra.

Such are the few particulars that we have been able to collect, with regard to the perſonal hiſtory of Mr. Chambers. But this article, incomplete as it is, would be ſtill more imperfect, if we did not add ſome farther circumſtances concerning the fate of the Cyclopædia, and the effects which it hath produced. We have already mentioned that it came to a fifth edition in the year 1746. After this, whilſt a ſixth edition was in agitation, the proprietors thought that the work might admit of a ſupplement, in two additional folio volumes. This buſineſs was conſigned to the late George Lewis Scott, Eſq; who, in many reſpects, was very equal to the undertaking. He was prevented, however, from doing any great matter in it, by being appointed ſub-preceptor to his preſent Majeſty, when Prince of Wales. The little that was executed by Mr. Scott was well performed, but it amounted only to a ſmall number of ſheets. As he was hindered from proſecuting the deſign, he committed the chief management of it to Dr. John Hill, ſo well known by his voluminous and haſty publications. Dr. Hill diſcharged the taſk aſſigned him with his uſual rapidity. In fact, he principally contented himſelf with tranſcribing largely, from his own botanical writings. The ſupplement, therefore, which was publiſhed in the joint names of Mr. Scott and Dr. Hill, though containing a number of valuable articles, was far from being uniformly conſpicuous for its exact judgment and due ſelection. Thus the matter reſted for ſome years, when it occurred to the bookſellers, that it might be advantageous to themſelves, and uſeful to the public, to combine the Supplement, when properly corrected and abridged, into one alphabet with the original work, and to introduce ſuch farther improvements and additions as the increaſe of knowledge in general, and of philoſophical knowledge in particular, had lately afforded. The deſign was judicious and laudable; but the proprietors were not happy in the choice of the gentleman to whom the completion of it was entruſted. This was Mr. Ruffhead, an able man in certain reſpects, and a man of undoubted application, but ſurely not the propereſt perſon for conducting a ſcientific dictionary. The whole, too, or, at leaſt, the moſt which he appears to have done, was his employing a literary aſſiſtant in tranſcribing, into an interleaved Cyclopædia, and inſerting in their due places, all thoſe parts of the Supplement which he intended to adopt. There was reaſon to fear that the work, under Mr. Ruffhead's conduct, would have been executed in too haſty and imperfect a manner, when he was cut off by death. Upon this event, the bookſellers had another gentleman recommended to them, of whom, without depretiating his general ingenuity, ability, and learning, it is no reflection to ſay, that he was not maſter of that accurate and extenſive philoſophical ſcience which is peculiarly neceſſary to ſuch an undertaking. Finding himſelf, therefore, embarraſſed in it, he gave up the deſign; and the proprietors, at length, committed it to Dr. Rees. This was a happy circumſtance both for themſelves and for the public at large. It would have been difficult to have found a ſingle perſon, that would have been more equal to the completing of the Cyclopædia than Dr. Rees; who, to a capacious mind, a large compaſs of general knowledge, and an unremitting application, unites that intimate acquaintance with all the branches of mathematics and philoſophy, without which the other qualifications would be ineffectual. The ſucceſs of the work thus improved, and digeſted into one alphabet, and which is intended to be comprized in four volumes folio, hath exceeded the moſt ſanguine expectations. This laſt and beſt edition of the Cyclopædia began to be publiſhed in weekly numbers in 1778, and at the time of writing this article, the third volume was finiſhed. The ſale is at the rate of four or five thouſand numbers in a week, and the demand is continually increaſing. The names, therefore, of Chambers and Rees will be handed down with great reputation to poſterity, the firſt as the original author, and the ſecond as the completer of ſo grand an undertaking.

The Cyclopædia is not abſolutely the firſt ſcientific dictionary which hath appeared in this country. It was preceded by Harris's Lexicon Technicum, the third edition of which was publiſhed in 1735. It has great merit in the mathematical articles, and Chambers was under obligations to it in this reſpect. Harris's deſign, however, was not ſo comprehenſive as that of Mr. Chambers; ſo that the latter gentleman may, perhaps, be conſidered as the firſt perſon who had the ability to form the plan, and attempt the execution, of a complete circle of the Arts and Sciences.

As the Cyclopædia is ſo popular a work, and has been ſo rapid and extenſive in its ſale, it is not ſurprizing that it hath given riſe to various publications of a ſimilar nature. The moſt conſiderable of theſe, in our own country, are "De Coetlogon's Hiſtory of "Arts and Sciences," in two volumes, folio, 1745; "Barrow's new and univerſal "Dictionary of Arts and Sciences," in two volumes, folio, 1751; "The Complete "Dictionary of Arts and Sciences," by Temple Croker and others, in three volumes, folio, 1763; and the "Encyclopædia Britannica," in three volumes, quarto; printed at Edinburgh, in 1773. Works of the ſame kind have, likewiſe, appeared on a ſmaller ſcale; and particularly, "A new and complete Dictionary of Arts and Sciences," in four large volumes, octavo, in 1763. As to certain publications by the moſt contemptible bookſellers and compilers, it will not be expected that we ſhould condeſcend to mention them in this place. What is the particular merit of the ſeveral ſcientific dictionaries we have enumerated, it is not in our power to ſay. It will ſcarcely be ſuppoſed that the writer of this article has entered into ſo nice and critical an examination of them, as to be able to appretiate with accuracy their reſpective excellencies and defects. One thing may ſafely be aſſerted, which is, that, whatever be their value, they have in no degree contributed to hinder the ſucceſs, or obſcure the glory of the Cyclopædia.

But it is abroad that the ſpirit of forming univerſal dictionaries of art and ſcience, derived from the example of Chambers, hath been carried the fartheſt, and conducted on the wideſt plan. The Encyclopédie of Paris is a prodigious undertaking, and reflects great honour on the country which gave it birth. The moſt able men in France have been engaged in it, and it hath extended to twenty-one folio volumes, not including the volumes containing the plates only. The third edition, in thirty-ſix volumes, quarto, excluſively of three volumes of plates, was publiſhed at Geneva, in 1778 and 1779, under the following title: "Encyclopédie, ou Dictionnaire Raiſonné des Sciences, des Arts, "& des Métiers. Par une Société de Gens de Lettres. Mis en ordre & publié par "M. Diderot; & quant à la partiè Mathematique, par M. D'Alembert." Though it would not be eaſy to give the due and full praiſes to this noble work, it may, at the ſame time, be obſerved, that it is not every where executed in an equal manner. Whilſt many of the articles are admirable, others are but indifferent; and the fault of a conſiderable number of them is, that they are too diffuſe. A ſcientific dictionary ought not, in our opinion, to be a collection of treatiſes; and, therefore, we cannot help preferring a conciſer plan than what hath been adopted by the French writers, provided that in ſuch a plan nothing very material be omitted. As we have thus ventured to ſuggeſt that there are ſome imperfections in the "Encyclopédie," juſtice and candour require us to inſert the cenſures which the editors of that work have paſſed upon Chambers; and the rather, as their very cenſures are mixed with high encomiums. In their "Diſcours Prelimi-"naire," they expreſs themſelves in the following manner: 'Chambers's Dictionary of 'Arts and Sciences, of which ſo great a number of rapid editions have been publiſhed 'at London, which has been lately tranſlated into Italian, and which we acknowledge 'to have merited, both in England, and in other countries, the honours that it hath 'received, would, perhaps, never have been produced at all, if, before it appeared in 'Engliſh, we had not had in our tongue thoſe works, from which Chambers has drawn, 'without meaſure, and without ſelection, the greateſt part of the articles of which his 'dictionary is compoſed. This being the caſe, what muſt Frenchmen think of a mere 'tranſlation of that work? It muſt excite the indignation of the learned, and give juſt 'offence to the public, to whom, under a new and pompous title, nothing is preſented 'but riches of which they have a long time been in poſſeſſion.

'But we will not refuſe to this author the juſtice that is his due. He well knew the 'merit of the encyclopedic order, or of the chain by which we may deſcend, without 'interruption, from the firſt principles of a ſcience, or of an art, to its moſt remote conſequences; and of aſcending, from its moſt remote conſequences, to its firſt principles; of paſſing imperceptibly from one art or ſcience to another; and how to make, 'without wandering, if the expreſſion may be admitted, the tour of the literary world. 'We agree with him, that the plan and the deſign of his dictionary are excellent, and

'that

'that if it were executed to a certain degree of perfection, it would alone contribute 'more to the progreſs of true ſcience, than one half of the books that are known. 'But notwithſtanding the obligations that we have to this author, and the conſiderable 'benefit that we have received from his labours, we cannot avoid ſeeing that there re- 'mains much to be added. Indeed, is it poſſible to conceive, that all which relates to 'the ſciences and to the arts can be comprized in two volumes in folio? The very 'nomenclature of them would furniſh matter enough for one volume, if it were complete. 'How many articles then muſt there be either omitted, or defective in his work?

'Theſe are not mere conjectures. The whole tranſlation of Chambers has paſſed under 'our review; and we have found a prodigious multitude of things wanting in the ſci- 'ences, and in the liberal arts; a word where pages were requiſite; and every thing to 'ſupply in the mechanic arts. Chambers had read books; but he had ſeen little of 'artiſts; and there are many things which are to be learned only in work-ſhops. Beſides, 'it is not the ſame with omiſſions here as in another work. An article omitted in a 'common dictionary renders it only imperfect. In an Encyclopedie, it breaks the 'chain, injures the form of it, and is prejudicial to its main deſign: and this is a ſpecies 'of defect which all the art of Ephraim Chambers has not been able to diſguiſe or to 'conceal (o)."

(o) Diſcours Preliminaire, p. lxiii, lxiv.

There is, we apprehend, no ſmall degree of national vanity in what is aſſerted above, that the greateſt part of the Cyclopædia is compoſed from French authors, and that there is nothing preſented in it but riches of which that country had a long time been in poſſeſſion. When Mr. Chambers engaged in his grand undertaking, he would, without doubt, look around him for all the aid he could find, whether foreign or domeſtic, and he was peculiarly indebted to Wolfius; but that he was not as much obliged to the excellent writers of his own native land, as he was to thoſe of France, will, by Engliſhmen at leaſt, be little queſtioned. As to the imperfections which are pointed out in the Cyclopædia, they are, in a great meaſure, removed by the ſubſequent improvements; and the work is no longer to be conſidered as the production of a ſingle perſon. However, that any ſcientific dictionary, comprized in four volumes, ſhould come up to the full ſtandard of human wiſhes, and of the human imagination, is not to be expected.

Since the firſt appearance of the Paris Encyclopédie, another, containing an Abridgment of the former in ſome reſpects, and a correction and improvement of it in others, was begun at Yverdon in 1770, and finiſhed in 1775, comprehending forty-two volumes, quarto, beſides the volumes of plates. A ſupplement to this work, in ſix volumes, quarto, was printed at the ſame place, in 1776. There are, likewiſe, very great amendments in the Geneva edition of the Encyclopédie, mentioned above. So ardent are the French in matters of this kind, that a new plan hath lately been formed by the literati of that country. It is propoſed to digeſt and methodize the Encyclopédie into twenty-ſeven regular claſſical dictionaries; and this is to be done by men of the firſt reputation in every branch of learning, and with conſiderable alterations and additions. There will be two editions of this work, one in quarto, and the other in octavo; but the plates, the number of which will be ſomewhat reduced, will be given only in quarto. For the whole ſubſcript on, which is to be paid by inſtallments, and will amount to twenty-eight, or, at moſt, to thirty guineas, there will be delivered thirty-five volumes in quarto, or double the number in octavo, together with fourteen quarto volumes of plates. A ſhort ſketch of what is propoſed to be done, and of the authors engaged in the deſign, ſhall be inſerted below [A], from the "New Review" of our ingenious and learned friend Mr. Maty.

Though

[A] A ſhort ſketch, &c. ſhall be inſerted below.] "1. Mathematics and Aſtronomy, 2 vols. 4to. or 4 vols. 8vo. by l'Abbé Roſſi and Mr. de Lalande, both of the Academy of Sciences.

"The elementary parts of the firſt almoſt entirely new, and many new articles in the higher mathematics by Mr. d'Alembert and the Marquis Condorcet.

"2. Phyſics, properly ſo called. Mr. de Monge, A. S. 1 vol. 4to.

"The articles, Fire, Flame, Heat, Cold, Elaſtic Fluids, Thermometer, &c. Water, Ice, Congelation, Ebullition, Evaporation, Smoke, Fire Engine, Watery Meteors, Rain, Fog, Snow, &c. entirely new, many other improvements, and a preliminary hiſtory of the ſcience, with a notitia of the order in which the ſeveral articles are to be read.

"3. Phyſick, Medicine. Mr. Vicq d'Azyr, A. S. Secretary to the Medical Society, and others; 2 or 3 vols. 4to.

"Great additions and alterations, particularly in the articles relative to the diſeaſes of priſons and camps; thoſe incidental to particular profeſſions; and, in particular ſeaſons of the year, the maladies of animals, and of vitiated corn; all which will be treated by perſons who have made theſe branches their particular ſtudy.

"4. Anatomy and Phiſiology, common and comparative, and animal chemiſtry, compriſing likewiſe the œconomy of vegetables. Vicq d'Azyr, 1 vol. 4to.

"All the articles on comparative anatomy, on that of plants, on the ſtructure of vegetables and animal chemiſtry, entirely new. Several of them by Mr. d'Aubenton.

"5. Surgery. Mr. Louis, Sec. to the Acad. of Surgery, 1 vol. 4to.

"The whole entirely new, elementary, preciſe, and ſolid, with an introductory diſcourſe on the ſtudy of the art, and the order in which the articles are to be read.

"6. Chemiſtry, Metallurgy, and Pharmacy. Mr. Morveau, of many Academies, Chemiſtry. Duhamel, Inſpector General of Mines, the Metallurgy; and Maret, Sec. Acad. Dijon, Pharmacy. 2 vols. 4to.

"Great variety of new articles, particularly on the principles of Chemiſtry, which will be attempted to be aſcertained and brought to a ſcience from Bergman and others; with a direction of reading, and an introductory diſcourſe.

"7. Agri-

Though we entertain a high opinion of the general utility and importance of ſcientific dictionaries, we are far from thinking that they ought to be reſted in as the only reſources of knowledge. Of this there is ſome danger, when they are rendered ſo large as to cauſe them to be regarded as containing complete bodies of every department of ſcience. Thoſe perſons, however, would be much to blame who ſhould entirely repoſe in them as ſuch. A divine, for inſtance, would act ſtrangely, who, in the newly projected Encyclopédie, ſhould look no farther for information in theology, than to the volume which is to be given by the Abbe Bergier; or the moraliſt who ſhould remain entirely ſatisfied with what is to be offered on metaphyſics, logic, and ethics, by Monſ. Gueneau de Montbeillard. The ſame remark may be made concerning the other ſubjects propoſed to be diſcuſſed. Profeſſional men, at leaſt, muſt go much farther than any dictionaries, however large, however excellent, can poſſibly conduct them. Profeſſional men, and thoſe who deſire to be perfect maſters of any particular ſcience, muſt

" 7. Agriculture, properly ſo called, by l'Abbé Teſſier, M. D. of the Medical Society; Gardening by Mr. Thouin, chief gardener at the Royal Botanic garden; and the Sylva by Mr. Fougeroux de Bondaroy, A. S.

" Very ſuperficially done in the old Encyclopædia. The whole, therefore, to be almoſt entirely new, with an introductory diſſertation on each branch, and a tree of our knowledge on the ſubject.

" 8. Natural Hiſtory of Animals. An introduction to the three kingdoms, and a natural hiſtory of man by Mr. Daubenton. The remainder to be divided into ſix parts. The Quadrupeds and Cetaceous Animals from Mr. Buffon's Natural Hiſtory, with alterations and additions. The Birds by Mr. Mauduit of the Acad. Med. Oviparous Quadrupeds and Serpents, Mr. Daubenton. Fiſhes by the ſame. Inſects by Mr. Montbeillard of the Acad. of Dijon; and Worms by Mr. Daubenton, 3 vols. 4to.

" The ſyſtem, with regard to the birds, to be Mr. Buffon's, the Nomenclature Buffon's, the Synonyms from Briſſon, Edwards, Belon, and Cateſby only, the matter of this and the other articles entirely new, and very varied and extenſive.

" 9. Botany. Chev. de la Marck, Acad. Sec. 2 vols. 4to.

" A great deal new, as half the vegetables are not to be found in the old Encyclopoedia, and an introductory diſcourſe on the riſe, progreſs, and preſent ſtate of the ſcience.

" 10. Minerals. Mr. Daubenton.

" An introductory diſcourſe, and an account of the order in which the articles are to be read, with numerous other technical improvements, and a moſt extenſive ſylva of articles.

" 11. Natural Hiſtory of the Earth by Mr. Deſmareſt, Acad. Sci. and Inſpector of the Royal Manufactures in Chanpaine; 5 or 6 vols. 4to.

" According to the plan laid down under the word Geographie-Phyſique in the old Encyclopoedia, with a very extenſive introductory diſcourſe.

" 12. Geography. Modern, Mr. Robert, Geographer to the King, and Mr. Morvilliers. Ancient, by Mr. Mentelle, late profeſſor at the Ecole Militaire, &c. &c. Maps and Charts, Mr. Bonne, Ingenieur-Hydrographe of the Marine, 2 vols. 4to.

" Almoſt entirely new; the old one, ſeveral parts excepted, being extremely deficient. The Atlas, of about 50 or 60 maps, quarto, to make part of the ſubſcription, or not, as gentlemen ſhall chooſe.

" 13. Antiquities, Inſcriptions, Chronology, the art of aſcertaining dates, Numiſmatica, or the ſcience of Medals, Mr. Cour de Gebelin, 1 vol. 4to.

" Almoſt entirely new, as ſeveral of theſe articles are not mentioned in the old book.

" 14. Hiſtory. Mr. Gaillard, of the French and Inſc. Acad. 2 vols. 4to.

" Had no buſineſs in the plan; but as it has once been introduced, ſhall be a dictionary both of things and perſons, the titles as well ſelected as attention can make them.

" 15. Theology. L'Abbé Bergier, Confeſſor to Monſieur and Can. Notre-Dame.

" In great meaſure new of courſe. A plan or proſpectus of the Nomenclature, according to the order of ideas.

" 16. Ancient and Modern Philoſophy, by Mr. Naigeon, 2 vols 4to.

" Mr. Diderot's articles to be left with all their virgin beauties, but very great improvements promiſed with regard to all the reſt.

" 17. Metaphyſics, Logic, and Ethics. Mr. Gueneau de Montbeillard, 1 vol. 4to.

" Some additions, but more parings.

" 18. Grammar and Belles-Lettres. By a ſociety of men of letters, at the head of whom are Meſſrs. Marmontel and Beauzeé, of the French Academy.

" A great deal of new, and great improvements from Marmontel and Voltaire.

" 19. Juriſprudence. Compiled by L'Abbé Remi, Counſellor at Law, from the works of a Society, 3 vols. 4to.

" Much new matter, an order of reading, and a catalogue of the beſt books and beſt editions.

" 20. Finances. Mr. Digeon, Director of the Royal Farms, 1 vol. 4to.

" Almoſt entirely new, treating the object with regard to every part of Europe, and ſome articles apparently written by a perſon who has had peculiar opportunities of being well informed.

" 21. Political Oeconomy. L'Abbé Baudeau, 1 vol. 4to.

" Entirely new, as it made no part of the original plan.

" 22. Naval Dictionary. Mr. Vial de Clair-Bois, Ingenieur-Conſtructeur de la Marine, and of the Royal Naval Academy; and Mr. Blondeau, Profeſſor of Mathematics and Hydrography at the Maritime Academy, of the Royal Academy, &c. &c.

" Almoſt entirely new.

" 23. Military Dictionary. The ordnance part by Mr. Pommereuil, Captain of Artillery; the reſt by Major Keralio, of the Academy of Inſcriptions, 2 vols. 4to.

" Will probably be moſt capitally done, as it is to be little more but extracts from the beſt approved writers, extraordinary well put together, with a liſt of the beſt words, and a notitia of the order in which the articles are to be read.

" 25. The fine Arts, Painting, Sculpture, Engraving, Architecture, Muſic and Dancing. By L'Abbé Arnaud, of the French and Inſc. Mr. Suard, of the French Acad. with the aſſiſtance of Mr. Watelet and others.

" Muſic excepted, the worſt part of the old book. All the old writers to be conſulted, and conſiderable aſſiſtance from different profeſſors to be expected.

" 26. Arts Mechanical, and Trades. By a Society, 4 vols. 4to.

" Above 300 admirably deſcribed by Mr. Diderot in the old book, but too much ſubdiviſion; no proper analogy between the text and the plates, and ſome omiſſions of a graver kind. Theſe to be remedied by Mr. Roland de la Platriere, Inſpector General of the Manufactures in Picardy, who has promiſed a great number of new articles, compiled from his own obſervation; and Mr. Peryer, who is to give the theory of fire-engines, &c. &c.

" 27. Univerſal Index, 1 vol. 4to. Will contain a moſt accurate hiſtory of the accidents and fortunes of the Encyclopedia, from its firſt conception, with all the Prolegomena, and a copious Index, both of the articles and the capital words in them. This will be the firſt volume publiſhed (1)."

(1) Maty's new Review for May, p. 327—331.

ſtudy the object of their purſuit in detail, and not in a compendium. If, then, it be aſked, what is the uſe of ſuch works as the Cyclopædia, it may be anſwered, in the firſt place, that they communicate a general knowledge of things to large multitudes who would otherwiſe be wholly deſtitute of it, and are books ready to be conſulted on every occaſion of enquiry; ſecondly, that they convey information to the moſt learned, in matters which are remote from their peculiar inveſtigation; and thirdly, that they are of advantage to ſcientific perſons, even in their proper walk, by refreſhing their memories with judicious ſummaries of what they already know, and by pointing out to them ſubjects of future conſideration. In ſhort, they are uſeful to vaſt numbers of men, in various ſituations of life, and in a thouſand different ways which it would not be eaſy to ſpecify. We cannot, therefore, but rejoice in having been born in a period that is ſenſible of their importance, and in which they have been carried to ſo great a degree of perfection.] K.

 [CHANDLER (SAMUEL), a diſſenting miniſter of great learning and eminence, was born at Hungerford, in Berkſhire, in the year 1693 (a). His father, Mr. Henry Chandler [A], was then paſtor of a congregation of Proteſtant diſſenters at that place. He early diſcovered a genius for literature, which was carefully cultivated; and being placed under proper maſters, he made a very uncommon progreſs in claſſical learning, and eſpecially in the Greek tongue (b). As it was intended by his friends to bring him up for the miniſtry, he was ſent to an academy at Bridgewater, under the care of the Rev. Mr. Moore: but he was ſoon removed from thence to Glouceſter, that he might become a pupil to Mr. Samuel Jones, a diſſenting miniſter of great erudition and abilities, who had opened an academy in that city. This academy was ſoon transferred to Tewkſbury, at which place Mr. Jones preſided over it for many years with very high and deſerved reputation. Such was the attention of that gentleman to the morals of his pupils, and to their progreſs in literature, and ſuch the ſkill and diſcernment with which he directed their ſtudies, that it was a ſingular advantage to be placed under ſo able and accompliſhed a tutor. Mr. Chandler made the proper uſe of ſo happy a ſituation; applying himſelf to his ſtudies with great aſſiduity, and particularly to critical, biblical, and oriental learning. Among the pupils of Mr. Jones were Mr. Joſeph Butler, afterwards biſhop of Durham, and Thomas Secker, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury. With theſe eminent perſons he contracted a friendſhip that continued to the end of their lives, notwithſtanding the different views by which their conduct was afterwards directed, and the different ſituations in which they were placed.

(a) Dr. Amory's Preface to Dr. Chandler's Sermons, p. vii.

(b) Amory, ubi ſupra.

Mr. Chandler, having finiſhed his academical ſtudies, began to preach about July, 1714; and being ſoon diſtinguiſhed by his talents in the pulpit, he was choſen, in 1716, miniſter of the Preſbyterian congregation at Peckham, near London, in which ſtation he continued ſome years (c). Here he entered into the matrimonial ſtate, and began to have an increaſing family, when, by the fatal South-ſea ſcheme of 1720, he unfortunately loſt the whole fortune which he had received with his wife. His circumſtances being thereby embarraſſed, and his income as a miniſter being inadequate to his expences, he engaged in the trade of a bookſeller, and kept a ſhop in the Poultry, London, for about two or three years, ſtill continuing to diſcharge the duties of the paſtoral office. It may not be improper to obſerve, that in the earlier part of his life, Mr. Chandler was ſubject to frequent and dangerous fevers; one of which confined him more than three months, and threatened by its effects to diſable him for public ſervice. He was, therefore, adviſed to confine himſelf to a vegetable diet, which he accordingly did, and adhered to it for twelve years. This produced ſo happy an alteration in his conſtitution, that though he afterwards returned to the uſual way of living, he enjoyed an uncommon ſhare of ſpirits and vigour till ſeventy (d).

(c) Amory, ubi ſupra.

(d) Amory, ubi ſupra, p. 10.

While Mr. Chandler was miniſter of the congregation at Peckham, ſome gentlemen, of the ſeveral denominations of Diſſenters in the city, came to a reſolution to ſet up and ſupport a weekly evening lecture at the Old Jewry, for the winter half year. The ſubjects to be treated in this lecture were the evidences of natural and revealed religion, and anſwers to the principal objections againſt them. Two of the moſt eminent young miniſters among the Diſſenters were appointed for the execution of this deſign, of which Mr. Chandler was one, and Mr. afterwards Dr. Lardner, who is ſo juſtly celebrated for his learned writings, was another (e). But after ſome time this lecture was dropped, and another of the ſame kind ſet up, to be preached by one perſon only;

(e) Amory, ubi ſupra.

[A] His father, Mr. Henry Chandler.] Dr. Amory obſerves, that 'Mr. Henry Chandler was a diſſenting 'miniſter of conſiderable worth and abilities, who 'ſpent the greater part of his miniſterial life at Bath, 'where he maintained an honourable name.' The ſame writer remarks, that 'Dr. Chandler was de-'ſcended from anceſtors heartily engaged in the cauſe 'of non-conformity, and ſufferers for the liberty of 'conſcience. His grandfather Chandler, a tradeſ-'man at Taunton in Somerſet, was much injured in 'his fortune by the perſecutions under Charles II. 'but bore chearfully the ſpoiling of his goods, that he 'might preſerve his peace of mind, and his title to 'the better and more enduring ſubſtance in Heaven 'inviolate (1).'

(1) Preface to Dr. Chandler's Sermons, p. vii.

5

only; it being judged that it might be thereby conducted with more consistency of reasoning, and uniformity of design: and Mr. Chandler was appointed for this service(f). In the course of this lecture, he preached some sermons on the confirmation which miracles gave to the divine mission of Christ, and the truth of his religion; and vindicated the argument against the objections of Collins, in his "Discourse of the Grounds "and Reasons of the Christian Religion." These sermons, by the advice of a friend, he enlarged and threw into the form of a continued treatise, and published, in 8vo, in 1725, under the following title: "A Vindication of the Christian Religion, in two parts: "I. A Discourse of the Nature and Use of Miracles. II. An Answer to a late Book, "entitled, A Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion [B]." Having presented a copy of this book to Archbishop Wake, his Grace expressed his sense of the value of the favour in the following letter, which is too honourable a testimony to Mr. Chandler's merit to be omitted. It appears, from the letter, that the Archbishop did not then know that the author was any other than a Bookseller.

(f) Id. ibid.

"SIR,

"Though I have been hindered by business, and company extraordinary, the last week, from finishing your good book, yet I am come so near the end of it, that I may venture to pass my judgment upon it, that it is a very good one, and such as I hope will be of service to the end for which you designed it.

"I think you have set the notion of a Miracle upon a clear and sure foundation; and by the true distinction of our blessed Saviour, in considering him as a Prophet sent from God, and as the Messiah promised to the Jews, have effectually proved him, by his doctrine and miracles, to be the one, and by his accomplishment of the prophecies of the Old Testament, to be the other.

"I cannot but own myself to be surprized, to see so much good learning and just reasoning in a person of your profession; and do think it pity you should not rather spend your time in writing books, than in selling them. But I am glad, since your circumstances oblige you to the latter, yet you do not wholly omit the former. As we are all, who call ourselves Christians, obliged to you for this performance, in defence of our holy religion, so I must, in particular, return you my thanks for the benefit I have received by it; and own to you that I have, as to myself, been not only usefully entertained, but edified by it. I hope you will receive your reward from God for it. It is the hearty wish of,

Sir, your obliged friend,

Lambeth-House, Feb. 14, 1725.

WILLIAM CANT."

Besides gaining the Archbishop's approbation, Mr. Chandler's performance considerably advanced his reputation in general, and contributed to his receiving an invitation, about the year 1726, to settle as a Minister with the congregation in the Old Jewry, which was one of the most respectable in London. Here he continued, first as assistant, and afterwards as pastor, for the space of forty years, and discharged the duties of the ministerial

[B] A vindication of the Christian religion, &c.] Dr. Leland observes, that in this work our author 'clearly vindicates the miracles of our Saviour, and 'shews, that, as they were circumstanced, they were 'convincing proofs of his divine mission (2).' But though Mr. Chandler refuted the arguments of Collins against Christianity, he was not unwilling to do justice to his merit, and therefore candidly said, in the preface to his own book, 'The preface to the Discourse 'of the Grounds and Reasons is, in my judgment, an 'excellent defence of the liberty of every one's judging for himself, and of proposing his opinions to 'others, and of defending them with the best reasons 'he can, which every one hath a right to, as a man 'and a Christian (3).' Our author also zealously opposed any interference of the civil magistrate in the defence of Christianity: 'Though the magistrate's 'sword,' says he, 'may very fitly be employed to 'prevent libertinism, or the breach of the public 'peace by men's vices, yet the progress of infidelity 'must be controuled another way, viz. by convincing men's consciences of the truth of Christianity, 'and fairly answering their objections against it. 'Tis not surprizing, that men, who take their religion upon trust, and who therefore can know but 'little of the intrinsic worth of Christianity, or of 'that strong evidence that there is to support it, 'should be in pain for it, when they find it attacked 'by any new objections, or old ones placed in a somewhat different view from what they were before; 'or that they should call out aloud to the magistrate 'to prevent the making them, because they know 'not how otherwise to answer them. But that men 'of learning and great abilities, whose proper office 'it is to defend Christianity, by giving the reasons 'for their faith, and who seem to have both ability 'and leisure thus to stand up in the behalf of it, 'should make their appeal to the civil power, and 'become humble suitors to the magistrate to controul 'the spirit of infidelity, is strangely surprizing. It 'looks as if they suspected the strength of Christianity; otherwise, one would think they would not 'invite such strange and foreign aids to their assistance, when they could have more friendly ones 'nearer at home, that would much more effectually 'support and protect it; or at least, as though they 'had some other interest to maintain than the cause 'of common Christianity; though at the same time 'they would willingly be thought to have nothing 'else in view, but the service and honour of it. If 'the scheme of our modern Deists be founded in 'truth, I cannot help wishing it all good success; 'and it would be a crime in the civil magistrate, by 'any methods of violence, to prevent the progress 'of it: but if, as I believe, Christianity is the cause 'of God, it will prevail by its own native excellence, and of consequence needs not the assistance of 'the civil power (4).' A second edition of this work was published in 1728.

(2) View of the Deistical Writers, vol. i. p. 95. edit. 1766.

(3) Preface to the Vindication of the Christian Religion, p. ix.

(4) Pref. p. xii, xiii, xiv.

niſterial office with great aſſiduity and ability, being much eſteemed and regarded by his own congregation, and acquiring a diſtinguiſhed reputation both as a preacher and a writer.

In 1727, Mr. Chandler publiſhed "Reflections on the Conduct of the modern Deiſts, in their late Writings againſt Chriſtianity: occaſioned chiefly by two Books, entitled, A Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons, &c. and the Scheme of literal Prophecy conſidered: with a Preface, containing ſome Remarks on Dr. Rogers's Preface to his eight Sermons." In this performance he expoſed the unfair methods that were employed by the enemies of Chriſtianity in their attack of it, and the diſingenuity of their reaſoning; and in his preface, he combated ſome ſentiments which had been advanced by Dr. Rogers, Canon Reſidentiary of Wells, and Chaplain to the Prince of Wales, to the prejudice of free inquiry, and the right of private judgment [C]. The following year he publiſhed, "A Vindication of the Antiquity and Authority of Daniel's Prophecies, and their Application to Jeſus Chriſt; in Anſwer to the Objections of the Author of the Scheme of literal Prophecy conſidered [D]."

Mr. Chandler had a ſtrong conviction of the pernicious nature, and dangerous tendency, of the Romiſh religion, and was deſirous of expoſing the perſecuting ſpirit by which that church has been ſo much characterized: and it was with this view that he publiſhed, in 1731, in two volumes, 4to, a tranſlation of "The Hiſtory of the Inquiſition, by Philip à Limborch:" to which he prefixed, "A large Introduction, concerning the Riſe and Progreſs of Perſecution, and the real and pretended Cauſes of it [E]." This piece was written with great learning and acuteneſs, but was attacked

[C] To the prejudice of free inquiry, and the right of private judgment.] Mr. Chandler, who conſidered what had been advanced by Dr. Rogers, 'in favour 'of church power and authority, as ſtrongly favouring of the ſpirit of perſecution, could not refrain 'from examining the Doctor's ſcheme, which was to 'blend religion and politics together, or to make 'religion not a perſonal but a ſtate matter. Accordingly he has offered ſome very ſpirited and judicious remarks on this ſubject, with a deſign to 'ſhew, that religion, as it implies a belief of certain principles, and a peculiar method of worſhipping God, ſaid to be contained in revelation, is a 'purely perſonal matter; and that every man ought 'to be perſuaded, in his own mind, of the nature of 'its proofs, and doctrines, and principles, and to 'diſſent from the public eſtabliſhment, if he finds 'it erroneous in any, or every, article of its belief; 'ſince no man is to be ſaved or damned hereafter, 'for the faith or practice of his ſuperiors in church 'or ſtate, and becauſe neither nature nor revelation 'hath given them, nor can give them, a right or 'power to judge or believe for others (6).'

(6) Britiſh Biography, vol. x. p. 163.

[D] In anſwer to the objections of the author of the ſcheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered.] 'Among other 'prophecies of the Old Teſtament, which the author 'of the Literal Scheme would not allow to have any 'literal reference to the Meſſiah, he reckoned thoſe 'of Daniel; and to make out this the more clearly, 'he began with endeavouring to prove, that they 'are no prophecies at all; that the book of Daniel 'was not written by the famous Daniel mentioned by 'Ezekiel; and that it contains a manifeſt reference 'to, or rather, an hiſtory of, things done ſeveral 'hundred years after that Daniel's time. This attempt to depreciate the authority and antiquity of 'a book, which our author eſteemed a noble teſtimony to the truth of Chriſtianity, induced him to 'try whether the Literal Schematiſt's criticiſms were 'juſt, and his arguments concluſive; with which 'view he enters into a particular examination of the 'Eleven Objections, wherein Mr. Collins had comprized what he had to urge againſt the book; and, 'upon the whole, he concludes, that theſe objections are of no weight, and therefore do not deſerve any regard from the thinking and impartial 'part of mankind. He then produces ſome diſtinct 'arguments to prove the proper antiquity of Daniel's book; and having ſo far eſtabliſhed its authority, he proceeds to the conſideration of the 'ſeveral prophecies contained in it, in order to obviate the exceptions of Mr. Collins againſt the 'Chriſtian interpretation of them, and at the ſame 'time to ſhew, that the explications which this 'writer would ſubſtitute in their ſtead, are founded on 'palpable miſtakes, and conſequently falſe; all which 'he has executed with great learning and acuteneſs (7).'

(7) Britiſh Biography, ubi ſupra, p. 164.

[E] Introduction concerning the riſe and progreſs of Perſecution, &c.] In this introduction Mr. Chandler ſays, 'I will not deny, but that the appointing perſons, whoſe peculiar office it ſhould be to miniſter 'in the external ſervices of public and ſocial worſhip, 'is, when under proper regulations, of advantage 'to the decency and order of divine ſervice. But 'then I think it of the moſt pernicious conſequence 'to the liberties of mankind, and abſolutely inconſiſtent with the true proſperity of a nation, as 'well as with the intereſt and ſucceſs of rational religion, to ſuffer ſuch miniſters to become the directors-general of the conſciences and faith of 'others, or publickly to aſſume, and exerciſe ſuch a 'power, as ſhall oblige others to ſubmit to their determinations, without being convinced of their 'being wiſe and reaſonable, and never to diſpute 'their ſpiritual decrees. The very claim of ſuch a 'power is the higheſt inſolence, and an affront to the 'common ſenſe and reaſon of mankind; and wherever it is uſurped and allowed, the moſt abject 'ſlavery both of ſoul and body is almoſt the unavoidable conſequence. For by ſuch a ſubmiſſion to 'ſpiritual power, the mind and conſcience is actually 'enſlaved; and by being thus rendered paſſive to 'the prieſt, men are naturally prepared for a ſervile 'ſubjection to the prince, and for becoming ſlaves 'to the moſt arbitrary and tyrannical government. 'And I believe it hath been generally found true by 'experience, that the ſame perſons who have aſſerted their own power over others, in matters of 'religion and conſcience, have alſo aſſerted the abſolute power of the civil magiſtrate, and been the 'avowed patrons of thoſe admirable doctrines of 'paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance for the ſubject (8).'

(8) Introd. p. [illegible]

At the cloſe of this piece our author obſerves, that the uſe of the view which he had given of the riſe and progreſs of perſecution, was, 'to teach men to 'adhere cloſe to the doctrines and words of Chriſt 'and his Apoſtles, to argue for the doctrines of the 'goſpel with meekneſs and charity, to introduce no 'new terms of ſalvation and Chriſtian communion, 'not to trouble the Chriſtian church with metaphyſical ſubtilties and abſtruſe queſtions, that miniſter 'to quarrelling and ſtrife, not to pronounce cenſures, judgments, and anathemas, upon ſuch as 'may differ from us in ſpeculative truths, not to exclude men from the rights of civil ſociety, nor lay 'them under any negative or poſitive diſcouragements for conſcience ſake, or for their different 'uſages and rites in the externals of Chriſtian worſhip; 'but to remove thoſe which are already laid, and 'which are as much a ſcandal to the authors and 'continuers of them, as they are a burthen to thoſe 'who labour under them (9).

(9) Ibid. p. 135

by

by Dr. Berriman, in a pamphlet, entitled, Brief Remarks on Mr. Chandler's Introduction to the Hiſtory of the Inquiſition. Our author publiſhed, in the form of a letter, an anſwer to theſe Remarks, in which he defended himſelf with great ſpirit. This engaged Dr. Berriman to write A Review of his Remarks; to which Mr. Chandler replied, in "A "ſecond Letter to William Berriman, D. D. &c. in which his Review of his Remarks "on the Introduction to the Hiſtory of the Inquiſition is conſidered, and the Characters of "St. Athanaſius, and Martyr Laud, are farther ſtated and ſupported." This publication was ſoon followed by another, entitled, "A Vindication of a Paſſage of the Right "Reverend the Lord Biſhop of London, in his ſecond Paſtoral Letter, againſt the "Miſrepreſentations of William Berriman, D. D. in a Letter to his Lordſhip:" and here the controverſy ended. As our author had the firmeſt perſuaſion, that there was nothing in the principles of Proteſtant Diſſenters which rendered them unfit to hold offices in the ſtate, or in corporations, and that it was a manifeſt injuſtice to deprive them of the common rights of citizens, he likewiſe publiſhed, in 1732, in 8vo, "The "Diſpute better adjuſted about the proper Time of applying for a repeal of the Corporation and Teſt Acts, by ſhewing that ſome Time is proper; in a Letter to the "Author of the Diſpute adjuſted, viz. the Right Rev. Dr. Edmund Gibſon, Lord "Biſhop of London (g)."

(g) Dr. Flexman's Catalogue of Dr. Chandler's Works, added to the account of his life prefixed to his ſermons.

Among other learned and uſeful deſigns which Mr. Chandler had formed, he began a Commentary on the Prophets; and in 1735, he publiſhed, in 4to, "A Paraphraſe "and critical Commentary on the Prophecy of Joel;" which he dedicated to the Right Honourable Arthur Onſlow, Eſq; Speaker of the Houſe of Commons. He afterwards proceeded a great way in the prophecy of Iſaiah; but before he had completed it, he met with the MS. Lexicon and Lectures of the famous Arabic profeſſor Schultens, who much recommends explaining the difficult words and phraſes of the Hebrew language, by comparing them with the Arabic. With this light before him, Mr. Chandler determined to ſtudy the Hebrew anew, and to drop his commentary till he ſhould thus have ſatisfied himſelf, that he had attained the genuine ſenſe of the Sacred Writings (h). But this ſuſpenſion of his deſign prevented the completion of it; for engagements of a different kind intervened, and he never finiſhed any other commentary on the prophets. He continued, however, to publiſh a variety of learned works, and diſplayed a very laudable zeal in ſupport of religious liberty, and of the truth of divine revelation.

(h) Amory, ubi ſupra, p. 11.

In 1736, he publiſhed, in 8vo, "The Hiſtory of Perſecution [F], in four parts; "viz. I. Amongſt the Heathens. II. Under the Chriſtian Emperors. III. Under the "Papacy and Inquiſition. IV. Amongſt Proteſtants. With a Preface, containing "Remarks on Dr. Rogers's Vindication of the Civil Eſtabliſhment of Religion." In 1741, appeared, in 8vo, "A Vindication of the Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament; in "Anſwer to the Miſrepreſentations and Calumnies of Thomas Morgan, M. D. and "Moral Philoſopher [G]." He likewiſe publiſhed, in oppoſition to the ſame writer, in 1742, "A Defence of the Prime Miniſtry and Character of Joſeph (i)."

(i) Amory, ut ſupra.

In 1744, Mr. Chandler publiſhed, in 8vo, "The Witneſſes of the Reſurrection of "Jeſus Chriſt re-examined, and their Teſtimony proved entirely conſiſtent." This was a very important controverſy, which was at that time much agitated; and Dr. Leland, who ſtyles our author's piece upon the ſubject "a valuable treatiſe," obſerves, that, in his laſt chapter, "he hath ſummed up the evidence for the reſurrection of Jeſus "with great clearneſs and judgment (k)." In 1748, he publiſhed, in 8vo, "The Caſe "of Subſcription to explanatory Articles of Faith, as a Qualification for Admiſſion "into the Chriſtian Miniſtry, calmly and impartially reviewed; in anſwer to, 1. A "late Pamphlet, intitled, The Church of England vindicated, in requiring Subſcription from the Clergy to the Thirty-nine Articles. 2. The Rev. Mr. John White's "Appendix to his third Letter to a diſſenting Gentleman. To which is added, The "Speech of the Rev. John Alphonſo Turretine, previous to the Abolition of all Subſcription at Geneva, tranſlated from a Manuſcript in the French (l)." His writings having procured him a high reputation for learning and abilities, he might eaſily have obtained a Doctor's degree in Divinity, and offers of that kind were made him; but for ſome time he declined the acceptance of a diploma, and, as he once ſaid, in the pleaſantneſs of converſation, becauſe ſo many blockheads had been made doctors. However, upon making a viſit to Scotland, in company with his friend, the Earl of Finlater and Seafield, he, with great propriety, accepted of this honour, which was (k) View of the Deiſtical Writers, vol. i. p. 187.

(l) Flexman's Catalogue, ut ſupra.

[F] The Hiſtory of Perſecution.] In this work he has inſerted the whole of his Introduction to the Hiſtory of the Inquiſition, with additions and improvements. In the courſe of this publication he endeavoured to prove, that the things for which Chriſtians have perſecuted one another, have generally been of ſmall importance; that pride, ambition, and covetouſneſs, have been the grand ſources of perſecution; that the decrees of councils and ſynods are of no authority in matters of faith; that impoſing ſubſcriptions to human creeds is unreaſonable and pernicious; and that the Chriſtian religion abſolutely condemns perſecution for conſcience-ſake.

[G] A Vindication of the Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament, &c.] Dr. Leland obſerves, that in this work of our author he has clearly proved, that Morgan 'hath been guilty of manifeſt falſhoods, and of the 'moſt groſs perverſions of the ſcripture hiſtory, even 'in thoſe very inſtances in which he aſſureth his 'reader, he hath kept cloſe to the accounts given by 'the Hebrew hiſtorians (10).'

(10) View of the Deiſtical Writers, vol. i. p. 149, edit. 1766.

conferred upon him without ſolicitation, and with every mark of reſpect, by the two Univerſities of Edinburgh and Glaſgow. He had, likewiſe, the honour of being afterwards elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and of the Society of Antiquaries.

On the death of King George the Second, in 1760, Dr. Chandler publiſhed a ſermon on that event, in which he compared that Prince to King David. This gave riſe to a pamphlet, which was printed in the year 1761, entitled, The Hiſtory of the Man after God's own Heart; wherein the author ventured to exhibit King David as an example of perfidy, luſt, and cruelty, fit only to be ranked with a Nero, or a Caligula; and complained of the inſult that had been offered to the memory of the late Britiſh Monarch, by Dr. Chandler's parallel between him and the King of Iſrael. This attack occaſioned Dr. Chandler to publiſh, in the following year, "A Review of the Hiſtory of the Man "after God's own Heart; in which the Falſehoods and Miſrepreſentations of the Hiſ-"torian are expoſed and corrected." In this performance our author, though he could not defend the character of the Jewiſh Prince from all the accuſations that were brought againſt him, yet ſufficiently cleared him from many of them. His learning and ſagacity alſo appeared to great advantage in this piece; and his ſkill in the Hebrew language, and his extenſive acquaintance with biblical learning, enabled him to correct a variety of miſtakes into which his opponent had fallen, from his taking many things as he found them in our common Engliſh tranſlation, without paying any regard to criticiſms, various readings of particular paſſages, or the opinions of expoſitors and commentators (m). It muſt, however, be confeſſed, that in this controverſy Dr. Chandler expreſſed himſelf with too much warmth and aſperity, which was indeed not unuſual with him in his polemical writings. But this being a ſubject on which he was determined to enter into a full inveſtigation, he prepared for the preſs a more elaborate work, which was afterwards publiſhed in two volumes, 8vo, under the following title: "A Critical Hiſtory of the Life of David: in which the principal Events are ranged "in Order of Time: the chief Objections of Mr. Bayle, and others, againſt the Cha-"racter of this Prince, and the Scripture Account of him, and the Occurrences of "his Reign, are examined and refuted; and the Pſalms which refer to him explained." As this was the laſt, it was, likewiſe, one of the beſt of Dr. Chandler's productions. We may ſafely aſſert, that, in point of judgment, it is far ſuperior to Dr. Delany's Life of King David, and that it is every way equal to it with reſpect to literature. The explanations of the Pſalms, which relate to the Jewiſh Monarch, are admirable; and the commentary, in particular, on the ſixty-eighth Pſalm, is a maſter-piece of criticiſm. The greateſt part of this work was printed off at the time of our author's death, which happened on the 8th of May, 1766, in his ſeventy-third year (n). During the laſt year of his life, he was viſited with frequent returns of a very painful diſorder, which he endured with great reſignation and Chriſtian fortitude. He repeatedly declared, "That "to ſecure the divine felicity promiſed by Chriſt, was the principal and almoſt the "only thing that made life deſirable: that to attain this he would gladly die, ſubmit-"ting himſelf entirely to God, as to the time and manner of death, whoſe will was "moſt righteous and good; and being perſuaded, that all was well, which ended well "for eternity (o)." He was interred in the burying-ground at Bunhill-fields, on the 16th of the month; and his funeral was very honourably attended by Miniſters, and other gentlemen. He expreſsly deſired, by his laſt will, that no delineation of his character might be given in his funeral ſermon, which was preached by Dr. Amory [H]. He had ſeveral children; two ſons and a daughter who died before him, and three daughters who ſurvived him, two of whom are yet living, and both married; one of them to the Rev. Dr. Harwood.

(m) Britiſh Biography, ubi ſupra, p. 175.

(n) Funeral Sermon, by Dr. Amory.

(o) Ibid. p. 24.

Dr. Chandler was a man of very extenſive learning, and eminent abilities; his apprehenſion was quick, and his judgment penetrating; he had a warm and vigorous imagination; he was a very inſtructive and animated preacher; and his talents in the pulpit, and as a writer, procured him very great and general eſteem, not only among the Diſſenters, but among large numbers of the eſtabliſhed Church. He was well known, and much reſpected, by many perſons of the higheſt rank, and was offered conſiderable preferment in the Church [I]; but he ſteadily rejected every propoſition of that kind. He was principally inſtrumental in the eſtabliſhment of the fund for relieving the wi-

(13) Pref. p.

[H] His funeral ſermon, which was preached by Dr. Amory.] In this ſermon, Dr. Amory, after obſerving, that he was reſtrained from delineating Dr. Chandler's character, by his deſire expreſſed in his laſt will, ſays, 'He had indeed himſelf made this unneceſſary; as 'his maſterly and animated defences of the great 'doctrines of natural and revealed religion, had 'abundantly manifeſted the uncommon greatneſs and 'ſtrength of his genius, the large extent and rich 'variety of his learning, and the ſolid grounds on 'which his faith was founded: together with his 'hearty attachment to the cauſe of rational piety 'and Chriſtian liberty, and his abilities for defending them. And after he had miniſtered for forty 'years in this place, with ſo great reputation, it 'might appear ſuperfluous to inform any preſent, 'how full of exalted ſentiments of the Deity, how 'judicious and how ſpirited his public prayers were, 'and how inſtructive and animating his diſcourſes (11).'

(11) Funeral Sermon, p. 22, 23.

[I] Was offered conſiderable preferment in the church.] Dr. Amory ſays, that 'the high reputation which he 'had gained, by his defences of the Chriſtian religion, procured him from ſome of the governors of 'the eſtabliſhed church, the offers of conſiderable 'preferment, which he nobly declined. He valued 'more than theſe the liberty and integrity of his conſcience; and ſcorned for any worldly conſiderations 'to profeſs as divine truths, doctrines which he did 'not really believe, and to practiſe in religion what 'he did not inwardly approve (12).'

(12) Funeral Sermon, p. 23, 24.

dows

dows and orphans of poor Proteſtant Diſſenting Miniſters: the plan of it was firſt formed by him; and it was by his intereſt and application to his friends, that many of the ſubſcriptions for its ſupport were procured (p).

(p) Pref. to his Sermons, p. 11.

In 1768, four volumes of our author's ſermons were publiſhed by Dr. Amory, according to his own directions in his laſt will; to which was prefixed a neat engraving of him, from an excellent portrait by Mr. Chamberlin. He alſo expreſſed a deſire to have ſome of his principal pieces re-printed in four volumes, octavo: propoſals were accordingly publiſhed for that purpoſe, but did not meet with ſufficient encouragement. But in 1777, another work of our author was publiſhed, in one volume, 4to, under the following title: "A Paraphraſe and Notes on the Epiſtles of St. Paul to the Galatians "and Epheſians, with doctrinal and practical Obſervations: together with a critical "and practical Commentary on the two Epiſtles of St. Paul to the Theſſalonians [K]." Dr. Chandler alſo left, in his interleaved Bible, a large number of critical notes, chiefly in Latin, which are now the property of Dr. Kippis, Mr. Farmer, Dr. Price, and Dr. Savage, and which have been intended to be publiſhed; but the deſign has not yet been executed. Of ſundry other pieces of our author, which were publiſhed in his life-time, and which have not yet been mentioned, an account will be found below [L].]

T.

[K] A Paraphraſe and Notes on the Epiſtles of St. Paul to the Galatians and Epheſians, &c.] This work was publiſhed from the author's own manuſcript, which was evidently intended for the preſs, by the Rev. Mr. Nathaniel White, who ſucceeded him as paſtor of the congregation of Proteſtant diſſenters in the Old Jewry. That gentleman obſerves, in the preface to this work, that 'there ſeems to have been 'ſomething in Dr. Chandler's genius and ſtrength of 'mind, as well as in the unremitted courſe of his 'ſtudies, which eminently fitted him to comment 'upon the writings of St. Paul, and to follow that 'deep and accurate reaſoner, through his continued 'chain of argument, ſo as to preſerve the whole diſtinct and clear; though from the peculiar vigour 'of the Apoſtle's imagination, the fervour of his 'affection, the compaſs of his thought, and the uncommon fulneſs of his matter, his epiſtles are 'remarkable for ſudden digreſſions, long parentheſes, 'remote connections, and unexpected returns to 'ſubjects already diſcuſſed. Theſe, added to many 'other circumſtances common to ancient writings, 'muſt neceſſarily occaſion a conſiderable degree of 'obſcurity and difficulty, which it is the buſineſs of 'the ſacred expoſitor as much as poſſible to remove. 'In this view, the diſtinguiſhing excellence of Dr. 'Chandler's paraphraſe ſeems to be, that the author 'adheres moſt cloſely and conſtantly to the ſpirit of 'the original, keeps the full idea of the inſpired 'writer, and only that, as far as he could apprehend 'it, before him, and never ſteps aſide to pick up any 'hints, however ornamental, which are not directly 'conveyed, or ſtrongly implied by the apoſtle: ſo 'that, not merely in the text, but in the paraphraſe, 'we find ourſelves reading St. Paul himſelf, though 'in a language more accommodated to our own 'conception, and with an illuſtration which true 'learning, deep attention to the ſubject, and uncommon critical ſagacity enabled him to afford us.' —— 'The notes will abundantly recommend the 'work to the ſtudious and judicious enquirer, who 'will find no difficulties artfully evaded, or ſlightly 'and ſuperficially touched; no unneceſſary parade of 'reading, though many ſtriking proofs of the moſt 'extenſive and liberal erudition (13).'

(13) Pref. p. iv, v.

[L] Sundry other pieces of our author, &c.] Theſe were the following:

A Letter to the Rev. Mr. John Guyſe, occaſioned by his two ſermons on Acts ix. 20. in which the ſcripture notion of preaching Chriſt is ſtated and defended; and Mr. Guyſe's charges againſt his brethren, are conſidered and proved groundleſs, 1729, 8vo.

A ſecond Letter to the Rev. Mr. John Guyſe, in which Mr. Guyſe's latitude and reſtrictive ways of preaching Chriſt are proved to be entirely the ſame; the notion of preaching Chriſt is farther cleared and defended; the charge alledged againſt him of defaming his brethren is maintained and ſupported; and his ſolemn arts in controverſy are conſidered and expoſed. 1730, 8vo.

A Letter to the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor; occaſioned by his Lordſhip's nomination of five perſons, diſqualified by act of parliament, as fit and proper perſons to ſerve the office of Sheriffs, in which the nature and deſign of the corporation act is impartially conſidered and ſtated, 1738, 8vo.

An account of the conferences held in Nicholas-lane, Feb. 13, 1734, between two Romiſh prieſts and ſome Proteſtant divines; with ſome remarks on a pamphlet, intitled, The Conferences, &c. truly ſtated, 1735, 8vo.

Caſſiodorii Senatoris Complexiones in Epiſtolas, Acta Apoſtolorum, & Apocalpſin e vetuſtiſſimis Canonicorum Veronenſium Membranis nuper erutæ. Editio altera ad Florentinam fideliter expreſſæ, opera & cura Samuelis Chandleri, 1722, 12mo.

A ſhort and plain Catechiſm, being an explanation of the Creed, Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer, by way of queſtion and anſwer, 12mo, 1742.

Great Britain's Memorial againſt the Pretender and Popery; to which is annexed, the method of dragooning the French Proteſtants after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, 1745, 12mo. This piece was thought ſo ſeaſonable at the time of the rebellion, that it paſſed through ten editions.

A Sermon preached for the benefit of the Charity-ſchool, Gravel-lane, Southwark, Jan. 1, 1728: to which is added, an Anſwer to Mandeville's Eſſay on Charity-ſchools.

Knowledge and Practice neceſſary to Happineſs, a Sermon preached at the Old Jewry, 1728, 8vo.

The Notes of the Church conſidered, a Sermon, 1735.

A ſecond Treatiſe on the Notes of the Church, being the ſubſtance of two Sermons, 1735.

Benevolence and Integrity eſſentials of Chriſtianity, a Sermon preached to the Society for relieving the widows and orphans of Proteſtant diſſenting-miniſters, 1736, 4to. He alſo publiſhed another Sermon preached to the ſame ſociety in 1748: To which was annexed, a paraphraſe and critical commentary on the 8th and 9th chapters of the Second Epiſtle to the Corinthians.

A Sermon preached to the Societies for reformation of manners, 1738, 8vo.

A Sermon on occaſion of the death of the Rev. Dr. Thomas Hadfield, 1741, 8vo.

The danger and duty of good men, under the preſent unnatural invaſion, a Sermon preached at the Old Jewry, in 1745.

A Sermon on the occaſion of the death of the Rev. Mr. George Smyth, 1746.

A Sermon on the day appointed for a general thankſgiving for the ſuppreſſion of the rebellion, 1746.

The Incurableneſs of Superſtition, the ſubſtance of two diſcourſes preached on the firſt of Auguſt, 1749.

The Scripture account of the cauſe and intention of Earthquakes, a Sermon preached at the Old Jewry, March 11, 1749, on occaſion of the ſhocks of an Earthquake, on Feb. 8, and March 8, 1750, 8vo.

A Sermon on occaſion of the death of the Rev. Mr. Moſes Lowman, 1752.

A Sermon preached to the Society for promoting religious knowledge among the poor, in 1752; and a Faſt Sermon in 1559.

A Ser-

A Sermon preached at Lewin's Mead, Briſtol, at the ordination of the Rev. Mr. Thomas Wright, 1759.

Two diſcourſes on the Inſtitution of the Sabbath, 1761.

Two Sermons on the Nature and Neceſſity of redeeming the Time, 1763.

A Charge at the Ordination of the Rev. Mr. Edward Harwood of Briſtol, and the Rev. Mr. Benj. Davis of Marlborough, delivered in the Old Jewry, 1765.

Funeral Oration at the Interment of the Rev. Dr. Iſaac Watts, 1749.

Dr. Chandler alſo wrote about fifty papers in the weekly publication, entitled the Old Whig, or Conſiſtent Proteſtant; and alſo the account of his ſiſter, Mrs. Mary Chandler, which is inſerted in "The "Lives of the Poets," which were publiſhed under the name of Theophilus Cibber (14).]

(14) Flexman's Catalogue, ut ſupra.

We ſhall here add ſome particulars relative to Mrs. MARY CHANDLER, ſiſter to Dr. Chandler. She was born at Malmſbury, in Wiltſhire, in 1687, and was carefully trained up in the principles of religion and virtue. As her father's circumſtances rendered it neceſſary that ſhe ſhould apply herſelf to ſome buſineſs, ſhe was brought up to the trade of a Milliner. But as ſhe had a propenſity to literature, ſhe employed her leiſure hours in peruſing the beſt modern writers, and as many as ſhe could of the antient ones, eſpecially the Poets, as far as the beſt tranſlations could aſſiſt her. Amongſt theſe Horace was her particular favourite, and ſhe greatly regretted that ſhe could not read him in the original. She was ſomewhat deformed in her perſon, in conſequence of an accident in her childhood. This unfavourable circumſtance ſhe occaſionally made a ſubject of her own pleaſantry, and uſed to ſay, "That as her perſon would not re- "commend her, ſhe muſt endeavour to cultivate her "mind, to make herſelf agreeable." This ſhe did with the greateſt care, being an admirable œconomiſt of her time: and it is ſaid, that ſhe had ſo many excellent qualities in her, that though her firſt appearance could create no prejudice in her favour, yet it was impoſſible to know her without valuing and eſteeming her. She thought the diſadvantages of her ſhape were ſuch, as gave her no reaſonable proſpect of being happy in the married ſtate, and therefore choſe to remain ſingle. She had, however, an honourable offer from a worthy country gentleman, of conſiderable fortune, who, attracted merely by the goodneſs of her character, took a journey of an hundred miles to viſit her at Bath, where ſhe kept a Milliner's ſhop, and where he paid her his addreſſes. But ſhe declined his offers, and is ſaid to have convinced him, that ſuch a match could neither be for his happineſs, nor her own. She publiſhed ſeveral poems, but that which ſhe wrote upon Bath was the beſt received. It paſſed through ſeveral editions. She intended to have written a large poem upon the being and attributes of God, and did execute ſome parts of it, but did not live to finiſh it. It was irkſome to her to be ſo much confined to her buſineſs, and the buſtle of Bath was ſometimes diſagreeable to her. She often languiſhed for more leiſure and ſolitude: but the dictates of prudence, and a deſire to be uſeful to her relations, whom ſhe regarded with the warmeſt affection, brought her to ſubmit to the fatigues of her buſineſs for thirty-five years. She did, however, ſometimes enjoy occaſional retirements to the country ſeats of ſome of her moſt reſpectable acquaintance; and was then extremely delighted with the pleaſures of ſolitude, and the contemplation of the works of nature. She was honoured with the eſteem and regard of the Counteſs of Hertford, afterwards Dutcheſs of Somerſet, who ſeveral times viſited her. Mr. Pope alſo viſited her at Bath, and complimented her for her poem on that place. The celebrated Mrs. Rowe was one of her particular friends. She had the misfortune of a very valetudinary conſtitution, which was ſuppoſed to be, in ſome meaſure, owing to the irregularity of her form. By the advice of Dr. Cheyne, ſhe entered into the vegetable diet, and adhered to it even to an extreme. She died on the 11th of September, 1745, in the fifty-eighth year of her age, after about two days illneſs (15). Dr. Chandler had a brother, Mr. John Chandler, who was long an eminent Apothecary in the City of London, and died lately. He was the author of a pamphlet on Colds and Catarrhs, which was well received.] T.

(15) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, vol. v. p. 345—354.

 [CHAPMAN (GEORGE), a Dramatic Poet, and Tranſlator of Homer, was born in the year 1557 (a). It is not known where he was born, though it is conjectured to have been in Kent; nor have we any account at what ſchool he was educated. But it appears, that having been well grounded in grammar-learning, he was ſent to the Univerſity, when he was about ſeventeen years of age (b). He ſpent about two years at Trinity-College, Oxford (c), where he paid little attention to logic or philoſophy, but was eminently diſtinguiſhed for his knowledge in the Greek and Roman claſſics. About the year 1576, he quitted the Univerſity, and repaired to the metropolis, where he commenced a friendſhip with Shakſpeare, Spenſer, Samuel Daniel, Chriſtopher Marlow, and other celebrated wits. In 1595, he publiſhed, in 4to, a poem, entitled, "Ovid's Banquet of Sauce, a Coronet for his Miſtreſs Philoſophy, and his amorous "Zodiac:" to which he added, a tranſlation of a poem into Engliſh, called "The "amorous Contention of Phillis and Flora," which was written in Latin by a Friar in the year 1400 (d). The following year he publiſhed, in 4to, "The Shield of "Achilles," from Homer: and ſoon after, in the ſame year, a tranſlation of ſeven books of the Iliad, in quarto (e). In 1600, fifteen books were printed in a thin folio (f). At length appeared, without date, an entire tranſlation of the Iliad, in folio [A], under the

(a) Wood's Athenæ, Oxon. vol. i. col. 592. edit. 1721.

(b) Biographia Dramatica, vol. i. p. 68.

(c) Warton's Hiſt. of Engliſh Poetry, vol. iii.

(d) Athenæ Oxon. ut ſupra.

(e) Warton's Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, vol. iii. p. 441.

(f) Id. ibid.

[A] An entire tranſlation of the Iliad, in folio.] Mr. Warton informs us, that before the publication of Chapman's tranſlation, ten books of the Iliad 'were tranſlated from a metrical French verſion into 'Engliſh, by A. H. or Arthur Hall, Eſq; of Grantham, and a Member of Parliament, and printed at 'London by Ralph Newberie, in 1581. This tranſ'lation has no other merit than that of being the 'firſt appearance of a part of the Iliad in an Engliſh 'dreſs (1).'

(1) Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, vol. iii. p. 440.

Chapman's complete tranſlation of the Iliad 'is 'dedicated in Engliſh heroics to Prince Henry. 'This circumſtance proves, that the book was printed 'at leaſt after the year 1603, in which James the 'Firſt acceded to the throne. Then follows an ana'gram on the name of his gracious Mecenas Prince 'Henry, and a ſonnet to the ſole Empreſſe of Beautie 'Queen Anne. In a metrical addreſs to the reader, 'he remarks, but with little truth, that the Engliſh 'language, abounding in conſonant monoſyllables, 'is eminently adapted to rythmical poetry. The 'doctrine that an allegorical ſenſe was hid under the 'narratives of epic poetry had not yet ceaſed; and 'he here promiſes a poem on the myſteries he had 'newly diſcovered in Homer. In the preface, he 'declares, that the laſt twelve books were tranſlated 'in fifteen weeks: yet with the advice of his learned 'and valued friends, maſter Robert Hews, and maſter 'Harriots. It is certain, that the whole perform'ance betrays the negligence of haſte. He pays his 'acknowledgments to his "moſt ancient, learned, "and right noble friend, maſter Richard Stapilton, "the firſt moſt deſertful mover in the frame of our "Homer." He endeavours to obviate a popular 'objection, the following title: 'The Iliads of Homer, Prince of Poets. Never before in any 'Language truly tranſlated. With a Comment upon ſome of his chief Places: Done 'according to the Greek by George Chapman. At London, printed by Nathaniel 'Butter.'

In 1598, he produced a Comedy, entitled, "The Blind Beggar of Alexandria, "moſt pleaſantly diſcourſing his various Humours in diſguiſed Shapes, full of Conceit

'objection, perhaps not totally groundleſs, that he 'conſulted the proſe Latin verſion more than the 'Greek original. He ſays, ſenſibly enough, 'it is "the part of every knowing and judicious interpre-"ter, not to follow the number and order of words, "but the material things themſelves, and ſentences "to weigh diligently; and to clothe and adorn them "with words, and ſuch a ſtyle and form of oration, "as are moſt apt for the language into which they "are converted.' The danger lies, in too laviſh an 'application of this ſort of cloathing, that it may 'not diſguiſe what it ſhould only adorn. I do not 'ſay that this is Chapman's fault: but he has by no 'means repreſented the dignity or the ſimplicity of (2) Ibid. p. 442. 'Homer (2).'

The ſame ingenious critic proceeds to obſerve, that Chapman 'is ſometimes paraphraſtic and redundant, 'but more frequently retrenches or impoveriſhes 'what he could not feel and expreſs. In the mean 'time, he labours with the inconvenience of an auk-'ward, inharmonious, and unheroic meaſure, im-'poſed by cuſtom, but diſguſtful to modern ears. 'Yet he is not always without ſtrength or ſpirit. 'He has enriched our language with many com-'pound epithets, ſo much in the manner of Homer, 'ſuch as the ſilver-footed Thetis, the ſilver-thorned 'Juno, the triple-feathered helme, the high-walled 'Thebes, the fair-haired boy, the ſilver-flowing 'floods, the hugely-peopled towns, the Grecians navy-'bound, the ſtrong-winged lance, and many more 'which might be collected.

'Dryden reports, that Waller never could read 'Chapman's Homer without a degree of tranſport. 'Pope is of opinion, that Chapman covers his de-'fects 'by a daring fiery ſpirit, that animates his "tranſlation, which is ſomething like what one "might imagine Homer himſelf to have written before "he arrived to years of diſcretion.' But his fire is 'too frequently darkened by that ſort of fuſtian (3) Id. ibid. 'which now diſfigured the face of our tragedy (3).'

Mr. Warton adds, 'My copy once belonged to 'Pope; in which he has noted many of Chapman's 'abſolute interpolations, extending ſometimes to the 'length of a paragraph of twelve lines. A diligent 'obſerver will eaſily diſcern, that Pope was no care-'leſs reader of his rude predeceſſor. Pope com-'plains, that Chapman took advantage of an un-'meaſureable length of line. But in reality, Pope's 'lines are longer than Chapman's. If Chapman af-'fected the reputation of rendering line for line, the 'ſpecious expedient of chuſing a protracted meaſure 'which concatenated two lines together, undoubt-'edly favoured his uſual propenſity to periphraſis.

'Chapman's commentary is only incidental, con-'tains but a ſmall degree of critical excurſion, and 'is for the moſt part a pedantic compilation from 'Spondanus. He has the boldneſs ſeverely to cen-'ſure Scaliger's impertinence. It is remarkable, 'that he has taken no illuſtrations from Euſtathius, 'except through the citations of other commenta-'tors. But of Euſtathius there was no Latin in-(4) Id. ibid. 'terpretation (4).'

The tranſlation of the Iliad is cloſed with ſixteen ſonnets by Chapman, addreſſed to the chief nobi-(5) Id. ibid. lity (5).

The following lines contain Chapman's tranſlation of Hector's reply to Ajax, and of the combat be-tween them:

"The helm-grac'd Hector anſwer'd him, Renowned Telamon,
Prince of the ſoldiers came from Greece, aſſay not me like one,
Young and immartial, with great words, as to an Amazon dame.
I have the habit of all fights, and know the bloody frame
Of every ſlaughter: I well know, the ready right hand charge;
I know the left, and every ſway, of my ſecureful targe;
I triumph in the crueltie of fixed combat fight,
And manage horſe to all deſigns; I think then with good right,
I may be confident as far, as this my challenge goes,
Without being taxed with a vaunt, borne out with empty ſhews.
But, being a ſoldier ſo renown'd, I will not work on thee,
With leaſt advantage of that ſkill I know doth ſtrengthen me;
And ſo with privity of ſleight, win that for which I ſtrive:
But at thy beſt, even open ſtrength, if my endeavours thrive.
Thus ſent he his long javelin forth; it ſtruck his foe's huge ſhield,
Near to the upper ſkirt of braſs, which was the eighth it held.
Six folds th' untamed dart ſtruck through, and in the ſeventh tough hide
The point was check'd: then Ajax threw; his angry lance did glide
Quite through his bright orbicular targe, his curiaſs, ſhirt of mail,
And did his manly ſtomach's mouth, with dangerous
taint aſſaile:
But in the bowing of himſelf, black death too ſhort did ſtrike;
Then both to pluck their javelins forth, encountered lion-like,
Whoſe bloody violence is increas'd, by that raw food
they eat;
Or boars, whoſe ſtrength, wild nouriſhment, doth make ſo wondrous great.
Again Priamides did wound, in midſt, his ſhield of braſs,
Yet pierc'd not thro' the upper plate, the head reflected was.
But Ajax, following his lance, ſmote thro' his target quite,
And ſtay'd bold Hector ruſhing in; the lance held way outright,
And hurt his neck; out guſh'd the blood; yet Hector ceas'd not ſo,
But in his ſtrong hand took a flint, as he did backwards go,
Black, ſharp, and big, laid in the field: the ſeven-fold targe it ſmit
Full on the boſs; and round about, the braſs did ring with it.
But Ajax a far greater ſtone, lift up, and (wreathing round,
With all his body laid to it) he ſent it forth to wound,
And gave unmeaſur'd force to it; the round ſtone broke within
His tundlet target; his lov'd knees, to languiſh did begin;
And he lean'd, ſtretch'd out on his ſhield; but Phœ-bus rais'd him ſtrait.
Then had they laid on wounds with ſwords, in uſe of cloſer fight,
Unleſs the heralds, (meſſengers, of gods and god-like men)
The one of Troy, the other Greece, had held betwixt them then
Imperial ſcepters: when the one, Idæus grave and wiſe,
Said to them, now no more, my ſons: the ſovereign of the ſkies
Doth love you both; both ſoldiers are, all witneſs with good right:
But now night lays her mace on earth; tis good t' obey the night (6)."

(6) Chapman's Iliad, p. 100, 101.

" and Pleaſure." It was printed in 4to, but without being divided either into acts or ſcenes, and dedicated to the Earl of Nottingham, Lord High Admiral (g). The following year, he publiſhed another Comedy in 4to, called " Humorous Day's Mirth," which was acted by the Earl of Nottingham's ſervants (h). He is ſaid to have been much countenanced and encouraged by Sir Thomas Walſingham, who, as Wood informs us, had a ſon of the ſame name, " whom Chapman loved from his birth (i). Henry, Prince of Wales, and Carr, Earl of Somerſet, alſo patronized him; but the former dying, and the latter being diſgraced, Chapman's hopes of preferment by their means, were fruſtrated. His intereſt at Court was likewiſe probably leſſened by the umbrage taken by King James at ſome reflections caſt on the Scotch nation, in a Comedy called Eaſtward Hoe [B], which was written by Chapman, in conjunction with Ben Jonſon and John Marſton. He is ſuppoſed, however, to have had ſome place at Court, either under King James, or his Queen Anne (k).

(g) Biographia Dramatica, and Cibber's Lives of the Poets, vol. i. p. 232.

(h) Jacob's Lives of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, vol. ii. p. 37.

(i) Athen. Oxon. ut ſupra.

(k) Id. ibid.

In 1605, he publiſhed a Comedy, in 4to, called " All Fools," the plot of which is founded on Terence's Heautontimorumenos, and which was performed at Black Friars. Jacob ſays, that " it was accounted an excellent play in thoſe days, and was acted be- " fore King James (l)." The following year he produced two other Comedies; one called " The Gentleman Uſher," and the other " Monſieur D'Olive." They were both printed in quarto: it is uncertain whether the firſt was ever performed; but the latter was often acted with ſucceſs at Black Friars (m). In 1607, he publiſhed, in 4to, " Buſſy d'Amboiſe, a Tragedy [C]." This play was often exhibited at St. Paul's, in the reign of James I. and, after the Reſtoration, was revived with ſucceſs at the Theatre-Royal. The plot of it is taken from the French hiſtorians, in the reign of Henry III. of France (n). The ſame year, he publiſhed, in 4to, " Cæſar and Pompey, a Roman " Tragedy, declaring their wars, out of whoſe events is evicted this propoſition, Only " a juſt Man is a Free-man." This was acted at Black Friars, and was afterwards reprinted. The following year he produced, " The Conſpiracy and Tragedy of Charles, " Duke of Biron, Marſhal of France:" which was printed in 4to, and performed at Black Friars, in two parts. The ſtory may be found in the French hiſtorians of the reign of Henry IV. In 1611, he publiſhed, in 4to, " May-day," which is ſtyled " a witty Comedy," and which was acted at Black Friars (o). The following year, he publiſhed another Comedy, called " The Widow's Tears, which was acted both at Black and White Friars. It has been obſerved, that " ſome parts of this play are very fine, " and the incidents affecting and intereſting (p):" but the cataſtrophe is thought exceptionable. The plot of Lyſander and Cynthia, is taken from the ſtory of the Epheſian Matron, related in Petronius.

(l) Lives of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, vol. ii. p. 35.

(m) Id. ibid.

(n) Biographia Dramatica, vol. ii. p. 39.

(o) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, vol. i. p. 234.

(p) Biog. Dram. vol. ii. p. 403.

About this time he publiſhed, an " Epicede, or Funeral Song on Prince Henry (q):" and when the Societies of Lincoln's-Inn and the Middle-Temple, in 1613, had reſolved to exhibit a ſplendid Maſque at Whitehall, in honour of the nuptials of the Palſgrave and the Princeſs Elizabeth, Chapman was employed for the poetry, and Inigo Jones for the machinery (r). The ſame year he publiſhed, in 4to, a Tragedy, entitled, " Buſſy d'Amboiſe his Revenge." Jacob informs us, that this play was not acted with ſo much " applauſe, as moſt of the other dramatic works of this Poet (s)." In 1714, he publiſhed, in 4to, " Andromeda liberata; or, The Nuptials of Perſeus and " Andromeda." This was dedicated, in a poetical epiſtle, to Robert, Earl of Somerſet, and Frances, his Counteſs (t). The ſame year he printed his verſion of the Odyſſey, which he alſo dedicated to the Earl of Somerſet. This was ſoon followed by the Batrachomuomachy, and the Hymns, and Epigrams (u). In 1616, he publiſhed, in 12mo, a tranſlation of Muſæus, with a dedication to Inigo Jones, in which he is addreſſed as the moſt ſkilful and ingenious Architect that England had yet ſeen (w). Mr. Warton remarks, that " there was an intimate friendſhip between our author, and this " celebrated reſtorer of Grecian palaces (x)." Chapman alſo publiſhed a paraphraſtic tranſlation, in verſe, of Petrarch's " ſeven Penitential Pſalms," with " a Hymn to (q) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(r) Warton, ut ſupra.

(s) Lives of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, vol. ii. p. 36.

(t) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(u) Warton, ubi ſupra, p. 445.

(w) Ibid. p. 448.

(x) Hiſt. of Engliſh Poetry, ut ſupra.

[B] In a Comedy called Eaſtward Hoe.] This piece was acted by the children of her Majeſty's Revels at Black Friars, and was printed in 4to, in 1605. The reflections in this Comedy on the Scots gave ſo much offence to King James, that Chapman, Jonſon, and Marſton were committed to priſon, and were ſaid to be in danger of being pilloried. They found means, however, to procure a pardon. It was from this play that Hogarth took the plan of his ſet of prints, called " The induſtrious and idle 'Prentices." The Comedy was revived ſome years ago, for the entertainment and inſtruction of the city youth, on Lord Mayor's night, inſtead of the London Cuckolds. It was alſo altered and fitted for repreſentation by Mrs. Lennox, and acted at Drury-lane, and printed in 8vo, in 1773, under the title of " Old City Man- " ners (7)." An alteration was alſo made by Tate, under the title of Cuckold's Haven, but not ſo good as the original (8).

(7) Biographia Dramatica, vol. ii. p. 98. 261.

(8) Id. ibid.

[C] Buſſy d'Amboiſe, a Tragedy.] This is the play of which Mr. Dryden ſpeaks, when, in his preface to the Spaniſh Friar, he reſolves to burn one annually to the memory of Ben Jonſon. Mr. Warton ſays, 'It is not clear, whether Dryden's reſolu- 'tion to burn annually one copy of Chapman's beſt 'Tragedy, Buſſy d'Amboiſe, to the memory of 'Jonſon, was a cenſure or a compliment. He ſays, 'however, that this play pleaſed only in the repre- 'ſentation, like a ſtar which glitters only while it 'ſhoots. The manes of Jonſon perhaps required 'ſome reconciliatory rites: for Jonſon being deli- 'vered from Shakſpeare, began unexpectedly to be 'diſturbed at the riſing reputation of a new theatric 'rival (9).'

(9) Hiſt. of Engliſh Poetry, ubi ſupra, p. 448.

(y) Id. ibid. "Chriſt upon the Croſs (y)," and ſome other pieces, which will be mentioned in the notes [D].

He died in the year 1634 [E], at the age of ſeventy-ſeven (z), and was buried on the ſouth-ſide of St. Giles's Church in the Fields. His friend Inigo Jones planned and erected a monument to his memory, in the ſtyle of the new architecture, which was unfortunately deſtroyed with the old Church (a). He appears to have been much reſpected in his own time: and, indeed, the man who communicated Homer to his countrymen, even in ſuch language as that of Chapman, might juſtly be conſidered as their benefactor; and in eſtimating the merit of his verſion, a candid allowance ought to be made for the age in which he lived, and the then unimproved ſtate of our language. As a dramatic writer, he had conſiderable reputation among his contemporaries, and was juſtly eſteemed for the excellence of his moral character. Wood ſays, that "he was a perſon of moſt reverend aſpect, religious and temperate, qualities (b) Athen. Oxon. ut ſupra. "rarely meeting in a Poet (b)." He is celebrated by Drayton in the following lines:

(z) Wood, ut ſupra.

(a) Warton, ut ſupra.

'Others again there lived in my days
'That have of us deſerved no leſs praiſe
'For their TRANSLATIONS, than the daintieſt wit
'That on Parnaſſus thinks he high'ſt doth ſit,
'And for a chair may 'mongſt the Muſes call
'As the moſt curious maker of them all:
'As reverend Chapman, who hath brought to us
'Muſæus, Homer, and Heſiodus,
'Out of the Greek: and by his ſkill hath rear'd
'Them to that height, and to our tongue endear'd,
'That were thoſe Poets at this day alive
'To ſee their books thus with us to ſurvive,
'They'd think, having neglected them ſo long,
'They had been written in the Engliſh tongue (c).'] T.

(c) Warton, ut ſupra.

[D] Some other pieces, &c.] Theſe were the following:

The Tragedy of Alphonſus, Emperor of Germany. This was performed at Black Friars with great applauſe (10).

(10) Jacob's Lives of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, vol. ii. p. 37.

Revenge for Honour, a Tragedy (11).

(11) Wood, ut ſupra.

A Comedy is alſo attributed to him, entitled, "Two Wiſe Men, and all the reſt Fools: or, a co-"mical Moral, cenſuring the Follies of the Age;" printed at London, in 4to, in 1619. This play is extended to ſeven acts; but Chapman's name is not to it. Wood ſays, it was doubted whether he was the author of it; and there ſeems no ſufficient authority for aſcribing it to him.

Chapman is ſuppoſed to have tranſlated Heſiod; and Mr. Warton informs us, that it appears from the regiſters of the Stationers Company, that "Heſiod's "Georgicks, tranſlated by George Chapman, were "licenſed to Miles Patrick, May 14, 1618 (12)." But he doubts whether the book was ever printed. Drayton ſpeaks of Chapman as a tranſlator of Heſiod.

(12) Hiſt. of Engliſh Poetry, ut ſupra.

[E] He died in the year 1634.] It is ſaid, by the writer of Chapman's article in the Biographia Dramatica, "What became of him during the troubles, "which he lived to ſee, but not to be witneſs to "their entire termination, I know not." But this obſervation is grounded on a manifeſt miſtake reſpecting the year of his death, which is erroneouſly ſtated to have been in 1654.

Part of the inſcription on Chapman's monument, which is preſerved by Wood, is as follows: "Georgius "Chapmannus, poeta Homericus, philoſophus verus "(etſi Chriſtianus poeta) pluſquam celebris," &c.]

CHAPPEL (WILLIAM), Biſhop of Cork, Cloyne, and Roſs, in the kingdom of Ireland, a moſt learned, pious, and eloquent Prelate in the laſt century. He was deſcended, as himſelf tells us, from parents that were but in narrow circumſtances, born at Lexington in Nottinghamſhire, December 10, 1582, and was very near dying of the ſmall-pox when in the ſecond year of his age (a). He was afterwards ſent to Mansfield, in the ſame county, to a grammar-ſchool, where he was very early taken notice of for his ſingular gravity, the meekneſs of his temper, and his cloſe application to his ſtudies (b). This induced his family, though their circumſtances were but indifferent, to ſend him to the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he was entered of Chriſt's-College at the age of ſeventeen (c). His modeſty, diligence, and capacity, gained him a great intereſt in his College, ſo that after having taken two degrees, he was, in the year 1607, at a time when he did not well know what courſe to ſteer, elected Fellow, as we learn from himſelf, in a ſtile equally humble and elegant (d), which was perhaps peculiar to our author [A]. When he had acquired this preferment, he ſeems to have been fully ſatisfied,

(a) Vita Guliel-mi Chappel Epiſ-copi Corcagienſis & Roſſenſis à ſeipſo conſcripta.

(b) Taken from ſome manuſcript notes on the Life of Biſhop Chappel.

(c) Fuller's Worthies, in Nottinghamſhire, p. 317. Vita Gulielmi Chappel, &c.

(d) Fuller's Hiſt. of Cambridge. Vita Gulielmi Chappel, &c.

[A] Which was perhaps peculiar to our author.] The life of Biſhop Chappel, written by himſelf in Latin, and, as it plainly appears, as an exerciſe of penitence, thankſgiving, and devotion, has been now twice printed; firſt, from a manuſcript in the hands of Sir Philip Sydenham, Bart. by the induſtrious Mr. Hearne (1), and a ſecond time by the reverend Mr. Peck, from a manuſcript which is ſtill preſerved in Trinity-Hall, Cambridge (2). In this life he has ſet down the principal ſteps of his fortunes and misfortunes, with ſhort and ſignificant reflections and meditations: as for inſtance, in reference to his going to the Univerſity, his ſtudying there, and his being elected fellow of his college, he writes thus (3):

(1) Joannis Lelandi Antiquarii Collectanea, vol. v. p. 261.

(2) Deſiderata Curioſa, lib. xi. p. 1.

(3) Vita Gulielmi Chappel.

Septendecim annos natus eo Cantabrigiam,
Pembrokiam parens, avunculus domum
Chriſti elegit, Chriſtoque duce figo hîc pedem.

Chriſtus

ſatisfied, and applied himſelf with great diligence to the education of youth, for which he was particularly fitted, by uniting in his diſpoſition two very different qualities, ſweetneſs of temper and ſeverity of manners; ſo that it is allowed there was no tutor in the Univerſity in thoſe days, that either bred more, or more famous pupils than he did (e). He was alſo very remarkable for his great abilities as a diſputant, which gained him much reputation, and in reſpect to which there happened a ſingular accident, of which the reader cannot but be well pleaſed to have an account (f) [B]. In this ſituation of life he would, in all probability, have paſſed his time in eaſe and quiet (g), if he had not been attacked by the malicious calumnies of ſome, who envied him the great reputation in which he ſtood with the moſt conſiderable perſons in the Univerſity; and this had ſuch an effect upon his ſpirit, that it broke and afflicted him exceedingly (b). When things were in this ſituation, he received an unexpected offer from Dr. Laud, then Biſhop of London, of the deanery of Caſhel in Ireland, which was become void by the promotion of Dean Jones to the biſhoprick of Killaloe (i). It ſeems, this promotion was not altogether agreeable to Mr. Chappel: he had no inclination to go to Ireland, and was not at all ambitious of dignity in the Church. However, after conſulting his relations, he determined to accept the offer, went over to Ireland accordingly, and was inſtalled Dean of Caſhel, by virtue of the King's mandate, Auguſt 20, 1633 (k). He had not been long in Ireland, before his kind patron, who ſent him thither, found out a new and more ſuitable employment for him; for Dr. Robert Uſher, who was Provoſt of Trinity-College at Dublin, being promoted to the See of Kildare, Dr. Laud, now become Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Chancellor of the Univerſity of Dublin, was deſirous of putting it under the care of Dean Chappel, which, however, he would willingly have declined (l). In order to this he returned to England in May 1634, and laboured as much as man could do, to be excuſed from undertaking this new charge, the burthen of which he apprehended too heavy for his ſhoulders, but it was in vain: a reſolution had been taken to give a new form to the Univerſity, and he was looked upon as the propereſt perſon to ſettle the eſtabliſhment that was propoſed (m). Upon this he went down to Cambridge, and reſigned his fellowſhip, which to him, as himſelf expreſſes it, was the ſweeteſt of earthly preferments, after he had held it for twenty-ſeven years (n). He alſo viſited his native country, and took his laſt leave of his antient and pious mother. In the month of Auguſt he returned to Ireland, and was elected Provoſt of Dublin, and had the care of it committed to him, though he was not ſworn into that office until June 5, 1637 (o), the reaſon of which the reader will be told in the notes [C]. He applied himſelf to his new charge with that zeal and diligence, (e) Fuller's Worthies, in Nottinghamſhire, p. 317.

(b) Vita Gulielmi Chappel.

(f) Dr. Borlace's Reduction of Ireland, p. 154.

(g) Lloyd's Memoirs of Loyal Sufferers, p. 607.

(i) Sir James Ware's Works, vol. i. p. 556.

(k) Vita Gulielmi Chappel.

(l) Sir James Ware's Works, vol. i. p. 566.

(m) Strafford's Letters, vol. i. p. 329.

(n) Vita Gulielmi Chappel.

(o) Dr. Borlace's Reduction of Ireland, p. 154.

Chriſtus tuetur, & ſcholarem me facit.
Binos gradus ſuſpicio. Verum quid agerem
Incertus hæſi: monet abire tenuitas
Parentum; at idem Chriſtus hîc ſpem mihi facit
Sodalitii, & anno ſequenti perfecit.
Mihi fauſta Julii dies penultima
Aperuit anguſtum hunc locum pauperculo;
Non clave munerum aut potentum litteris,
Sed (gratia Chriſti) ſtatutorum viâ.
Ætatis annus hic erat vigeſimus
Et quintus, annuſque Domini Jeſu mei
Poſt mille ſextieſque centum ſeptimus.
Ex illo, iis quæ ad utramque vitam ſunt opus
Circumfluo, qua officia, qua beneficia.

[B] To have an account.] In the ſpring of the year 1624 King James viſited the Univerſity of Cambridge, lodged in Trinity-College, and was entertained with a Philoſophical Act, and other academical performances (4). At theſe exerciſes Dr. Roberts of Trinity-College was reſpondent at St. Mary's, and Mr. Chappel puſhed him ſo hard, that feeling himſelf unable to ſuſtain the controverſy he fainted. Upon this King James, who valued himſelf much upon his capacity in ſuch matters, undertook to maintain the theſes, but with no better fortune than the Doctor; for Chappel was ſo much too hard for him at theſe logical weapons, that his Majeſty openly profeſſed he was glad that a man of ſuch great talents was ſo good a ſubject. Many years after this Sir William St. Leger riding to Cork with the Popiſh titular Dean of that city, it fell out that Mr. Chappel, then Dean of Caſhel, and Provoſt of Dublin, accidentally overtook them, upon which Sir William, who was then Preſident of Munſter, propoſed, that the two Deans ſhould diſpute, which, though Mr. Chappel was not forward to accept, yet he did not any ways decline. But the Popiſh Dean, with equal dexterity and addreſs, extricated himſelf from this dilemma, by ſaying, Excuſe me, Sir, I don't care to diſpute with a man who is wont to kill his reſpondent (5).

(4) Fuller's Hiſt. of Cambridge, p. 164.

(5) Borlace's Reduction of Ireland, p. 154.

[C] Will be told in the notes.] There were at this time conſiderable heats among the clergy in Ireland, many of them being inclined to thoſe that were then ſtiled Puritan opinions, which the Lord Deputy Wentworth, and his great friend Laud, wiſhed to ſee rooted out, as appears very plainly from their letters (6). Amongſt other methods taken for this purpoſe, one that was judged very neceſſary was, the introduction of a new charter into Trinity-College; and the hiſtory of this matter we will give in the words of a very intelligent and very impartial author (7). 'By the firſt 'charter, granted to the Univerſity in March 1591, 'the election of a Provoſt was placed in the Fellows, 'and ſo continued, until the vacancy made by the 'promotion of Dr. Uſher, as aforeſaid. Archbiſhop 'Laud, who was then Chancellor of the Univerſity, 'thought proper to introduce a new ſet of ſtatutes, 'which veſted the nomination of the Provoſt in the 'Crown. This project took ſome time in ripening; 'for the concurrence of the Fellows to this change was 'neceſſary, and they were induced to conſent to a ſurrender of their old charter, upon making them tenants for life in their offices under the new ſtatutes, 'whereas before they held their fellowſhips but for ſeven years, from the time they commenced maſter of 'arts; and ſo to gain eſtates for life in a ſmall ſhare of 'the government to themſelves, and their ſucceſſors, 'they parted with a more abſolute authority, which 'was temporary, and ſubmitted to a more unlimited 'power in their ſuperior. For theſe new ſtatutes 'were not ſo indulgent to the Fellows, and placed a 'more ſovereign authority in the Provoſts, than they 'were entruſted with by the old charter, from whence 'hath flowed the negative voice of the Provoſts in the 'election of Fellows, and other very ample powers.

(6) Strafford's Letters, vol. i. p. 329.

(7) Sir James Ware's Works, vol. i. p. 566, 567.

'While

ligence, for which he was always diſtinguiſhed in every office that he filled: he was perfectly learned in Caſuiſtical Divinity, had a clear underſtanding, ſound judgment, and was univerſally applauded for his diſcretion. His temper for government was ſuitable to his knowledge, in which he was highly eminent, as appeared in the mildneſs and regularity of his adminiſtration, and in the moſt perfect obedience of the ſcholars to the rules and ſtatutes of the houſe (p). That he might mix ſomething of the pleaſant with the profitable, and that young minds might not be oppreſſed with the unrelaxed ſeverity of their ſtudies, he inſtituted, amongſt the juniors, a Roman Commonwealth, which continued during the Chriſtmas-vacation, and in which they had their Dictators, Conſuls, and Cenſors, and other officers of the Roman State, in great ſplendour (q). While he was thus worthily and uſefully employed, his patrons, the Lord Wentworth and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, upon the promotion of Dr. Richard Boyle to the archbiſhoprick of Tuam, advanced Dean Chappel to the biſhopricks of Cork, Cloyne, and Roſs, and he was accordingly conſecrated November 11, 1638, in St. Patrick's at Dublin, though he had done all he could to decline this preferment (r). The King commanded, that he ſhould ſtill continue in his Provoſtſhip, which for ſome time he did, and at laſt reſigned it July 20, 1640; before which time he was very earneſt in endeavouring to obtain a ſmall biſhoprick in England, that he might return to his native country, and die in peace (s). His endeavours, however, were fruitleſs, and he was left in Ireland to feel all the fury of that ſtorm which he had long foreſeen. He was attacked in the Houſe of Commons with great bitterneſs and reſentment, by thoſe who were not ſo much enemies to him, as to the great men by whom he was preferred (t). This obliged him to come to Dublin from Cork, and he was compelled to put in ſureties for his appearance. In the month of June 1641, articles of impeachment were exhibited againſt him to the Houſe of Peers, conſiſting of fourteen, though the ſubſtance of them was reduced to two; the firſt perjury, on a ſuppoſed breach of his oath as Provoſt; the ſecond malice towards the Iriſh, founded on the diſcontinuing, during the time he was Provoſt, of an Iriſh lecture (u). Theſe articles were preſſed by a very ſevere ſpeech made by one Mr. Robert Biſſe, a famous Lawyer of thoſe times; to which the Biſhop made a reply, which however did not give ſatisfaction. The Lord Primate Uſher, and Dr. Anthony Martin, Biſhop of Meath, were the fierceſt of his adverſaries, and the proſecution againſt him was driven on with unexampled violence. The true cauſe of all this fury, was the vigour and activity he had ſhewn, in enforcing uniformity and ſtrict Church diſcipline in the College, in oppoſition to the ſchiſm and fanaticiſm of thoſe times (w). He was, in his whole conduct, one of the eveneſt and moſt conſtant men that ever lived; and yet, ſuch was the temper of the age in which he flouriſhed, that he lay under a continual load of calumny. At Cambridge he was thought a Puritan, from the ſtrictneſs of his morals; in Ireland they repreſented him as a Papiſt, from the fervency of his devotion, and his great exactneſs with reſpect to the ceremonies of the Church (x). While he laboured under ſo many and ſo great troubles, he was expoſed to ſtill greater, by the breaking out of the moſt execrable Rebellion in the latter end of that year. He was under a kind of confinement at Dublin, on account of the impeachment which was ſtill depending; but at length, after much application, and with no ſmall difficulty, he was allowed to embark for England, that from thence he might return to Cork, which from Dublin, as things then ſtood, he could not ſafely do (y). He embarked accordingly on the 26th of December, 1641, and the next day landed at Milford-haven, after a double eſcape, as himſelf phraſes it, from the Iriſh wolves, and from the Iriſh ſeas (z). He went from Milford-haven to Pembroke, and from Pembroke to Tenby, a little miſerable place, where, being detained for ſome time by the inclemency of the weather, an ill-natured fellow gave an information againſt him to the Mayor, who committed him to gaol upon the 25th of January, for coming over from Ireland without licence (a). In this ſad condition he continued ſeven weeks, till Sir Hugh Owen, who was a Member of Parliament, coming to his ſeat in that neighbourhood, cauſed him to be ſet at liberty, upon his giving bond in a thouſand pounds for his appearance; and on the ſixteenth of March he was diſcharged, and ſet out for Briſtol (b); where, upon his arrival, he had another unwelcome piece of news, which was, that the ſhip, on board of which were a great part of his effects, embarked by a friend of his at Cork for England, was loſt near Minehead, and therein, amongſt other things, periſhed his choice collection of books (c). What ſmall matters could be ſaved were ſent to Cheſter, from whence, though they had fallen into bad hands,

(p) Sir James Ware's Works, p. 567.

(q) Idem. ibid.

(r) Lloyd's Memoirs of Loyal Sufferers, p. 607. Strafford's Letters, vol. ii. p. 249.

(s) Vita Gulielmi Chappel.

(t) Lloyd's Memoirs of Loyal Sufferers, p. 607.

(u) Vita Gulielmi Chappel.

(w) Sir James Ware's Works, p. 567.

(x) Lloyd's Memoirs of Loyal Sufferers, p. 607.

(y) Vit. Gulielmi Chappel. Fuller's Worthies in Nottinghamſhire, p. 317.

(z) Vita Gulielmi Chappel.

(a) Sir James Ware's Works, vol. i. p. 567.

(b) Vita Gulielmi Chappel.

(c) Ware's Works, vol. i. p. 567.

'While this project was moulding, and bringing to 'perfection, it was thought neceſſary to keep the 'place unfilled, that the ſcheme might be at once car-'ried into execution by the King's nomination, and in 'the mean time Dean Chappel was placed over the 'college, although without the title of Provoſt.' A certain author, who does not ſeem to be at all partial in favour of our Dean, after giving a ſuccinct relation of his becoming Provoſt of Trinity-College, and his behaviour in that office, concludes his account thus (8). 'Yet certainly the exerciſes of the Univerſity were 'never ſtricter looked to, or diſcipline (if it were not 'too ceremonious) better obſerved than in his time; 'only the lecture for teaching Iriſh (whether through 'indulgence merely or enjoined by ſtatute, I am un-'certain) was, after his admiſſion, wholly waved.'

(8) Borlace's Reduction of Ireland, p. 154.

he ſafely received them, by the kind interpoſition and great diligence uſed by his friends. After ſuch a ſeries of misfortunes, as ſerved only to endear to him his religion and his country, he withdrew to his native ſoil, and ſpun out there the remainder of his life in a contemplative and pious, but withal not idle, retirement (d). He reſigned his ſoul to his Creator at Derby, where he had ſome time reſided, upon Whit-Sunday 1649 (e). In the laſt ſeven years of his life he had ſtruggled with many and great difficulties; and for ſome time, probably at the beginning of that period, he derived his ſubſiſtence from the charitable contributions of others. At the time of his deceaſe, however, he was either in poſſeſſion of ſome fortune, or had a reaſonable expectation that it might be recovered, ſince he directed by his will, that his eſtate, ſuch as it was, ſhould be divided between his family and the poor; for as he lived ſo he died, a good man and a good Chriſtian (f). As for his works, and more eſpecially as to the notion that has prevailed with ſome people, of his being the concealed author of that excellent treatiſe The Whole Duty of Man, we ſhall give the reader all the lights we are able in the notes (g) [D]. Some years after his deceaſe, a monument was erected to his memory, in the pariſh church of Bilſtorp, in Nottinghamſhire, where he was buried by the pious care

(d) See the concluding verſes of his life cited in note [D].

(e) Borlace's Reduction of Ireland, p. 154.

(f) Sir James Ware's Works, vol. i. p. 568. Lloyd's Memoirs of the Loyal Sufferers, p. 607. Fuller's Worthies in Nottinghamſhire, p. 317.

(g) See Mr. Beaupre Bell's Letter cited in note [D].

[D] We are able in the notes.] There is no reaſon to wonder, that a perſon of Biſhop Chappel's pious and primitive diſpoſition, ſhould, however well qualified in reſpect to parts and learning, decline the publication of his works in his life-time, more eſpecially when we conſider the misfortunes he had run through, and the ill uſage he had met with from different parts. Accordingly we find, that in his whole life he publiſhed but one book, and that in Latin, about a year before his death; and perhaps he was induced to this, from his having formerly communicated it to his intimate friends, or poſſibly to his pupils, ſo that it would have been impoſſible for him to have concealed his being the author of it, had he been ever ſo deſirous of doing it. The title of this work was,

I. Methodus Concionandi; London, 1648. 8°. that is, The method of preaching. Which, for its uſefulneſs, was alſo tranſlated into Engliſh. Our author, it ſeems, was not at all of Alſtedius's opinion, who judged, that the concealing the method uſed in preaching beſt ſecured the hearer's attention. Biſhop Chappel founded his theory on his practice, and being convinced by experience, that the way he uſed had the greateſt effect upon a general audience, he, for that reaſon, recommended it to others. It was his manner to raiſe doctrinal propoſitions from the words of his text, which he powerfully confirmed and enforced. And when a point of controverſy ſtarted, he did not endeavour to ſhew his eloquence on both ſides of the queſtion, but his abilities in eſtabliſhing the truth, beyond all oppoſition or doubt.——A certain author ſpeaks of this prelate and his book in the following terms (9). 'Biſhop Chappel was a man of a very ſtrict method, 'being an excellent man; famous for his many and 'eminent pupils, more for the eminent preachers 'made ſo by his admirable method, for the theory 'and praxis upon 2 Tim. iii. 16. for the practice of 'preaching. So good a diſputant, as to be able to 'maintain any thing, but ſo honeſt a man that he 'was willing to maintain only, as he would call 'them, ſober truths. Harraſſed between the rebellions in Ireland and England, where it was imputed 'to Biſhop Laud as a crime, that he preferred Biſhop 'Chappel; and to him, that he was preferred by him, 'being thought a Puritan before his preferment, and 'a Papiſt afterwards, though he was the ſame godly 'and orthodox man always.'

(9) Lloyd's Memoirs of Loyal Sufferers, p. 607.

II. The uſe of Holy Scripture. Lond. 1653. 8°. printed after his deceaſe.

III. The true method of Preaching. Lond. 1656. This is no other than the Engliſh tranſlation of his firſt mentioned work.

There are ſome variations in the two copies that have been publiſhed, of the manuſcript he left behind him of his own life in Latin. The Rev. Mr. Peck adds, by way of note, upon his edition, the following extract of a Letter from Mr. Beaupre Bell (10). 'Tis 'certain, The whole Duty of Man was written by one 'who ſuffered by the troubles in Ireland, and ſome 'lines in this piece give great grounds to conjecture 'that Biſhop Chappel was the author, 3 March 1734.' It would have been more ſatisfactory, if this gentleman had been pleaſed to point out the paſſages in the book he mentions, and thoſe in the life of Biſhop Chappel, which induced him to be of that opinion; but, as he has not, it may be the more excuſable to add a very few remarks upon this ſubject.

(10) Peck' Deſiderata Curioſa, vol. ii. l. xi. p. 7.

At the cloſe of Mr. Peck's edition of Biſhop Chappel's Latin life there are two lines, which are wanting in the edition publiſhed by Mr. Hearne, and which are a direct proof, that this pious Prelate paſſed the laſt ſeven years of his life in reviſing his writings. The lines are theſe (11):

(11) Ibid. p. 8.

Reviſo, quæ ante ſcripſeram. Et ſeptennium
Attexo, quod tunc fluxerat, prioribus.

The Whole Duty of Man was publiſhed in 1657, or rather, I think, in 1658; but it appears plainly from Dr. Hammond's letter to Mr. Garthwaite the bookſeller, prefixed to it, that it had been ready for the preſs ſome time before; and from various paſſages in the book, as well as from the prayer at the end of it, it is very plain that it was written before the death of King Charles the Firſt. So that in this reſpect it might very well be written by Biſhop Chappel. There is another circumſtance, much more favourable than this, to the opinion of his being the author of it; and that is the method of the book, which is perfectly agreeable to our Prelate's manner of writing. I may alſo add the fervency of the ejaculations, more eſpecially in the prayers for the Church, and for the peace of the Church, which are very ſuitable to the ſtrong and lively ſtrokes in his little work upon his own life. That if he had been the author of that, and other works, he might have deſired to conceal it, very clearly appears from the inſcription on his monument, drawn up by Archbiſhop Sterne (12).

(12) See that inſcription in note [E].

On the other hand, as a work of his was actually publiſhed with his name after his death, and his method of preaching tranſlated and ſent abroad in Engliſh the very year before the Whole Duty of Man was publiſhed, it is not eaſy to ſee the reaſon, why, if he had written the Whole Duty of Man, it ſhould have been ſuppreſſed in the title page, becauſe it would have added credit to the work, and done him no hurt. Some people have attributed the Whole Duty of Man to Mr. Abraham Woodhead (13), and others to Mr. Obadiah Walker (14), both of whom became Papiſts; but moſt apparent it is, that book was written by a true and ſincere member of the Church of England, and one who held that to be the Catholick Church. It has been very poſitively ſaid, that Lady Packington (15) was the author; and that the manuſcript of it in her own hand-writing, is in the poſſeſſion of the family, which, one may preſume, is the authority relied on to juſtify the placing this as an indubitable fact in a monumental inſcription to her memory. It is indeed very remarkable, that Dr. Hammond, in his letter to Mr. Garthwaite, has not a ſingle pronoun that determines the word author either to the maſculine or feminine gender; but then, it ſeems, that either he did not, or would not, ſeem to know, who was the author; though, if it was the Lady Packington, he could hardly be ignorant of it, in as much as he lived long, and at laſt died at her houſe.

(13) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 617.

(14) Ibid. col. 936.

(15) Engliſh Baronetage, vol. i. p. 398. 402.

of

of Dr. Richard Sterne, Archbiſhop of York; and becauſe there is ſomething very ſingular, and very well deſerving the reader's notice, in the inſcription upon that monument, we judged it neceſſary to inſert it at the bottom of the page (h) [E]. It is hoped, that the pains taken here to do juſtice to ſo learned, ſo pious, and ſo worthy a Prelate, whoſe virtues and whoſe ſufferings were alike extraordinary, will give peculiar ſatisfaction to the publick: for to write the lives of men highly eminent, and whoſe great and good actions have been juſtly celebrated, is a taſk rather pleaſant than hard; but to collect the ſcattered remembrances of ſuch as wiſhed to live concealed, and were content to be great and good in ſecret, is a labour equally difficult and laudable; as it can have no other intention than that of doing them juſtice, and contributing to the information of the world, in matters that might otherwiſe be for ever overſpread with oblivion; into which it has been obſerved, that the weightieſt things moſt eaſily ſink, while the lighteſt, for that very reaſon, ſwim upon the ſurface, and eſcape the deluge.

(h) Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, vol. i. l. xi. p. 8.

[E] At the bottom of the page.] It is no ſmall honour to the memory of this good man, that ſo excellent a Prelate as Biſhop Sterne, ſhowed ſo great affection for his remains; and it gives us alſo an opportunity of ſeeing his character drawn at large by the pen, or at leaſt by the direction, of ſo great a perſon, and ſo true a judge of mankind. After mentioning thoſe particulars of his life, which have been more fully inſiſted upon in this article, he proceeds thus: 'The excellent graces which (if any other did) 'he received in a plentiful meaſure from God, he 'adminiſtered, with a ſingular fidelity and ſucceſs, 'to his glory, and to the publick emolument of the 'Church. He was a ſtrenuous aſſertor of juſtice, 'wiſdom, and divine grace. By his love to God, 'and charity to men, as well friends as enemies, ac'cording to the law and example of Chriſt, he be'came to us both an example and law; he gave up 'his temporal goods, partly for Chriſt, partly to 'Chriſt; as to be hid from the world was always his 'greateſt deſire, ſo he never was able to compaſs it, 'nor can he now. In his ſixty-ſeventh year he 'calmly ſurrendered his ſoul to his Saviour on Whit'ſunday 1649, and is here depoſited, near his ve'nerable mother, expecting our Lord Chriſt, whom 'he enjoys. He had a younger brother (while he 'lived) named John Chappel, who was alſo a very 'eminent divine, and born for the pulpit. But he 'went to heaven before him, and his remains are bu'ried in the church of Mansfield Woodhouſe.' Chariſmata, quæ (ſi quis alius) plurima atque eximia à Domino acceperat, ſingulari tum fide tum felicitate, ad ejus gloriam publicumque eccleſiæ commodum adminiſtravit. Sapientiæ, juſtitiæ, gratiæ divinæ, ſtrenuus aſſertor. Charitate in Deum ac hominem, amicos atque inimicos, ad Chriſti legem, & exemplum factus nobis exemplum & lex. Bona temporalia, partim pro Chriſto, partim Chriſto reliquit, &c. C.

 [The two lines quoted, in note [D], from Biſhop Chappel's Latin life of himſelf, not only prove that he reviſed what he had before written, but that he added to it an account of ſeven years more.

On a tranſient view of the matter, it has a tendency to create ſome prejudice in the mind againſt our Prelate, that his warmeſt enemies in the Houſe of Peers, ſhould be the Lord Primate Uſher, and Dr. Anthony Martin, Biſhop of Meath. The excellent character of Archbiſhop Uſher is univerſally acknowledged, as well as his eminent learning; and Dr. Martin, who appears to have been a moſt reſpectable man in private life, was, at the ſame time, a very zealous Church-man (16). Perhaps the diſlike theſe two good men had to the proceedings of Laud, in the affair of the Univerſity of Dublin, had exaſperated their minds againſt Dr. Chappel, (who was the friend of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and indeed his agent) beyond all reaſon and juſtice. This muſt certainly have been the caſe, if we are to credit Dr. Leland's indignant account of the affair. The Houſe of Commons, ſays this Hiſtorian, "proceeded "to ſtrike at the very vitals of the religious eſta"bliſhment, by harraſſing the Univerſity. The re"gulations eſtabliſhed in this ſeminary by Arch"biſhop Laud, excluded Non-conformiſts of every "kind from its advantages and preferments. The "Houſe examined them with ſeverity, diſcovered "dangers never experienced, and ſuggeſted objec"tions which time had abundantly confuted. So "earneſt were the prevailing factions to condemn the "late ſtatutes, that the committee of the Commons "appointed to inſpect the College, accepted the "groſſeſt miſinformations, and diſgraced their re"port by palpable falſehoods. From a clauſe in "one ſtatute not rightly underſtood, they were per"ſuaded that every Member of the College was "prevented from divulging the grievances or miſ"government of the ſociety to any but the gover"nors, under pain of expulſion. They exclaimed "againſt the ſuppoſed prohibition as an infamous "contrivance to conceal and ſuppreſs the truth: "and it was voted null and void. They accuſed the "late Provoſt, by this time advanced to the Biſhop"ricks of Cork and Roſs, of clandeſtinely accepting "the new body of ſtatutes, with the concurrence of "two members only of the body; a fact evidently "falſe, and eaſy to be diſproved: his government, "his procuring the new charter, his acceptance of "the new regulations, were voted ſubverſive of the "antient foundation, and a grievous diſappoint"ment to natives of the kingdom, before this "charter was inſpected, or theſe regulations weighed. "They proceeded to a frivolous impeachment of the "Biſhop in the Houſe of Lords, and ſoon found it "impoſſible to be ſupported. In the plenitude of "their power they forbad any elections to be held, "or any leaſes executed, in the College, until the "Houſe of Commons ſhould give farther orders "therein; and to complete the triumph over royal "prerogative, the committee was empowered to in"ſpect the old and new ſtatutes, and to make ſuch "a compilation of laws from both, as they ſhould "judge neceſſary for the government of the College. "In the next ſeſſion, which was to complete this "ſcheme of reformation, public diſorders became "too violent to admit of any attention to the govern"ment of a College (17)."] K.

(16) Harris's edition of Sir James Ware's Works, vol. i. p. 157, 158.

(17) Leland's Hiſtory of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 78, 79.

CHARLETON (WALTER), a very learned Phyſician, and copious writer, from the middle of the laſt to the beginning of the preſent century, was deſcended from a very antient and worthy family of that name in the weſt of England, and the ſon of the Reverend Walter Charleton, M. A. ſome time Vicar of Ilminſter, and afterwards Rector of Shepton Mallet, in the county of Somerſet (a). He was born at Shepton Mallet, in the parſonage-houſe of his father, February 2, 1619 (b), and received the firſt rudiments of learning, not in a country grammar-ſchool, but by the care and induſtry of his parent, who was a man of extenſive capacity, though but indifferently furniſhed with the goods of fortune. He made it his buſineſs, however, to qualify his ſon Walter for the Univerſity; and when he found him fit for it, which was about the age of ſixteen, he ſent sent him to Oxford, where he was entered of Magdalen-Hall (c), in Lent term 1635. It was no small happiness for him, that he became the pupil of the famous Dr. John Wilkins, afterwards Bishop of Chester, under whom he made a great progress in Logick and Philosophy, very far superior to any thing that could be expected from one of his years (d). His parts were very brisk and lively, but he was rather more conspicuous on the score of his application, and of his extensive capacity, which enabled him to form very just notions of the connection that subsists between the Sciences, and encouraged him to aim at making himself an universal scholar (e). As his circumstances would not allow him to pursue Science at large, but on the contrary obliged him to think of some particular profession, which might be useful to him in his subsistence, as well as contribute to his reputation in passing through life, he addicted himself very early to Physick (f), and in a short time made as great a progress therein as he had done in his former studies. The breaking out of the Civil War, as it brought the Royal Presence to Oxford, was, in that respect, favourable to Mr. Charleton, who had in himself so much real merit, and knew so well how to display it, that by the favour of the King he had the degree of Doctor of Physick conferred upon him in February 1642 (g), and was soon after made one of the Physicians in Ordinary to his Majesty; at which time he was looked upon as a very extraordinary genius, and, as such, became very early the object of that envy and resentment, of which he could never get the better as long as he lived (h) [A]. Upon the declension of the royal cause, he came up to London, was admitted of the College of Physicians, came into considerable practice, and lived in much esteem with the ablest and most learned men of the profession; such as the celebrated Sir Francis Prujean; the learned and penetrating Sir George Ent; the glory of that college, and the honour of this nation, Dr. William Harvey, and others, by whom he was much assisted, and towards whom he behaved with the utmost gratitude and respect (i). In the space of ten years before the Restoration, he wrote and published several very ingenious and learned treatises, as well on physical as other subjects, by which he gained great reputation, and very deservedly, considering the times in which they were written; and that many of those discoveries were then in their infancy, which have been since prosecuted with the most happy effect. By these books his

(a) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 1112.

(b) MS. notes relating to the Life of Dr. Charleton.

(c) Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. l. ii. p. 377.

(d) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 1112.

(e) MS. notes relating to the Life of Dr. Charleton.

(f) Taken from his own writings, and particularly his Dedication of The Darkness of Atheism dispelled by the Light of Nature, to Sir Francis Prujean.

(g) Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. l. ii. p. 377.

(h) MS. notes of the Life of Dr. Charleton.

(i) This is collected from his Dedications to those excellent persons.

[A] As long as he lived.] If we consider the state of learning at this time, in the University of Oxford, and what a number of men of more than ordinary capacities there were in every faculty, one must be sufficiently convinced that the gentleman, who is the subject of the present article, must have distinguished himself in a very surprizing manner, to obtain the honour of a Doctor's degree in Physick at the age of twenty-two (1), as is very justly observed in his commendation by Anthony Wood; who affirms, that he received this honour, as well by the favour of the King, as from the grace of the University of Oxford; adding, that he was, beyond all doubt, a very learned man, and one, who made a shining figure in his profession. Vir proculdubio doctus, & in sua facultate clarus (2). He thought fit afterwards to alter this character a little, and to represent poor Dr. Charleton as a man exceedingly learned in his own opinion (3). But, as is observed in the text, this spirit of envy began to shew itself early against Dr. Charleton; so that after the decease of his royal Master he would have found his admission into the College of Physicians a thing of very great difficulty, if he had not been supported by some of the principal members of that learned body, more especially Dr. Prujean, who was then President; and who, with as great a reputation as most, raised a greater estate than any Physician of his own time. To this worthy man he not only stood indebted for this favour, but for many others, which we learn from himself; such as defending his character, when attacked by such as disliked his civil and religious principles, for the Doctor professed himself a Royalist and a Churchman, when there was neither King nor Church; which, no doubt, increased the number, and at the same time added to the boldness of such as envied, and would willingly have run down his abilities. The same kind person revised, corrected, and improved his writings; and this Dr. Charleton openly as well as gratefully acknowledges, which, by the way, is no great sign of his entertaining so high an opinion of his own learning. Besides all this, he likewise owed his life to Dr. Prujean, who recovered him from an epidemic dysentery, by which he was brought to death's door in the year 1650, which he acknowledged in this epigram (4).

(1) MS. Memoirs relating to the Life of Dr. Charleton.

(2) Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. l. ii. p. 377.

(3) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 1112.

(4) In the Epistle Dedicatory prefixed to The Darkness of Atheism dispelled by the Light of Nature.

Auxiliis Prujan, anima hæc moribunda revixit;
Ut vigil infusâ Pallade, flamma solet.

Snatched from the Grave by Prujan's help I live,
As wasting lamps by oil supply'd revive.

We may, from hence, collect the reasons why this gentleman stood exposed to so many assaults; and yet while his health, vigour, and friends lasted, he got the better of them all. He came into the world early, and with vast expectations; this naturally excited envy. He was for many years of a declining party, which opened the mouths of the malicious. He was very fond of Chemistry, and a friend to the new discoveries in Physick, which of course exposed him to the resentment of those who laboured to decry and explode both. It must, however, be allowed, that he had his failings, and, indeed, who has them not? He was a bold and lively writer, and supported his sentiments with a flow of spirit, and of language, that had a great air of confidence; and in his English writings especially, his stile was a little crabbed, too much loaded with hard words, and now and then interspersed with new terms of his own devising. From all this we find him very kindly defended by Dr. Clement Barksdale, in a copy of verses prefixed to one of Dr. Charleton's books, from which, though none of the best, I will venture to quote a few lines (5).

(5) These are also prefixed to the book last cited.

'Tis fit that censure wait on all that's done;
'Wits are made great by emulation.
Some places are obscure. The book's not good,
By every vulgar head is understood.
What you don't understand, read o'er again;
Compare, confer, and meditate. 'Tis plain.
Th' English is Latin. Know, that the English tongue
Hath from each language consummation:
And he that will our learnedst writers scan,
Must be both Latinist and Grecian.
The stile's too high. Fear not the critick's rod:
'High phrase is born of your high thoughts of God.
Forward, dear brother: 'Gifts for use are lent:
'To do most good brings in the most content.
Your physick has done miracles: But sure,
Th' atheist convert is thy noblest cure.

name

name became known abroad as well as at home; and though they are now leſs regarded than perhaps they deſerve, yet they were then received with almoſt univerſal approbation (k) [B]. He became, as a certain writer tells us, Phyſician in Ordinary to King Charles II. while in exile (l); and, as it was very reaſonable, retained that honour after the King's return; and, upon the founding of the Royal Society, became one of the firſt Members (m) of that moſt learned and illuſtrious body. Amongſt others, his kind patrons and intimate friends, was that worthy Royaliſt, and generous Nobleman, William Cavendiſh, Duke of Newcaſtle, whoſe Life Dr. Charleton tranſlated into Latin in a very clear and elegant ſtyle (n). He was alſo well acquainted with, and a ſincere friend to, the famous Philoſopher of Malmſbury, Thomas Hobbes (o), which, together with his avowed reſpect for the Epicurean Philoſophy, drew ſome ſuſpicions upon him in regard to his religion, notwithſtanding the pains he had taken to diſtinguiſh between the religious and philoſophical opinions of that famous Greek, in his own writings againſt infidelity. Yet how much ſoever he might ſuffer by theſe calumnies in the opinions of ſome, this made no impreſſion upon his ſpirit; but he continued with the ſame vigour and diligence to proſecute his ſtudies, and to oblige the Republick of Letters with new productions, which were generally well received, and ſome of them have (k) Morhoff's Polyhiſt. II. 1, 5, 5.

(l) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 1112.

(m) See the Liſt of Members at the end of Biſhop Sprat's Hiſt. of the Royal Society.

(n) Publiſhed at London, in fol. 1668.

(o) Vita Hobbianæ Auctarium, p. 186.

[B] With almoſt univerſal approbation.] In this note we ſhall give an account of the works publiſhed by our author before the Reſtoration, ſome of which it is very poſſible were written at the requeſt of Booksellers, more eſpecially the tranſlations; and the reſt, by the perſuaſion of his friends, for particular purpoſes, of ſeveral of which we ſhall be able to give ſome account.

I. A Ternary of Paradoxes. (1.) Of the magnetic cure of wounds. (2.) Nativity of Tartar in wine; and, (3.) The image of God in man. Lond. 1650, 4°. Written in Latin by John Baptiſt Van Helmont.

II. The Errors of Phyſicians concerning Defluxions, called Deliramenta Catarrhi. Lond. 1650. 4°. Written by Van Helmont, and printed with a ternary of paradoxes.

III. Spiritus Gorgonicus vi ſua ſaxipara exutus, ſive de cauſis, ſignis, & ſanatione lithiaſeos, diatriba. Ludg. Bat. 1650, in 8°. that is, 'The Gorgonic ſpirit deprived of its ſtone-producing power, or a diſcourſe of the cauſes, ſymptoms, and cure of the ſtone.' This book is generally known by the ſhorter title of Diatriba de Lithiaſi; or, 'a Diſcourſe upon the Stone.' There are in this book of our author's, and indeed in almoſt every piece he wrote, many ſingular, curious, and judicious obſervations; and as ſuch they have been tranſcribed, though ſometimes without the leaſt mention of this gentleman's name, by other writers of conſiderable figure, both at home and abroad; which was a fault never committed by Dr. Charleton, who was very careful in beſtowing on every man his due praiſes, and by conſtantly owning to whom he was obliged, drew upon himſelf the unkind and unjuſt cenſure of compiling his books from thoſe of other men. But it would have ſaved abundance of controverſy amongſt the members of the republick of letters, if great authors had never ſuffered themſelves to be miſled by this falſe ſhame, of being thought compilers, which Dr. Charleton very juſtly deſpiſed.

IV. The Darkneſs of Atheiſm diſpelled by the Light of Nature. A Phyſico-Theological Treatiſe, written by Walter Charleton, Doctor in Phyſick, and Phyſician to the late King. Lond. 1652, 4°. To this work there is prefixed a dedication in Latin to Dr. Francis Prujean, dated the 1ſt of Auguſt 1651, though in the printed copies it is, by miſtake, 1641. There is as much learning, and reading, in this book, as, perhaps, in any of its ſize in our language; and thoſe parts of it that ſeem to fall moſt within the compaſs of a Phyſician's knowledge, are treated with the utmoſt ſkill and exactneſs, more eſpecially that famous queſtion, whether the term of man's life be mutable or fixed. Upon this occaſion, he tells us a very remarkable ſtory of a godly Phyſician in the Parliament's army, who being a rigid Fataliſt, gave out his preſcriptions by lot, and ſo left his patients to take their chance, though he took his fees (6); which is a proof, that abſurd opinions in Divinity may have dreadful effects on men's practice.

(6) Darkneſs of Atheiſm diſpelled by the Light of Nature, p. 251.

V. The Epheſian and Cimmerian Matrons, two remarkable Examples of the Power of Love and Wit. Lond. 1653; and again in 1658, 8°.

VI. Phyſiologia Epicuro-Gaſſendo-Charltoniana; or, A Fabrick of natural Science erected upon the moſt antient hypotheſis of Atoms. Lond. 1654, fol.

VII. Epicurus his Morals. Lond. 1655, 4°. This work of his is divided into thirty-one chapters, and in theſe he fully treats all the principles of the Epicurean Philoſophy, digeſted under their proper heads; tending to prove, that, conſidering the ſtate of the heathen world, the morals of Epicurus were as good as any, as in a former work he had ſhewn, that his philoſophick opinions were the beſt of any, or at leaſt capable of being explained in ſuch a manner, as that they might become ſo in the hands of a modern Philoſopher (7). To this book there is prefixed a ſuccinct apology for Epicurus, which I make no ſcruple of aſſerting to be the moſt ſenſible, as well as the moſt learned and curious, that is any where extant, and very far exceeding ſome that have been written in other languages; and while this is forgotten, are in the preſent poſſeſſion of the world's applauſe.

(7) It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that this work was tranſlated into ſeveral modern languages.

VIII. The Immortality of the human Soul demonſtrated by Reaſons natural. Lond. 1657, 4°.

IX. 'Oeconomia Animalis novis in Medicina hypotheſibus ſuperſtructa & mechanicè explicata. Autore Gualtero Charleton, M. D. & Caroli Magnæ Britanniæ Regis olim Medico.' Lond. 1659, 12mo. Id. Amſtelodami, 1659, in 12mo. Id. Lugd. Bat. 1678, in 12mo. Id. Hagæ Comit. 1681, in 12mo. that is, The Animal Oeconomy according to the new Diſcoveries in Phyſick, as alſo mechanically explained. It appears clearly, by an epiſtle addreſſed to Dr. Ent, and prefixed to this book, that it was written at leaſt ſix, if not ſeven years before it was publiſhed; for that epiſtle is dated June 12th, 1653, and the author ſpeaks as if he had written the book nearly a year before. The deſign of that epiſtle is to acquaint the reader, that this learned perſon, who was juſtly eſteemed one of the ableſt Phyſicians of his age, had peruſed and approved it. It is dedicated to Thomas Viſcount Falconbridge, the author's great patron, and ſeems to have been written at his requeſt. The Dedication is dated March 25th, 1659, that is, according to the Engliſh computation, and ſuppoſing that to be the firſt day of the year. The title of this book ſufficiently ſhews the deſign of it; and whoever conſiders the diſtribution of the chapters will very eaſily conceive, that it was from it a modern writer of the firſt rank amongſt our neighbours, took his plan of a work of the ſame kind, and publiſhed very nearly under the ſame title. To the laſt edition of our author's work in Holland, is joined Dr. William Cole's Diſſertation upon Animal Secretion.

X. The Natural Hiſtory of Nutrition, Life, and voluntary Motion; containing all the new Diſcoveries of Anatomiſts, &c. Lond. 1658, 4to.

XI. Excercitationes Phyſico-Anatomicæ de Oeconomia Animali. Lond. 1659, 8°. That is, Phyſico-Anatomical Diſſertations upon the Animal Oeconomy. Printed afterwards ſeveral times beyond the ſeas. I been often re-printed (p) [C]. He had the misfortune to draw upon himself a new load of envy, by venturing to differ in opinion from the celebrated Inigo Jones, who, for the satisfaction of his royal Master, had written a discourse upon Stonehenge, in which he attributed that celebrated pile to the Romans, and asserted it to be no other, than a temple dedicated by them to the god CŒLUS, or CŒLUM (q); which opinion of his Dr. Charleton could not confide in, but thought rather that this antiquity belonged to later and more barbarous times. Upon this, it is said, that he transmitted Jones's book, which was not published till after its author's death, to Olaus Wormius, or caused it to be transmitted to that learned Danish Antiquary, who thereupon wrote him several letters, tending to fortify him in his own sentiment, by proving that this work ought rather to be attributed to his countrymen the Danes (r). With the assistance of these materials, Dr. Charleton undertook to set this matter in a clear light; and in a treatise written expressly upon that subject, offered many strong arguments to shew, that this could not be a Roman temple, and several plausible reasons why it ought rather to be considered as a Danish monument (s). This book of his, though in itself very learned, and enriched with a great variety of curious observations, was but indifferently received by the many; and though approved, was but coldly defended by the few; which, however, does not at all lessen its merit with posterity [D]. To this book there

(p) See this fully justified in note [C].

(q) The most noble Antiquity of Britain, vulgarly called Stonehenge, on Salisbury Plain, restored. Lond. 1655, fol.

(r) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 1113.

(s) See this farther explained in the note [D].

[C] Have been often reprinted.] About the time of the Restoration, in order to dispose the people, not only to a quiet submission, and acquiescence under the Royal Authority, but also to excite a spirit of loyalty, and sincere affection for that monarch (8), he undertook, from the knowledge he had of him in his youth, and the near access he had at this time to his person, to send abroad a picture of him, drawn by his pen, which he accordingly did under the following title.

(8) Kennet's Chronicle, p. 674.

XII. A Character of his most sacred Majesty Charles the Second, King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. Written by Dr. Charleton, Physician in Ordinary to his Majesty. Lond. 1660, in one sheet in quarto, printed again in 1662.

XIII. 'Exercitations Pathologicæ, in quibus morborum pene omnium natura, generatio, & causæ, 'ex novis Anatomicorum inventis sedulo inquiruntur.' Lond. 1660, printed there again in 1661, 4to. that is, Pathological Dissertations, in which the nature, generation, and causes of almost all diseases are most diligently set forth. This book has been also very deservedly commended and admired, as an excellent introduction to the study of Physick. The reader will easily discern the relation that our author's works have to each other; and how, after having first explained the philosophy of atoms, in a sober and solid manner, so as to render it fit to give his reader a clear notion of the mechanical superstructures he meant to raise upon it, he proceeded next to the animal œconomy, and having considered the human body as a curious and wonderful machine, suited to various purposes, by a vast variety of contrivances, which, by the help of the new discoveries, he explained in the best manner possible at that time, goes on from thence to the view of this curious machine, when disturbed, and out of order, shows how, and whence, those disorders arise, the signs with which they are attended, by which they may be known, and, when known, by what methods they may be removed. After rendering these services to Physick, he stopped a little, and turned his thoughts, as the reader will see in the next note, to other subjects, which he handled with equal learning and ingenuity.

[D] Lessen its merit with posterity.] As the whole of this work of our author is very curious and learned, and as it will afford us an opportunity of giving a succinct account of the several opinions that have been maintained, and the principal treatises that have been written, in relation to Stone-Henge, the most famous antiquity in our country, it will be first of all requisite to give the title of our author's work at large, which runs thus:

XIV. Chorea Gigantum: Or, The most famous Antiquity of Great Britain, STONE-HENGE, standing on Salisbury Plain, restored to the Danes. By Walter Charleton, M. D. and Physician in ordinary to his Majesty. Lond. 1663. 4to.

This book was dedicated to his Royal Master, and in the Dedication there is contained a very memorable piece of History. 'I have had the honour to hear, 'from that oracle of truth and wisdom, your Majesty's 'own mouth, you were pleased to visit that monument, and for many hours together entertain your-'self with the delightful view thereof; when, after 'the defeat of your loyal army at Worcester, Almighty God, in infinite mercy to your three kingdoms, 'miraculously delivered you out of the bloody jaws of 'those monsters of sin and cruelty.' In respect to the different opinions that have been advanced as to this famous monument, we are first to consider the matter of which it is composed, and next, the manner in which it was erected. As to the former it is agreed, that there are three rows of great stones, some of which are twenty-eight feet high, and seven broad, that stand almost in the form of a crown; and over some of them other stones are laid, with tenons and mortises. But then it is enquired, whether these stones be natural or factitious? Dr. Childrey holds the first (9), as also, that they actually grew in this place; and he thinks the argument brought to prove the contrary, from the want of stones, either little or big, in that neighbourhood, makes rather for his opinion, because nature could not provide herself of lapidifick matter otherwise, than by robbing the adjacent parts to compose these huge stones. He thinks it also no small confirmation of this notion, that upon the Downs about Marlborough, not above twenty miles from Stone-Henge, there are found abundance of such great stones, commonly called by the country people the Grey Weathers; and at Aubery, in an orchard, there are half a dozen, or half a score stones little inferior in size to those of Stone-Henge, some standing upright, and some lying flat on the ground, and the country thereabouts affording scarcely a stone beside. On the other hand, Mr. Camden (10), and many other sensible people, have thought them artificial, composed of stone-dust, or sand, held together by some petrifying juice. They were led to this opinion by observing, that in this country there are no such stones, indeed hardly any stones; and next, that the size of these stones renders it very improbable that they were brought thither by land-carriage; to which they add, that Pliny (11), and other authors, very positively mention such factitious stones as an invention common in their days, which, to them, puts the thing out of doubt. But, however, later experience has fully decided this question in favour of the former notion, for that these very stones are natural, and no composition, is a point now out of dispute. The sentiments of learned men in relation to the work itself, are still very much divided; but to bring them within the compass of a note, we may range them under seven heads. (I.) A certain author would persuade us, that Stone-Henge ought to be ascribed to the Phœnicians (12). But, however, that has not much prevailed; and till we have better arguments than any he has produced, very few will think it part of true history, that the Phœnicians performed any great exploits in this island. (II.) The celebrated Inigo Jones (13) would have this a Roman work, and, as we have said in the text, a temple to the (9) Britannia Baconica, p. 48, 49.

(10) Camden's Britan. col. 95, 96, 97.

(11) Hist. Naturalis, lib. xxxvii.

(12) Sammes's Britannia Antiqua Illustrata, p. 335.

(13) In his posthumous Treatise upon that subject, mentioned in the text.

there was an angry anſwer written by Mr. Jones's (t) ſon-in-law, who was the editor alſo of that work which had occaſioned the diſpute. In ſhort, there was a great clamour raiſed againſt it, and many liberties were taken with Dr. Charleton's character, upon account of this performance; and this, notwithſtanding Sir William Dugdale, and ſome other of the moſt eminent Antiquaries in the kingdom, owned themſelves to be of our author's opinion (u). However, all the noiſe and envy of his enemies could not hinder him from riſing to the higheſt honours of his profeſſion, or from being celebrated, even in his life-time, as one of its greateſt ornaments, to which his Anatomical Prelections in the College Theatre, in the ſpring of the year 1683 (w), did not a little contribute, as well as his full and ſatisfactory Defence of the immortal Hervey's claim to the diſcovery of the circulation of the blood, againſt the pretence that was ſet up in favour of Father Paul (x), which our author clearly confuted. This certainly ought to be remembered in honour to his memory; not only as it is a very ſtrong proof of his great capacity and extenſive learning, and as it was in ſome meaſure a vindication of the honour of this nation, but alſo as a generous teſtimony of his eſteem and gratitude to his deceaſed friend, qualities not over common in modern times, and for which therefore it would be barbarous to deny him that applauſe he ſo juſtly merits. It was from theſe motives, that in 1689 (y), he was choſen Preſident of the College of Phyſicians, in which office he continued to the year 1691. A little after this, his circumſtances becoming narrow, he found himſelf under the neceſſity of ſeeking a retreat in the Iſland of Jerſey, where he reſided at the time that Anthony Wood took ſome very extraordinary liberties with his character, repreſenting it in a light very different from (t) A Vindication of Stonehenge reſtored. London, 1665, fol.

(u) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 1113.

(w) Goodall's Hiſtorical Accounts of the College's proceedings againſt Empiricks in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to Dr. Whiſtler.

(x) See the article HERVEY (WILLIAM).

(y) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 1113.

the god Cœlum; but therein his imagination and learning got the better of his judgment, and even of his ſenſes; for he deſcribes Stone-Henge not as it is, but as it ſhould be, to make it conſiſtent with what he has delivered: he makes a regular hexagon of what is rather an octagon, or, to ſpeak with ſtill greater propriety, a polygon, altogether irregular. But for all this, his book is highly valuable, and the number of fine things there are in it, very fully atone for any miſtakes that it may contain. (III.) Our author, in his treatiſe upon this ſubject, will have it to be a Daniſh monument (14), and he grounds his opinion chiefly on the miſtake, which he ſuppoſes to have been made in relation to its ancient name; for he aſſerts, that inſtead of the Giants Dance, which is the name it bears in our ancient writers, it ought to have been ſtiled, the Aſſembly of the Chiefs, or Nobles; and in ſupport of this, he ſays a great deal that is very well worth reading; nor the leſs ſo, for the informations he received from the learned Olaus Wormius. Yet after all, he was as much deceived in his opinions, as the writer whom he oppoſed; for, beyond a queſtion, the Danes could not be the founders of this monument, ſince we find it mentioned by Nennius (15), a writer who flouriſhed two hundred years before the Danes came into England. (IV.) It has been aſſerted in general terms, that this was a temple of the Druids, erected long before the Romans came into Britain; and in defence of this Mr. John Aubrey, a very knowing Antiquary, and one particularly well acquainted with all the ancient monuments in Wiltſhire, has written an expreſs treatiſe (16), which has had its weight with the moſt ſtudious perſons in this kind of learning, who have inclined to think him, if not exactly right, yet much nearer the truth than any of the reſt. (V.) Another author, whoſe name at preſent is, and in all probability will continue, a ſecret, has advanced a notion more ſingular and extraordinary than any of theſe (17). He ſays, that this was a temple erected to the honour of Anaraith, the goddeſs of victory; and that in this place the illuſtrious Steynings, a famous giant, having defeated Diviaticus and his Belgæ, ſacrificed the captives and ſpoils to the idol before-mentioned, upon her altar here. It is not, however, very probable, notwithſtanding the pains this gentleman has taken, that this ſtory of his will ever grow into any great credit. (VI.) The moſt ingenious Edward Bolton, Eſq; who was a very learned Antiquary, as well as an excellent Hiſtorian, gives us a hint that it was a monument raiſed to the memory of Queen Boadicea (18), his great heroine, by her ſubjects the Britons. But though the conjecture is certainly not amiſs, yet perhaps, the proof might be found very difficult. (VII.) The laſt and moſt common notion is, that it was the burial-place of Arthur Pendragon, Conſtantine, Ambroſius, and other Britiſh Princes; or, that it was a monument erected by Ambroſius in memory of a multitude of Britons here baſely ſlain by the Saxons (19); and in ſupport of this it is alledged, that in very ancient manuſcripts, and thoſe of the beſt authority, this famous monument is called Stan-Hengiſt, for which different reaſons are aſſigned. We will conclude this long, tho' we hope not tedious, note, with a ſhort quotation from a copy of commendatory verſes prefixed to this work of our author by John Dryden, Eſq; (20), not barely on account of the beauty of the verſes, and the harmony of his numbers, or their containing the praiſe of our author and his writings, but for the ſake of the hiſtory contained in them, and his fine deſcription of the paſt, and at that time preſent ſtate of learning in England.

(14) Chorea Gigantum, &c.

(15) Hiſt. Britonum, cap. xlii.

(16) Monumenta Britannica, MS.

(17) Diſſertations upon Stonehenge, MS. formerly belonging to the Rev. Mr. Paſchal, Rector of Chedſey, near Bridgwater, and of which there are various copies in the hands of curious perſons.

(18) In his Nero Cæſar, at the concluſion.

(19) Agreeable to what is delivered by Geoffry of Monmouth, in his Britiſh Hiſtory, &c.

(20) Original Poems and Tranſlations, by John Dryden, Eſq; vol. ii. p. 207.

Among th' aſſerters of free reaſon's claim,
Our nation's not the leaſt in worth or fame.
The world to Bacon does not only owe
Its preſent knowledge, but its future too.
Gilbert ſhall live, 'till loadſtones ceaſe to draw,
Or Britiſh fleets the boundleſs ocean awe.
And noble Boyle, not leſs in nature ſeen,
Than his great brother read in ſtates and men.
The circling ſtreams once thought but pools of blood
(Whether life's fuel, or the body's food)
From dark oblivion Harvey's name ſhall ſave;
While Ent keeps all the honour that he gave.
Nor are you, learned friend, the leaſt renown'd;
Whoſe fame, not circumſcrib'd with Engliſh ground,
Flies like the nimble journies of the light;
And is, like that, unſpent too in its flight.
Whatever truths have been, by art, or chance,
Redeem'd from error, or from ignorance,
Thin in their authors (like rich veins of ore)
Your works unite and ſtill diſcover more.
Such is the healing virtue of your pen,
To perfect cures on books, as well as men.
Nor is this work the leaſt: You well may give
To men new vigour, who make ſtones to live.
Through you, the Danes, (their ſhort dominion loſt)
A longer conqueſt than the Saxons boaſt.
STONE-HENGE, once thought a Temple, you have found
A Throne where Kings, our earthly gods, were crown'd;
Where by their wond'ring ſubjects they were ſeen,
Joy'd with their ſtature, and their princely mien.
Our Sovereign here above the reſt might ſtand,
And here be choſe again to rule the land.
These ruins ſhelter'd once his ſacred head,
When He from Wor'ſter's fatal battle fled;
Watch'd by the genius of this Royal place,
And mighty viſions of the Daniſh race.
His refuge, then, was for a Temple ſhown:
But, He reſtor'd, 'tis now become a Throne.

that, in which, during the Doctor's proſperity, he had thought fit to place it (z). It is not eaſy to ſay, what the cauſes were of our learned Phyſician's misfortunes, except it may be the death of his friends and patrons, and thoſe changes to which all things in this world are ſubject, together with the faſhion of following ſuch Phyſicians as are in vogue, though not more learned or more ſucceſsful than their predeceſſors. That it was not any decay of parts, or loſs of underſtanding, is very apparent from hence; that the very laſt of his books was, in point of various learning, equal to any that he had formerly publiſhed, more exact in its method, more correct in its ſtyle, and in every circumſtance more highly finiſhed than any of his former (a). Of this, as well as of his other performances, ſome account will be given in a note [E]. We have not been able

(z) Hiſt. & Antiq. Oxon. p. 377.

(a) See this point explained in note [E].

[E] Some account will be given in a note.] We are here, according to the promiſe made in the text, to ſpeak of the remainder of our learned author's works, and this we ſhall do as clearly and as conciſely as it is poſſible.

XV. Diſquiſitiones duæ Anatomico-Phyſicæ; altera Anatome pueri de cœlo tacti, altera de proprietatibus cerebri humani. Londini 1664, 8°. That is, Two Anatomico-Phyſical Diſſertations; the firſt, concerning a boy killed by lightning; the ſecond, of the properties of the human brain. In the former of theſe, he diſcourſes largely of the nature and effects of thunder and lightning; explodes the vulgar error, concerning perſons being killed with thunder-bolts; and inſerts occaſionally many other curious obſervations and reflections, as well in regard to Natural Philoſophy, as Anatomy and Phyſick. In the latter alſo, he gives a great many ſingular, and in thoſe days new diſcoveries, and treats the ſubject with much learning and perſpicuty (21).

(21) Morhoff. Polyhiſt. II. 2, 7, 5.

XVI. Gulielmi Ducis Novicaſtrenſis vita. Londini 1668, in fol. That is, The Life of William Duke of Newcaſtle. This, as has been obſerved in the text, is no other than a tranſlation of the life of that eminent Stateſman, and great Captain, written originally by his conſort, Margaret Ducheſs of Newcaſtle; and the reader may find a copious account of it in another article of this work (22).

(22) See article CAVENDISH (William) Duke of Newcaſtle.

XVII. Onomaſticon Zoicon plerorumque Animalium differentias & nomina propria pluribus linguis exponens. Cui accedunt mantiſſa Anatomices, & quædam de variis Foſſilium generibus. Londini 1668, & 1671, in 4°. Id. Oxonii 1677, in fol. That is, The names of ſeveral Animals in many languages; to which is annexed an Anatomical Appendix, and ſome obſervations as to the different kinds of Foſſils. It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that ſome copies of the laſt edition are with, and ſome without cuts; the former are ſcarce, and bear a greater value than any of the reſt of Dr. Charleton's works.

XVIII. Two philoſophical Diſcourſes: the firſt, Concerning the different wits of men; the ſecond, concerning the myſtery of Vintners; or, A Diſcourſe of the various ſickneſſes of Wines, and their reſpective Remedies at this day commonly uſed, &c. Lond. 1668, 1675, 1692, 8°. This ſome have thought a little below the character of our author, and much inferior to his other writings. In all probability it was compoſed from obſervations ſet down in his common-place books, without any intention of publiſhing them originally; and it is very likely that he was perſuaded to ſend them abroad, either by ſome of his friends, or by ſome bookſeller, to whom they might be uſeful. In this he had the ſame misfortune with other great writers, who have been too ready to commit to the preſs thoſe pieces that were only fit for their cloſets, from a notion, that their bare names may ſupport any thing; whereas the greateſt writer runs the hazard of his reputation, every time he ventures to ſubmit a new work to the publick view.

XIX. De Scorbuto liber ſingularis; cui acceſſit Epiphonema in Medicaſtros. Londini 1671, in 8°. Id. Lugd. Bat. 1672, in 12mo. That is, Of the Scurvy a ſingle book; to which is added, an Excurſion againſt Quacks. The very learned father Niceron (23) obſerves, very juſtly, that there is great variety of curious matter contained in this book. The very ſame thing may be juſtly ſaid of moſt of our author's writings, ſince we find in them not only the fruits of general reading, and extenſive learning, but alſo the effects of his experimental knowledge, and of his enquiries, and converſations, with other learned perſons of the Faculty; ſo that one has, generally ſpeaking, in a very narrow view, all that could be expected on the ſubject he handles, and even more, becauſe the circle of his knowledge is commonly wider than that of his reader's, which contributes not a little to the value of his books.

(23) Memoires des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. xvii. p. 215.

XX. Natural Hiſtory of the Paſſions. Lond. 1674, 8°. This is alſo a very curious and inſtructive treatiſe, ſuitable to the philoſophick ſpirit that reigned at that time, when it was faſhionable for men of parts and learning to employ their time in endeavouring thoroughly to underſtand human nature; towards which we may, without flattery, affirm, that none afforded greater helps than our author, who has written almoſt upon every ſubject that can be held juſtly neceſſary to this purpoſe, and with great induſtry laboured to give us the hiſtory both of the body and of the mind.

XXI. Enquiries into human Nature, in ſix Anatomy Prelections, in the new Theatre of the Royal College of Phyſicians in London. London, 1680, 4°.

XXII. Oratio anniverſaria habita in Theatro inclyti Collegii Medicorum. Lond. 5 Aug. 1680, in commemorationem beneficiorum à Doctore Harvey, aliiſque, &c. præſtitorum. Lond. 1680, 4°. That is, An Anniverſary Oration delivered in the Theatre of the College of Phyſicians at London, Aug. 5, 1680, in commemoration of the benefits received from Dr. Harvey, and other worthy perſons. There could be nothing more agreeable to our author's diſpoſition than ſuch a performance as this, as well in regard to the love he had for his profeſſion, as the high eſteem, and true affection, which he bore to the memory of Dr. Harvey; which, upon many occaſions, while living, he expreſſed for his perſon, and of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſay ſomething more hereafter.

XXIII. The Harmony of natural and poſitive divine Laws. Lond. 1680, 8°. In this treatiſe our author endeavours to ſhew, that the ſupreme good, or ultimate happineſs of man, is not a thing either incertain or chimerical, but that it is ſettled by the will of God, in the diſpoſition of all things, and of man himſelf, as a free and rational being; ſo that what he has been pleaſed to diſcover to mankind in an extraordinary way, as a legiſlator, and what he has left it in their own power to diſcover by the light of reaſon, concerning him as their Creator, is ſo far from being contradictory, or repugnant, that in fact theſe laws help each other, and afford a joint proof of their reſpective authorities. This ſcheme of the book ſhews, that it was very well ſuited to thoſe times; but, perhaps, it would be no eaſy thing to prove, that it is at all leſs ſuitable to ours. Several of our author's treatiſes are now grown out of date, being ſuperſeded by other and freſher diſcoveries; but this is not liable to that fate, as the ſubject is like to continue the ſame for ever.

XXIV. Three Anatomy Lectures, concerning, 1. The motion of the Blood through the veins and arteries. 2. The organic ſtructure of the Heart. 3. The efficient cauſe of the Heart's pulſation. Read on the 19th, 20th, and 21ſt days of March, 1682, in the Anatomical Theatre of his Majeſty's Royal College of Phyſicians in London. Lond. 1683, 4°. I know none of our author's works that have been more, indeed, I think, hardly any ſo much, applauded, as theſe lectures, which ſhews the gradual improvements that were made in this ſort of uſeful knowledge, of which Dr. Charleton able to discover how long he continued in that kind of voluntary exile, or whether he returned afterwards to London: but it is beyond all doubt, that those writers are much mistaken, who have asserted that he died soon after he retired thither; for, as much as we are in the dark as to other circumstances, we are very clear as to the time of his death, which happened in the latter end of the year 1707, and in the eighty-eighth year of his age (b). He was, as the many books he has written very fully shew, a man of very solid and extensive learning; and as he distinguished himself very early by his ton was both a faithful register, and a great promoter. It was in these lectures that he clearly and effectually refuted the pretence, that Dr. Harvey had borrowed his doctrine, of the Circulation of the Blood, from Father Paul of Venice (24). It is, indeed, true, that Father Paul had written upon the use of the valves in the veins, which he has thought to have first discovered; and in like manner Servetus (25), Columbus (26), and Andreas Cæsalpinus (27), had delivered various things concerning the motion of the Blood, which was not unknown even to Hippocrates himself; but as a system from which the whole animal œconomy might be explained, it was first known to Dr. Harvey, and by him discovered, described, and demonstrated. The learned Boerhaave, therefore, in his Institutes, delivers this point clearly, and in a manner which fully shews, that he was convinced, that the rights of our countryman were, beyond all controversy, supported and established (28). 'At length, says he, the immortal Harvey, by the 'discoveries which he demonstrated, overturned the 'whole theory of the Ancients, and founded Physic upon a new and more certain basis, upon 'which it at present rests.' It will not be amiss, before we quit this subject, to observe, that it was no small advantage to Dr. Harvey's noble discovery, that, on the one hand, he lived long enough to establish the certainty of it, and to triumph over all the numerous efforts that were made from a disingenuous spirit of envy and contradiction; and that on the other, his intimate friendship with several learned men of his own country and profession, secured, after his decease, the glory due to his memory, from being tarnished by the many malicious attempts to show, that it was no discovery at all; or, that if it was, it did not belong to him, but to others. If these pretences had not been refuted in time, and before they had taken root in the minds of men, it might have been found much more difficult to eradicate them; and, perhaps, also many of the testimonies that were urged by his friends, might, in process of time, have been lost; or, at least, the circumstances that render them most convincing, buried in oblivion. But the learning and spirit of the Doctor's friends, more especially Dr. Peter Barwick, and our author, rendered every thing of this kind impracticable; for as soon as any hint was given abroad, or even suspicion dropped in any literary dissertation, or in prefaces before ancient authors, or epistolary essays of the moderns, to the prejudice of Dr. Harvey's system, his title to it, or the claim of any other, they were ready to take up the dispute; and were such able masters of it, both in regard to the Doctor's manner of finding and publishing his discovery, and of the nature of it, and its distinctness from what others had written about the motion of the blood, that nothing could gain ground during their life-times, contrary to the truth; and as they were both very long-lived men, they survived that spirit of rancour which so long followed this invention. To this concurrence of happy circumstances, we may justly attribute that general sense the learned world now has, of the merit of this great discovery, and of the great benefits thereby derived to Physic by its illustrious author; which may justly be esteemed a singular credit to the Faculty, and a very high honour to this nation.

(b) Hist. of Europe for 1707, p. 517.

(24) Dr. Goodall's Dedication to Dr. Whistler, before cited.

(25) Christianismi Restitutio, lib. vi.

(26) Reald. Columb. Anatom. lib. vii. p. 325.

(27) Question. Peripatet. p. 113.

(28) Boerhaave's Academical Lectures on the Theory of Physick, including a translation of his Institutes, vol. i. p. 41.

XXV. The Life of Marcellus, translated from the Greek. This is to be found in that noble treasury of English learning, the translation of Plutarch's Lives, by various hands (29). In this he has given the world a testimony of his perfect acquaintance with the Greek learning, as well as language, for it is illustrated throughout with concise explanatory notes. The style of this piece is excellent, and as different from that which our author used in his junior years, as can be imagined. His periods are short, his diction easy, natural, and perspicuous, insomuch that one perceives nothing in it of that stiffness and want of vigour which is generally complained of in translations. In short, he gives the sense of Plutarch with the same freedom as if it was his own, enters into the spirit of his author, and from the perfect knowledge he has of the subject, becomes, as it were, an original writer.

(29) Plutarch's Lives, vol. ii. p. 365.

XXVI. Inquisitio Physica, de Causis Catameniorum, & Uteri Rheumatismo; in qua probatur, sanguinem in animali fermentescere nunquam. Lond. 1685. 8°. That is, A physical Dissertation on the Causes of certain feminine Disorders, and of the Rheumatism in the Womb; in which it is proved, that there is no such thing as Fermentation in the Blood. This little book, divided into eight chapters, besides the conclusion, is written in a very clear and correct Latin style; in a method perfectly exact, in which the sentiments of the most eminent professors of the Art, Ancients, as well as Moderns, are clearly stated, and freely examined: in short, as this is the last work that he published, so it seems to be the most finished; and it ends with so much affection to his Faculty, that it looks like taking his farewel of them, and the public. The approbation prefixed informs us, that in the judgment of those who subscribe it, this physical enquiry of their most friendly member and collegue might be very useful, when printed; and the underwritten names are, Sir Thomas Witherley, Knight, and President; Dr. Samuel Collins, Register; Dr. Thomas Burwell, Dr. Peter Barwick, Sir Thomas Millington, and Dr. Humphry Brooke, Censors of the Royal College of Physicians.

XXVII. Of human Felicity and Infelicity: a Discourse by way of similitude or parable. This was never printed; but there are several copies of it handed about in manuscript, under the name of our author; but whether it be really his, or not, I am not able to say. Thus, as succinctly as might be, and as nearly as it was possible, in the order of time when they came abroad, the reader has a true catalogue of this learned Physician's writings; and as to his character, it has been attempted in the text, if not with success, at least with candour, and with an honest desire of doing justice to his memory, and to truth. C.

 [We find, from Mr. Ayscough's Catalogue, that a considerable number of manuscript papers and letters, written by Dr. Charleton, are preserved in the British Museum. The greater part of them are on subjects of philosophy and natural history; but others are of a miscellaneous nature; and among the rest there is a copy of verses of the Doctor's composition (30). Some of the manuscripts are the materials upon which a few of his publications were founded, and several of the rest were probably read before the Royal Society. Dr. Charleton's name occurs not unfrequently in Birch's History of that learned body. We hope it will not be deemed very criminal in us, that we have not thought the Doctor's papers in the Museum to be of consequence enough to merit a particular examination; especially, as the article concerning him is already sufficiently extended; and, to say the least of it, ample justice has been done in it to his character and writings. Though Dr. Charleton was undoubtedly a man of abilities, he appears to have been sometimes too rapid and injudicious in his productions. His works are, at present, very little read or known; and yet there are parts of them that would probably well reward a perusal. From our learned predecessor's account of him, this must certainly be the case with regard to his defence of the morals of Epicurus.] K.

(30) Ayscough's Catalogue, p. 341. 355. 387. 434. 443. 528. 647. 659. 666. 768. 814.

great abilities, ſo, for the ſpace of five and thirty years, he continued a very uſeful and aſſiduous Member of the Republic of Letters. He was a very ſincere lover of the conſtitution in Church and State, and had ſo warm an affection for his country, that though he was ſtrongly ſolicited to accept a Profeſſor's chair in the Univerſity of Padua, yet he abſolutely refuſed it (c). He was a perſon of great candour and generoſity, ready upon all occaſions to acknowledge and to commend the merit of others; and, as in his youth he was honoured with the protection of the moſt conſiderable men for learning and quality in this kingdom, more eſpecially thoſe of his own profeſſion, ſo he continued happy in their eſteem and friendſhip to the laſt. In his junior years he dedicated much of his time to the ſtudy of Philoſophy and polite literature, and was as well read in the Greek and Roman authors as any man of his time. He learned, very early, from his excellent tutor Biſhop Wilkins, the art of digeſting his knowledge in ſuch a manner, as to command it readily and fully when occaſion required. It is doubtful, whether in Natural or in Moral Philoſophy he was the greater man: that he wrote very accurately upon both is however certain; and he who would ſee the dark and disjointed notions of the antients, concerning the Anima Mundi, ſet in a clear light, and thoroughly reconciled, muſt have recourſe to his works, ſince it would be hard to meet with it any where elſe (d). In every branch of his own profeſſion, he has left teſtimonies of his diligence and his capacity; and whoever conſiders the plainneſs and perſpicuity of his language, the pains he has taken to collect and produce the opinions of the old Phyſicians, in order to compare them with the moderns, the juſt remarks with which theſe collections and compariſons are attended, the ſuccinctneſs with which all this is diſpatched, and the great accuracy of that method in which his books are written, will readily agree with me, that he was equal to moſt of the writers in this faculty, who were his contemporaries; and that if he has been ſurpaſſed by any of the moderns, his example has been, in a great meaſure, the occaſion of it, many of the beſt received books in the preſent age, being, as to method and form, at leaſt, very like this. He was alſo a very curious and judicious Antiquary, had taken much pains in peruſing our antient Hiſtorians, and in obſerving their excellencies as well as their defects, the latter of which ſeem to have occupied chiefly the thoughts of modern Critics. But, above all, he was very ſtudious of connecting the Sciences with each other, and thereby rendering them ſeverally more perfect; in which, if he did not abſolutely ſucceed himſelf, he had at leaſt the ſatisfaction of opening the way to others, of ſhowing the true road to perfection, and pointing out the means of applying and making thoſe diſcoveries uſeful, which have been made in ſucceeding times. There is alſo good reaſon to believe, that though we have few or none of his writings extant that were compoſed during the laſt twenty years of his life, yet he was not idle during that ſpace, but committed many things to paper, as materials at leaſt for other works that he deſigned. This, I ſay, may be well concluded from the natural induſtry of this learned perſon, as well as from ſome volumes of Collections that are, or at leaſt lately were, in being, and have paſſed from hand to hand under his name (e). The accounts that have been hitherto given of him, and of his works, in our language, have been very ſlender and ſparing, no ways ſuitable to his deſerts, or to the reputation that he very juſtly acquired amongſt foreigners (f), which led us to take ſo much care in this article, that it may appear we have a true concern for the honour of all our countrymen, who have done credit to this nation, by promoting ſolid and uſeful knowledge of every kind.

(c) See Dr. Goodall's Dedication to Dr. Whiſtler, before cited.

(d) See his Apology for Epicurus, prefixed to the Morals of that Philoſopher.

(e) Theſe Collections were formerly in the hands of the Millington family.

(f) Morhoff. Polyhiſtor. Vol. II. I, 2, 5, 5. II, 2, 7, 5. II, 2, 24, 6. II, 2, 47, 3. Stollii, Introduct. ad Hiſt. Litter. p. 675. Ouvres de Bayle, tom. i. p. 626. Buddei, Compend. Hiſtor. Philoſophicæ, p. 367.

 [CHATTERTON (THOMAS). In order to obtain fuller information, which we have good reaſon to hope for, and to render this article more perfect than it could at preſent have been made, it is referred to the end of the letter C, in the next volume.]

CHAUCER (GEOFFREY), the father of our Engliſh Poets, and the firſt great improver and reformer of our language. He flouriſhed in the XIVth century; and as he juſtly obtained the higheſt admiration amongſt his contemporaries, ſo his memory has ever ſince been highly honoured (a). One would imagine from this, that every hiſtorical circumſtance relating to him, or at leaſt thoſe of the greateſt moment, ſhould be well preſerved, and be perfectly clear; which, however, is ſo far from being the caſe, that nothing can hitherto be certainly determined concerning his deſcent, or ſo much as who was his father. One ſays that he was of a noble ſtock (b); another that he was the ſon of a Knight (c); a third that his father was a Vintner (d); a fourth that he was a Merchant (e); and the fifth, and laſt opinion, which is the beſt, is, that nothing can be ſaid (f) with any tolerable aſſurance of his family at all, but that there is ſomewhat more probability of his being the ſon of a gentleman, rather than of a tradeſman [A]. The place

(a) Sprat's Hiſt. of the Royal Society, p. 41, 42.

(c) Pits, de Illuſt. Angl. Script. p. 572.

(e) Mr. Hearne's Letter to Mr. Bagford, relating to Chaucer's Life.

(f) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Mr. Urry's edit. of his Works.

(b) Leland, Comment. de Script. Britan. p. 419.

(d) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

[A] Rather than of a tradeſman.] It is a point well agreed amongſt our ancient authors, that the French ſurname of this family, which was variouſly written, as for inſtance, Chaucier, Chaucierris, Chauſſier, Chauſir, &c. ſignified a Shoemaker (1). But notwithſtanding this it is very well known, that the founder of this family in England was a Norman Chief that came over with William the Conqueror, as appears by the roll of Battle Abbey (2); and in ſucceeding times there were ſeveral perſons of note of this place of his birth is as much diſputed, but however may be determined with greater appearance of truth; for though ſome ſay he was a Berkſhire man (g), and others would entitle Oxfordſhire (h) to his birth, yet if we may rely upon what he tells us himſelf, it is much more likely that he drew his firſt breath in the City of London (i): and that he had a great intereſt amongſt its inhabitants, is a thing as certain as that it drew upon him many misfortunes; notwithſtanding which, his having that intereſt ſeems to be a corroborating proof of his being a citizen's ſon [B]. The time of his birth is pretty well fixed, for moſt of the writers who mention it agree, that it was in the ſecond year of Edward III. A. D. 1328 (k). Here again we fall into the dark, for as to his earlier years we know not where or how they were ſpent; but as ſoon as he was fit for academical ſtudies, he was ſent to Cambridge, where he gave early teſtimonies of his abilities

(1) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Mr. Urry's edit. of his Works.

(2) Aſhmole's Theatrum Chemicum, p. 471.

(g) Bale, de Script. Britan. p. 525.

(h) Pits, de Illuſt. Angl. Scriptor. p. 572.

(i) In the Teſtament of Love, p. 486. Camden. Eliz. edit. Hearne, p. 783.

(k) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

this name mentioned in our records. In the reign of King John there was one le Chauſir (3), as appears by the records in the Tower; and in the reign of Henry III. one Elias Chaucefir, who in the reign following, viz. Edward I. had a grant of ten ſhillings from the Treaſury (4). There was alſo one John Chaucer, of whom King Edward I. heard a complaint for a thouſand pounds (5); but all this gives us no kind of certainty in reſpect to our author's family at all. Leland contents himſelf with hinting, that he was of genteel extraction: nobili loco natus (6), are his words; and it is ſaid, that he is faithfully copied by Bale; but this is to be underſtood of the later editions of his book, for in the firſt he calls him Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, Knight, and ſays nothing of his family at all (7); afterwards he met with Leland's book, and abridged his account of him. John Pits is very clear, that he was of an exceeding good family, and not only a knight himſelf, but his father a knight before him (8): but his authority goes for little, more eſpecially with thoſe that know him beſt. Mr. Speght is of opinion, that one Richard Chaucer was his father, who was a Vintner at the corner of Kirton-Lane; and dying in 1348, left his houſe, tavern, and ſtock, to the church of St. Mary Aldermary (9), where he was buried. This paſſed currently with Fuller; and, perhaps the better, becauſe it furniſhed him with a very ſilly jeſt. 'His father, 'ſays he, was a Vintner in London; and I have 'heard his arms quarrelled at being argent and gules 'ſtrangely contrived, and hard to be blazoned. Some 'more wits have made it the daſhing of white and 'red wine (the parents of our ordinary claret) as 'nicking his father's profeſſion.' Againſt this opinion, however, there lie two exceptions, that ſolider heads than his have not been able to get over; the firſt is, that there was ſomething very unnatural in this Vintner's leaving all his eſtate to the Church, while his ſon was at the Univerſity; and the ſecond, that Chaucer ſhould never complain of this, or, for any thing that we can diſcover, feel the effects of it, ſince it is evident enough, that in his youth he lived at a rate that could not have been ſupported without a fortune. The induſtrious Mr. Hearne thinks it probable, his father was a Merchant of London (10); but the laſt writer of his life thinking that father not good enough for him, hath found him out a better, one Sir John Chaucer, for which he has no other evidence, than that ſuch a man lived at a time (11) when our Poet might poſſibly have been his ſon. I muſt confeſs, I think he was of a good family, and that for various reaſons, which, becauſe I do not know they have been taken notice of before, I will mention as briefly as I can. Firſt then, his education ſpeaks him a gentleman bred at both the Univerſities, travelled through ſeveral countries, and at laſt a ſtudent in the Temple, where, it is reported, that he was fined two ſhillings for beating a Fryar in Fleet-ſtreet. Next, his poſt at court ſhews him to have been a gentleman; for birth was much ſtood upon in thoſe days, and young men of the beſt quality were the King's Pages. Thirdly, this is confirmed by his marriage, which ſo proud a man as John of Gaunt would not have admitted, if he had been of a mean deſcent, much leſs have recommended him to his wife, and thereby made him the uncle-in-law of his own children. Fourthly, his writings ſhew him a gentleman, for they are all written with ſuch freedom and ſpirit as muſt have expoſed him to great envy, if he had not been a gentleman, and which he would probably have appeaſed by ſome reaſonable apology. Laſtly, the company he kept, and the reſpect that was conſtantly paid him, ſeem the cleareſt teſtimonies of this, which, with the reſt, I ſubmit to the deciſion of the intelligent reader.

(3) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(4) Record. in Scacc.

(5) Record. in Tur. Lond.

(6) Leland, Comment. de Script. Britan. p. 419.

(7) Illuſt. Major. Britan. Script. fol. 198.

(8) Pits, de Illuſt. Angl. Scriptor. p. 572.

(9) Speght's Life of Chaucer, in Stowe's Survey of London.

(10) Robert of Glouceſter's Chr. vol. ii. p. 596.

(11) Rymer's Fœd. tom. v. p. 51.

[B] Of his being a citizen's ſon.] It ſeems to have been a doubt with Leland, whether Oxfordſhire or Berkſhire produced this great man; but he thought he had reaſon to think, that he was born in one of thoſe counties (12). If Berkſhire was to be preferred, then Dunnington (13) would bid the faireſt for it, which was certainly Chaucer's ſeat; but then it ſeems to be no leſs certain, that he purchaſed it from Sir Richard Adderbury. Pits affirms roundly, that he was born at Woodſtock (14), and Camden ſpeaking of that place, ſays, that having nothing in it elſe remarkable, it boaſts of having produced our Engliſh Homer, Geoffrey Chaucer (15), but he was too knowing a man to credit this. He knew the reaſon of it to be, that Chaucer had a houſe there, and Ewelm and Hocknorton in the ſame county, were alſo belonging to his family, and might therefore, with as much juſtice as Woodſtock, put in a claim to his birth. But Chaucer himſelf ſeems to have determined the point, as clearly as man could do; for, ſpeaking of the troubles that had happened in this place, he ſays (16), The city of London, that is to me ſo dear and ſweet, in which I was forth-grown, and more kindly love, have I to that place, than any other on earth, as every kindly creature hath full appetite to that place of his kindly engendruer, &c. And therefore Camden very juſtly takes occaſion, ſpeaking of another Poet, to affirm, that London (17) was our author's birth-place. 'Edmund Spencer, ſays he, a 'Londoner, was ſo ſmiled on by the Muſes at his 'birth, that he excelled all the Engliſh Poets that 'went before him, if, we except only his fellow-'citizen, Chaucer.' It may ſeem a little difficult to reconcile what is ſaid in this note, to what has been advanced in the former, and yet it may be done tolerably well; for though we now conſider a citizen of London as a trader of courſe, yet in the times when Chaucer lived, men of great quality and diſtinction reſided in the city, where the Court was alſo kept; and therefore he might very well be in this ſenſe the ſon of an inhabitant of London, and ſtill his father might not be either Merchant or Vintner, but in ſome poſt about the Court; and this in ſo dark a matter, and which has employed ſo many learned pens, without letting in much light upon it, ſeems the moſt probable account of the matter. For in that diſcourſe in which he ſpeaks of London as his birth-place, he very clearly confeſſes, that he had been but too deeply engaged in the popular diſturbances that happened there, through his attachment to his patron the Duke of Lancaſter, which ſhows the intereſt he had among the people; and yet he affirms, that in what he did he had no evil intention, much leſs meant to throw all things into confuſion; and offers it as a reaſon why he ſhould be believed in declaring this, that he was a native of London, and loved it better than any place upon earth, as every creature naturally does the place from which it ſprings. After clearing up theſe points as far as poſſible, we ſhall be more brief in our remarks upon other points of this Hiſtory, though a large and full Life of Chaucer ſeems to be a work ſtill wanting to the learned world, after all the pains that have been hitherto taken about it.

(12) Leland, Comment. de Script. Britan. p. 419.

(13) Camden. Britan. p. 138.

(14) Pits, de Illuſt. Angl. Script. p. 572.

(15) Camden. Britan. p. 279.

(16) The Teſtament of Love, p. 486. a.

(17) Camden. Annal. Eliz. id. hic Hearne, p. 783.

by ſeveral elegies and ſonnets, as well as by a poem called the Court of Love, which he compoſed when he was about eighteen (l), and which carries in it very pregnant proofs of ſkill and learning, as well as quickneſs of wit, and great ſtrength of genius [C]. It is not by any means certain in what college or hall of that Univerſity he ſtudied; but it is conjectured, and not without ſome ſhew of reaſon, that it might be in Solere's-Hall, which he has ſo particularly and humorouſly deſcribed in his ſtory of the Miller of Trompington (m). He removed from thence, for reaſons which we find no where aſſigned, to the Univerſity of Oxford, and compleated his ſtudies there; ſome ſay at Canterbury-College (n), which, however, is improbable, ſince it was not founded till Chaucer was thirty-five years of age; others in Merton-College, which is more likely; for though his name does not appear among the celebrated members of it at that time, yet we find moſt of his contemporaries, as Strode, Occleve, &c. (o) were of that college. After a conſiderable ſtay here, and a ſtrict application to the publick Lectures of the Univerſity, he became, as Leland tells us, a ready Logician, a ſmooth Rhetorician, a pleaſant Poet, a grave Philoſopher, an ingenious Mathematician, and a holy Divine (p). That he was a great maſter in Aſtronomy is plain from his Diſcourſes of the Aſtrolabe; that he was verſed in the Hermetick Philoſophy, appears by his Tale of the Chanon's Yeoman; his knowledge in Divinity is evident from his Parſon's Tale; and his Philoſophy from the Teſtament of Love. After he left this Univerſity, he travelled abroad through France and the Low-Countries, in order to ſee the world, and to improve the knowledge which he had acquired from books: but when he went abroad, or at what time he returned, are circumſtances not eaſy to be determined (q). Yet ſurely there is a probability that he ſpent not many years out of his own country, ſince the beſt writers ſeem to be well ſatisfied, that after his return he entered himſelf of the Middle-Temple, and became a ſtudent there of the Municipal Laws of this land (r). Of this learning having received ſome tincture, he betook himſelf to the Court, which was indeed the place in the world fitteſt for a man of his accompliſhments to thrive in. His firſt employment there was in quality of the King's Page (s), in thoſe times a very honourable office, as it gave near and frequent acceſs to the royal preſence: but one would imagine this was not a poſt to which any but a young man could be advanced upon his coming to Court; and therefore it ſeems moſt conſiſtent with truth to (l) Court of Love, line 43.

(m) See the Gloſſary at the end of his Works, under the word Solere.

(n) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(o) Hiſt. & Antiq. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 87.

(p) Leland, Comment. de Script. Britan. p. 419.

(q) Bale, de Script. Britan. p. 525. Pits, de Illuſtr. Angl. Script. p. 572.

(r) Leland, Comment. de Script. Britan. p. 419. Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(s) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Mr. Urry's edit. of his Works.

[C] And great ſtrength of genius.] The moſt certain accounts we have of Chaucer are thoſe taken from his own writings, in which there are a great variety of circumſtances that occur not in any of the ancient relations of his life, in ſo much that it is very doubtful, whether we ſhould ever have heard any thing of his being a ſtudent at Cambridge, if he had not left us that particular himſelf. In like manner it might have been preſumed, but it could hardly have been proved, that his Court of Love was not his firſt performance; or, at leaſt, his firſt performance that made any great figure. But from the peruſal of this poem, we learn from himſelf, that he had written many things before in honour of the deity of love. Indeed, the poem itſelf ſpeaks it probable; for though we have a very high idea of the natural genius of Chaucer, yet it would be impoſſible to perſuade any judge of Poetry, that this was his firſt eſſay; for not only the ſtructure of the poem manifeſts an extraordinary ſkill in that kind of writing, but the harmony of his numbers, even at this diſtance of time, ſufficiently ſhew that they could not fall from the pen of an unpractiſed Poet. It is generally believed, upon the credit I apprehend of the Rubrick placed at the head of this performance, that in was written in imitation of the Romant of the Roſe (18); but I muſt confeſs I am not very well ſatisfied of that, and ſhould rather be of opinion, that our author compoſed it after the manner of thoſe Italian Poems that were then ſo generally eſteemed, and for which the famous Francis Petrarch had been crowned ſome years before with great ſolemnity at Rome (19). The honours which that celebrated Poet acquired, and which he had never acquired but in an age of the greateſt gallantry, excited all who had any turn that way, to emulate his performances. We may very plainly perceive in this work of Chaucer's, that he meant to make his entrance by it into the region of Parnaſſus, and boldly reſolved, on the ſtrength of his own judgment as well as of his genius, to declare himſelf a Poet, and put himſelf that way into the road to fame. If this had not been his intention, he would have ſcarcely written the Court of Love, the ground of which Poem is to ſhew, that it was a tribunal to which every man owed obedience, which ſooner or later he was obliged to pay. As for himſelf, he profeſſes that he was ſummoned to do ſuit and ſervice at the age of eighteen, which affords him an opportunity of deſcribing the Court, the manner of its proceedings, and the Statutes of Love by which thoſe proceedings are regulated, and in doing this he gives the following account of himſelf in three ſtanzas (20):

(18) This is alſo ſaid in the Rubrick of the Poem.

(19) Niceron. Memoires des Hommes Illuſtres, vol. xxviii. p. 372.

(20) Chaucer's Works, p. 367. a.

In art of Love I write and ſongis make,
That maie be ſong in honour of the King
And Queen of Love; and then I undirtake
He that is ſadde ſhall then full mery ſyng,
And daungerous not ben in every thyng:
Beſeche I you but ſeen my will and rede,
And let your anſwere put me out of drede.

What is your name? reherſe it here I praie;
Of whens and where, of what condicion
That ye ben of? let me ſe come of and ſaie
Fain would I know your diſpoſicion;
Ye have put on your old entencion
But whate ye mene, to ſerve me I ne wote,
Savſe that ye ſaie, ye love me woundir hote.

My name, alas! my herte why makes thou ſtraunge,
Phylogenet I call'd am ferre and nere,
Of Cambridge, Clerke, that nevir thinke to chaunge
Fro you, that with your heavenly ſtremis clere
Raviſhe myne herte, and ghoſt, and all in fere,
Since at the firſt I write my bill for grace,
Methinke I ſe ſome mercie in your face.

This poem is very long, conſiſting of upwards of fourteen hundred verſes, and concludes with the Feſtival of Love, which with great elegance our Poet fixes upon the firſt of May, and makes it celebrated by the birds: yet this part of the Poem is the moſt exceptionable of any, and ſhows what a ſtrange taſte prevailed in that age; for in this feſtival not only the Hymns of the Church, but the Pſalms themſelves, are very ſcandalouſly prophaned, and applied to the God of Love and his Mother, which ſhows the bad conſequences that naturally flow from ſuperſtitious devotion.

believe,

believe, that Geoffrey Chaucer could not at his admittance exceed thirty [D]. At this time the Engliſh Court was the moſt gay and ſplendid in Europe. Edward III. a Prince equally diſtinguiſhed by civil and martial virtues, ſat then upon the throne, bleſſed with an illuſtrious Conſort, by whom he had a numerous poſterity (t). His many victories had rendered him famous abroad, and his moderation and clemency, his reverence for the laws, and his kindneſs for his people, made him beloved at home; ſo that our Chronicles boaſt of few reigns ſo glorious, and of none brighter, than his. Among other great qualities with which this famous Monarch was endowed, his love of learning and learned men was not the leaſt conſpicuous; and therefore we need not wonder that our author, who was continually giving ſome ſpecimen or other of the vivacity of his parts, wrought himſelf into high favour, inſomuch, that it appears that he was a conſtant attendant on the Court, and when it was at Woodſtock reſided at a ſquare ſtone houſe near the Park-gate, which ſtill retains his name (u); and well indeed it may, ſince, being conſecrated in his Poems, the whole country round about is become, in reſpect to Engliſhmen, a kind of claſſick ground [E]. But beſides his employment about the perſon of his Prince, our Poet took pains to advance his fortune, by attaching himſelf to the ſervice of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, by whom, and by his Ducheſs Blanch, a lady equally remarkable for her wit and virtue, he was exceedingly beloved, nor was it long before he became part of their family alſo (w). It happened thus: this Ducheſs entertained in her ſervice one Catherine Rouet, daughter of Sir Payne, or Pagan Rouet, a native of Hainault, and Guien King at Arms for that country, who was afterwards married to Sir Hugh Swynford, a Knight of Lincoln. He lived not long after their marriage, and upon his deceaſe this lady returned into the Duke's family, and was appointed Governeſs of his children (x). She had a ſiſter, whoſe name was Philippa, a great favourite likewiſe with the Duke and Ducheſs, and by them therefore, as a mark of their great eſteem, recommended to Chaucer for a wife (y). He married her about the year 1360, when he was in the flower of his age, and, as appears from a picture of him taken about that time, one of the handſomeſt perſons about the Court (z). Of a complexion fair and beautiful, his lips very red (t) Robert de Aveſbury, Hiſt. de Mirabilibus Geſtis Edwardi III. Contin. Nic. Trivet. Annal. vol. ii. p. 72. Robert of Glouceſter's Chron. p. 592.

(u) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(w) Dugd. Baron. vol. i. p. 789, 790.

(x) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(y) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition of his Works.

(z) This original picture was in the poſſeſſion of George Greenwood, of Chaſtleton, in Glouceſterſhire, Eſq;

[D] Could not at that time exceed thirty.] We have intimated in the text, that our author ſeems to have owed his admittance into the King's ſervice in quality of Page, which in the Latin of thoſe times was called Valettus, or Valectus, an honour that young Noblemen of the firſt rank were glad to accept, to the favour of the King's ſon John of Gaunt, afterwards Duke of Lancaſter, of which no notice is taken by any of thoſe who have hitherto collected the Memoirs of his Life. Yet we do not aſſert this without authority, for it appears by a poem of his, called Chaucer's Dream (21), firſt printed in the year 1597, that he was very deep in this young Prince's amorous ſecrets; for that poem is an Allegorical Hiſtory of the Loves of John of Gaunt and Blanch of Lancaſter, daughter of Henry Duke of Lancaſter; which, from this very poem it appears, were managed with the utmoſt ſecrecy, till, by a long train of intrigues and ſolicitations, all the obſtacles in the way of this match were got over, and with the help of the King's conſent and the Pope's diſpenſation, they were married in May 1359 (22); which, as it was the firſt introduction to John of Gaunt's vaſt power and greatneſs, ſo it ſeems to have been the beginning of our author's fortunes at Court: at leaſt it is certain, that the knowledge he had of this affair, was what made him equally the favourite of the Duke of Lancaſter and of the Ducheſs Blanch, who, as the higheſt teſtimony of her friendſhip, gave him the ſiſter of her favourite Lady in marriage, which is alſo intimated at the cloſe of this poem. But this is quite a different thing from another under the ſame title, that in the old manuſcripts is, and ought to be entituled, the Book of the Ducheſs (23), written, not upon her marriage, but upon her death; and this being written in the manner of a viſion, and the other not being diſcovered, came to be called Chaucer's Dream, becauſe that title appeared in ſome old liſts of his Works. As the credit of the Duke of Lancaſter increaſed with his father, Chaucer's alſo roſe in a like proportion; for he continued ſteady to his patron to the laſt hour of that Duke's life; and indeed, conſidering his alliance as well as his obligations, we need not at all wonder that he did. But after ſaying all this it will be very proper to add, that notwithſtanding his fidelity to his patron, he did not go all lengths with him, but kept exactly within the bounds of loyalty to his Prince, as well as thoſe of duty to his benefactor.

(21) Chaucer's Works, p. 572.

(22) Thomæ Walſingham, Ypod Neuſtr. p. 125, n. 50.

(23) Chaucer's Works, p. 404.

[E] A kind of claſſick ground.] In order to juſtify this, we need only obſerve, that many of the rural deſcriptions that occur in his works, are taken from Woodſtock Park; of which he tells us, that it was a park walled with green ſtone (24), that being the firſt park walled in England, and not many years before his time. In moſt of his pieces where he deſigns an imaginary ſcene, he certainly copies it from a real landſcape: ſo in his Cuckow and Nightingale, the morning walk he takes was ſuch, as at this day may be traced from his houſe through part of the park, and down by the brook into the vale, under Blenheim Caſtle (25), as certainly as we may aſſert, that Maples inſtead of Phylireas were the ornaments round the bower; which place he likewiſe deſcribes in his Dream as a white caſtle (26), ſtanding upon a hill; the ſcene in that poem being laid in Woodſtock-Park. When diſengaged from publick affairs, his time was entirely ſpent in ſtudy and walking: ſo agreeable to him was this exerciſe, that he ſays, he preferred it to all other ſports and diverſions. He lived within himſelf, neither deſirous to hear, nor buſy to concern himſelf with the affairs of his neighbours. His courſe of living was temperate and regular; he went to reſt with the ſun, and roſe before it; and by that means enjoyed the pleaſures of the better part of the day, his morning walk and freſh contemplations. This gave him the advantage of deſcribing the morning in ſo lively a manner, as he does every where in his works: the ſpringing ſun glows warm in his lines, and the fragrant air blows cool in his deſcriptions; we ſmell the ſweets of the bloomy haws, and hear the muſick of the feather'd choir, whenever we take a foreſt walk with him. The hour of the day is not eaſier to be diſcovered, from the reflexion of the ſun in Titian's paintings, than in Chaucer's morning landſcapes. 'Tis true, theſe deſcriptions are ſometimes too long; and as it is before obſerved, when he takes thoſe early rambles, he almoſt tires his reader with following him; and ſeldom knows how to get out of a foreſt, when once entered into it: but how advantageous this beautiful extravagance is, moſt of his ſucceſſors well know, who have very plentifully lopt off his exuberant beauties, and placed them as the chief ornaments of their own writings.

(24) Complaint of the Black Knight, ver. 42.

(25) Cuckow and Nightingale, ver. 56.

(26) Chaucer's Dream, v. 1018.

and full, his ſize of a juſt proportion, his air very graceful and majeſtick. We live at too great a diſtance of time, to be able to penetrate with certainty into the true motives of our author's match; but ſurely there is a great probability, that he was not unacquainted with the tenderneſs which his patron, the Duke of Lancaſter, had for the Lady Swynford, by whom he had ſeveral children, who were afterwards legitimated by Act of Parliament (a). Yet this alliance was not the only tie he had upon that Prince, one of the moſt ambitious and artful men of his time, and always embarked in ſome State-intrigue or other, and therefore, above all things, fond of having men of parts and literature about him, of whom he might make uſe as occaſion offered; and in which capacity, as there was none more able, ſo it appears there were none did him greater ſervice, than Chaucer (b). Being thus ſupported, we need not wonder that his fortunes made a very quick progreſs at Court; and, accordingly, we find very many marks of his Maſter King Edward's kindneſs towards him. As for inſtance, in the forty-firſt year of his reign, he granted him an annuity of twenty marks per annum out of the Exchequer (c). How mean ſoever ſuch a penſion may ſeem now, it was then very conſiderable; and in Chaucer's caſe was ſtill the more valuable, as being an earneſt of future favours. For not long after we find him Gentleman of the King's Privy-Chamber, and by that title the King granted to him, by Letters-patents dated in the forty-fifth year of his reign, the farther ſum of twenty marks per annum during his life (d). In this ſtation he did not long continue, being next year made Shield Bearer (e) to the King, a title at that time, though now extinct, of great honour, ſuch perſons being always next the King's perſon, and generally, upon ſignal victories, rewarded with military honours. Neither were theſe all the inſtances he received of the King's attention to, and confidence in, him; for in the very ſame year, and by the ſame title, we find him commiſſioned, in conjunction with other perſons, to treat with the Republick of Genoa (f); and, accordingly, thither he went, and actually managed a negociation, concerning the ſubject of which, thoſe who have written our author's life make not the leaſt mention, but ſeem to treat it as a matter, at this diſtance of time, altogether inexplicable. But it may, from the Hiſtory of that Prince's reign, be very probably inferred, that Chaucer was ſent to Genoa to hire ſhips for the King's navy: for in thoſe times, though we frequently made great naval armaments, yet we had but very few ſhips of our own; and this defect was ſupplied, by hiring them from the free States either in Germany or Italy (g). In this negotiation our author ſucceeded ſo well, that upon his return home he received new marks of his royal Maſter's favour; for, by Letters-patents dated at Windſor the 23d of April, in the 48th year of his reign, his Majeſty granted him a pitcher of wine daily in the Port of London, to be delivered by the Butler of England (h); and very ſoon after he was made Comptroller of the Cuſtoms in the Port of London, for wool, wool-fells, and hides, with a proviſo that he ſhould perſonally execute that office, and keep the accounts of it with his own hand (i). As this was a very lucrative, ſo it was a very reputable employment likewiſe; and as Chaucer was enriched by the profits of his poſt, ſo his reputation was very much increaſed by that diligence and integrity with which he diſcharged it. He values himſelf, as he had reaſon to do, very much upon his conduct in this office, which he affirms was never liable to any kind of imputation (k). And indeed it is highly probable, that what he has delivered upon this ſubject is ſtrictly true; for in the latter end of King Edward's reign there were great frauds and embezzlements committed in the cuſtoms, which by proſecutions were brought to publick view; but we do not find that in theſe Chaucer's name was ſo much as mentioned (l). About a year after he was in poſſeſſion of this office, the King made him a grant of the lands and body of Sir Edmund Staplegate, ſon of Sir Edmund Staplegate, of Kent, in ward, for which he received one hundred and four pounds (m); and other pecuniary advantages he had, which enabled him to raiſe altogether an income of one thouſand pounds per annum, which was, in thoſe days, a prodigious ſum, and might well enable him to live, as he ſays he did, with dignity in office, and with good-will amongſt his neighbours (n). But as all theſe benefits aroſe chiefly from the favour in which he ſtood with the potent and ambitious Duke of Lancaſter, ſo he became daily more and more involved in the political intrigues of that active and ambitious Prince. It is ſuggeſted, by many of our Hiſtorians, that this Duke had caſt a longing eye upon the Crown; and it is attributed to this, that about the time our author was ſent to Genoa, the King declared, in full Parliament, the young Prince Richard, the only ſurviving ſon of Edward the Black Prince, heir apparent to the Crown (o). But there ſeems to be a plainer and more natural reaſon for the King's taking this ſtep, in which none more readily concurred than the Duke of Lancaſter, and that was his own and his ſon's going abroad to carry on the war in France, upon which occaſion it was requiſite that the ſucceſſion ſhould be ſettled; and therefore the young Prince Richard was not only declared heir-apparent, but the government of the kingdom was, nominally at leaſt, entruſted with him, during the abſence of his grandfather, his father, and uncles (p). But what ſeems to be a ſtronger proof of the Duke of Lancaſter's innocence in this reſpect, was, his marrying, upon the deceaſe of his Ducheſs Blanch,

(a) Thom. Walſ. p. 388. n. 30.

(b) Henry Knighton, apud Decem Scriptor. p. 26. 47.

(c) 41 Ed. III. Pat. 41. p. 1. m. 13.

(d) 45 Ed. III. p. 3. m. 7.

(e) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(f) See an extract of this Commiſſion in Chaucer's Life, prefixed to Urry's edition.

(g) Froiſard, cap. 298, 299.

(h) Pat. 48 Ed. III. p. 1. m. 20.

(i) Pat. 48 Ed. III. p. 1. m. 7.

(k) Teſtament of Love, p. 488. b.

(l) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition.

(m) Records collected by Mr. Rymer in the Houſe of Lords.

(n) Teſtament of Love, p. 486. a

(o) Froiſard, cap. 305.

(p) Pat. 46 Ed. III. p. 2. m. 25.

Blanch; the Lady Conſtantia, daughter of Peter the Cruel, King of Caſtile and Leon, in whoſe right, upon the deceaſe of her father, he aſſumed theſe royal titles (q). This muſt be allowed to be a mark of his ambition, and of his inclination to be a King; but at the ſame time it is a proof, that he had another crown in view than that of England; and therefore to this we may well aſcribe that device of his, of an eagle endeavouring with his bill to undo a footlock, which many of our writers, with more malignity than judgment, have conſtrued into a kind of treaſon (r). It is however true, that after the deceaſe of his eldeſt brother, Edward the Black Prince, he was aſſociated by his father in the government, and had the principal direction of publick affairs; which, conſidering his age, his experience, and his very near relation to the Crown (s), may be looked upon as a thing rather natural than extraordinary. In this happy ſeaſon of his life, when he enjoyed all the bleſſings this world could afford, Chaucer compoſed moſt of thoſe gay and lively pieces, which were ſo much adapted to the humour of thoſe times, and to that romantick ſpirit of love and fighting, which in thoſe days was ſo much in vogue, and by which he acquired ſo great and ſo extenſive a reputation for his wit, and for his capacity in writing (t) [F]. But it was not long before he found himſelf obliged to turn his thoughts to graver ſubjects; for his patron, the Duke of Lancaſter, having eſpouſed the cauſe of Wickliffe, whom the Clergy conſidered as a heretick, Chaucer inclined the ſame way, and turned the edge of his ſatire againſt lazy Monks, ignorant Prieſts, and the inſolence of ſuch as belonged to Eccleſiaſtical Courts, with extraordinary ſucceſs (u). Yet it does not at all appear, that he was an enemy to religion, or even to that of the Church of Rome; but rather the contrary; for he ſpeaks very ſubmiſſively of her doctrines, and beſtows high characters upon ſuch of the Clergy, as acted ſuitably to their calling: ſo that it was the ill men who brought religion into contempt, and proſtituted their own function in the vileſt manner, that felt the ſeverity of Chaucer's Muſe, and not Prieſts in general, or the Chriſtian Faith; for the former he highly revered, and the latter he firmly believed (w), as his writings plainly ſhew [G]. But how much ſoever Wickliffe's doctrines might prevail, or Chaucer's (q) Barne's Hiſt. of Ed. III. p. 897.

(r) Chaucer's Life prefixed to Urry's edit. of his Works.

(s) Fox's Martyrology, p. 392.

(t) John Lidgate, in his Prologue to his Tranſlation of Boccace of the Fall of Princes.

(u) In his Plowman's Tale, and his Jack Upland, and other pieces.

(w) See his Teſtament of Love, his moral Poems, and other pieces in his Works.

[F] And for his capacity in writing.] We have already mentioned ſome of the performances of our author while a very young man, and alſo ſome of thoſe pieces that he wrote to compliment the Duke of Lancaſter and his Ducheſs. We will here take an opportunity of giving an account of ſome other pieces of his, that were written within the time of his greateſt proſperity. The Complaint of Mary Magdalen, taken from Origen (27), was tranſlated either before, or ſoon after his coming to Court; perhaps to oblige ſome pious lady of thoſe times, as he wrote that which is called Chaucer's A. B. C. for the uſe of the Ducheſs Blanch. The Complaint of the Black Knight, was penned in honour of John of Gaunt's courtſhip of that lady, and is as elegant and harmonious a poem, as any of our author's compoſure; ſo that it is reaſonable to believe, he took extraordinary pains about it; and perhaps it would be no unreaſonable conjecture, if we ſhould ſuppoſe, that it was written upon his firſt admiſſion to the intimacy of that great Prince, who is repreſented under the character of the Black Knight (28). The Houſe of Fame is alſo a moſt admirable performance, as well in the conſtruction of the fable, as in the eaſe and happineſs of its execution; of which there cannot be a higher teſtimony, than Mr. Pope's borrowing from thence the model of his Temple of Fame; which will probably be eſteemed, as long as there is either Taſte or Poetry in this nation. The Aſſembly of Fowls was written while he was at Court, and before the death of King Edward's Queen, Philippa (29); and ſo was his Tale of the Cuckow and the Nightingale, in which, as was obſerved in the preceding note, the ſcene is viſibly laid in Woodſtock-Park. He likewiſe wrote abundance of Elegies, Poems, or Ballads, in honour of Margaret Counteſs of Pembroke, and other Ladies of the Court; and as it is natural to ſuppoſe, that he was not the only perſon who wrote things of this kind; ſo by an accident common enough to great men, all of thoſe pieces which have ſurvived the injuries of time, are come down to us under the name of Chaucer, though it might be very eaſily proved that they are none of his. The Poem of Troilus and Creseide (30), was written in the former part of his life, and tranſlated, as he ſays, from Lollius, an Hiſtoriographer of Urbano in Italy. He did not however content himſelf with making a cloſe tranſlation of his author, but, on the contrary, added many things of his own, and borrowed alſo from others, more eſpecially his friend Petrarch, whatever he judged might render it acceptable to his reader. That diſcourſe of Predeſtination, which he has inſerted in the fourth book is entirely his own; and from it, and from what he has delivered upon the ſame ſubject in the Nun's Prieſt's Tale, the very learned Sir Henry Savile thought, that he was no ſtranger to Archbiſhop Bradwardine's learned book de Cauſâ Dei, publiſhed at that time (31). Sir Francis Kinaſton, who tranſlated this poem into Latin rhimes, in his manuſcript notes upon it, ſays, that it was not improbably conjectured, that Chaucer in writing the Lives and Loves of Troilus and Creſeide, glanced at ſome private perſons in the Court of King Edward III. and (32) did not follow Homer, Dares, Dictys, or any Hiſtorian of thoſe times. However (ſays he) Chaucer has taken the liberty of his own inventions; he hath made an admirable and inimitable Epick Poem, deſcribing in Troilus a complete Knight in arms and courtſhip, and a faithful and conſtant lover; and in Creſeide, a moſt beautiful and coy Lady, which being once overcome, yields to the frailty of her ſex (33). We ſhall have occaſion hereafter to ſpeak more largely of this worthy perſon's performance, and of the pains he took to illuſtrate Chaucer, in which he equalled at leaſt, if not exceeded, all who have ſpent their time in doing juſtice to this great Poet.

(27) Chaucer's Works, p. 520.

(28) It appears plainly, from the two laſt ſtanzas, to have been addreſſed to Lady Blanch.

(29) Chaucer's Works, p. 413.

(30) This Poem is digeſted into five books, and is the longeſt in our author's Works.

(31) In præfat. ejuſd. libr. edit. 1617.

(32) See this further explained in note [U].

(33) The ſixth book; or Teſtament of Creiſeide, is not Chaucer's, but one Mr. Henderſon's.

[G] As his writings plainly ſhew.] The true deſign of our author, was not to expoſe or abuſe the Clergy, from a diſlike to their order, but quite the contrary, to amend and reform them; and it was with this view, that he wrote many pieces, and tranſlated others, that they might plainly perceive how much religion ſuffered by the monſtrous irregularities in their behaviour. As for inſtance, the Romaunt of the Rose, is a tranſlation from the French. This poem was begun by William de Lorris, and continued by John Meung, commonly called Cloppinel, both famous French Poets in their time. It ſeems to have been tranſlated by Chaucer while he was at Court, and about the time of the riſe of Wickliffe's opinions, it conſiſting of violent invectives againſt the religious orders (34). It is left imperfect at the end, and there are ſome lacuna's in other places of it. It may not be amiſs to obſerve here, that the original author of this work, William de Lorris, died in the year 1260, at cer's writings pleaſe among the better ſort of people, and in the country, they were far enough from making a general impreſſion on the minds of people in London, where the meaner ſort of citizens were ſo warmly attached to the Church, that upon the Duke of Lancaſter's attending Wickliffe, when he was ſummoned before the Biſhop of London, and treating that Prelate a little roughly, they made a kind of inſurrection, and marching down into the Strand in a body, entered into, and rifled the Savoy, which was the Duke of Lancaſter's palace, built by himſelf, and at that time eſteemed one of the fineſt houſes in Europe, deſtroyed his goods, abuſed his ſervants, and turned his arms upſide down, as if he had been a traitor: but by the care of the King, and the interpoſition of ſome of the principal Nobility, this quarrel was compromiſed, and the Duke and the Citizens reconciled, at leaſt, in appearance (x). In the laſt year of King Edward, the French having infringed the truce which that Monarch had concluded with them, Commiſſioners were ſent over to expoſtulate that matter before the Pope's Legates; and of theſe, Chaucer was one. This negotiation of theirs was not very ſucceſsful, only it produced ſome mention of a marriage between Richard, Prince of Wales (y), and the Lady Mary, daughter to the French King; and thereby made way for a new treaty, in which Sir Guiſcard Dangle, Knight of the Garter, Sir Richard Sturrey, a great Wickliviſt, and in high favour with the King, together with Geoffrey Chaucer, Eſq; were Commiſſioners (z); and this ſeems to have been the laſt publick employment that our author bore: though from a gold chain about his neck, in that original picture of his ſtill remaining as is before-mentioned, it has been not without ſome ſhew of reaſon conjectured, that he was honoured with ſome other dignity, than from any records we have been able to trace; for it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that he wore this ornament on account of his office in the Cuſtoms (a). June 21, 1377, the young Prince of Wales ſucceeded his grandfather, by the title of Richard II. and his uncle, the Duke of Lancaſter, conſidering the incapacity of the King, who was then but eleven years of age, was intruſted with the chief ſhare of the adminiſtration; and, therefore, to ingratiate himſelf with the populace, he reſolved to ſolemnize the new Monarch's coronation with greater pomp and magnificence, than had been ever ſeen in this kingdom; previouſly to which, a Court of Claims was eſtabliſhed, to ſettle the demands of thoſe who ſhould pretend to have a right to aſſiſt upon this occaſion; and among theſe we find Geoffrey Chaucer (b) [H]. It appears plainly, that the Duke of Lancaſter, (x) Barnes's Hiſt. of Edward III.

(34) Chaucer's Works, p. 215.

(y) Hollinſhed, Barnes, &c.

(z) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(a) Miſcellaneous Obſervations on old Engliſh Authors, p. 95.

(b) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition.

at the age of twenty-ſix, and advanced no great way therein; but forty years afterwards it was finiſhed and publiſhed by John de Meung, when he was in his twenty-fourth year. He was a man of ſenſe and learning, well verſed in Divinity, Philoſophy, Chemiſtry, Aſtronomy, and other ſciences, but was a violent enemy to bad prieſts and bad women. He is ſuppoſed to have died about the year 1365 (35). This work is ſtill much eſteemed in France, where it has run through many editions; but the beſt, which was publiſhed in Holland, is of a very freſh date (*). Beſides this, Chaucer is affirmed by Leland (36), and other ancient writers, to have been the author of the Plowman's Tale, which bears very hard upon the vices of the Clergy, both ſecular and regulars; and the ſatire under the title of Jack Upland (37), is alſo attributed to him upon very good authority; notwithſtanding which, there want not many, who under colour of veneration for Chaucer's memory, are deſirous of imputing theſe pieces to others: and yet this would be of little uſe, for in many other works that are undoubtedly his, we find ſentiments of the ſame nature. On the other hand, the venerable John Fox thinks the labour of our author in this reſpect, worthy the higheſt commendation; and even attributes the preſervation of his works, to a particular providence. Let us hear him (38). 'I marvel to conſider this, ſays, he, how that the Biſhops condemning and aboliſhing all manner of Engliſh books and treatiſes, which might bring the people to any light of knowledge, did yet authorize the works of Chaucer, to remain ſtill and to be occupied; who no doubt ſaw in religion, as much almoſt as ever we do now, and uttereth in his works no leſs; and ſeemeth to be a right Wicklevian, or elſe there was never any; and that all his works almoſt, if they be thoroughly adviſed will teſtify; (albeit it be done in mirth and covertly) and eſpecially the latter end of his third book of the Teſtament of Love: for there purely he toucheth the higheſt matter, that is, the Communion; wherein, except a man be altogether blind, he may eſpy him at the full. Although in the ſame book (as in all other he uſeth to do) under ſhadows covertly, as under a vizour, he ſuborneth truth in ſuch ſort, as both privily ſhe may profit the godly-minded, and yet not be eſpied of the crafty adverſary. And therefore the Biſhops belike, taking his words but for jeſts and toys, in condemning other books, yet permitted his books to be read. So it pleaſed God then to blind the eyes of them for the more commodity of his people, to the intent that through the reading of his treatiſes, ſome fruit might redound thereof to his Church, as no doubt it did to many. As alſo I am partly informed of certain which knew the parties, which to them reported, that by reading Chaucer's works they were brought to the true knowledge of religion: and not unlike to be true; for to omit the other parts of his volume, whereof ſome are more fabulous than other, what tale can be more plainly told, than the Tale of the Ploughman? &c.'

(35) Hiſtoire de la Philoſophie Hermetique, vol. i. p. 193.

(*) Amſterdam, 1734. 3 vols. 12mo.

(36) De Script. Britan. p. 423.

(37) Chaucer's Works, p. 590.

(38) Acts and Monuments, vol. ii. p. 42.

[H] And amongſt theſe we find Geoffrey Chaucer.] The claim made upon this occaſion, was in right of his ward, who was poſſeſſed of the manor of Bilſington in Kent (39); which was held of the Crown, by the ſervice of preſenting to the King three maple cups on the day of his coronation. This manor had been purchaſed by Sir Edmond Staplegate the father; of Richard Fitz-Allen, Earl of Arundel, whoſe family had been in long poſſeſſion of it; and it was ſet forth in Chaucer's petition, that the manor was held by Grand Serjeantry, by the owner's diſcharging the office of Chief Butler at the King's coronation (40). But Richard Earl of Arundel controverted this claim, and by his petition and plea ſet forth, that the office of Chief Butler belonged to his family, and was never annexed to this manor, his anceſtors having enjoyed it both before they held that manor, and ſince they parted with it, and therefore he demanded it as his proper right (41). The iſſue of this buſineſs was, that the Earl ſo far carried his point before John Duke of Lancaſter, then acting as Lord High-Steward, as to be allowed to officiate for that time with a ſalvo jure, that it ſhould not infringe the right of Edmond Staplegate, or any who ſhould pretend

(39) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition.

(40) Harris's Hiſt. of Kent, p. 42.

(41) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. i. p. 318.

Lancaſter, who was now in the zenith of power, let ſlip no opportunity of ſerving ſo firm a friend, and ſo uſeful a dependant, as our author was; for in the very beginning of this reign it appears, that by Letters-patents, dated March 23, 1377, the King confirmed his grandfather's grant of twenty marks a year (c); and by other Letters-patents, dated the 18th of April following, he likewiſe confirmed the other grant of a pitcher of wine daily (d). But whether Chaucer remained in his office of Comptroller of the Cuſtoms, is not ſo clear, though the contrary ſeems to be moſt probable; for in a ſhort time after his affairs were in ſuch confuſion, that we find, in the ſecond year of King Richard, he was obliged to have recourſe to the King's protection (e), in order to ſcreen him from his creditors: but how he came to fall into theſe difficulties, and whether they were temporary only, or of a long continuance, is a point that, at this diſtance, it is not poſſible to aſcertain; but from a compariſon of circumſtances, it ſeems to be moſt likely, that it was from ſome ſudden accident he fell under this misfortune, and that he had recourſe to the King's protection, merely to gain time to ſettle his concerns. One may be the more confirmed in this, by comparing his circumſtances at this juncture, with thoſe of his family, ſoon after (f). We have no direct hiſtorical lights indeed, but methinks, though it be a new, it is ſtill a probable conjecture, that about this time, he conveyed all his eſtates to his eldeſt ſon Thomas Chaucer; and the facts that ſeem to ſtrengthen this conjecture, ſhall be ſubmitted to the reader's judgment at the bottom of the page (g) [I]. In the fourth year of King Richard the IId's reign, he procured a confirmation of the grants that had been formerly made to himſelf, and to Philippa his wife (h), which is a proof, that he had a great perſonal intereſt in this Court; ſince at the time of his obtaining this grant, the power and influence of the Duke of Lancaſter were very much ſunk, as from a train of ſiniſter accidents waiting upon his conduct, he was become equally ſuſpected by the King, and diſliked by the people. The great encouragement and ſupport he had afforded to Mr. Wickliffe, was attended with conſequences that he did not in the leaſt expect, and yet found it not in his power to hinder; for, without doubt, the Duke's great view in ſupporting this party, was to weaken the power of the Clergy, and to hinder them from taking ſo large a ſhare as they did in the management of all temporal affairs: but ſome great men of his party miſtaking his view, puſhed things to extremities, and by countenancing itinerant preachers, without either learning or ſound principles, made way for a ſudden turn, which had very nearly ſubverted the conſtitution, and thrown all things into confuſion (i). For the common people, thus encouraged to ſhake off the yoke of the Clergy, began to think that of the government alſo too heavy; and taking occaſion, from ſome taxes lately impoſed, roſe up in arms, under the conduct of Wat Tyler, Jack Straw, and ſuch kind

(c) Pat. 1 R. II. p. 13.

(d) Pat. 1 R. II. p. 19.

(e) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(f) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition of his Works.

(g) Clauſ. 19 Ric. II. m. 15.

(b) Records remaining in the Houſe of Lords, collected by Mr. Rymer.

(i) Lewis's Life of Wickliffe.

pretend title for the future (42). This ward of our author died about thirteen years after, but the manor continued in the family till the beginning of the reign of Hen. VI when it paſſed into that of the Cheyneys, who in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, ſold it to Sir Francis Barham, of London; and his grandſon, Mr. Robert Barham, was in poſſeſſion of it at the coronation of King Charles II. when Mr. Eraſmus Smith, on the behalf of the ſaid Mr. Barham, aſſiſted at the coronation, and preſented the three maple cups (43). This manor has ſince paſſed into other families.

(42) Harris's Hiſt. of Kent, p. 42.

(43) Hiſtorical Account of the Coronation of Charles II.

[I] At the bottom of the page.] All who have hitherto attempted to give any account of Chaucer's life, have been very much at a loſs about this circumſtance, of his having recourſe to the King's protection; which ſhows, that in the very beginning of this reign, his affairs were in great diſorder; and yet it is very plain, that himſelf and his patron flouriſhed in the full poſſeſſion of power and plenty, as long as King Edward the III. lived (44). A certain writer hints, that Chaucer exhauſted his fortune in his foreign embaſſies (45); but a later writer obſerves with greater probability, that he made his fortune by them; yet, as he very juſtly remarks, this by no means ſolves the doubt, how he ſhould come to be ſo very poor in ſo ſhort a time, after his poſſeſſing ſo great wealth (46); for which amongſt others, we have his own authority (47). Now this riddle I think, may be very probably explained thus. Our author, Chaucer, about this time, found out a very conſiderable match for his eldeſt ſon Thomas Chaucer, and this was Maud, the ſecond daughter of Sir John Burgherſhe, a man of very conſiderable rank, but by no means brother to Sir Bartholomew Burgherſhe, Knight of the Garter, and of Dr. Henry Burgherſhe, Biſhop of Lincoln, Chancellor and Treaſurer of England, as a certain writer very confidently aſſerts (48); but rather, if I gueſs right, the nephew of thoſe great men, and the ſon of Sir John Burgherſhe, who was truly their brother; and this I am led to believe, becauſe it appears upon record, that the cuſtody of this John Burgherſhe, the father of Maud, was granted in his nonage to the daughter of Sir Bartholomew Burgherſhe before-mentioned (49). A great fortune ſhe was without doubt, but not the only daughter or ſole heireſs of her family, as has been repreſented, or at leaſt not ſo at the time ſhe married Thomas Chaucer, though ſhe might be, and indeed was ſo afterwards. Neither are we to believe what we are told, of her being a ward to the crown (50); for her father was then living, and lived many years after, that is, to the nineteenth of Richard II. when he left behind him two daughters; Margaret, the eldeſt, firſt married to Sir John Grenville, Knight, and then to John Arundel, Eſq; and this Maud (51). Now my ſuppoſition is, that Geoffrey Chaucer, for obtaining this great match, ſettled all his land eſtate upon his ſon; and that his doing this might bring upon him thoſe demands, which put him under the neceſſity of obtaining the King's protection. As to the ſeveral facts upon which this conjecture is built, I think they are ſupported by as good authorities as can be deſired: nor can any great difficulty ariſe from the age of this young gentleman, as may appear thus. Chaucer married his wife Philippa Rouet about the year 1360, and if he had this ſon the next year, he might be of full age in the latter end of the fourth year of Richard II. when this marriage took place; and before which, in all probability, the father might make this ſettlement (52). We ſhall have occaſion hereafter to ſay more of this gentleman, who became a much greater man than his father, to whom he was a ſupport in his declining years.

(48) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(49) Pat. 29 E. III. p. 1. m. 5.

(50) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(51) Clauſ. 19 R. II. m. 15.

(52) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition.

(44) Hollinſhed, Stowe, Barnes, &c.

(45) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(46) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition.

(47) Prologue to the Teſtament of Love.

of leaders, with a wild intention of freeing themſelves from whatever theſe wife leaders taught them to look upon as oppreſſions (k). Their reſentment was chiefly directed againſt the Clergy, as appears by their beheading the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Prior of St. John's by Smithfield, who was Lord Treaſurer; and by their burning that ſtately Priory, and plundering the Abbies of St. Alban's, Bury, and ſeveral others (l). As ſoon as this rebellion was ſomewhat abated, the Parliament began to enquire into the cauſe of it; nor were there wanting enemies of Wickliffe, who charged him and his followers with being the encouragers of it. But that is unlikely to be true; for had the rebels been Wickliffe's friends, they would never have burnt the Savoy, the palace of his patron the Duke of Lancaſter. However, ſome of his followers gave too much cauſe for ſuch a ſurmiſe; as Dr. Hereford, who aſſerted, that Archbiſhop Sudbury deſerved that death he found; and the King, the year following, impowered the Biſhops to arreſt Wickliffe, and forbad his ſubjects to encourage any of that perſuaſion. Yet Wickliffe appeared, and ſeemed partly to ſatisfy the Biſhops with his opinion (m). It is commonly ſaid, by moſt of our Hiſtorians, that from this time forward the Duke of Lancaſter diſowned the Wicklevites, and charging the late diſturbances upon them, ſtiled their opinions, the Doctrine of Devils. The writers alſo of our author's life give into this opinion, and ſeem to think, that he likewiſe began to temporize, and did not ſpeak his ſentiments ſo freely as formerly; but the truth is otherwiſe; for the Duke of Lancaſter did not condemn Wickliffe's doctrine, but the doctrines of Dr. Hereford, and other followers of Wickliffe, who had now deſerted him, and propagated many dangerous tenets, which he diſclaimed (n). As for Chaucer, he was ſo far from abandoning his former notions, that he exerted himſelf to the utmoſt in 1382, in the ſupport of John Comberton, generally ſtiled John of Northampton, Mayor of London, in his endeavours to reform the city, according to the advice given by Wickliffe; which was ſo much reſented by the Clergy (o), that rather than they would let this reformation proceed, they had recourſe to the moſt violent methods; and in order to prevent Comberton's being re-choſen Mayor of London, excited ſuch diſturbances as bordered upon a rebellion. The King, making uſe of force upon this occaſion, ſent Sir Robert Knolles to London, who committed great ſeverities, put ſome to death, made the late Mayor Comberton priſoner, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours to apprehend Chaucer (p) [K]. But our author, having an early foreſight of his danger, made his eſcape into Hainault; and from thence went to France, where finding himſelf not ſo ſafe as he expected, he withdrew into Zealand, and there concealed himſelf for ſome time, with ſeveral other Londoners, who had fled upon the ſame account, and whom he generouſly ſubſiſted out of his own private fortune (q). But while he was in this diſtreſs, moſt of thoſe with whom he had been engaged at home, had found ways and means to make their peace; and far from conſidering the calamities to which Chaucer had expoſed himſelf for their ſakes, took no care to ſupply him; and, which was much worſe, endeavoured to hinder the remittances that might have been made him out of his own fortune; and this, in hopes that he might periſh in his baniſhment, and by his death put them out of all fear. Such baſe and barbarous ingratitude, though it extremely afflicted him, yet it did not put our author upon taking any meaſures to be revenged: on the contrary, he came over privately into England, to avoid ſtarving in a (k) Thom. Walſ. p. 210. n. 10.

(l) H. Knyghton. ap. Decem Script. 2640. n. 10.

(m) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(n) Dugdale's Baronage, tom. ii. p. 117.

(o) Annal. Ricard. II. MS.

(p) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition.

(q) Theſe circumſtances are all collected from our author's Teſtament of Love.

[K] His utmoſt endeavours to apprehend Chaucer.] It is very certain, that in this whole matter our author ſuffered for his attachment to his party: but this is ſo darkly repreſented by ſuch as have written his life, that it is a very difficult thing to diſcover their meaning (53); and yet after all, the fact is no more than this. There were at that time two powerful factions in the city; and as very ſeldom any thing of this kind happens, but religion is drawn into the quarrel, ſo the one was ſuppoſed to be well affected to the Church, and the other inclined to a reformation. Dr. Courtney, formerly Biſhop of London, and now Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was protector of the one, and John Duke of Lancaſter was eſteemed to be the head of the other; and the leading man in his intereſt was this John Comberton, or John of Northampton, Citizen and Draper; on whoſe account all this diſturbance happened, for which ſome lives were loſt; and this unfortunate perſon being carried to Reading, was there tried and convicted, and had judgment given againſt him to be impriſoned for life, and to have his goods ſeized, which we find was accordingly done: and ſo ſtrong the current ran at that time, that he with ſome other citizens of his party, were excepted out of a pardon which the King granted; and all this was then underſtood, to be done in ſpite and contempt of the Duke of Lancaſter, to whom Comberton ſteadily adhered, and called him his Lord at his trial (54). But for all this, things came about again not long after, and Mr. Comberton had the honour to have his ſentence reverſed, at the prayer of the Commons of England in Parliament aſſembled (55). We may from all this infer, that how warm and indiſcreet ſoever our author Chaucer might be, in ſupporting that party to which he had attached himſelf, yet beyond all queſtion there was nothing of diſloyalty in this, but quite the contrary: for thoſe who had then the management of the King's affairs, and ran him into all theſe warm and violent meaſures, were the very ſame perſons, who by their evil counſels brought him at laſt into that diſtreſſed condition, which coſt him firſt his crown and then his life. It is therefore no diſcredit to Chaucer that he was a friend to Wickliffe, or that he eſpouſed this party in the city, however ſome of our hiſtorians may have repreſented, or rather miſrepreſented it: for it is a thing well enough known to all who are converſant in the Engliſh hiſtory, that many baſe and black calumnies are thrown upon the Duke of Lancaſter and his party, merely on account of their oppoſing the pride and power of the Prelates (56) of thoſe times; who under colour of maintaining the King's prerogative, really ſacrificed him to their own intereſts, which at the ſame time alſo they very ill underſtood; ſince a reaſonable compliance had both ſaved him, and done themſelves much more good (57).

(53) See both the Lives of Chaucer ſo often quoted.

(54) Compleat Hiſt. of England, vol. i. p. 253.

(55) Cotton's Abridgment of the Records, p. 336.

(56) H. Knyghton. ap. Decem Script. col. 2643.

(57) Cotton's Abridgment of the Records, p. 555.

ſtrange country; but had not been long here before, either through the vigilance of the government's enquiries, or the treachery of ſome whom he truſted, he was diſcovered, ſeized, and ſent to priſon, where he was treated at firſt with great rigour and ſeverity, but in the end promiſed the King's pardon, and his liberty, if he would diſcloſe all he knew, and put it in the power of the government to reſtore the peace of the city; which, at length, he did. It does not appear what the conſequences were, of his confeſſion, with reſpect to others; but with regard to himſelf, they brought upon him an inexpreſſible load of calumnies and ſlanders. All theſe circumſtances, we learn from himſelf, in that moſt excellent treatiſe of his, intituled, the Teſtament of Love; which he wrote on purpoſe to vent his ſorrow, and to conſole himſelf under the heavy burthen of his afflictions [L]. This load, which was already almoſt too heavy for him, received however ſome very conſiderable additions from the concurrence of other untoward accidents; ſuch as the Duke of Lancaſter's loſing much of his credit at Court, and Chaucer, not a little of his intereſt with the Duke; who finding his reputation very much injured, by the liberties taken with his character, on account of his amours with the Lady Swynford, he came, though very unwillingly, to a full reſolution of parting with her; which he accordingly did: and this, for a time, affected the concerns of our author extremely, who finding himſelf ſtrongly puſhed on one ſide, by ſuch as meant him ill; and little, if at all, ſupported on the other, by ſuch as had been formerly his friends, was ſo much depreſſed thereby in his mind, and diſtreſſed in his fortune, as to reſolve upon diſpoſing of his penſions before-mentioned, which he had obtained in the former, and had been confirmed to him in the preſent reign; and this he actually did, to one John Scalby, as appears by a licence obtained for this purpoſe (r), on record. In this unexpected and terrible reverſe of fortune, he very wiſely reſolved to quit that buſy ſcene of life, in which he had met with ſo many troubles, and to ſeek in retirement that happineſs, which, from experience, he knew was not to be met with in Courts. The place he choſe for his retreat was Woodſtock, which had been the ſweet ſcene of ſo much ſatisfaction to him in the days of his proſperity; and there he employed part of his time in reviſing and correcting his writings, totally ſecluded from the world, and taſting only thoſe calm and ſolid pleaſures, which are the reſult of a wiſe man's reflections on the viciſſitudes of human life (s). By this means he became well prepared for a new alteration in his condition, and as unexpected a change in his affairs as he had hitherto met with; for the abſence of the great Duke of Lancaſter, which had coſt him ſo dear, gave him the better title to hope his favour and his protection upon his return, which happened towards the end of the year 1389 (t). He had made an expedition into Spain, in order to recover the kingdoms of Caſtile and Leon, of which, in right of his wife, he had aſſumed the title; and though his ſucceſs in war was at firſt various, and at laſt diſaſtrous, yet ſo wiſe and prudent a Prince he was, that after diſmiſſing his army, and ſeeming to relinquiſh that great deſign, for the accompliſhment of which he had ſpent ſo much, he had notwithſtanding ſo great addreſs, as to be able to extract, even from his diſappointment, almoſt as much as he could have expected from victory; for though he could not make himſelf a King, yet he made two of his daughters Queens, one of Caſtile, and the other of Portugal, bringing home with him alſo a vaſt treaſure in ready money, having, at the time he landed in England, as one of our Hiſtorians tells us, as many cheſts of gold as loaded forty-ſeven mules (u).

(r) This Licence bears date May 11, 1389.

(s) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(t) H. Knyghton. ap. Decem Script, col. 2677. n. 10.

(u) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 118.

[L] Under the heavy burthen of his afflictions.] There cannot be a better account given of this, which is the moſt important of our author's works in proſe, than by tranſcribing the Rubrick that ſtands before it, and which runs thus (58):

(58) Chaucer's Works, I. 479.

'This book is an imitation of Boecius de Conſolatione Philoſophiæ. I. In the firſt part whereof Love, 'by way of legacy, bequeaths to all them that follow her inſtructions, the knowledge of truth from 'error, whereby they may rightly judge of the 'cauſes of croſs fortune, and ſuch adverſities as befal them, whether in their ſuits of Love or otherwiſe, and ſo in the end obtain their wiſhed deſires. 'II. In the ſecond part ſhe teacheth the knowledge 'of one very God our Creator, as alſo the ſtate of 'Grace, and the ſtate of Glory, all which good 'things are figured by a Margarite Pearl. Chaucer 'compiled this book as a comfort to himſelf, after 'great griefs conceived for ſome raſh attempts of the 'Commons, with whom he had joined, and thereby 'was in fear to loſe the favour of his beſt friends, 'and alſo therein to ſet an end to all his writing, 'being commanded by Venus (as appears by Gower 'at the end of the eighth book, intituled Confeſſio 'Amantis) ſo to do, as one that was Venus Clerk; 'even as Gower had made his Confeſſio Amantis, 'his laſt work and ſhrift of his former offences.' As one of the great excellencies of all our author's compoſitions in verſe or proſe, is, an eaſy, natural, and unaffected manner of writing, allowing for the uſage of the times in which he lived, which in all ages has been held a kind of law even to the beſt and ableſt authors; ſo in this work theſe qualities are very remarkable; for one plainly ſees a great Philoſopher broken by misfortunes, deſerted by companions, and expoſed to the cenſures of an evil world, delivering himſelf in a priſon with freedom and ſpirit, though in a melancholy mood, and in the language of ſorrow; painting in the boldeſt colours his own miſtakes as well as thoſe of others; and pointing out the ſole remedies that are left, when a man is abandoned by fortune and by friends. Such is the nature of this performance, in which we have a clear and perfect repreſentation of his condition, and may enter as fully into all the cauſes of his private griefs, which were alſo thoſe of the publick diſorders of his time, as if we actually ſat by him in the priſon, and heard him utter thoſe complaints, which, with equal force of fancy, and elegance of expreſſion, he has committed to the peruſal of poſterity; and thereby tranſmitted the faireſt evidence of a ſpirit, which, though calamity might tame, yet it could not injure, much leſs deſtroy.

Upon

Upon his return, in ſo good circumſtances, his party began to revive, and the Duke recovered his credit at Court, inſomuch that the King, in full Parliament, created him Duke of Aquitaine, and ſent him over to take poſſeſſion of that noble principality (w). His old affection for the Lady Catherine Swynford, ſiſter to Chaucer's wife, revived with his fortune; and under colour of rewarding the care ſhe had taken in the education of his daughters, he made her very large grants in the nature of penſions (x) [M]. We have no particular account of the benefits that accrued to Chaucer from this turn in the Duke's affairs; but notwithſtanding this we have no reaſon to doubt, that he felt the effects of his patron's proſperity, who had ſuffered ſo deeply by the declenſion of his influence. But it ſeems his diſtaſte to Courts was grown ſo ſtrong, that nothing could tempt him to quit his rural retirement, or to launch again into that ſea of buſineſs where he had been ſo lately ſhipwrecked (y). His mind, however, being more at reſt, he undertook and finiſhed a new work, which has eſtabliſhed his reputation, with reſpect to learning, upon as firm a baſis, as his former labours had fixed his fame for wit and genius. This new work plainly appears to have been written in the year 1391, and was intended for the uſe of his younger ſon Lewis, then no more than ten years of age, and yet ſo forward in his learning, as to be deſirous of having his father's inſtructions in acquiring the principles of Aſtronomy. This gave birth to his Treatiſe on ASTROLABE (z), which not only ſhows the ſkill of its author, but likewiſe inconteſtibly proves, that uſeful ſcience was not at near ſo low an ebb in thoſe times, as it is generally repreſented (a). Neither will the caſe be at all altered, if what ſome writers have ſuggeſted ſhould really prove true, and this Diſcourſe of Chaucer's appear to be no more than a tranſlation, or, which ſeems to be ſtill a more probable opinion, a collection from other authors who had written before him upon the ſame ſubject (b) [N]. About four years after this, while her huſband was in France, Conſtance, Ducheſs of Lancaſter, died (c), and was buried with great ſolemnity at Leiceſter; and the Duke coming over into England at the cloſe of the year, and not meeting with quite ſo kind a (w) Rot. Parl. 13 R. II. n. 21.

(x) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(y) See his Preface to his Treatiſe on the Aſtrolabe.

(z) Chaucer's Works, p. 439.

(a) See this farther explained in the note [N].

(b) Life of Chaucer prefixed to Urry's edition.

(c) Tho. Walſ. p. 385. n. 40. Hen. Knyghton. ap. Decem Script. col. 2731. n. 30.

[M] He made her very large grants in the nature of penſions.] The colour given by the Duke of Lancaſter to theſe grants made in favour of the Lady Swynford, was the care ſhe had taken of his two daughters Philippa and Elizabeth, as appears by the words of the grant of the wardſhip of Bertam de Sandbys's heir, and of an annuity of two hundred marks per annum, payable out of his honour of Tickhill, which words are theſe (59): 'For the good and agreeable ſervice 'which our thrice dear and moſt beloved Lady Ca'therine Swynford, the miſtreſs of our moſt beloved 'daughters, hath rendered to our ſaid children; we 'have given and granted, &c.' but no doubt the true reaſon was for his ſpecial affection towards her on account of the children he had had by her, to whom he gave the name of Beaufort, in Latin de bello forte, from a caſtle ſo called in Anjou, which came into his family by the Lady Blanch of Artois, Queen of Navarre (60). Theſe children were four, viz. John Beaufort, afterwards Earl of Somerſet; Henry Beaufort, afterwards Cardinal Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Chancellor of England; Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorſet, afterwards Duke of Exeter; and Joan, firſt married to Sir Robert Ferrers of Overſly, and afterwards to Ralph Earl of Weſtmorland (61). We have mentioned this more particularly, becauſe of the near relation between the deſcendants of our author and thoſe of this Lady by the Duke of Lancaſter, of which we find it remembered by a very curious and circumſpect writer (62) in the time of King Charles I. that there had been eight Kings, four Queens, and five Princes of England; ſix Kings, and three Queens of Scotland; two Cardinals, upwards of twenty Dukes, almoſt as many Ducheſſes of England, ſeveral Dukes of Scotland, beſides many potent Princes, and eminent Nobility in foreign parts.

(59) Ex libro nigro in Cam. Duc. Lanc. fol. 96.

(60) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition of his Works.

(61) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 119.

(62) Weaver's Funeral Monuments, p. 661.

[N] Upon the ſame ſubject.] The title of this piece, as it ſtands in our author's Works, is, The Concluſions of the Aſtrolabie (63), in the introduction to which, addreſſed to his ſon, he remarks, that it was with great pleaſure he obſerved his growing capacity and earneſt paſſion for learning, which very willingly induced him to yield to his requeſt, of teaching him the uſe of this inſtrument. He then proceeds to inform him, that his intention was not to diſcourſe of all, but on the moſt uſeful, and thoſe too the moſt eaſy operations that might be performed by this curious inſtrument, as being the fitteſt for the apprehenſion of a child of ten years old. He adds, that for the very ſame reaſon he wrote them in Engliſh and not in Latin, as conceiving it too much to put ſo young a perſon upon learning things unknown in a tongue of which he had little or no knowledge, and which alſo he held unneceſſary, ſince the ſcience was the ſame in whatever language taught, and the practice too had been the ſame in other nations; for the Greeks wrote their books of Aſtronomy in Greek, the Arabians in Arabick, the Jews in Hebrew, and thoſe to whom the Latin language was familiar in Latin; for aſſuredly, ſays he, thoſe who wrote in Latin had the knowledge of which they wrote, out of other tongues. He would not therefore have him believe, that he knew the leſs for not gaining his knowledge from that learned languade, becauſe, continues he, different tongues lead to the ſame ſcience, as by many different roads men go to the ſame city, as for inſtance to Rome. He adds likewiſe, that he has written it in a very plain ſtile, out of regard to the tenderneſs of his underſtanding, and that he judged it better to uſe more words to make the propoſitions clear, than by ſtudying a correct ſtyle, to render his work more difficult to a child, though more perfect in the eyes of ſcholars; and alſo puts him in mind, that he pretends not to deliver any thing of his own, but only to compile and to tranſlate from the Aſtronomers in ſeveral languages, what, with more accuracy, but leſs perſpicuity, they had delivered concerning this matter; and with this ſword, ſays he, (meaning this explication of his deſign) ſhall I ſlay envy. The work itſelf is unqueſtionably a maſter-piece in it's kind, and agrees in every reſpect to what it appears the author propoſed to make it; for there can be nothing better diſpoſed, more clearly written, or delivered in a way more ſuitable to pleaſe and ſatisfy the appetite of a young ſcholar. In a very fine MS. of this treatiſe, belonging formerly to Dr. Henry Moore, Biſhop of Ely, there is a note which ſignifies, that Lewis Chaucer was at this time under the tuition of his father's friend Nicholas Strode. Leland (64), Bale (65), and Wood (66), call him Ralph Strode of Merton-college in Oxford; one of the deepeſt Philoſophers, and moſt eſteemed Poets of his time, which, conſidering the youth of Lewis Chaucer, ſeems not a little ſtrange. The note referred to at the end of the book beforementioned runs thus: 'Explicit Tractatus de Concluſionibus Aſtrolabii, compilat. per Galfredum Chauciers, 'ad filium ſuum Ludewicum ſcholarem tunc temporis 'Oxoniæ, ac ſub tutela illius nobiliſſimi Philoſophi 'Magiſtri N. Strode.'

(63) Chaucer's Works, p. 439.

(64) Comment. de Scriptor. Britan. p. 376.

(65) Script. Brit. p. 477, 478.

(66) Hiſt. & Antiquit. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 87.

reception at Court as he expected, went ſuddenly to Lincoln, where his old miſtreſs Lady Catherine Swynford reſided; and, to the great ſurprize of the world, now, when ſhe had not either youth or beauty to recommend her, married her (d). This gave great diſcontent to the Ducheſs of Glouceſter, the Counteſs of Derby, the Counteſs of Arundel, and other Ladies deſcended of the Royal Family, becauſe ſhe became by this marriage the ſecond perſon in the realm, and from being no fit companion for any, was now ſuddenly to take place of them all: but ſhe behaved with ſo much diſcretion and humility, that theſe diſputes were quickly compoſed (e), and in a ſhort time ſhe gained ſuch an aſcendency over the King, that he carried her, as well as the Duke her huſband, with him, the year after their marriage, into France, at which time he eſpouſed Iſabel, the French King's daughter, then very young, and who was put under the care of the Ducheſs of Lancaſter (f). After the ceremony of this marriage, and the return of the Royal Family to England, we find a very ſingular inſtance of the advantage that Chaucer received from this alliance; for now, by Letters-patents, the King granted him an annuity of twenty marks per annum (g), in lieu of that given him by his grandfather, and which, in the time of his diſtreſs, he had been compelled to diſpoſe of for his ſubſiſtence. Soon after this he granted him his protection by other Letters-patents, dated the fourth of May, in the twenty-firſt year of his reign, for two years, ſignifying, that for that ſpace he had occaſion to employ him in his ſervice (h). Neither was this the laſt or greateſt inſtance afforded him of royal favour; ſince we find that by Letters-patents, dated the thirteenth of October, in the following year, he had a pipe of wine annually granted him out of the cuſtoms of the Port of London (i), which was to be delivered him by the Chief Butler, and to this office his ſon Thomas Chaucer was now raiſed (k). But if theſe benefits cheared and comforted his decayed ſpirits in the decline of life, he had, however, the mortification to loſe, about the ſame time, his noble patron, his conſtant friend, and kind brother, the Duke of Lancaſter, by whom he was firſt brought to Court, and through whoſe favour he never wanted either countenance or ſupport, when it was in his power to beſtow (l). This loſs very probably afflicted him deeply, as we may gather from his retiring about this time to Dunnington-Caſtle, where he ſpent moſt of his days during the laſt two years of his life, indulging his grave thoughts in the ſolitude of that ſweet retreat (m) [O]. In this ſituation he was, when that great revolution happened, which placed Henry of Lancaſter, the ſon of his brother-in-law, upon the throne, in which, as Chaucer had no hand, (though certainly it could not diſpleaſe him) ſo we do not find that he was at all eager in paying his compliments to the new King, much leſs that he triumphed in the misfortunes of his late kind maſter, and gracious benefactor, as others, and particularly Gower, who had been more obliged to that unfortunate Prince, and who at that time was both old and blind, moſt ſhamefully did (n). He did not, however, ſlight the advantages offered him by this revolution; but having accidentally loſt the two laſt grants of an annuity, and of the pipe of wine by King Richard, he obtained a confirmation of them in the firſt year of Henry IV. by an exemplification of his former Letters-patents (o). Neither was this the only favour he received from the new King, who, out of regard to the ancient friendſhip and near alliance between the Prince his father and our author, granted him, during the firſt year of his reign, an annuity of forty marks per annum for the term of his life (p). It is true, indeed, that a very great writer, a ſincere ad(d) Tho. Walſ. p. 388. n. 10.

(e) Stowe's Annals, p. 312.

(f) Knyghton, Walſingh. ubi ſup.

(g) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(h) Pat. 21 R. II. p. 3. m. 26.

(i) Pat. 22 R. II. p. 1. m. 5.

(k) Speght's Life of Chaucer.

(l) T. Walſingh. p. 393. n. 30.

(m) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition.

(n) See his Prologue to his Confeſſio Amantis.

(o) Pat. 1 H. IV. p. 1. m. 18.

(p) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to his Works by Urry.

[O] Of that ſweet retreat.] It is not very clear at what time our author quitted his beloved houſe at Woodſtock, in order to go to Dunnington-caſtle, where he ſpent the laſt two years of his life; but as this was his final retreat, and became very remarkable for being ſo, an account of it cannot be unacceptable to the reader. It was in Mr. Camden's time (67), (when in it's glory) 'a ſmall but neat caſtle, ſituate upon the 'brow of a riſing hill, having an agreeable proſpect, 'very light, with windows on all ſides, ſaid to be 'built by Sir Richard Adderbury, Knt. who likewiſe 'founded an hoſpital beneath it called God's Houſe: 'it was afterwards the ſeat of Chaucer, then of the 'De la Poles, and in our father's memory the dwelling of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk.' At the beginning of the civil wars in the reign of King Charles I. it was a garriſon for the King under the valiant Sir John Boys, which commanded the weſtern road and town of Newbury, and was therefore of great advantage to the Royal Party as a ſafe retreat; and the cannon playing from it much annoyed the Parliament forces. This place his Majeſty honoured by lying one night in it; but after a rough aſſault, and as bold a reſiſtance, during which ſeveral of the towers were battered down, it was ſurrendered upon honourable conditions. This was the antient ſtate, and the occaſion of the late ruin of that pleaſant ſtructure. At preſent there is nothing to be ſeen of it but what raiſes horror and concern, a battered gateway with two towers, and ſome ſmall part of the ſhattered walls, being all that remains thereof. The ground about it, and the ruins of it, are choaked with brambles and over-run with ivy; but leſt the place of it's ſituation ſhould in a few years more be forgotten (68), I ſhall as plainly as I can deſcribe it. It lies half a mile to the right of Spinham-land, (the antient Spina of Antoninus) and a mile beyond Newbury on the ſame ſide: as you go from London you paſs over the river Kennet to the village of Dunnington, from which there is a pretty ſteep but pleaſant aſcent through a lane to a hill under the caſtle, where ſtands a ſeat formerly belonging to the Counteſs of Sandwich. From hence ariſes the Caſtle-hill, very ſteep, and not unlike that whereon the Obſervatory ſtands at Greenwich, and from this hill there is a very fine proſpect of ſeveral counties. On the back of the caſtle are level grounds, woodlands, and encloſures. The Caſtle itſelf ſtands in a pleaſant park, in which there was a famous oak called Chaucer's Oak, under which, as tradition taught, he wrote ſeveral Poems. Mr. Evelyn (69) gives a particular account of this tree, and ſays there were three of them planted by Chaucer, the King's Oak, the Queen's Oak, and Chaucer's Oak.

(67) Camd. Britan.

(68) Theſe are the words of the author of the Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition of his Works.

(69) In his Sylva.

mirer of our author, and moſt deſervedly a Poet-Laureat himſelf, informs us, that Chaucer enjoyed this honour under three Kings, Edward III. Richard II. and Henry IV. (q) : but this is a miſtake; for in truth there was no ſuch office in thoſe days, or, if we may truſt to the authority of the learned Selden, before the reign of Edward IV. (r). If we take this in a more extenſive ſenſe, for an eminent Poet who celebrated theſe Princes, it may be juſtly applied to Chaucer in regard to the two firſt; but we find nothing in his works relating to the laſt, nor indeed is his name ſo much as mentioned in any of our author's writings. The ſmall time he lived after the acceſſion of this King, was chiefly employed in regulating his private affairs, which had ſuffered by the publick diſorders; for all the publick acts of the depoſed King Richard, in the twenty-firſt year of his reign being declared void, Chaucer was forced to quit his retirement, to come up to town to ſolicit his cauſes, and beginning now to bend under the weight of years (s), this unlucky acceſſion of buſineſs, which obliged him to alter his uſual way of living, might very poſſibly haſten his end, the near approach of which he bore with Roman conſtancy, or rather with Chriſtian patience; for there is ſtill extant a kind of Ode that he is ſaid to have compoſed in his laſt agonies, which very plainly proves that his ſenſes were perfectly ſound, and the faculties of his mind not in the leaſt impaired (t) [P]. He died October 25, 1400, in the full poſſeſſion of that high reputation (u) which his writings had deſervedly acquired, and was buried in Weſtminſter-Abbey, in the great ſouth croſs-iſle. Some writers have affirmed, that he was firſt buried in the cloiſter, and lay there till ſome years after; but this is a miſtake; for Caxton, in his edition of Chaucer, (which was long before the time of his removal) as they place it, ſays, that he was buried in the Abbey-church of Weſtminſter, before the chapel of St. Bennet. And it is very probable he lay beneath a large ſtone of grey marble in the pavement, where the monument of Mr. Dryden now ſtands, which is in the front of that chapel, upon the erecting of which this ſtone was taken up, and ſawed in pieces to make good the pavement: at leaſt this ſeems beſt to anſwer the deſcription of the place given by Caxton (w). As to the alterations that have happened ſince, and the inſcription now viſible on his tomb, an account will be given in the notes [Q]. We may

(q) Mr. Dryden, in his Preface to his Fables.

(r) Selden's Titles of Honour, P. ii. ch. i. § 43.

(s) Leland, de Script. Brit.

(t) See this Poem in the note [P].

(u) Leland, de Script. Brit.

(w) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition of his Works.

[P] And the faculties of his mind not in the leaſt impaired.] This Sonnet or Ode conſiſts of no more than three ſtanzas, and as well for the beauty of the piece, as for the extraordinary occaſion on which it was written, I think it very well deſerves a place here (70).

(70) In a MS. in the Cotton. Library OTHO. A. XVIII. this title is inſerted; A Balade made by Giſtrey Chaucyer, upon his Dethe Bedde lying in his grete Anguyſſe.

Gode counſaile of Chaucer.

I.

Flie fro the preſe and dwell with ſothfaſtneſſe,
Suffice unto thy gode though it be ſmall,
For horde hath hate, and climbyng tikilneſſe,
Prece hath envy, and wele it brent ore all,
Savour no more then The behovin ſhall,
Rede well thy ſelf, that othir folke canſt rede,
And trouthe The ſhall delivir it is no drede.

II.

Paine The not eche crokid to redreſſe,
In truſt of her that tournith as a balle,
Grete reſt ſtandith in litil buſineſſe,
Beware alſo to ſpurre again a nalle,
Strive not as doith a crocke with a walle,
Demith thy ſelf that demiſt othir's dede,
And trouthe The ſhall deliver it is no drede.

III.

That The is ſent receve in buxomeneſſe;
The wraſtlyng of this worlde aſkith a falle,
Here is no home, here is but wildirneſſe,
Forthe pilgrim forthe o beſt out of thy ſtalle,
Loke upon high, and thanke thy God of all;
Weivith thy luſte and let thy ghoſt The lede,
And trouthe The ſhall delivir, it is no drede.

Attempted in modern Engliſh.

The Poet's laſt advice.

I.

Fly from the crowd, and be to virtue true,
Content with what thou haſt tho' it be ſmall,
To hoard brings hate; nor lofty thoughts purſue,
He who climbs high endangers many a fall.
Envy's a ſhade that ever waits on fame,
And oft the ſun that raiſes it will hide;
Trace not in life a vaſt expanſive ſcheme,
But be thy wiſhes to thy ſtate ally'd.
Be mild to others, to thyſelf ſevere;
So truth ſhall ſhield thee or from hurt or fear.

II.

Think not of bending all things to thy will,
Nor vainly hope that fortune ſhall befriend;
Inconſtant ſhe, but be thou conſtant ſtill,
Whate'er betide unto an honeſt end.
Yet needleſs dangers never madly brave,
Kick not thy naked foot againſt a nail;
Or from experience the ſolution crave,
If wall and pitcher ſtrive which ſhall prevail?
Be in thy cauſe as in thy neighbour's clear,
So truth ſhall ſhield thee or from hurt or fear.

III.

Whatever happens, happy in thy mind
Be thou, nor at thy lot in life repine,
He 'ſcapes all ill, whoſe boſom is reſign'd,
Nor way nor weather will be always fine.
Beſide, thy home's not here, a journey this,
A pilgrim thou, then hie thee on thy way;
Look up to GOD, intent on heavenly bliſs,
Take what the road affords and praiſes pay;
Shun brutal luſts, and ſeek thy ſoul's high ſphere;
So truth ſhall ſhield thee or from hurt or fear.

[Q] In the notes.] We are told by Speght and other authors, that the following lines ſtood anciently upon Chaucer's tomb-ſtone,

Galfridus Chaucer, vates & fama Poeſis
Maternæ, hâc ſacrâ ſum tumulatus humo.

This antiently muſt refer only to the time of Caxton, who procured a long epitaph to be written in honour of our author by Stephanus Surigonius, Poet-Laureat of Milan, which was hung upon a pillar over-againſt Chaucer's grave ſtone, towards the end of which epitaph theſe two lines occur (71). But about the year 1555, as a very exact author reports; or in 1556, as Wood will have it, Mr. Nicholas Brigham, a Gentleman of Oxford, who exerciſed his Muſe much in Poetry, and took great delight in Chaucer's works, and honoured his memory, at his own charge, erected a handſome monument for him not far from the ſaid chapel; for in the ſame place, he could not then conveniently erect it, by reaſon of the cancelli which the late Duke of Buckingham obtained leave to remove to make room for Mr. Dryden's tomb. Upon that monument, Mr. Brigham cauſed Chaucer's picture to be painted from (71) Stowe's Survey, by Strype, B. vi. p. 31.

that may juſtly affirm of this great man, that in whatever light he is conſidered, he ſeems always to merit our eſteem, as well as to claim our admiration. In his publick character, if we conſider the time in which he lived, we muſt acknowledge that he ſhewed as great ſteadineſs, and adhered as firmly to his principles as could be expected; and as to his gratitude towards, and affection for, his patron, the great Duke of Lancaſter, they ſtand in no need of apology. His conduct, in the laſt part of his life, was full of prudence, and of that calm contempt for an ungrateful world, which, though it is eaſy for a man of parts to conceive, yet to perſiſt in it is a very difficult taſk. In private life he was a fine gentleman, a learned writer, and an agreeable companion. In his youth he was gay, and loved pleaſure, for which he might not only plead the uſual excuſes of his age and conſtitution, but the cuſtom alſo of the times, ſince he lived in the moſt gallant reign from the Conqueſt. But in his maturer ſtate of life his manners altered, and his behaviour was modeſt and grave to a degree of exceſs, for which he was rallied by his patroneſs the Counteſs of Pembroke, who told him his abſence created more mirth than his converſation; for he was very baſhful and reſerved in company, notwithſtanding that life and ſpirit which appear in his writings. If we look upon him as an author, he may be truly ſtiled the Father of Engliſh Poetry, and perhaps the Prince of it; for excepting the unavoidable defects of language, his works have ſtill all the beauties that can be wiſhed for or expected, in every kind of compoſition (x). He was not unacquainted with the antient rules of Poetry, nor was he incapable of writing up to them, as very clearly appears by the Knight's Tale, which, as Mr. Dryden very juſtly ſays, is a finiſhed Epick Poem; but he did not always judge this exactneſs neceſſary, and perhaps he thought his genius ſet him above thoſe reſtraints that ought to limit, becauſe they improve, the works of meaner Poets. He was deeply verſed in Moral and in Natural Philoſophy; and as perhaps no man underſtood human nature better, ſo it may be truly ſaid that no writer in any language has either painted it with greater force, exactneſs, or judgment. His reading was deep and extenſive, and his learning both ſpecious and ſolid; for he knew how to expoſe thoſe parts of it to view, that are moſt apt to attract publick applauſe, and yet leave a ſenſe concealed, that might at once employ and ſatisfy the moſt inquiſitive underſtandings (y). It would draw this article into too great a length, ſhould we perſiſt in exhibiting every part of his accompliſhed character; and therefore we will in the notes give the beſt account we may of his merit in general as a Poet, in all the different kinds of writing by which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in that capacity [R]; and next we will give the reader the cleareſt account (x) Camd. Britan. in Dobunis.

(y) Beaumont's Letter to Speght.

that which was in Occleve's book, together with the following inſcription, which ſtill remains.

M. S.
Qui fuit Anglorum vates ter maximus olim,
Galfridus Chaucer conditur hoc tumulo:
Annum ſi quæras Domini, ſi tempora vitæ,
Ecce notæ ſubſunt quæ tibi cuncta notunt.
25 Octobris 1400.

Ærumnarum requies mors.

N. Brigham hos fecit Muſarum nomine ſumptus.
1556.

In Engliſh thus:

Of Engliſh bards who ſang the ſweeteſt ſtrains,
Old Geoffrey Chaucer now this tomb contains:
For his death's date if reader thou ſhould'ſt call,
Look but beneath and it will tell thee all.
25th of October 1400.

Of cruel cares, the certain cure, is death.

N. Brigham placed theſe, in the name of the Muſes, at his own expence. 1556.

About the ledge of the tomb, we are told, the following verſes were written, that are now worn out; but it is more probable, that they were inſcribed upon a ledge of braſs, that is taken away, for there is not the leaſt ſign of any letters upon the ſtone itſelf.

Si rogites quis eram, forſan te fama docebit;
Quod ſi fama negat, mundi quia gloria tranſit,
Hac monumenta lege.

If who I was you aſk, fame ſhall declare;
If fame denies, ſince frail all glories are,
Theſe ſtones ſhall ſpeak inſcrib'd with pious care.

It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that this date of his death is preſerved by ſeveral writers; who alſo inform us, that he was then ſeventy-two. Some indeed have queſtioned it, becauſe of a piece, intituled, Cupid's Letter, printed with Chaucer's works (72), and dated in 1402; but that was written by Thomas Occleve his Scholar, and was intended to do honour to his works and memory. The Rev. Mr. Collier fixes his death in 1440 (73), which was the nineteenth of Henry VI. and if ſo, Chaucer was but ten years old at the death of King Edward III. which contradicts all the records, and is in every reſpect a moſt glaring abſurdity; whereas, the other date agrees with them exactly, and therefore, there can be no doubt of it's truth.

(72) Chaucer's Works, p. 534.

(73) Hiſtorical Dictionary, vol. i.

[R] By which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in that capacity.] We may ſafely affirm that of Chaucer, which can be hardly ſaid of any other general Poet, ancient or modern, that he excelled in all the different kinds of verſe, in which he wrote. In his Sonnets, or Love Songs, when he was but a very boy, there is not only fire and judgment, but great elegance of thought and neatneſs of compoſure. It is very true, that he did not always ſtand upon his own ground, but choſe rather to tranſlate from the Italian or French; yet he choſe his authors judiciouſly, and uſed them freely; ſo that this, inſtead of ſinking, ſerves really to heighten his character. That in the elegiack Poetry, he was a compleat maſter, appears plainly by his Complaint of the Black Knight, the Poem called, La belle Dame ſans Mercy, and ſeveral of his ſongs. He was an excellent maſter of Love Poetry, having ſtudied that paſſion in all it's turns and appearances; and Mr. Dryden prefers him upon that account to Ovid. His Troilus and Creſeide is one of the moſt beautiful Poems of that kind, in which love is curiouſly and naturally deſcribed in it's early appearance, it's hopes and fears, it's application, fruition, and deſpair in diſappointment. How great a maſter he was in ſatire, we ſhall have occaſion to ſhow in the next note; but his great proficiency in this, did not at all hinder his diſcharging himſelf moſt happily, account we may of his largeſt work, peculiar in its kind; and as it was almoſt without example, ſo hitherto above the reach of imitation, I mean his CANTERBURY TALES (z) [S].

(a) Mr. Dryden in the Preface to his Fables.

happily, in a far more difficult way of writing, that of panegyrick. The praiſes of Chaucer are eaſy, natural, and delicate, ſuch as muſt give equal pleaſure to the perſon commended and to the peruſer, and have always the true air of a courtier, without the meanneſs of a flatterer. His moral Poems are grave and weighty, full of good ſenſe and of fine ſentiments. In a word, he deſerves all that is ſaid of him by Mr. Dryden, who was ſcarcely a better Poet than a Critick; let us hear him then a little upon this ſubject. 'As he is the Father of Engliſh Poetry, ſo I hold him 'in the ſame degree of veneration as the Grecians 'held Homer, or the Romans Virgil: he is a perpe-'tual fountain of good ſenſe, learned in all Sciences, 'and therefore ſpeaks properly on all ſubjects: as he 'knew what to ſay, ſo he knows alſo when to leave 'off, a continence which is practiſed by few writers, 'and ſcarcely by any of the Ancients, excepting 'Virgil and Horace.——Chaucer followed nature 'every where, but was never ſo bold as to go beyond 'her: and there is a great difference of being Poëta '& nimis Poëta, if we may believe Catullus, as much 'as betwixt a modeſt behaviour and affectation. The 'verſe of Chaucer, I confeſs, is not harmonious to 'us, but it is like the eloquence of one whom Tacitus 'commends, it was auribus iſtius temporis accommodata: 'they who lived with him, and ſome time after him, 'thought it muſical, and it continues ſo even in our 'judgment, if compared with the numbers of Lidgate 'and Gower, his contemporaries: there is the rude 'ſweetneſs of a Scotch tune in it, which is natural 'and pleaſing, though not perfect. It is true, I can-'not go ſo far as he who publiſhed the laſt edition of 'him, for he would make us believe, the fault is in 'our ears, and that there are really ten ſyllables in a 'verſe, where we find but nine: but this opinion is 'not worth confuting: it is ſo groſs and obvious an 'error, that common ſenſe (which is a rule in every 'thing but matters of faith and revelation) muſt con-'vince the reader, that equality of numbers in every 'verſe, which we call heroick, was either not known 'or not always practiſed in Chaucer's age: it were an 'eaſy matter to produce ſome thouſands of his verſes, 'which are lame for want of half a foot, and ſome 'times a whole one, and which no pronounciation 'can make otherwiſe. We can only ſay, that he 'lived in the infancy of our Poetry, and that nothing 'is brought to perfection at the firſt. We muſt be 'children before we grow men. There was an Ennius; 'and in proceſs of time, a Lucilius; and a Lucretius 'before Virgil and Horace; even after Chaucer, there 'was a Spenſer, a Harrington, a Fairfax, before 'Waller and Denham were in being: and our num-'bers were in their nonage, till theſe laſt appeared.'

[S] I mean his Canterbury Tales.] The ſcheme of this work is in every reſpect very extraordinary, and of ſo vaſt an extent, that at firſt ſight, one would be apt to pronounce it abſolutely impracticable, from a perſuaſion that it muſt ſurpaſs the powers of any ſingle mind to paint the different lineaments, and call out to view the various faculties of every mind. The truth, as well as meaning of this ſentiment, will beſt appear from a ſhort repreſentation of the author's deſign, which is this: Chaucer pretends, that intending to pay his devotions to the ſhrine of Thomas à Becket, he ſet up his horſe at the Tarbard-Inn in Southwark: That he found in the Inn, a number of Pilgrims, who ſeverally propoſed the ſame journey; and that they all agreed to ſup together, and to ſet out the next morning on the ſame party. The ſupper being finiſhed, the landlord, a fellow of ſenſe and drollery, conformably to his character and calling, makes them no diſagreeable propoſal: That to divert them on their journey, each of them ſhould be obliged to tell two ſtories, one going, the other coming back, and that whoever in the judgment of the company ſhould ſucceed beſt in this art of tale telling, by way of recompence, at their return to his inn, ſhould be intituled to a good ſupper at the common coſt; which propoſal being aſſented to, he promiſes to be their Governor and Guide. At the entrance of the Poem, the characters of all the Pilgrims are diſtinctly drawn, and a plan of the Comedy, in which they ſtand for the Dramatis Perſonæ. Beſides this, every Tale has it's Prologue, and a kind of Epilogue too, which ſerves by way of tranſition to the next: and to the honour of our author be it ſpoken, ſo far as his plan is executed, every part of it is performed with equal juſtice and ſpirit; and above all, the character of the Hoſt, who acts as a kind of Chorus in the ancient Drama, is moſt admirably kept up, and the ſame wit, ſpirit, and humour is preſerved through the whole journey, that ſtrikes and aſtoniſhes the reader ſo much at the very beginning, where the original character of this incomparable perſon is drawn at full length. A ſtronger argument in ſupport of this character of the Canterbury Tales, cannot well be brought, than ariſes from the authority of three great Poets, who have judged them worthy of imitation and revival; I mean Spenſer, Dryden, and Pope, to whom we may add, Mr. Betterton, who tranſlated many of the characters of Chaucer, and muſt have been allowed to have been as fit a judge of them, as any of the foregoing. But the reader will receive the fulleſt ſatisfaction on this head, from the critical remarks of Mr. Dryden, who, as he perfectly underſtood, ſo he has very freely given us his ſentiments on this maſter-piece of our author's. 'He muſt, ſays he, have been a man of a moſt wonderful comprehenſive nature, becauſe, as it has been 'truly obſerved of him, he has taken into the compaſs of his Canterbury Tales, the various manners 'and humours, as we now call them, of the whole 'Engliſh nation in his age. Not a ſingle character 'has eſcaped him. All his Pilgrims are ſeverally 'diſtinguiſhed from each other, and not only in their 'inclinations, but in their very phyſiognomies and 'perſons. Baptiſta Porta could not have deſcribed 'their natures better, than by the marks which the 'Poet gives them. The matter and manner of their 'tales and of their telling, are ſo ſuited to their dif-'ferent educations, humours, and callings, that each 'of them would be improper in any other mouth. 'Even the grave and ſerious characters are diſtin-'guiſhed by their ſeveral ſorts of gravity; their diſ-'courſes are ſuch as belong to their age, their calling, 'and their breeding; ſuch as are becoming of them, 'and of them only. Some of his perſons are vicious, 'and ſome virtuous; ſome are unlearned (or as 'Chaucer calls them) lewd, and ſome are learned. 'Even the ribaldry of the low characters is different: 'the Reeve, the Miller, and the Cook, are ſeveral 'men, and diſtinguiſhed from each other, as much as 'the mincing Lady Prioreſs and the broad ſpeaking 'gaptooth'd wife of Bath. But enough of this: 'there is ſuch a variety of game ſpringing up before 'me, that I am diſtracted in my choice, and know 'not which to follow. It is ſufficient to ſay, accord-'ing to the proverb, that here is God's plenty. We 'have our forefathers and great grand-dames all 'before us, as they were in Chaucer's days: their 'general characters are ſtill remaining in mankind, 'and even in England, though they are called by 'other names than thoſe of Monks and Friars, of 'Chanons, and Lady Abbeſſes, and Nuns: for 'mankind is ever the ſame, and nothing loſt out of 'nature, though every thing is altered.'—Boccace 'lived in the ſame age with Chaucer, had the ſame 'genius, and followed the ſame ſtudies: both wrote 'Novels, and each of them cultivated his mother 'tongue.'——In the ſerious part of Poetry, the ad-'vantage is wholly on Chaucer's ſide; for though 'the Engliſhman has borrowed many tales from the 'Italian, yet it appears, that thoſe of Boccace were 'not generally of his own making, but taken from 'authors of former ages, and by him only modelled; 'ſo that what was of invention in either of them, may 'be judged equal. But Chaucer has refined on 'Boccace, and has mended the ſtories, which he 'has borrowed, in his way of telling, though proſe 'allows more liberty of thought, and the expreſſion 'is more eaſy, when unconfined by numbers. Our 'countryman carries weight, and yet wins the race 'at diſadvantage.'

We have already, in the courſe of his memoirs, ſpoken of moſt of his patrons, who were the greateſt, as well as ableſt, men, of thoſe times. The circle of his friends was alſo very large, and his communicative diſpoſition made him as much beloved by his contemporaries, as he was admired both by them and by poſterity. He appears to have been uſeful to them in every manner that was in his power; and it was this diſpoſition, in all probability, that kept them ſo firm to his intereſt while he was living, and taught them to have ſo high a reſpect for his memory after his deceaſe. It is no difficult thing to compile a liſt of them from his writings, in which he has mentioned them with all the marks of kindneſs and eſteem poſſible; a circumſtance favourable to himſelf and to them, for in this Poets have the advantage even of Princes: the latter, how great ſoever, can confer only temporary benefits, but the former can beſtow immortality; and therefore Princes themſelves have courted, not perhaps without political reaſons, the good-will of theſe favourites of the Muſes. But we are apt to ſuſpect their praiſes when applied to their patrons of high rank, more than their commendations of private friends. The former is commonly dictated by the head, whereas the latter flows from the heart; and this conſideration alone makes it reaſonable, that we ſhould inſiſt more particularly on thoſe whom our author has thus conſigned to fame. But in order to ſpare the reader's time, we ſhall mention only a very few of Chaucer's intimate friends and contemporaries, at the bottom of the page [T]. That general applauſe with which his writings were received in his life-time, and the high honours that were paid him by ſuch as took a pride in ſtiling themſelves his diſciples, after his death, ſtamped ſuch a mark of authority upon his works (a), as ſaved at leaſt the greateſt part of them from that oblivion, which has covered the performances even of the moſt celebrated authors of his time. In ſpite of that ſpirit of envy which his free and ſevere ſatires excited in the Clergy, in ſpite of his own retractation (whether genuine or fictitious (b) is uncertain), in ſpite of that authority which the Church afterwards acquired, not of cenſuring only, but of condemning and prohibiting what books they pleaſed, his writings have eſcaped, and not barely eſcaped, but have been held in the greateſt honour, and tranſmitted to poſterity with ſuch care and circumſpection, and by the united labours of ſo many eminent perſons (c), as will do laſting honour to his memory, and plainly prove, that true genius, extenſive learning, and a free ſpirit, are capable of commanding reverence through all ages, and preſerving that tranſcendent eſteem, which is, and ought to be, the peculiar reward of ſuperior merit [U]. We are not, however, to ſuppoſe, that with all theſe great qualifications,

(a) Such as Occleve, Lydgate, &c.

(b) See Mr. Hearne's Letter to Mr. John Bagford.

(c) As Caxton, Thynne, Stowe, &c.

[T] At the bottom of the page.] Amongſt the earlieſt of Chaucer's friends, and alſo directors of his ſtudies, were Nicholas of Lynne and John Some (74), both Carmelite Monks, and extreamly well verſed in Mathematical ſciences; the former more eſpecially, who left behind him ſeveral learned books, and is commended by Leland as having excelled in Aſtronomy all that went before him (75). We have before mentioned Ralph Strode, who was both a celebrated Poet and Philoſopher of Merton-college in Oxford, where it ſeems our author was intimately acquainted with him, and had a great veneration for his abilities (76). It is a ſtrange error which the author of the Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Mr. Urry's edition, has fallen into, with regard to Strode, who, he ſays, was a great follower of Wickliffe (77), which is ſo far from being true, that he was one of the warmeſt writers againſt him, for which he is heavily cenſured by Bale (78), and as highly commended by Pits (79). It is very probable that Wickliffe and Chaucer were very good friends, as they both owed the eminence of their reſpective ſtations to the ſame Patron, John Duke of Lancaſter (80). Sir John Gower, an eminent Lawyer, Poet, and Philoſopher, was alſo Chaucer's intimate companion, as appears from both their writings: the former was blind before the latter died, and ſurvived him only two years (81). But Thomas Occleve, or Hockliffe, a very ingenious man, and a celebrated writer, was a great favourite of our author's, and imitated him in his manner of writing. We are indebted to him for preſerving Chaucer's picture, which he cauſed to be drawn in his book, de Regimine Principis, and which he dedicated to King Henry V. and it is very evident from the verſes which refer to that picture, that Chaucer had been a long time dead before he compoſed that work (82). Another ſcholar of his was the famous John Lydgate, a Monk of Bury, who celebrates our author's memory and writings in many of his pieces (83), and who outlived him forty years. Schogan alſo, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſarcaſtical wit, was a profeſſed admirer and imitator of Chaucer, but, as Leland obſerves, if Chaucer, who ſometimes ſtiles Gower his Maſter, excelled him in the ſpirit and elegance of his verſes, Schogan, who acknowledged Chaucer for his Maſter (84), was ſo far from doing the like that he fell much below him. Yet ſuch in all ages has been the proneneſs of mankind to encourage even the coarſeſt ſort of ſatire, that Schogan wanted not his admirers, how little ſoever he reſembled Chaucer. It is believed that he was perſonally acquainted with the celebrated Petrarch (85); but that he was perfectly maſter of his writings, and thoſe of Boccace, is inconteſtible.

[U] And ought to be the peculiar reward of ſuperior merit.] It muſt be allowed by all who are proper judges, that the excellence attributed to Chaucer's writings by ſuch Poets as came neareſt his own times, did not ariſe in any degree either from cuſtom or complaiſance, but, on the contrary, was equally well founded in reaſon and on matter of fact; ſo that if we examine the ſentiments we ſhall find them more noble, ſhall diſcover a greater compaſs in his learning, and, above all, an harmonious ſweetneſs in his verſe, far beyond any thing that is to be met with in any poetical compoſitions for a whole century after his time. This is very candidly acknowledged by a ſtranger, who had as good a right as any to diſpute it, I mean that excellent old Poet of Scotland (86) Gawin Douglas, Biſhop of Dunkeld. Indeed Chaucer's reputation was as well eſtabliſhed in Scotland as in England, and I will take upon me to ſay, that he was as much the Father of Poetry in that country as in this. It would render this note tedious to attempt giving a detail of the ſeveral printed editions of our author's Works: it will be ſufficient to refer the reader to a place where this may be found (87). Caxton, the Father of Engliſh Printers, firſt printed many of Chaucer's Works, and printed them ſeveral times. In the reign of Henry VIII. William Botteville, alias Thynne, Eſq; was the editor of a new edition of Chaucer, which, in a very elegant diſcourſe, he addreſſed to King Henry VIII (88). In the ſame reign the induſ-

(74) We find theſe mentioned by Chaucer himſelf; and it is certain that they flouriſhed when he was young.

(75) Comment. de Script. Britan. p. 347.

(76) Chaucer's Works, p. 333.

(77) This is ſtill ſtranger, becauſe what he ſays of him ſeems to be taken from Bale.

(78) Script. Brit. p. 478.

(79) De Illuſt. Angl. Scriptor. p. 509.

(80) See the Life of Wickliffe, by the Rev. Mr. Lewis.

(81) Leland, Comment. de Script. Britan. p. 415.

(82) Bale, Script. Britan. p. 537.

(83) As in his Prologue to the Story of Thebes, his Prologue to the Fall of Princes, his Praiſe of the Virgin Mary, &c.

(84) Comment. de Scriptor. Britan. p. 421.

(85) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition.

(86) In the Preface to his tranſlation of Virgil, p. 9.

(87) See the concluſion of the Life of Chaucer, and the Preface to Mr. Urry's edit.

(88) Leland, Comment. de Script. Brit. p. 422.

fications, Chaucer could entirely eſcape the fury of falſe Criticks: neither would it have been very much, perhaps, to his honour if he had; inaſmuch as all great Poets, antient and modern, have been ſo generally infeſted by theſe cavillers, that they ſeem to be the neceſſary attendants of an exalted reputation, and, like the ſlaves in a Roman triumph, make unwillingly an addition to that glory they meant to ſhade. Thoſe who have attacked Chaucer have not preſumed to queſtion his wit, for of this perhaps no writer of our nation ever had more; neither have they diſputed his poetical abilities, which certainly ſet his on a level with the greateſt names in antiquity; nor have they dared to throw any aſperſion on his learning, the extent of which is not greater than the maſterly degree of propriety with which it is every where applied: but the point to which they object, is, his changing, debaſing, or corrupting our language (d), by introducing foreign words; as if the worth of all languages did not ariſe from their being thus enlarged and compounded, or as if Chaucer could have hurt the jargon of his time, which was not either Saxon, Norman, or French, but a mixture of all, by introducing words derived from the ſweeteſt and ſmootheſt language then uſed throughout Europe, I mean the Provençal (e). It is, however, juſt to obſerve, that this reflection never made any great impreſſion; and that with the beſt and moſt elegant writers in our tongue, Chaucer paſſes not only for a great improver, but for the very Father and Founder of it; and it is not a little to his honour, that amongſt thoſe who are of this opinion, we may reckon one of the ſoundeſt of our Criticks (f), and one of the correcteſt writers in our language (g). So wide the difference is between the narrow notions of falſe Wits, and the fair and candid judgments that are given by the true [W]. We (d) Verſtegan, Skinner, &c.

(e) Remarks on the Engliſh language, by W. C.

(f) Rymer's Short View of Tragedy, p. 78.

(g) Sprat's Hiſt. of the Royal Society, p. 41, 42.

ſtrious and learned Leland, was a ſtudious reader, and a moſt zealous admirer, of the Works of Chaucer, in whoſe honour he wrote not one only, but three copies of commendatory verſes (89). The ſame tribute of praiſe was beſtowed upon our author, by that excellent writer, and great judge of elegance in all kind of writing, Roger Aſcham (90); to whom we may add Sir Philip Sidney (91), who very judiciouſly obſerves, that it was equally ſtrange to him, that Chaucer ſhould ſee ſo clearly in ſo miſty a time, and that in brighter ages men ſhould go ſo ſtumblingly after him. About this time Mr. Speght, by the aſſiſtance of the induſtrious John Stowe, publiſhed a new edition of our author's Works (92), which were dedicated to Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Saliſbury; and another ſtill more complete edition was promiſed by Mr. Francis Thynne, which never appeared. We have mentioned the commendations given him by the laborious John Fox (93), and the moſt learned Camden (94). We muſt add to theſe the numerous teſtimonies of the immortal Spenſer (95), and the judicious Apology of the ſuppoſed levites in Chaucer's Works, by Mr. Francis Beaumont (96). The celebrated Sir Henry Savile (97), mentions him with the higheſt reſpect; and the great Mr. Selden (98) has given us a noble ſpecimen of that profound learning of which he was maſter, in juſtifying an epithet of our author's. Sir Francis Knyaſton of Otely in Shropſhire, publiſhed the firſt and ſecond books of a Latin verſion of Troilus and Creſeide, and compleated his tranſlation of, and notes upon, the other three; and from ſome ſpecimens that are extant in the Gloſſary at the end of Mr. Urry's edition, the world may well perceive, how valuable a performance we are deprived of, by the loſs or concealment of his manuſcript (99). It would be needleſs to ſwell this note with other particulars, but if ſome able hand would reſume the deſign of the late ingenious Mr. Ogle, and give us his Canterbury Tales in modern Engliſh, with a proper body of notes, there is no doubt that it would meet with a favourable reception.

(89) Collectanea, vol. v. p. 141. 152.

(90) Schole-maſter, fo. 60. b. Toxophilus, fo. 13. b. State of Germany, fo. 1.

(91) Defence of Poeſie, p. 492. 513.

(92) Stowe's Annals, p. 326.

(93) Acts and Monuments, vol. ii. p. 42.

(94) Britan. in Dobunis, & in Trinobantibus.

(95) Fairy Queen, l. iv. Cant. ii. St. 31. Ibid. l. vii. Cant. vii. St. 9. Shepherd's Calendar, in Feb. June, and December.

(96) In his Letter to Mr. Speght, dated the laſt of July 1597.

(97) In Prefat. ad Brad. De Cauſa Dei.

(98) Preface to Drayton's Polyolbion.

(99) Gloſſary to Chaucer, p. 47. voc. morter.

[W] And the fair and candid judgments that are given by the true.] The firſt writer that ventured to fall upon our author was himſelf more than half a foreigner, and very far from being correct with reſpect to ſentiment or ſtile. His very charge in the preſent caſe will prove what I have advanced (100). 'The 'Poet, Geoffry Chaucer (ſays he) writing his Poeſies 'in Engliſh, is of ſome called the firſt Illuminator of 'the Engliſh tongue. Of their opinion I am not, tho' I 'reverence Chaucer as an excellent Poet for his time. 'He was indeed a great mingler of Engliſh with 'French, unto which language (by like, for that he 'was deſcended of French, or rather Wallon race) 'he carried a great affection.' But Dr. Skinner (101), in a very elegant Latin ſtyle, has attacked our author with much more ſpirit and force. I ſhall give his words in Engliſh: 'The Poet Chaucer ſet the worſt exam-'ple, who by bringing whole ſhoals of French words 'into our language, which was but too much adul-'terated before, through the effects of the Norman 'Conqueſt, deprived it almoſt wholly of its native 'grace and ſplendor, laying on paint over its pure 'complexion, and, for a beautiful face, ſubſtituted 'a downright maſk.'

(100) Reſtitution of Decay'd Intelligence, chap. vii.

(101) Etymologiconn Linguæ Anglicanæ, in Prefat. p. 5.

 [Though our ingenious and learned predeceſſor hath taken ſuch laudable pains in endeavouring to aſcertain the facts that relate to Chaucer's Life and Hiſtory, there are ſtill ſeveral circumſtances concerning him, the abſolute determination of which is attended with difficulty. Such, at leaſt, is the opinion of the laſt and beſt editor of the Canterbury Tales, Mr. Tyrwhit. This gentleman is inclined to believe, with the Heralds, in oppoſition to Leland, that Chaucer did not deſcend from any great Houſe. The ſame gentleman admits of his having been born at London, but thinks that we are more in the dark about the place of his education, and ſmiles at the Biographers, for telling us very gravely, that he was firſt at Cambridge, and afterwards removed from thence to compleat his ſtudies at Oxford. Mr. Tyrwhit wiſhes that Mr. Speght had given us the date of that record in the Inner Temple, where Geffrey Chaucer was fined two ſhillings for beating a Franciſcan Friar in Fleet-ſtreet. Though this is but a blind ſtory, it rather induces a belief that our Poet was of the Inner Temple in the early part of his life, before he went into the ſervice of Edward the Third. The firſt authentic memorial, which we have of Chaucer, is the patent in Rymer, 41 E. III. by which that King grants him an annuity of twenty marks, by the title of Valettus noſter, or our yeoman. He was then in the 39th year of his age. It is not known how long he had ſerved the King in that, or any other ſtation, or what particular merits were rewarded by this Royal bounty. Mr. Tyrwhit proceeds to mention, from various public inſtruments, the ſeveral grants that were made to Chaucer. When he was appointed Envoy, with two others, to Genoa, it was by the title of Scutifer noſter. This title only ſignifies that he was raiſed to the rank of a Squier, though the Biographers have changed it into Shield-Bearer, as if Chaucer had the ſpecial office of carrying the King's ſhield. Mr. Tyrwhit doubts whether the two offices conferred upon Chaucer, by Richard the Second, indemnified him for the loſs of his former office in the cuſtoms. This was probably a very lucrative one; but that he ſhould ever have been poſſeſſed of "Lands and revenues to the yearly value almoſt of a thouſand pounds,"

We cannot close this article better, than by giving a succinct detail of our author's family, or, to speak with greater propriety, of his eldest son; for as to his second son Lewis, pounds," is, in the opinion of his learned editor, quite incredible. This gentleman thinks, also, that there is no proof of his having purchased Dunnington Castle in Berkshire, and that the situation of his affairs renders it highly improbable. The tradition of an Oak, in Dunnington Park, called Chaucer's Oak, may be sufficiently accounted for without supposing that it was planted by Chaucer himself, as the Castle was undoubtedly in the hands of Thomas Chaucer for many years. It appears that he received an annuity on account of his wife. There are many circumstances, in Mr. Tyrwhyt's opinion, which might incline us to think that Thomas Chaucer was not the son of the Poet. That he had a son, called Lewis, as is related in the text, and who was ten years of age in 1391, we learn from himself; and it seems to be the only fact, relating to his family, of which he has informed us. The supposition of some writers, that Chaucer was a follower of Alain Chartier, is rejected by Mr. Tyrwhit, and indeed very justly, on account of its being inconsistent with chronology: neither must we infer, from his repeated commendations of the Daysie Flower, that he was specially favoured by Margaret, Countess of Pembroke (102).

(102) Tyrwhit's edition of the Canterbury Tales, vol. i. Appendix to the Preface, p. xxiv—xxvi.

How strongly Chaucer was supported by the Duke of Lancaster, is plain from the whole article; but Mr. Thomas Warton hath found out another nobleman, whom he supposes to have been one of our Poet's patrons. This was the Earl of Salisbury, beheaded by Henry the Fourth. He "could not, says Mr. "Warton, but patronise Chaucer. I do not mean "for political Reasons. The Earl was a writer of "verses, and very fond of poetry. On this account, "his acquaintance was much cultivated by the "famous Christina of Pisa; whose works, both in "prose and verse, compose so considerable a part of "the old French Literature." She used to call him, "Gracieux Chevalier, aimant Dictiez, et lui-meme "Gracieux Dicteur (103)." It ought to be remembered, that Mr. Warton's opinion is only conjectural, not being founded on any positive historical evidence, (103) History of Poetry, vol. i. p. 342. note.

Mr. Walpole takes notice of the painted effigies of Chaucer, which remained, till within these few years, on his Tomb at Westminster, and of another that is preserved in an illuminated manuscript of Thomas Occleve, painted by Occleve himself (104). Of Occleve's picture, and of some other pictures and drawings, representing Chaucer's person, and which have a remarkable resemblance, Mr. Warton has given an account, in his history of poetry (105).

(104) Anecdotes of Painting, vol. i. p. 33.

(105) Hist. of Poetry, vol. ii. p. 43, 44.

The same ingenious and learned writer, in his "Observations on the Fairy Queen of Spenser," hath devoted a whole section to that Poet's Imitations from Chaucer. Having thus had occasion to illustrate a number of passages in both these illustrious Geniuses, he concludes in the following terms: "I cannot dismiss this Section without a wish, that this neglected author, whom Spenser proposed as the pattern of his style, and to whom he is indebted for many noble inventions, should be more universally studied. This is at least what one might expect in an age of research and curiosity. Chaucer is regarded rather as an old, than as a good, Poet. We look upon his poems as venerable relics, not as beautiful compositions; as pieces better calculated to gratify the antiquarian than the critic. He abounds not only in strokes of humour, which is commonly supposed to be his sole talent, but of pathos, and sublimity, not unworthy a more refined age. His old manners, his romantic arguments, his wildness of painting, his simplicity and antiquity of expression, transport us into some fairy region, and are all highly pleasing to the imagination. It is true, that his uncouth and unfamiliar language disgusts and deters many readers: but the principal reason of his being so little known, and so seldom taken into hand, is the convenient opportunity of reading him with pleasure and facility in modern imitations. For when translation, and such imitations from Chaucer may be justly called, at length becomes substituted as the means of attaining a knowledge of any difficult and antient author, the original not only begins to be neglected and excluded as less easy, but also to be despised as less ornamental and elegant. Thus the public taste becomes imperceptibly vitiated, while the genuine model is superseded, and gradually gives way to the establishment of a more specious, but false, resemblance. Thus, too many readers, happy to find the readiest accommodation for their indolence and their illiteracy, think themselves sufficient masters of Homer from Pope's translation: and thus, by an indiscreet comparison, Pope's translation is commonly preferred to the Grecian text, in proportion as the former is furnished with more frequent and shining metaphors, more lively descriptions, and in general appears to be more full and florid, more elaborate and various (106)."

(106) Observations on the Fairy Queen of Spenser, vol. i. p. 196—198. Second edition.

The wish, expressed by Mr. Warton, in the beginning of this passage, that Chaucer may be more universally studied, will probably be accomplished, as an access to the knowledge and taste of his beauties hath been rendered easier of late years than it was in former times. To Mr. Tyrwhit, and to Mr. Warton himself, the public is eminently indebted for an event so desirable and important. It is entirely consistent with the nature of our work, which is critical as well as biographical, and which is intended to be a large repository of useful literature, that we should enter into a copious relation of what these gentlemen have done for the elucidation of Chaucer.

To begin with Mr. Tyrwhit, his admirable edition of the Canterbury Tales was published in 1775, in four volumes, crown octavo; to which was added, in 1778, a fifth volume, containing a Glossary. Prefixed to the first volume, is an account of the preceding editions of the Canterbury Tales, for which we refer to the work itself; only observing, that Mr. Urry, the last compleat editor previous to Mr. Tyrwhit, introduced a number of arbitrary innovations into the text. A volume, in octavo, containing the Prologue and the Knightes Tale, was published in 1737, by a gentleman who is said to have since distinguished himself by many other learned and useful publications. This gentleman appears to have set out upon the only rational plan of publishing Chaucer, by collating the best manuscripts, and selecting from them the genuine readings. Accordingly, his edition, as far as it extends, is infinitely preferable to any of those which have gone before it (107). We know not who was the publisher of this volume, or for what reasons his design was not compleated. Mr. Tyrwhit next gives a list of manuscripts collated, or consulted by him, with the abbreviations by which they are cited, and points out those manuscripts to which the most credit is certainly due (108). To this is added, an abstract of the historical passages of the Life of Chaucer; of which particular notice hath already been taken.

(107) Tyrwhit's Canterbury Tales of Chaucer, vol. i. Appendix to the Preface. A. p. vi—xxi.

(108) Ibid. p. xxii, xxiii.

Prefixed to the fourth volume, is an "Essay on the Language and Versification of Chaucer." This is so curious and important, and throws so much light on our great Poet, and on the literature of the age in which he lived, that, notwithstanding its length, we think it ought not to be omitted. We shall, therefore, insert the whole text of the Essay; but must be obliged to drop the learned notes with which it is accompanied, and many of which, if they would not take up too much room, would afford peculiar pleasure to our readers.

"The language of Chaucer has undergone two very different judgments. According to one, he is the "well of English undefiled;" according to the other, he has corrupted and deformed the English idiom by an immoderate mixture of French words. Nor do the opinions with respect to his versification seem to have been less discordant. His contemporaries, and they who lived nearest to his time, universally extol him as the "chief Poete of Britanie," "the flour of "Poetes," &c. titles, which must be supposed to implie their admiration of his metrical skill, as well as of his other poetical talents; but the later critics, though they leave him in possession of the fame founding

Lewis, we have no account in what ſtation he lived, or where he died. But as to Thomas Chaucer, the office of Chief Butler to the King, granted to him in the laſt year of founding titles, yet they are almoſt unanimouſly agreed, that he was either totally ignorant or negligent of metrical rules, and that his verſes (if they may be ſo called) are frequently deficient, by a ſyllable or two, of their juſt meaſure.

" It is the purpoſe of the following Eſſay to throw ſome light upon both theſe queſtions. Admitting the fact, that the Engliſh of Chaucer has a great mixture of French in it, I hope to ſhew, that this mixture (if a crime) cannot fairly be laid to his charge. I ſhall then proceed to ſtate ſome obſervations upon the moſt material peculiarities of the Norman-Saxon, or Engliſh language, as it appears to have been in general uſe in the age of Chaucer; and laſtly, applying theſe obſervations to the poetical parts of the Canterbury Tales, as they are faithfully printed in this edition from the beſt MSS. which I could procure, I ſhall leave it to the intelligent Reader to determine, whether Chaucer was really ignorant of the laws, or even of the graces, of verſification, and whether he was more negligent of either than the very early Poets in almoſt all languages are found to have been.

PART THE FIRST.

" § I. In order to judge, in the firſt place, how far Chaucer ought to be charged as the importer of the many French words and phraſes, which are ſo viſible in all his writings, it will be neceſſary to take a ſhort view of the early introduction and long prevalency of the French language in this country before his time. It might be ſufficient, perhaps, for our purpoſe to begin this view at the Conqueſt: but I cannot help obſerving, from a contemporary Hiſtorian, that, ſeveral years before that great event, the language of France had been introduced into the court of England, and from thence among the people. The account which Ingulphus gives of this matter is, that Edward, commonly called the Confeſſor, having been educated at the court of his uncle Duke Richard II. and having reſided in Normandy many years, became almoſt a Frenchman. Upon his return from thence and acceſſion to the throne of England in 1043, he brought over with him a number of Normans, whom he promoted to the higheſt dignities; and (according to Ingulphus) under the influence of the King and his Norman favourites, the whole nation began to lay aſide their Engliſh faſhions, and imitate the manners of the French in many things. In particular, he ſays expreſsly, that all the Nobility in their courts began to ſpeak French, as a great piece of gentility.

" § II. This faſhion however of ſpeaking French, having been adopted only in compliance with the caprice of the reigning prince, would not probably have ſpread very wide or laſted very long; but at the revolution, which followed ſoon after in 1066, the language of the Norman conqueror was interwoven with the new political ſyſtem, and the ſeveral eſtabliſhments, which were made for the ſupport and ſecurity of the one, all contributed, in a greater or leſs degree, to the diffuſion and permanency of the other.

" § III. To begin with the court. If we conſider that the King himſelf, the chief officers of ſtate, and by far the greateſt part of the nobility, were all Normans, and could probably ſpeak no language but their own, we can have no doubt that French was the ordinary language of the court. The few Saxons, who for ſome time were admitted there, muſt have had the ſtrongeſt inducements to acquire the ſame language as ſoon as poſſible, not merely for the ſake of apprehending and anſwering inſignificant queſtions in the circle, but becauſe in that age affairs of the greateſt importance were publickly tranſacted in the King's court, and there they might be called upon to anſwer for their poſſeſſions and even for their lives. In an eccleſiaſtical ſynod, held in the preſence of the King in 1072, the venerable Biſhop of Worceſter, Wulſtan, (whoſe holy ſimplicity, as the Hiſtorian calls it, ſeems to have preſerved him from the degradation which almoſt all the other Engliſh Prelates underwent) was obliged to defend the rights of his ſee by an interpreter, a monk (according to the ſame Hiſtorian) of very little eloquence, but who had a ſmattering of the Norman language.

" § IV. If we conſider further, that the great Barons, to whom William diſtributed a large ſhare of his conqueſt, when releaſed from their attendance in the King's court, retired to courts of their own, where they in their turn were ſurrounded by a numerous train of vaſſals, chiefly their own countrymen, we may be ſure that the French language travelled with them into the moſt diſtant provinces, and was uſed by them, not only in their common converſation, but in their civil contracts, their judicial proceedings, and even in the promulgation of their laws. The many Caſtles, which William built in different parts of the Iſland, muſt alſo have contributed very much to the propagation of the French language among the natives, as it is probable that the Foreigners, of whom the garriſons were entirely compoſed, would inſiſt upon carrying on all their tranſactions with the neighbouring country in their own language.

" § V. But the great alteration, which, from political motives, was made in the ſtate of the clergy at that time, muſt have operated perhaps more efficaciouſly than any other cauſe to give the French language a deep root in England. The Conqueror ſeems to have been fully apprized of the ſtrength which the new government might derive from a Clergy more cloſely attached to himſelf by a community of intereſts than the native Engliſh were likely to be. Accordingly, from the very beginning of his reign, all eccleſiaſtical preferments, as faſt as they became vacant, were given to his Norman chaplains; and, not content to avail himſelf of the ordinary courſe of ſucceſſion, he contrived, upon various charges of real or pretended irregularities, to remove ſeveral of the Engliſh Biſhops and Abbots, whoſe places were in like manner immediately ſupplied by Foreigners. In ſhort, in the ſpace of a very few years, all the Sees of England were filled with Normans, or ſtrangers naturalized (if I may ſo ſay) in Normandy, and the greateſt part of the Abbies in the kingdom were under governors of the ſame deſcription.

" § VI. It muſt be allowed, that the confeſſed ſuperiority in literature of the Norman clergy over the Engliſh at that time, furniſhed the King with a ſpecious pretext for theſe promotions; and it is probable, that the Prelates, who were thus promoted, made uſe of the ſame pretext to juſtify themſelves in diſpoſing of all their beſt benefices among their friends and countrymen. That this was their conſtant practice is certain. Nor were the new Abbots leſs induſtrious to ſtock their convents with foreigners, whom they invited over from the continent, partly perhaps for the pleaſure of their ſociety, and partly (as we may ſuppoſe) in expectation of their ſupport againſt the cabals of the Engliſh Monks. And when the great Barons, following the royal example, applied themſelves to make their peace with the Church, by giving her a ſhare of their plunder, it was their uſual cuſtom to begin their religious eſtabliſhments with a colony from ſome Norman Monaſtery.

" § VII. In this ſtate of things, which ſeems to have continued with little variation to the time of Edward III. it is probable, that the French and Engliſh languages ſubſiſted together throughout the kingdom; the higher orders, both of the Clergy and Laity, ſpeaking almoſt univerſally French, the lower retaining the uſe of their native tongue, but alſo frequently adding to it a knowledge of the other. The general inducements which the Engliſh had to acquire the French language, have been touched upon above; to which muſt be added, that the children, who were put to learn Latin, were under a neceſſity of learning French at the ſame time, as it was the conſtant practice in all ſchools, from the Conqueſt till about the reign of Edward III. to make the ſcholars conſtrue their Latin leſſons into French. From the diſcontinuance of this practice, as well as from other cauſes, the uſe, and probably, the knowledge of French, of Richard II: was afterwards given him for life by Letters-patents from King Henry IV. (b), and confirmed by Henry VI. In the ſecond year of Henry IV. we find him

(b) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Chaucer's Works by Urry.

French, as a ſeparate language, received a conſiderable check. In the 36th year of Edward III. a law was made, "that all pleas, in the courts of the King or of any other Lord, ſhall be pleaded and judged in the Engliſh tongue;" and the preamble recites, "that the French tongue (in which they had been uſually pleaded, &c.) was too much unknown," or diſuſed; and yet, for near threeſcore years after this, the proceedings in Parliament (with very few exceptions) appear to have been all in French, and the ſtatutes continued to be publiſhed in the ſame language, for above one hundred and twenty years, till the firſt of Richard III.

"§ VIII. From what has been ſaid, I think we may fairly conclude, that the Engliſh language muſt have imbibed a ſtrong tincture of the French, long before the age of Chaucer, and conſequently that he ought not to be charged as the importer of words and phraſes, which he only uſed after the example of his predeceſſors, and in common with his contemporaries. This was the real fact, and is capable of being demonſtrated to any one, who will take the trouble of comparing the writings of Chaucer with thoſe of Robert of Glouceſter and Robert of Brunne, who both lived before him, and with thoſe of Sir John Mandeville and Wickliff, who lived at the ſame time with him. If we could, for a moment, ſuppoſe the contrary; if we could ſuppoſe that the Engliſh idiom, in the age of Chaucer, remained pure and unmixed, as it was ſpoken in the courts of Alfred or Egbert, and that the French was ſtill a foreign, or at leaſt a ſeparate language; I would aſk, whether it is credible, that a Poet, writing in Engliſh upon the moſt familiar ſubjects, would ſtuff his compoſitions with French words and phraſes, which (upon the above ſuppoſition) muſt have been unintelligible to the greateſt part of his readers; or, if he had been ſo very abſurd, is it conceivable, that he ſhould have immediately become, not only the moſt admired, but alſo the moſt popular writer of his time and country?

PART THE SECOND.

"Having thus endeavoured to ſhew, in oppoſition to the ill-grounded cenſures of Verſtegan and Skinner, that the corruption (or improvement) of the Engliſh language, by a mixture of French, was not originally owing to Chaucer, I ſhall proceed, in the ſecond part of this Eſſay, to make ſome obſervations upon the moſt material peculiarities of that Norman-Saxon dialect, which, I ſuppoſe, to have prevailed in the age of Chaucer, and which, in ſubſtance, remains to this day the language of England.

"§ I. By what means the French tongue was firſt introduced and propagated in this iſland, has been ſufficiently explained above; but to aſcertain, with any exactneſs, the degrees by which it inſinuated itſelf, and was ingrafted into the Saxon, would be a much more difficult taſk, for want of a regular ſeries of the writings of approved authors, tranſmitted to us by authentic copies. Luckily for us, as our concern is ſolely with that period when the incorporation of the two languages was completed, it is of no great importance to determine the preciſe time at which any word or phraſe became naturalized; and, for the ſame reaſon, we have no need to enquire minutely, with reſpect to the other alterations, which the Saxon language, in its ſeveral ſtages, appears to have undergone, how far they proceeded from the natural mutability of human ſpeech, (eſpecially among an unlearned people) and how far they were owing to a ſucceſſive conflux of Daniſh and Norman invaders.

"§ II. The following obſervations therefore will chiefly refer to the ſtate, in which the Engliſh language appears to have been about the time of Chaucer, and they will naturally divide themſelves into two parts. The firſt will conſider the remains of the antient Saxon maſs, however defaced or diſguiſed by various accidents; the ſecond will endeavour to point out the nature and effects of the acceſſions, which, in the courſe of near three centuries, it had received from Normandy.

"§ III. For the ſake of method it will be convenient to go through the ſeveral parts of ſpeech, in the order in which they are commonly ranged by Grammarians.

"1. The Prepoſitive Article ꝑe, ꝑeo, ꝑat, (which anſwered to the ὁ, ἡ, τὸ, of the Greeks, in all its varieties of gender, caſe, and number), had been long laid aſide, and inſtead of it an indeclinable the was prefixed to all ſorts of nouns, in all caſes, and in both numbers.

"2. The Declenſions of the Nouns Subſtantive were reduced from ſix to one; and inſtead of a variety of caſes in both numbers, they had only a Genitive caſe ſingular, which was uniformly deduced from the Nominative, by adding to it es; or only s, if it ended in an e feminine; and the ſame form was uſed to expreſs the Plural number in all its caſes: as, Nom. Shour, Gen. Shoures, Plu. Shoures. Nom. Name, Gen. Names, Plur. Names.

"The Nouns Adjective had loſt all diſtinction of Gender, Caſe, or Number.

"3. The Primitive Pronouns retained one oblique caſe in each number: as, Ic, or I; We: Obl. Me; Us.—Thou; Ye: Obl. Thee; You.—He, She; Hi, or They: Obl. Him, Hire; Hem, or Them.

"Their Poſſeſſives were in the ſame ſtate with the Adjectives; Min, Thin, His, Hire; Oure, Youre, Hir, or Their.

"The Interrogative and Relative Who had a Genitive and Accuſative caſe, Whoes, and Whom, but no variety of Number.

"On the contrary, the Demonſtrative, This, and That, had a Plural expreſſion, Thiſe, and Tho, but no variety of caſe.

"The other words, which are often (though improperly) placed in the claſs of Pronouns, were all become undeclined, like the Adjectives; except, Eyther, alteruter; Neyther, neuter; Other, alter; which had a Genitive caſe Singular, Eytheres, Neytheres, Otheres: Other, alius, had a Genitive caſe ſingular, and a Plural number, Otheres; and Aller (a corruption of ealna) was ſtill in uſe, as the Genitive Plural of Alle.

"4. The Verbs, at the time of which we are treating, were very nearly reduced to the ſimple ſtate in which they are at preſent.

"They had four Modes, as now; the Indicative, the Imperative, the Subjunctive, and the Infinitive; and only two expreſſions of Time, the Preſent and the Paſt. All the other varieties of Mode and Time were expreſſed by Auxiliary Verbs.

"In the inflexions of their Verbs, they differed very little from us, in the Singular number: I love, Thou loveſt, He loveth: but in the Plural they were not agreed among themſelves; ſome adhering to the old Saxon form; We loveth, Ye loveth, They loveth; and others adopting, what ſeems to have been, the Teutonic; We loven, Ye loven, They loven. In the Plural of the Paſt Tenſe the latter form prevailed univerſally: I loved, thou lovedeſt, he loved; We loveden, Ye loveden, They loveden.

The ſecond perſon Plural in the Imperative Mode regularly terminated in eth; as, Loveth ye; though the final conſonants (according to the genius of the language) were frequently omitted, eſpecially in verſe.

"The Saxon termination of the Infinitive in an had been long changed into en; to loven, to liven, &c. and they were beginning to drop the n; to love, to live.

"The Participle of the Preſent Time began to be generally terminated in ing; as, loving; though the old form, which terminated in ende, or ande, was ſtill in uſe; as, lovende, or lovande. The Participle of the Paſt time continued to be formed, as the Paſt time itſelf was, in ed; as, loved; or in ſome contraction of ed; except among the irregular Verbs, where, for the moſt part, it terminated in en; as bounden, founden.

him Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, Sheriff of Oxfordſhire and of Berkſhire, and Conſtable of Wallingford-Caſtle, and of Knareſborough-Caſtle, during life. In the fourth

" The greateſt part of the Auxiliary Verbs were only in uſe in the Preſent and Paſt Tenſes of their Indicative and Subjunctive Modes. They were inflected in thoſe tenſes like other Verbs, and were prefixed to the Infinitive Mode of the Verb to which they were Auxiliary. I ſhall loven; I will, or woll, loven; I may, or mow, loven; I can, or con, loven, &c. We ſhullen loven; We willen, or wollen, loven; We mowen loven; We connen loven, &c. In the Paſt tenſe, I ſhudde loven; I wolde loven; I mighte, or moughte loven; I coude loven, &c. We ſhulden, we wolden, we mighten, or moughten, we couden loven, &c.

" The Auxiliary To Haven was a complete Verb, and, being prefixed to the Participle of the Paſt time, was uſed to expreſs the Preterperfect and Preterpluperfect Tenſes. I have loved, Thou haveſt, or haſt loved, He haveth, or hath loved; We haven, or han loved, &c. I hadde loved, thou haddeſt loved, he hadde loved; We, ye, they, hadden loved.

" The Auxiliary To ben was alſo a complete Verb, and being prefixed to the Participle of the Paſt time, with the help of the other Auxiliary Verbs, ſupplied the place of the whole Paſſive voice, for which the Saxon language had no other form of expreſſion. I am, thou art, he is loved; We, ye, they, aren, or ben loved. I was, thou waſt, he was loved; We, ye, they, weren loved.

" 5. With reſpect to the indeclinable parts of Speech, it will be ſufficient to obſerve here, that many of them ſtill remained pure Saxon: the greateſt number had undergone a ſlight change of a letter or two; and the more conſiderable alterations, by which ſome had been disfigured, were fairly deducible from that propenſity to abbreviation, for which the inhabitants of this iſland have been long remarkable, though perhaps not more juſtly ſo than their neighbours.

" § IV. Such was, in general, the ſtate of the Saxon part of the Engliſh language, when Chaucer began to write: let us now take a ſhort view of the acceſſions, which it may be ſuppoſed to have received at different times from Normandy.

" As the language of our anceſtors was complete in all its parts, and had ſerved them for the purpoſes of diſcourſe, and even of compoſition in various kinds, long before they had any intimate acquaintance with their French neighbours, they had no call from neceſſity (and conſequently no ſufficient inducement) to alter its original and radical conſtitution, or even its cuſtomary forms. Accordingly, we have juſt ſeen, that, in all the eſſential parts of Speech, the characteriſtical features of the Saxon idiom were always preſerved; and we ſhall ſee preſently, that the crowds of French words, which from time to time were imported, were themſelves made ſubject, either immediately or by degrees, to the laws of that ſame idiom.

" § V. The words, which were thus imported, were chiefly Nouns Subſtantive, Adjectives, Verbs, and Participles. The Adverbs, which are derived from French Adjectives, ſeem to have been formed from them after they were Angliciſed, as they have all the Saxon termination lich or ly, inſtead of the French ment. As to the other parts of Speech, our language, being ſufficiently rich in its own ſtores, has borrowed nothing from France, except perhaps an Interjection or two.

" The Nouns Subſtantive in the French language (as in all the other languages derived from the Latin) had loſt their Caſes long before the time of which we are treating; but ſuch of them as were naturaliſed here, ſeem all to have acquired a Genitive caſe, according to the corrupted Saxon form, which has been ſtated above. Their Plural number was alſo new modelled to the ſame form, if neceſſary; for in Nouns ending in e feminine, as the greater part of the French did, the two languages were already agreed. Nom. Flour. Gen. Floures. Plur. Floures. Nom. Dame. Gen. Dames. Plur. Dames.

" On the contrary, the Adjectives, which at home had a diſtinction of Gender and Number, upon their naturaliſation here, ſeem to have been generally ſtript of both, and reduced to the ſimple ſtate of the Engliſh Adjective, without Caſe, Gender, or Number.

" The French Verbs were obliged to lay aſide all their differences of Conjugation. Accorder, ſouffrir, recevoir, deſcendre, were regularly changed into—accorden, ſuffren, receiven, deſcenden. They brought with them only two Tenſes, the Preſent and the Paſt; nor did they retain any ſingularity of Inflexion, which could diſtinguiſh them from other Verbs of Saxon growth.

" The Participle indeed of the Preſent time, in ſome Verbs, appears to have ſtill preſerved its original French form; as, uſant, ſuffiſant, &c.

" The Participle of the Paſt time adopted, almoſt univerſally, the regular Saxon termination in ed; as, accorded, ſuffred, received, deſcended. It even frequently aſſumed the prepoſitive particle ȝe, (or y, as it was laterly written) which, among the Saxons, was very generally, though not peculiarly, prefixed to that Participle.

" § VI. Upon the whole, I believe it may be ſaid with truth, that, at the time which we are conſidering, though the form of our Language was ſtill Saxon, the matter was in a great meaſure French. The novelties of all kinds, which the Revolution in 1066 had introduced, demanded a large ſupply of new terms; and our Anceſtors very naturally took what they wanted, from the Language which was already familiar to a conſiderable part of the Community. Our Poets in particular (who have generally the principal ſhare in modelling a Language) found it their intereſt to borrow as many words as they conveniently could from France. As they were, for a long time, chiefly Tranſlators, this expedient ſaved them the trouble of hunting for correſpondent terms in Saxon. The French words too, being the remains of a poliſhed language, were ſmoother, and ſlid eaſier into metre than the Saxon, which had never undergone any regular cultivation: their final ſyllables chimed together with more frequent conſonancies, and their Accents were better adapted to Riming Poetry. But more of this in the next Part.

PART THE THIRD.

" Before we proceed in the third and laſt part of this Eſſay, in which we are to conſider the Verſification of Chaucer, it may be uſeful to premiſe a few obſervations upon the ſtate of Engliſh Poetry antecedent to his time.

" § I. That the Saxons had a ſpecies of writing, which differed from their common proſe, and was conſidered by themſelves as Poetry, is very certain; but it ſeems equally certain, that their compoſitions of that kind were neither divided into verſes of a determinate number of ſyllables, nor embelliſhed with what we call Rime. There are no traces, I believe, to be found of either Rime or Metre in our language, till ſome years after the Conqueſt; ſo that I ſhould apprehend we muſt have been obliged for both to the Normans, who very early diſtinguiſhed themſelves by poetical performances in their Vulgar tongue.

" The Metres which they uſed, and which we ſeem to have borrowed from them, were plainly copied from the Latin rythmical verſes, which, in the declenſion of that language, were current in various forms among thoſe, who either did not underſtand, or did not regard, the true quantity of ſyllables; and the practice of Riming is probably to be deduced from the ſame original, as we find that practice to have prevailed in Eccleſiaſtical Hymns, and other compoſitions, in Latin, ſome centuries before Otfrid of Weiſſenberg, the firſt known Rimer in any of the vulgar European dialects.

" § II.

fourth year of the ſame reign, the King directed an order to him, as Chief Butler, to deliver one hundred tuns of wine to the Duke of Burgundy. In the ſixth year of the ſame

" § II. I wiſh it were in my power to give a regular hiſtory of the progreſs which our Anceſtors made in this new ſtyle of verſification; but, except a few lines in the Saxon Chronicle upon the death of William the Conqueror, which ſeem to have been intended for verſes of the modern faſhion, and a ſhort Canticle, which, according to Matthew Paris, the bleſſed Virgin was pleaſed to dictate to Godric, an Hermite near Durham, I have not been able to diſcover any attempts at Riming Poetry, which can with probability be referred to an earlier period than the reign of Henry the ſecond. In that reign Layamon, a Prieſt of Ernleye near Severn, as he calls himſelf, tranſlated (chiefly) from the French of Wace a fabulous hiſtory of the Britons, entitled " Le Brut," which Wace himſelf, about the year 1155, had tranſlated from the Latin of Geffrey of Monmouth. Though the greateſt part of this work of Layamon reſembles the old Saxon Poetry, without Rime or metre, yet he often intermixes a number of ſhort verſes, of unequal lengths, but riming together pretty exactly; and in ſome places he has imitated not unſucceſsfully the regular octoſyllable meaſure of his French original.

" § III. It may ſeem extraordinary, after theſe proofs that the art of Riming was not unknown or unpractiſed in this country in the time of Henry II. that we ſhould be obliged to ſearch through a ſpace of above an hundred years, without being able to meet with a ſingle maker of Engliſh Rimes, whom we know to have written in that interval. The caſe I ſuſpect to have been this. The Scholars of that age (and there were many who might fairly be called ſo, in the Engliſh dominions abroad as well as at home) affected to write only in Latin, ſo that we do not find that they ever compoſed, in verſe or proſe, in any other language. On the other hand they, who meant to recommend themſelves by their Poetry to the favour of the great, took care to write in French, the only language which their patrons underſtood; and hence it is, that we ſee ſo many French poems, about that time, either addreſſed directly to the principal perſons at the Engliſh court, or at leaſt written on ſuch ſubjects as we may ſuppoſe to have been moſt likely to engage their attention. Whatever therefore of Engliſh Poetry was produced, in this infancy of the art, being probably the work of illiterate authors and circulating only among the vulgar, we need not be much ſurpriſed that no more of it has been tranſmitted down to poſterity.

" § IV. The learned Hickes however has pointed out to us two very curious pieces, which may with probability be referred to this period. The firſt of them is a Paraphraſe of the Goſpel Hiſtories, entitled Ormulum, by one Orm, or Ormin. It ſeems to have been conſidered as mere Proſe by Hickes and by Wanley, who have both given large extracts from it; but, I apprehend, every reader, who has an ear for metre, will eaſily perceive that it is written very exactly in verſes of fifteen ſyllables, without Rime, in imitation of the moſt common ſpecies of the Latin Tetrameter Iambic. The other piece, which is a moral Poem upon old age, &c. is in Rime, and in a metre much reſembling the former, except that the verſe of fifteen ſyllables is broken into two, of which the firſt ſhould regularly contain eight and the ſecond ſeven ſyllables; but the metre is not ſo exactly obſerved (at leaſt in the copy which Hickes has followed) as it is in the Ormulum.

" § V. In the next interval, from the latter end of the reign of Henry III. to the middle of the fourteenth century, when we may ſuppoſe Chaucer was beginning to write, the number of Engliſh Rimers ſeems to have increaſed very much. Beſides ſeveral, whoſe names we know, it is probable that a great part of the anonymous Authors, or rather Tranſlators, of the popular Poems, which (from their having been originally written in the Roman, or French, language) were called Romances, flouriſhed about this time. It is unneceſſary to enter into particulars here concerning any of them, as they do not appear to have invented, or imported from abroad, any new modes of Verſification, by which the Art could be at all advanced, or even to have improved thoſe which were before in uſe. On the contrary, as their works were intended for the ear more than for the eye, to be recited rather than read, they were apt to be more attentive to their Rimes than to the exactneſs of their Metres, from a preſumption, I ſuppoſe, that the defect, or redundance, of a ſyllable might be eaſily covered in the recitation, eſpecially if accompanied, as it often was, by ſome muſical inſtrument.

" § VI. Such was, in general, the ſtate of Engliſh Poetry at the time when Chaucer probably made his firſt eſſays. The uſe of Rime was eſtabliſhed; not excluſively (for the Author of the " Viſions of " Pierce Ploughman" wrote after the year 1350 without Rime), but very generally; ſo that in this reſpect he had little to do but to imitate his predeceſſors. The Metrical part of our Poetry was capable of more improvement, by the poliſhing of the meaſures already in uſe, as well as by the introducing of new modes of verſification; and how far Chaucer actually contributed to the improvement of it, in both or either of theſe particulars, we are now to conſider.

" § VII. With reſpect to the regular Metres then in uſe, they may be reduced, I think, to four. Firſt, the long Iambic Metre, conſiſting of not more than fifteen, nor leſs than fourteen ſyllables, and broken by a Cæſura at the eighth ſyllable. Secondly, the Alexandrin Metre, conſiſting of not more than thirteen ſyllables, nor leſs than twelve, with a Cæſura at the ſixth. Thirdly, the Octoſyllable Metre; which was in reality the ancient Diameter Iambic. Fourthly, the Stanza of ſix verſes; of which the firſt, ſecond, fourth, and fifth, were in the complete Octoſyllable Metre; and the third and laſt Catalectic, i. e. wanting a ſyllable, or even two.

" § VIII. In the firſt of theſe Metres it does not appear that Chaucer ever compoſed at all, (for, I preſume, no one can imagine that he was the author of Gamelyn,) or in the ſecond; and in the fourth we have nothing of his but the Rime of Sire Thopas, which, being intended to ridicule the vulgar Romancers, ſeems to have been purpoſely written in their favourite Metre. In the third, or Octoſyllable Metre, he has left ſeveral compoſitions; particularly, " an imperfect Tranſlation of the Roman de la Roſe," which was, probably, one of his earlieſt performances; " the Houſe of Fame;" " the Dethe of the Ducheſſe " Blanche," and a poem called his " Dreme;" upon all which it will be ſufficient here to obſerve in general, that, if he had given no other proofs of his poetical faculty, theſe alone muſt have ſecured to him the pre-eminence, above all his predeceſſors and contemporaries, in point of Verſification.

" § IX. But by far the moſt conſiderable part of Chaucer's works is written in that kind of Metre which we now call the Heroic, either in Diſtichs or in Stanzas; and as I have not been able to diſcover any inſtance of this metre being uſed by any Engliſh Poet before him, I am much inclined to ſuppoſe that he was the firſt introducer of it into our language. It had long been practiſed in France, in the Northern as well as the Southern provinces; and in Italy, within the laſt fifty years before Chaucer wrote, it had been cultivated with the greateſt aſſiduity and ſucceſs, in preference to every other metre, by Dante, Petrarch, and Boccace. When we reflect that two of Chaucer's juvenile productions, the Palamon and Arcite, and the Troilus, were in a manner tranſlated from the Theſeida and the Filoſtrato of Boccace, both written in the common Italian hendecaſyllable verſe, it cannot but appear extremely probable, that his metre alſo was copied from the ſame original; and yet I cannot find that the form of his Stanza in the Troilus (conſiſting of ſeven verſes) was ever uſed by Boccace, though it is to be met with among the poems of the King of Navarre, and of the Provençal Rimers. Whichever he ſhall be ſuppoſed to have followed, whether the French or Italians, it is certain that he could ſame Prince, he was ſent Embaſſador into France, and the year following he went beyond the ſeas, joined in commiſſion with the King's brother, and Geoffry Chaucer's nephew, could not want in either language a number of models of correct and harmonious verſification; and the only queſtion will be, whether he had ability and induſtry enough to imitate that part of their excellency.

" § X. In diſcuſſing this queſtion we ſhould always have in mind, that the correctneſs and harmony of an Engliſh verſe depends entirely upon its being compoſed of a certain number of ſyllables, and its having the accents of thoſe ſyllables properly placed. In order therefore to form any judgment of the Verſification of Chaucer, it is neceſſary that we ſhould know the ſyllabical value (if I may uſe the expreſſion) of his words, and the accentual value of his ſyllables, as they were commonly pronounced in his time; for without that knowledge, it is not more probable that we ſhould determine juſtly upon the exactneſs of his metres, than that we ſhould be able to caſt up rightly an account ſtated in coins of a former age, of whoſe current rates and denominations we are totally ignorant.

" § XI. Let us conſider a moment, how a ſenſible critic in the Auguſtan age would have proceeded, if called upon to examine a work of Ennius. When he found that a great proportion of the verſes were ſtrictly conformable to the ordinary rules of Metre, he would, probably, not ſcruple to conclude that ſuch a conformity muſt have been produced by art and deſign, and not by mere chance. On the other hand, when he found, that in ſome verſes the number of feet, to appearance, was either deficient or redundant; that in others the feet were ſeemingly compoſed of too few or too many ſyllables, or ſhort ſyllables in the place of long or of long in the place of ſhort; he would not, I think, immediately condemn the old Bard, as having all at once forgotten the fundamental principles of his art, or as having wilfully or negligently deviated from them. He would firſt, I preſume, enquire, whether all theſe irregularities were in the genuine text of his author, or only the miſtakes of Copyiſts: he would enquire further, by comparing the genuine text with other contemporary writings and monuments, whether many things, which appeared irregular, were not in truth ſufficiently regular, either juſtified by the conſtant practice, or excuſed by the allowed licence of the age: where authority failed, he would have recourſe (but ſoberly) to etymology and analogy; and if after all a few paſſages remained, not reducible to the ſtrict laws of Metre by any of the methods abovementioned, if he were really (as I have ſuppoſed him) a ſenſible critic, he would be apt rather to expect patiently the ſolution of his difficulties from more correct manuſcripts, or a more complete theory of his author's verſification, than to cut the knot, by deciding peremptorily, that the work was compoſed without any regard to metrical rules.

" § XII. I beg leave to purſue the ſame courſe with reſpect to Chaucer. The great number of verſes, ſounding complete even to our ears, which is to be found in all the leaſt corrected copies of his works, authorizes us to conclude, that he was not ignorant of the laws of metre. Upon this concluſion, it is impoſſible not to ground a ſtrong preſumption, that he intended to obſerve the ſame laws in the many other verſes which ſeem to us irregular; and if this was really his intention, what reaſon can be aſſigned ſufficient to account for his having failed ſo groſsly and repeatedly, as is generally ſuppoſed, in an operation, which every Balladmonger in our days, man, woman, or child, is known to perform with the moſt unerring exactneſs, and without any extraordinary fatigue?

" § XIII. The offences againſt metre in an Engliſh verſe, as has partly been obſerved before, muſt ariſe either from a Superfluity or Deficiency of ſyllables, or from the Accents being improperly placed.

" § XIV. With reſpect to the firſt ſpecies of irregularity, I have not taken notice of any Superfluities in Chaucer's verſes, but what may be reduced to juſt meaſure by the uſual practices of even modern Poets. And this, by the way, is a ſtrong proof of his real attention to metrical rules; for otherwiſe, if he had written without any reſtraint of that kind, a certain proportion of his deviations from meaſure muſt, in all probability, have been on the ſide of exceſs.

" § XV. But a great number of Chaucer's verſes labour under an apparent Deficiency of a ſyllable, or two. In ſome of theſe perhaps the defect may ſtill be ſupplied from MSS. but for the greateſt part, I am perſuaded, no ſuch aſſiſtance is to be expected; and, therefore, ſuppoſing the text in theſe caſes to be correct, it is worth conſidering whether the verſe alſo may not be made correct, by adopting, in certain words, a pronunciation, different indeed from modern practice, but which, we have reaſon to believe, was uſed by the author himſelf.

" For inſtance, in the Genitive caſe Singular, and the Plural Number of Nouns (which, as has been remarked above, in the time of Chaucer had the ſame expreſſion), there can be no doubt that ſuch words as, ſhoures, ver. 1. croppes, ver. 7. ſhires, ver. 15. lordes, ver. 47, &c. were regularly pronounced as conſiſting of two ſyllables. Whenever they are uſed as Monoſyllables, it muſt be conſidered as a Poetical Licence, warranted however even then (as we may preſume from the natural progreſs of our language) by the practice of inaccurate ſpeakers in common converſation.

" In like manner, we may be ſure that ed, the regular termination of the Paſt Tenſe and its Participle, made, or contributed to make, a ſecond ſyllable in the words, perced, ver. 2. bathed, ver. 3. loved, ver. 45. wered, ver. 75, &c. The firſt ſtep toward reducing words of this form to Monoſyllables ſeems to have been to ſhorten the laſt ſyllable, either by tranſpoſing the final letters, as in—wolde, ver. 144. ſayde, ver. 763, &c. or by throwing away the d, as in—caſte, ver. 1910. caſte, ver. 2083, &c. In both theſe caſes the words ſtill remained of two ſyllables, the final e being ſounded as an e feminine; but they were prepared to loſe their laſt ſyllable by the eaſy licence of changing an e feminine into an e mute, or of dropping it entirely, according to the modern practice.

" § XVI. But nothing will be found of ſuch extenſive uſe for ſupplying the deficiencies of Chaucer's metre as the pronunciation of the e feminine; and as that pronunciation has been for a long time totally antiquated, it may be proper here to ſuggeſt ſome reaſons for believing (independently of any arguments to be drawn from the practice of Chaucer himſelf) that the final e in our antient language was very generally pronounced, as the e feminine is at this day by the French.

" With reſpect to words imported directly from France, it is certainly quite natural to ſuppoſe, that, for ſome time, they retained their native pronunciation; whether they were Nouns ſubſtantive, as, hoſte, ver. 753. face, ver. 1580. &c.—or Adjectives, as, large, ver. 755. ſtrange, ver. 13, &c.—or Verbs, as, grante, ver. 12756. preche, ver. 12327, &c. and it cannot be doubted, that in theſe and other ſimilar words in the French language, the final e was always pronounced, as it ſtill is, ſo as to make them diſſyllables.

" We have not indeed ſo clear a proof of the original pronounciation of the Saxon part of our language; but we know, from general obſervation, that all changes of pronunciation are uſually made by ſmall degrees; and therefore, when we find that a great number of thoſe words, which in Chaucer's time ended in e, originally ended in a, we may reaſonably preſume, that our anceſtors firſt paſſed from the broader ſound of a to the thinner ſound of e feminine, and not at once from a to e mute. Beſides, if the final e in ſuch words was not pronounced, why was it added? From the time that it has confeſſedly ceaſed to be pronounced, it has been gradually omitted in them, except where it may be ſuppoſed of uſe to lengthen or ſoften the preceding ſyllable, as in—nephew, Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter. In the ninth year of the ſame reign, on Tueſday, the twenty-fifth of October, the Commons preſented him their Speaker; as hope, name, &c. But according to the ancient orthography it terminates many words of Saxon original, where it cannot have been added for any ſuch purpoſe, as, herte, childe, olde, wilde, &c. In theſe therefore we muſt ſuppoſe that it was pronounced as an e feminine, and made part of a ſecond ſyllable; and ſo, by a parity of reaſon, in all others, in which, as in theſe, it appears to have been ſubſtituted for the Saxon a.

Bope,

" Upon the ſame grounds we may preſume, that in words terminated, according to the Saxon form, in en, ſuch as the Infinitive modes and Plural numbers of Verbs, and a great variety of Adverbs and Prepoſitions, the n only was at firſt thrown away, and the e, which then became final, continued for a long time to be pronounced as well as written.

" Theſe conſiderations ſeem ſufficient to make us believe, that the pronuntiation of the e feminine is founded on the very nature of both the French and Saxon parts of our language; and therefore, though we may not be able to trace the reaſons of that pronountiation in all caſes ſo plainly as in thoſe which have been juſt mentioned, we may ſafely, I think, conclude with the learned Wallis, that what is generally conſidered as an e mute in our language, either at the end or in the middle of words, was antiently pronounced, but obſcurely, like the e feminine of the French.

" § XVII. The third kind of irregularity, to which an Engliſh verſe is liable, is from the Accents being miſplaced. The reſtoring of Chaucer's words to their juſt number of ſyllables, by the methods which have been pointed out above, will often be of ſignal ſervice in reſtoring his accents alſo to their proper places; but further, in many words, we muſt be cautious of concluding too haſtily that Chaucer accented the ſame ſyllables that we do. On the contrary, I am perſuaded that in his French words he moſt commonly laid his accent according to the French cuſtom (upon the laſt ſyllable, or the laſt but one in words ending in e femine,) which, as is well known, is the very reverſe of our practice. Thus in ver. 3. he uſes licóur for líquour; ver. 11. corâges for cóurages; ver. 22. again, corâge for cóurage; ver. 37. reſón for réaſon; ver. 77. viâge for voyage; ver. 109, 10. viſage—uſage for víſage, úſage; ver 140. manére for mánner; ver. 186. laboúre for lábour; ver. 204. prelát for prélate; ver. 211. langâge for lánguage; ver. 212. mariâge for márriage; ver. 216. contrée for cóuntry; and ſo through the whole work.

" In the ſame manner he accents the laſt Syllable of the Participle Preſent, as, ver. 885, 6. wedding—coming for wédding—cóming; ver. 903. living for líving; ver. 907, 8. coming—crying; ver. 998. brenning for brénning, &c. and as he does this in words of Saxon as well as of French growth, I ſhould ſuppoſe that the old Participle of the preſent tenſe, ending in and, was originally accented upon that ſyllable, as it certainly continued to be by the Scottiſh Poets a long time after Chaucer. See Bp. Douglas, Virg. p. 18. ver. 18. Spryngând; ver. 51. Berând; p. 27. ver. 49. Fleând; p. 29. ver. 10. Seând.

Theſe inſtances are all taken from the Riming ſyllables (where a ſtrong accent is indiſpenſably neceſſary) in order to prove beyond contradiction, that Chaucer frequently accented his words in the French manner. But if he followed this practice at the end of his verſes, it is more than probable that he did the ſame in the middle, whenever it gave a more harmonious flow to his metre; and therefore in ver. 4. inſtead of vértue, I ſuppoſe he pronounced, vertúe; in ver. 11. inſtead of nâture, natúre; in ver. 25. inſtead of avénture, aventúre; in ver. 46. inſtead of hónour, honoúr, &c.

It may be proper however to obſerve, that we are not to expect from Chaucer that regularity in the diſpoſition of his accents, which the practice of our greateſt Poets in the laſt and the preſent century has taught us to conſider as eſſential to harmonious verſification. None of his maſters, either French or Italian, had ſet him a pattern of exactneſs in this reſpect; and it is rather ſurprizing, that, without rule or example to guide him, he has ſo ſeldom failed to place his accents in ſuch a manner, as to produce the cadence beſt ſuited to the nature of his verſe.

" § XVIII. I ſhall conclude this long and (I fear) tedious Eſſay, with a Grammatical and Metrical Analyſis of the firſt eighteen lines of the Canterbury Tales. This will afford me an opportunity of illuſtrating at once a conſiderable part of that Theory, which I have ventured to propoſe in the preceding pages, with regard to the Language and Verſification of Chaucer. The remainder I ſhall take occaſion to explain in a few notes upon particular paſſages.

THE BEGINNING OF THE CANTERBURY TALES.

" I. Whânne that Âpril with his ſhoûres ſôte
" II. The droûghte of Márch hath pérced tó the róte,
" III. And bâthed évery véine in ſwíche licoúr,
" IV. Of whíche vertûe engéndred ís the floúr;
" V. Whan Zéphirús eké with his ſôte bréthe
" VI. Enſpíred háth in évery hólt and héthe
" VII. The téndre cróppes, and the yónge ſónne,
" VIII. Háth in the Rám his hálfe cóurs yrónne,
" IX. And ſmále foúles máken mélodíe,
" X. That ſléepen âlle night with ópen eye,
" XI. So príketh hém natúre in hír coráges;
" XII. Than lóngen fólke to gón on pilgrimáges,
" XIII. And pálmer'es fór to ſéken ſtránge ſtróndes,
" XIV. To férre hálwes coúthe in ſóndry lóndes;
" XV. And ſpécially from évery ſhíres énde
" XVI. Of Englelónd to Cánterbúry they wénde,
" XVII. The hóly blíſful mártyr fór to ſéke,
" XVIII. That hém hath hólpen, whân that théy were ſéke (109)."

(109) Tyrwhytt, ubi ſupra, p. 1—111.

Mr. Tyrwhytt hath annexed to the " Eſſay on the Language and Verſification of Chaucer, an " Introductory Diſcourſe to the Canterbury Tales." This, too, is of ſo much conſequence to the elucidation of theſe Tales, and to the explanation of the order of placing them, followed by our learned Editor, that we ſhall, likewiſe, inſert it; omitting, as before, the notes, and for the ſame reaſon.

" § I. The Dramatic form, which Boccace gave to his collection of Tales, or Novels, about the middle of the fourteenth Century, muſt be allowed to have been a capital improvement of that ſpecies of amuſing compoſition. The Decameron in that reſpect (not to mention many others) has the ſame advantage over the Cento novelle antiche, which are ſuppoſed to have preceded it in point of time, that a regular Comedy will neceſſarily have over an equal number of ſingle unconnected Scenes. Perhaps indeed there would be no great harm, if the Critics would permit us to conſider the Decameron, and other compoſitions of that kind, in the light of Comedies not intended for the ſtage: at leaſt we may venture to aſſume, that the cloſer any ſuch compoſition ſhall copy the moſt eſſential forms of Comedy; the more natural and defined the Plan ſhall be; the more the Characters ſhall be diverſified; the more the Tales ſhall be ſuited to the Characters; ſo much the more conſpicuous will be the ſkill of the Writer, and his work approach the nearer to perfection.

" § II. The Canterbury Tales are a work of the ſame nature with the Decameron, and were, in all probability, compoſed in imitation of it, though upon a different and (in my opinion) an improved plan. It would be eaſy to ſhew, that, in the ſeveral points above-mentioned, Chaucer has either been more judicious, or more fortunate, than his maſter Boccace; but (waving for the preſent that diſquiſition) I ſhall proceed to the immediate object of this Diſcourſe, which is, in the firſt place, to lay before the Reader the general plan of the Canterbury Tales, as it appears to have been originally deſigned by Chaucer; and, ſecondly, to give a particular review of the ſeveral parts of that work, which are come as they did likewiſe in the eleventh year, on Wedneſday, the twenty-eighth of January. In the twelfth year of that reign, Queen Jane granted to him, for his good ſervice, the manors down to us, as they are publiſhed in this edition.

" § III. THE GENERAL PLAN of the Canterbury Tales may be learned, in a great meaſure, from the Prologue, which Chaucer himſelf has prefixed to them. He ſuppoſes there, that a company of Pilgrims going to Canterbury, aſſemble at an Inn in Southwark, and agree, that, for their common amuſement on the road, each of them ſhall tell at leaſt one Tale in going to Canterbury, and another in coming back from thence; and that he, who ſhall tell the beſt Tales, ſhall be treated by the reſt with a ſupper upon their return to the ſame Inn. This is ſhortly the Fable. The Characters of the Pilgrims are as various as, at that time, could be found in the ſeveral departments of middle life; that is, in fact, as various as could, with any probability, be brought together, ſo as to form one company; the higheſt and the loweſt ranks of ſociety being neceſſarily excluded. It appears further, that the deſign of Chaucer was not barely to recite the Tales told by the Pilgrims, but alſo to deſcribe their journey, And all the remenant of their pilgrimage [ver. 726.]; including, probably, their adventures at Canterbury as well as upon the road. If we add, that the Tales, beſides being nicely adapted to the Characters of their reſpective Relaters, were intended to be connected together by ſuitable introductions, and interſperſed with diverting epiſodes; and that the greateſt part of them was to have been executed in Verſe; we ſhall have a tolerable idea of the extent and difficulty of the whole undertaking: and admiring, as we muſt, the vigour of that genius, which in an advanced age could begin ſo vaſt a work, we ſhall rather lament than be ſurprized that it has been left imperfect.

" § IV. In truth, if we compare thoſe parts of the Canterbury Tales, of which we are in poſſeſſion, with the ſketch which has been juſt given of the intended whole, it will be found that more than one half is wanting. The Prologue we have, perhaps nearly complete, and the greateſt part of the journey to Canterbury; but not a word of the tranſactions at Canterbury, or of the journey homeward, or of the Epilogue, which, we may ſuppoſe, was to have concluded the work, with an account of the Prize-ſupper, and the ſeparation of the company. Even in that part which we have of the journey to Canterbury, it will be neceſſary, in the following Review, to take notice of certain defects and inconſiſtencies, which can only be accounted for upon the ſuppoſition, that the work was never finiſhed by the Author.

" § V. Having thus ſtated the general Plan of the Canterbury Tales, I ſhall now, according to my promiſe, enter upon a particular Review of thoſe parts of them, which are publiſhed in this edition, beginning with THE PROLOGUE.

" It ſeems to have been the intention of Chaucer, in the firſt lines of the Prologue, to mark, with ſome exactneſs, the time of his ſuppoſed pilgrimage; but unluckily the two circumſtances of his deſcription, which were moſt likely to anſwer that purpoſe, are each of them irreconcileable to the other. When he tells us, that " the ſhours of April had perced to the rote the drought of March" [ver. 1, 2.], we muſt ſuppoſe (in order to allow due time for ſuch an operation) that April was far advanced; while, on the other hand, the place of the Sun, " having juſt run half his courſe in the Ram" [ver. 7, 8.], reſtrains us to ſome day in the very latter end of March; as the Vernal Equinox, in the age of Chaucer, according to his own treatiſe on the Aſtrolabe, was computed to happen on the twelfth of March. This difficulty may (and, I think, ſhould) be removed by reading in ver. 8, the Bull, inſtead of the Ram. All the parts of the deſcription will then be conſiſtent with themſelves, and with another paſſage, [ver. 4425.] where, in the beſt MSS. the eighte and twenty day of April is named as the day of the journey to Canterbury.

" We will ſuppoſe, therefore, that the preceding day, the ſeven and twentieth of April, was the day on which the company aſſembled at the Tabard. In what year this happened, Chaucer has not thought fit to inform us. Either he did not think it neceſſary to fix that point at all; or perhaps he poſtponed it, till the completion of his work ſhould enable him to aſſign ſuch a date to his Fable, as ſhould be conſiſtent with all the Hiſtorical circumſtances, which he might take occaſion to introduce into it.

" § VI. A ſecond point, intended to be defined in the Prologue, is the number of the company; and this too has its difficulties. They are ſaid in ver. 24. to have been nine and twenty, but it is not clear whether Chaucer himſelf is included in that number. They might, therefore, according to that paſſage, be thirty; but if we reckon the ſeveral characters, as they are enumerated in the Prologue, we ſhall find them one and thirty; 1. a Knight; 2. a Squier; 3. a Yeman; 4. a Prioreſſe; 5. an other Nonne; 6. 7. 8. Three Preeſtes; 9. a Monk; 10. a Frere; 11. a Marchant; 12. a Clerk of Oxenforde; 13. a Sergeant of the Lawe; 14. a Frankelein; 15. an Haberdaſher; 16. a Carpenter; 17. a Webbe; 18. a Deyer; 19. a Tapiſer; 20. a Coke; 21. a Shipman; 22. a Doctour of Phyſike; 23. a Wif of Bathe; 24. a Perſone; 25. a Plowman; 26. a Reve; 27. a Miller; 28. a Sompnour; 29. a Pardoner; 30. a Manciple; 31. Chaucer himſelf. It muſt be obſerved, however, that in this liſt there is one very ſuſpicious article, which is that of the three Preeſtes. As it appears evidently to have been the deſign of Chaucer to compoſe his company of individuals of different ranks, in order to produce a greater variety of diſtinct characters, we can hardly conceive that he would, in this ſingle inſtance, introduce three, of the ſame profeſſion, without any diſcriminating circumſtances whatever; and, in fact, when the Nonnes Preeſt is called upon to tell his tale, [ver. 14814.] he is accoſted by the Hoſt in a manner, which will not permit us to ſuppoſe that two others of the ſame denomination were preſent. This muſt be allowed to be a ſtrong objection to the genuineneſs of that article of the three Preeſtes; but it is not the only one. All the other Characters are particularly deſcribed, and moſt of them very much at large; whereas the whole that is ſaid of the other Nonne, and the three Preeſtes, is contained in theſe two lines [ver. 163, 4.] at the end of the Prioreſſes character:

> Another Nonne alſo with hire had ſhe,
> That was hire Chapellein, and Preeſtes three.

Where it is alſo obſervable, that the ſingle circumſtance of deſcription is falſe; for no Nonne could be a Chaplain. The chief duty of a Chaplain was to ſay Maſs, and to hear Confeſſion; neither of which offices could regularly be performed by a Nonne, or by any woman.

" It ſhould ſeem, therefore, that we have ſufficient ground to reject theſe two lines, or at leaſt the ſecond, as an interpolation; by which means we ſhall get rid of two of the Preeſtes, and the detail of the characters will agree with the groſs number in ver. 24. Chaucer himſelf being included among the nine and twenty. As Novelliſts generally delight in even numbers, it is not improbable that the Hoſt was intended to be the thirtieth. Though not under the ſame obligation with the other Pilgrims, he might nevertheleſs tell his Tale among them as a Volunteer.

" § VII. This leads me, in the third place, to examine what the agreement was, which the Pilgrims entered into, at the ſuggeſtion of the Hoſt, with reſpect to the number of Tales that each perſon was to tell. The propoſal of the Hoſt ſtands thus, with very little variation, in all the MSS.

" This is the point—[ſays he, ver. 792—c.]

> That eche of you, to ſhorten with youre way,
> In this viage ſhal tellen tales tway,
> To Canterbury ward, I mene it ſo,
> And homeward he ſhal tellen other two—

From this paſſage we ſhould certainly conclude, that each of them was to tell two tales in the journey to Canterbury, manors of Woodſtock, Hannebrough, Wotton, and Stantesfield, during life; and in the thirteenth year, on the fifth of November, he was again preſented Speaker, as he was Canterbury, and two more in the journey homeward: but all the other paſſages, in which mention is made of this agreement, would rather lead us to believe, that they were to tell only one Tale in each journey; and the Prologue to the Parſon's Tale ſtrongly confirms this latter ſuppoſition. The Hoſt ſays there, [ver. 17317.]

" Now lacketh us no tales mo than on"— and calling upon the Parſon to tell this one tale, which was wanting, he ſays to him, [ver. 17325.]

——" ne breke thou not our play,
For every man, ſave thou, hath told his tale."

The Parſon therefore had not told any tale before, and only one tale was expected from him (and conſequently from each of the others) upon that journey.

" It is true, that a very ſlight alteration of the paſſage firſt cited would reconcile that too to this hypotheſis. If it were written—

That eche of you, to ſhorten with youre way,
In this viage ſhal tellen tales tway;
To Canterbury ward, I mene it, o,
And homeward he ſhall tell another to— the original propoſition of the Hoſt would perfectly agree with what appears to have been the ſubſequent practice. However, I cannot venture to propoſe ſuch an alteration of the text, in oppoſition to ſo many MSS. ſome of them of the beſt note; and therefore the Reader, if he is ſo pleaſed, may conſider this as one of thoſe inconſiſtencies, hinted at above, which prove too plainly that the author had not finiſhed his work.

" § VIII. The remainder of the Prologue is employed in deſcribing the Characters of the Pilgrims, and their firſt ſetting out upon their journey. The little that it may be neceſſary to ſay in illuſtration of ſome of the Characters I ſhall reſerve for the Notes. The circumſtances of their ſetting out are related ſuccinctly and naturally; and the contrivance of appointing the Knight by lot to tell the firſt tale is a happy one, as it affords the Author the opportunity of giving his work a ſplendid opening, and at the ſame time does not infringe that apparent equality, upon which the freedom of diſcourſe, and conſequently the eaſe and good-humour of every ſociety ſo entirely depends. The general ſatisfaction, which this appointment is ſaid to give to the company, puts us in mind of a ſimilar gratification to the ſecret wiſhes of the Grecian army, when the lot of fighting with Hector falls to Ajax; though there is not the leaſt probability that Chaucer had ever read the Iliad, even in a tranſlation.

" § IX. THE KNIGHTES TALE, or at leaſt a Poem upon the ſame ſubject, was originally compoſed by Chaucer, as a ſeparate work. As ſuch it is mentioned by him, among ſome of his other works, in the Legende of gode women, [ver. 420, 1.] under the title of—" al the love of Palamon and Arcite Of Thebes, though the ſtorie is knowen lite—;" and the laſt words ſeem to imply, that it had not made itſelf very popular. It is not impoſſible that at firſt it was a mere tranſlation of the Theſeida of Boccace, and that its preſent form was given to it, when Chaucer determined to aſſign it the firſt place among his Canterbury Tales. As the Theſeida, upon which this tale is entirely founded, is very rarely to be met with, it may be not unpleaſing to the Reader to ſee here a ſhort ſummary of it, which will ſhew with what ſkill Chaucer has proceeded in reducing a poem of about ten thouſand lines to a little more than two thouſand, without omitting any material circumſtance.

" The Theſeida is diſtributed into twelve Books or Cantoes.

" B. I. Contains the war of Theſeus with the Amazons; their ſubmiſſion to him; and his marriage with Hippolyta.

" B. II. Theſeus, having ſpent two years in Scythia, is reproached by Perithous in a viſion, and immediately returns to Athens with Hippolyta and her ſiſter Emilia. He enters the city in triumph; finds the Grecian Ladies in the temple of Clemenzia; marches to Thebes; kills Creon, &c. and brings home Palemone and Arcita, who are " Damnati—ad eterna preſone.

" B. III. Emilia, walking in a garden and ſinging, is heard and ſeen firſt by Arcita, who calls Palemone. They are both equally enamoured of her, but without any jealouſy or rivalſhip. Emila is ſuppoſed to ſee them at the window, and to be not diſpleaſed with their admiration.—Arcita is releaſed at the requeſt of Perithous; takes his leave of Palemone, with embraces, &c.

" B. IV. Arcita, having changed his name to Pentheo, goes into the ſervice of Menelaus at Mycenæ; and afterwards of Peleus at Ægina. From thence he returns to Athens and becomes a favourite ſervant of Theſeus, being known to Emilia, though to nobody elſe; till after ſome time he is overhead making his complaint in a wood, to which he uſually reſorted for that purpoſe, by Pamphilo, a ſervant of Palemone.

" B. V. Upon the report of Pamphilo, Palemone begins to be jealous of Arcita, and is deſirous to get out of priſon in order to fight with him. This he accompliſhes with the aſſiſtance of Pamphilo, by changing clothes with Alimeto, a Phyſician. He goes armed to the wood in queſt of Arcita, whom he finds ſleeping. At firſt they are very civil and friendly to each other. Then Palemone calls upon Arcita to renounce his pretenſions to Emilia, or to fight with him. After many long expoſtulations on the part of Arcita, they fight, and are diſcovered firſt by Emilia, who ſends for Theſeus. When he finds who they are, and the cauſe of their difference, he forgives them, and propoſes the method of deciding their claim to Emilia by a combat of an hundred on each ſide, to which they gladly agree.

" B. VI. Palemone and Arcita live ſplendidly at Athens, and ſend out meſſengers to ſummon their friends; who arrive; and the principal of them are ſeverally deſcribed, viz. Lycurgus, Peleus, Phocus, Telamon, &c. Agamemnon, Menelaus, Caſtor and Pollux, &c. Neſtor, Evander, Perithous, Ulyſſes, Diomedes, Pygmalion, Minos, &c. with a great diſplay of ancient hiſtory and mythology.

" B. VII. Theſeus declares the laws of the combat, and the two parties of an hundred on each ſide are formed. The day before the combat, Arcita, after having viſited the temples of all the Gods, makes a formal prayer to Mars. The Prayer, being perſonified, is ſaid to go and find Mars in his temple in Thrace, which is deſcribed; and Mars, upon underſtanding the meſſage, cauſes favourable ſigns to be given to Arcita. In the ſame manner Palemone cloſes his religious obſervances with a prayer to Venus. His Prayer, being alſo perſonified, ſets out for the Temple of Venus on Mount Citherone, which is alſo deſcribed; and the petition is granted. Then the ſacrifice of Emilia to Diana is deſcribed; her prayer; the appearance of the Goddeſs; and the ſigns of the two fires.—In the morning they proceed to the Theatre with their reſpective troops, and prepare for the action. Arcita puts up a private prayer to Emilia, and harangues his troop publickly; and Palemone does the ſame.

" B. VIII. Contains a deſcription of the battle, in which Palemone is taken priſoner.

" B. IX. The horſe of Arcita, being frighted by a Fury, ſent from hell at the deſire of Venus, throws him. However, he is carried to Athens in a triumphal chariot with Emilia by his ſide; is put to bed dangerouſly ill; and there by his own deſire eſpouſes Emilia.

" B. X. The funeral of the perſons killed in the combat. Arcita, being given over by his Phyſicians, makes his will, in diſcourſe with Theſeus, and deſires that Palemone may inherit all his poſſeſſions and alſo Emilia. He then takes leave of Palemone and Emilia, to whom he repeats the ſame requeſt. Their lamentations. Arcita orders a ſacrifice to Mercury, (which Palemone performs for him,) and dies.

" B. XI.

was in the ſecond of Henry V. on Wedneſday, the ſecond day of Parliament. And in the ſame year he was ſent by the King, in joint commiſſion with Hugh Mortimer, to treat

" B. XI. Opens with the paſſage of Arcita's ſoul to heaven, imitated from the beginning of the 9th Book of Lucan, The funeral of Arcita. Deſcription of the wood felled takes up ſix Stanzas. Palemone builds a temple in honour of him, in which his whole hiſtory is painted. The deſcription of this painting is an abridgment of the preceding part of the Poem.

" B. XII. Theſeus propoſes to carry into execution Arcita's will by the marriage of Palemone and Emilia. This they both decline for ſome time in formal ſpeeches, but at laſt are perſuaded and married. The Kings, &c. take their leave, and Palemone remains —" in gioia e in diporto Con la ſua dona nobile e corteſe."

" From this ſketch of the Theſeida, it is evident enough that Chaucer was obliged to Boccace for the Plan and principal incidents of the KNIGHTES TALE; and in the Notes upon that tale I ſhall point out ſome paſſages, out of many more, which are literal tranſlations from the Italian.

" § X. When the Knight has finiſhed his Tale, the Hoſt with great propriety calls upon the Monk, as the next in rank among the men, to tell the next Tale; but, as it ſeems to have been the intention of Chaucer to avail himſelf of the variety of his Characters, in order to diſtribute alternate ſucceſſions of Serious and Comic, in nearly equal proportions, throughout his work, he has contrived, that the Hoſtes arrangement ſhall be ſet aſide by the intruſion of the dronken Miller, whoſe Tale is ſuch as might be expected from his character and condition, a complete contraſt to the Knightes.

" § XI. I have not been able to diſcover from whence the Story of the MILLERS TALE is taken; ſo that for the preſent I muſt give Chaucer credit for it as his own invention, though in general he appears to have built his Tales, both ſerious and comic, upon ſtories, which he found ready made. The great difference is, that in his ſerious pieces he often follows his author with the ſervility of a mere tranſlator, and in conſequence his narration is jejune and conſtrained; whereas in the comic, he is generally ſatisfied with borrowing a ſlight hint of his ſubject, which he varies, enlarges, and embelliſhes at pleaſure, and gives the whole the air and colour of an original; a ſure ſign, that his genius rather led him to compoſitions of the latter kind.

" § XII. The next tale is told by the REVE (who is repreſented above [ver. 589.] as " a cholerick man") in revenge of the Miller's tale. It has been generally ſaid to be borrowed from the Decameron, D. ix. N. 6. but I rather think that both Boccace and Chaucer, in this inſtance, have taken whatever they have in common from an old Fabliau, or Conte, of an anonymous French rimer, De Gombert & des deux Clers. The reader may eaſily ſatisfy himſelf upon this head, by caſting his eye upon the French Fabliau, which has lately been printed with ſeveral others from MSS. in France. See Fabliaux & Contes, Paris, 1756. t. ii. p. 115—124.

" § XIII. The COKES TALE is imperfect in all the MSS. which I have had an opportunity of examining. In MS. A. it ſeems to have been entirely omitted; and indeed I cannot help ſuſpecting, that it was intended to be omitted, at leaſt in this place, as in the Manciples Prologue, when the Coke is called upon to tell a tale, there is no intimation of his having told one before. Perhaps our Author might think, that three tales of harlotrie, as he calls it, together would be too much. However, as it is ſufficiently certain, that the Cokes Prologue and the beginning of his Tale are genuine compoſitions, they have their uſual place in this Edition. There was not the ſame reaſon for inſerting the ſtory of GAMELYN, which in ſome MSS. is annexed to the Cokes Tale. It is not to be found in any of the MSS. of the firſt authority; and the manner, ſtyle, and verſification, all prove it to have been the work of an author much inferiour to Chaucer. I did not therefore think myſelf warranted to publiſh it a ſecond time among the Canterbury Tales, though as a relique of our antient Poetry, and the foundation, perhaps, of Shakeſpeare's As you like it, I could have wiſhed to ſee it more accurately printed, than it is in the only edition which we have of it.

" § XIV. In the PROLOGUE TO THE MAN OF LAWES TALE Chaucer recalls our attention to the Action (if I may ſo call it) of his Drama, the journey of the Pilgrims. They had ſet out ſoon after the day began to ſpring [ver. 824 and f.] When the Reve was beginning to tell his tale, they were in the neighbourhood of Deptford and Greenwich, and it was half way prime; that is, I ſuppoſe, half way paſt prime, about half hour after ſeven A. M. [ver. 3904, 5.] How much further they were advanced upon their road at this time is not ſaid; but the hour of the day is pointed out to us by two circumſtances. We are firſt told [ver. 4422,3.], that —" the Sonne

" The ark of his artificial day had ronne
" The fourthe part and half an hour and more;"

—and ſecondly [ver. 4432.], that he was " five and forty degrees high;" and this laſt circumſtance is ſo confirmed by the mention of a correſponding phænomenon that it is impoſſible to ſuſpect any error in the number. The equality in length of ſhadows to their projecting bodies can only happen, when the Sun is at the heighth of five and forty degrees. Unfortunately however this deſcription, though ſeemingly intended to be ſo accurate, will neither enable us to conclude with the MSS. that it was " ten of the clock," nor to fix upon any other hour; as the two circumſtances juſt mentioned are not found to coincide in any part of the twenty-eighth (or of any other) day of April in this climate. All that we can conclude with certainty is, that it was not paſt ten of the clock.

" The compliments which Chaucer has introduced upon his own writings are modeſt enough, and quite unexceptionable; but if the reflection [ver. 4497. and f.] upon thoſe who relate ſuch ſtories as that of Canace, or of Apollonius Tyrus, was levelled at Gower, as I very much ſuſpect, it will be difficult to reconcile ſuch an attack to our notions of the ſtrict friendſhip, which is generally ſuppoſed to have ſubſiſted between the two bards. The attack too at this time muſt appear the more extraordinary on the part of our bard, as he is juſt going to put into the mouth of his Man of Lawe a tale, of which almoſt every circumſtance is borrowed from Gower. The fact is, that the ſtory of Canace is related by Gower in his Conf. Amant. B. iii. and the ſtory of Apollonius (or Apollynus, as he is there called) in the VIIIth book of the ſame work; ſo that, if Chaucer really did not mean to reflect upon his old friend, his choice of theſe two inſtances was rather unlucky.

" § XV. THE MAN OF LAWES TALE, as I have juſt ſaid, is taken, with very little variation, from Gower, Conf. Amant. B. ii. If there could be any doubt, upon a curſory peruſal of the two tales, which of them was written firſt, the following paſſage, I think, is ſufficient to decide the queſtion. At ver. 5505, Chaucer ſays,—

Som men wold ſayn, how that the child Maurice Doth this meſſage until this Emperour:—

and we read in Gower, that Maurice is actually ſent upon this meſſage to the Emperour. We may therefore fairly conclude, that in this paſſage Chaucer alludes to Gower, who had treated the ſame ſubject before him, but, as he inſinuates, with leſs propriety.

" I do not however ſuppoſe that Gower was the inventor of this tale. It had probably paſſed through ſeveral hands before it came to him. I find among the Cotton MSS. Cal. A. ii. fol. 69. an old Engliſh Rime, entitled " Emare," in which the heroine under that name goes through a ſeries of adventures, for the moſt part, exactly ſimilar to thoſe of Conſtance. But neither was the author of this Rime the inventor of the ſtory, for in fol. 70. a. he refers to his original " in Romans," or French; and in the laſt Stanza he tells us expreſsly—treat of a marriage with Katherine, daughter to the Duke of Burgundy. He was likewiſe Embaſſador in the fifth and ſixth years of the ſame reign, with Walter Hungerford, Steward

Thys

Thys ys on of Brytayne layes
That was uſed by olde dayes.

" Of the Britaine layes I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more at large, when I come to the Frankelin's Tale.

" § XVI. The Man of Lawes Tale in the beſt MSS. is followed by the Wife of Bathes Prologue and Tale, and therefore I have placed them ſo here; not, however, merely in compliance with authority, but becauſe, according to the common arrangement in the Merchants Tale, there is a direct reference to the Wife of Bathes Prologue, before it has been ſpoken. Such an impropriety I was glad to remove upon the authority of the beſt MSS. though it had been acquieſced in by all former Editors; eſpecially as the ſame MSS. pointed out to me another (I believe, the true) place for both the Merchant's and the Squier's Tales, which have hitherto been printed immediately after the Man of Lawes. But of that hereafter.

" § XVII. The want of a few lines to introduce the WIFE OF BATHES PROLOGUE, is, perhaps, one of thoſe defects, hinted at above, which Chaucer would have ſupplied if he had lived to finiſh his work. The extraordinary length of it, as well as the vein of pleaſantry that runs through it, is very ſuitable to the character of the ſpeaker. The greateſt part muſt have been of Chaucer's own invention, though one may plainly ſee that he had been reading the popular invectives againſt marriage and women in general; ſuch as, the ROMAN DE LA ROSE; VALERIUS AD RUFINUM de non ducendâ uxore; and particularly HIERONYMUS contra Jovinianum.

" § XVIII. THE WIFE OF BATHES TALE ſeems to have been taken from the Story of Florent in Gower, Conf. Amant. B. i. or perhaps from an older narrative, in the Geſta Romanorum, or ſome ſuch collection, from which the Story of Florent was itſelf borrowed. However that may have been, it muſt be allowed that Chaucer has conſiderably improved the fable by lopping off ſome improbable, as well as unneceſſary, circumſtances; and the transferring of the ſcene from Sicily to the Court of King Arthur muſt have had a very pleaſing effect, before the fabulous majeſty of that court was quite obliterated.

" The old Ballad, entitled " The Marriage of Sir Gawaine," [Ancient Poetry, vol. iii. p. 11.] which the learned Editor thinks may have furniſhed Chaucer with this tale, I ſhould rather conjecture (with deference to ſo good a judge in theſe matters) to have been compoſed by one who had read both Gower and Chaucer.

" § XIX. THE TALES OF THE FRERE and THE SOMPNOUR are well ingrafted upon that of the Wife of Bath. The ill humour which ſhews itſelf between thoſe two characters is quite natural, as no two profeſſions at that time were at more conſtant variance. The Regular Clergy, and particularly the Mendicant Freres, affected a total exemption from all Eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, except that of the Pope, which made them exceedingly obnoxious to the Biſhops, and of courſe to all the inferior officers of the national hierarchy.

" I have not been able to trace either of theſe tales to any author older than Chaucer, and poſſibly they may both have been built upon ſome traditional pleaſantries, which were never before committed to writing.

" § XX. THE CLERKES TALE is in a different ſtrain from the three preceding. He tells us, in his Prologue, that he learned it from Petrarch at Padua; and this (by the way) is all the ground that I can find for the notion that Chaucer had ſeen Petrarch in Italy. It is not eaſy to ſay why Chaucer ſhould chooſe to own an obligation for this tale to Petrarch rather than to Boccace, from whoſe Decameron, D. x. N. 10. it was tranſlated by Petrarch in 1373 (the year before his death), as appears by a remarkable letter, which he ſent with his tranſlation to Boccace [Opp. Petrarch. p. 540—7. Ed. Baſ. 1581.]. It ſhould ſeem too from the ſame letter, that the ſtory was not invented by Boccace, for Petrarch ſays, " that it had always pleaſed him when he heard it many years before," whereas he had not ſeen the Decameron till very lately.

" § XXI. In the Ballade, with which the Clerk concludes his Tale, I have changed the order of the three laſt Stanzas, ſo as to make it end—

And let him care, and wepe, and wringe, and waile— and immediately after I have placed the MARCHANTS PROLOGUE, beginning—

Weping and wailing, care and other ſorwe
I have enough—.

This arrangement, which recommends itſelf at firſt ſight, is alſo ſupported by ſo many MSS. of the beſt authority, that, without great negligence or dulneſs, I could not have either overlooked or rejected it, eſpecially as the whole turn of the Marchants Prologue, and the expreſs mention of Griſilde in ver. 9100. demonſtrate, that he is ſuppoſed to ſpeak with the Clerkes Tale freſh in his memory.

" § XXII. The ſcene of the MARCHANTS TALE is laid in Italy, but none of the names, except Damian and Juſtin, ſeem to be Italian, but rather made at pleaſure; ſo that I doubt whether the ſtory be really of Italian growth. The adventure of the Pear-tree I find in a ſmall collection of Latin fables, written by one Adolphus, in Elegiac verſes of his faſhion, in the year 1315. As this fable has never been printed but once, and in a book not commonly to be met with, I ſhall tranſcribe below the material parts of it, and I dare ſay the Reader will not be very anxious to ſee any more.

" Whatever was the real original of this Tale, the Machinery of the Faeries, which Chaucer has uſed ſo happily, was probably added by himſelf; and, indeed, I cannot help thinking, that his Pluto and Proſerpina were the true progenitors of Oberon and Titania, or rather, that they themſelves have, once at leaſt, deigned to reviſit our poetical ſyſtem under the latter names.

" § XXIII. The PROLOGUE to the Squire's Tale appears now for the firſt time in print. Why it has been omitted by all former Editors I cannot gueſs, except, perhaps, becauſe it did not ſuit with the place, which (for reaſons beſt known to themſelves) they were determined to aſſign to the Squire's Tale, that is, after the Man of Lawes and before the Merchants. I have choſen rather to follow the MSS. of the beſt authority in placing the Squire's Tale after the Merchant's, and in connecting them together by this Prologue, agreeably, as I am perſuaded, to Chaucer's intention. The lines which have uſually been printed by way of Prologue to the Squire's Tale, as I believe them to have been really compoſed by Chaucer, though not intended for the Squire's Prologue, I have prefixed to the Shipman's Tale, for reaſons, which I ſhall give when I come to ſpeak of that Tale.

" § XXIV. I ſhould have been very happy if the MSS. which have furniſhed the SQUIRES Prologue, had ſupplied the deficient part of his TALE, but I fear the judgement of Milton was too true, that this ſtory was " left half-told" by the author. I have never been able to diſcover the probable original of this tale, and yet I ſhould be very hardly brought to believe that the whole, or even any conſiderable part of it, was of Chaucer's invention.

" § XXV. We are now arrived with the common Editions (though by a different courſe) at the FRANKELEINES TALE; and here again we muſt be obliged to the MSS. not indeed, as in the laſt inſtance, for a new Prologue, but for authorizing us to prefix to this Tale of the Frankelein a Prologue, which in the common Editions is prefixed to the Tale of the Merchant, together with the true Prologue of that Tale, as printed above. It is ſcarce conceivable how theſe two Prologues could ever be joined together and given to the ſame character, as they are not only entirely unconnected, but alſo in one point directly contradictory to each other; for in that, which is properly the Marchant's,

Steward of the Houſhold, in the ſame affair; and again, in the ſixth year of the ſame reign, he was Embaſſador for peace with France; and he paſſed through ſeveral other publick

Marchant's, he ſays expreſsly [ver. 9110.] that he had been married "two months and not more;" whereas in the other, the Speaker's chief diſcourſe is about his ſon, who is grown up. THIS therefore, upon the authority of the beſt MSS. I have reſtored to the Frankelein; and I muſt obſerve, that the ſentiments of it are much more ſuitable to his character than to that of the Marchant. It is quite natural, that a wealthy land-holder, of a generous diſpoſition, as he is deſcribed [ver. 332—62.] who has been Sheriff, Knight of the Shire, &c. ſhould be anxious to ſee his ſon (as we ſay) a Gentleman, and that he ſhould talk ſlightingly of money in compariſon with poliſhed manners and virtuous endowments; but neither the character which Chaucer has drawn of his Marchant, nor our general notions of the profeſſion at that time, prepare us to expect from him ſo liberal a ſtrain of thinking.

"§ XXVI. THE FRANKELEINS TALE, as he tells us himſelf, is taken from a Britiſh Lay; and the name of perſons and places, as well as the ſcene and circumſtances of the ſtory, make this account extremely probable. The Lay itſelf is either loſt, or buried (perhaps for ever) in one of thoſe ſepulchres of MSS. which, by courteſy, are called Libraries; but there are two imitations of it extant by Boccace, the firſt in the Vth Book of his Philocopo, and the ſecond in the Decameron, D. x. N. 5. They agree in every reſpect with each other, except that the ſcene and the names are different, and in the latter the narration is leſs prolix and the ſtyle leſs flowery than in the former, which was a juvenile work. The only material point, in which Boccace ſeems to have departed from his original, is this: inſtead of "the removal of the rockes" the Lady deſires "a garden, full of the flowers and fruits of May, in the month of January;" and ſome ſuch alteration was certainly neceſſary, when the ſcene came to be removed from Bretagne to Spain and Italy, as it is in Boccace's novels. I ſhould gueſs that Chaucer has preſerved pretty faithfully the principal incidents of the Britiſh Tale, though he has probably thrown in ſome ſmaller circumſtances to embelliſh his narration. The long liſt of virtuous women in Dorigene's Soliloquy is plainly copied from HIERONYMUS contra Jovinianum.

"§ XXVII. Thus far I flatter myſelf I have been not unſucceſsful in reſtoring the true order, and connexion with each other, of the Clerkes, the Marchantes, the Squieres and Frankeleines Tales, but with regard to the next ſtep, which I have taken, I muſt own myſelf more dubious. In all the editions the Tales of the Nonne and the Chanones Yeman precede the Doctoures, but the beſt MSS. agree in removing thoſe Tales to the end of the Nonnes Preeſtes, and I have not ſcrupled to adopt this arrangement, which, I think, is indiſputably eſtabliſhed by the following conſideration. When the Monk is called upon for his Tale the Pilgrims were near Rocheſter [ver. 13932.] but when the Chanon overtakes them they were advanced to Boughton under Blee [ver. 16024.] twenty miles beyond Rocheſter, ſo that the Tale of the Chanones Yeman, and that of the Nonne to which it is annexed, cannot with any propriety be admitted till after the Monkes Tale, and conſequently not till after the Nonnes Preeſtes, which is inſeparably linked to that of the Monk.

"§ XXVIII. Theſe two Tales therefore of the Nonne and the Chanones Yeman being removed out of the way, the Doctoures comes clearly next to the Frankeleines; but how they are to be connected together, and whether at all, is a matter of doubt. What I have printed by way of Prologue to the Doctoures Tale I found in one of the beſt MSS. but only in one: in the others it has no Prologue. The firſt line applies ſo naturally and ſmartly to the Frankeleines concluſion, that I am ſtrongly inclined to believe it from the hand of Chaucer, but I cannot ſay ſo much for the five following. I would therefore only wiſh theſe lines to be received for the preſent (according to the Law-phraſe) de bene eſſe, till they ſhall either be more authentically eſtabliſhed, or ſuperſeded by the diſcovery of the genuine Prologue.

"§ XXIX. In THE DOCTOURES TALE, beſide Livy (who is quoted), Chaucer may poſſibly have followed Gower in ſome particulars, who has alſo related the Story of Virginia, Conf. Amant. B. vii. but he has not been a ſervile copyiſt of either of them.

"§ XXX. The Pardoneres Tale has a Prologue which connects it with the Doctoures. There is alſo a pretty long preamble, which may either make part of the Prologue, or of the Tale. The MSS. differ in this point. I have choſen to throw it into the Tale, and to confine the Prologue to what I ſuppoſe to be its proper uſe, the introduction of the new Speaker. When he is once in complete poſſeſſion of his office of entertaining the company, his Prefaces or Digreſſions ſhould all, I think, be equally conſidered as parts of his Tale.

"The mere outline of THE PARDONERS TALE is to be found in the Cento Novelle Antiche. Nov. lxxxii.

"§ XXXI. The Tale of the Shipman in the beſt MSS. has no Prologue. What has been printed as ſuch in the common Editions is evidently ſpurious. To ſupply this defect I have ventured, upon the authority of one MS. (and, I confeſs, not one of the beſt) to prefix to this Tale the Prologue, which has uſually been prefixed to the Tale of the Squier. As this Prologue was undoubtedly compoſed by Chaucer, it muſt have had a place ſomewhere in this Edition, and if I cannot prove that it was really intended by him for this place, I think the Reader will allow that it fills the vacancy extremely well. The Pardoners Tale may very properly be called "a thrifty Tale," and he himſelf "a lerned man" [ver. 12905—8.] and all the latter part, though highly improper in the mouth of the "curteis Squier," is perfectly ſuited to the character of the Shipman.

"This tale is generally ſuppoſed to be taken from the Decameron. D. viii. N. 1. but I ſhould rather believe that Chaucer was obliged to ſome old French Fableour, from whom Boccace had alſo borrowed the ground-work of his Novel, as in the caſe of the Reves Tale. Upon either ſuppoſition, a great part of the incidents muſt probably have been of his own invention.

"§ XXXII. The tranſition from the Tale of the Shipman to that of the Prioreſſe is happily managed. I have not been able to diſcover from what Legende of the Miracles of our Lady THE PRIORESSES TALE is taken. From the ſcene being laid in Aſia, it ſhould ſeem, that this was one of the oldeſt of the many ſtories, which have been propagated, at different times, to excite or juſtify ſeveral mercileſs perſecutions of the Jews, upon the charge of murthering Chriſtian children. The ſtory of Hugh of Lincoln, which is mentioned in the laſt Stanza, is placed by Matthew Paris under the year 1255.

"§ XXXIII. Next to the Prioreſſe CHAUCER himſelf is called upon for his Tale. In the Prologue he has dropped a few touches deſcriptive of his own perſon and manner, by which we learn, that he was uſed to look much upon the ground; was of a corpulent habit; and reſerved in his behaviour. His RIME OF SIRE THOPAS was clearly intended to ridicule the "palpable-groſs" fictions of the common Rimers of that age, and ſtill more, perhaps, the meanneſs of their language and verſification. It is full of phraſes taken from Iſumbras, Li beaus deſconus, and other Romances in the ſame ſtyle, which are ſtill extant. A few of his imitations of them will be pointed out in the Notes.

"§ XXXIV. For the more complete reprobation of this ſpecies of Riming, even the Hoſt, who is not to be ſuſpected of too refined a taſte, is made to cry out againſt it, and to cut ſhort Sire Thopas in the midſt of his adventures. CHAUCER has nothing to ſay for his Rime, but that "it is the beſte he can" [ver. 13856.] and readily conſents to tell another Tale; but having juſt laughed ſo freely at the bad poetry of his time, he might think it, perhaps, too invidious to exhibit a ſpecimen of better in his own perſon, publick ſtations, as appears by records (i). He reſided chiefly at Ewelm, in Oxfordſhire, which came to him by marriage, and there he died on the twenty-eighth of April, and therefore his other Tale is in proſe, a mere tranſlation from "Le Livre de Melibee & de dame Prudence," of which ſeveral copies are ſtill preſerved in MS. It is in truth, as he calls it, [ver. 13868.] "a moral tale vertuous," and was probably much eſteemed in its time, but, in this age of levity, I doubt ſome Readers will be apt to regret, that he did not rather give us the remainder of Sire Thopas.

(i) Stowe's Annals, p. 388.

"§ XXXV. THE PROLOGUE of THE MONKES Tale connects it with Melibee. The Tale itſelf is certainly formed upon the plan of Boccace's great work de caſibus virorum illuſtrium, but Chaucer has taken the ſeveral Stories, of which it is compoſed, from different authors, who will be particularized in the Notes.

"§ XXXVI. After a reaſonable number of melancholy ditties, or Tragedies, as the Monk calls them, he is interrupted by the Knight, and the Hoſt addreſſes himſelf to the Nonnes Preeſt, to tell them "ſwiche thing as may their hertes glade."

"THE TALE OF THE NONNES PREEST is cited by Dryden, together with that of the Wife of Bath, as of Chaucer's own invention. But that great Poet was not very converſant with the authors of which Chaucer's library ſeems to have been compoſed. The Wife of Bathes Tale has been ſhewn above to be taken from Gower, and the Fable of the Cock and the Fox, which makes the ground of the Nonnes Preeſtes Tale, is clearly borrowed from a collection of Æſopean and other Fables, by Marie, a French Poeteſs, whoſe collection of Lais has been mentioned before in n. 24. As her Fable is ſhort and well told, and has never been printed, I ſhall inſert it here at length, and the more willingly, becauſe it furniſhes a convincing proof, how able Chaucer was to work up an excellent Tale out of very ſmall materials.

"§ XXXVII. The ſixteen lines, which are printed at the end of the Nonnes Preeſtes Tale, might perhaps more properly be conſidered as the beginning of the Prologue to the ſucceeding Tale, if it were certain what Tale was intended to ſucceed. In both Dr. Aſkew's MSS. the laſt of theſe lines is read thus,— and there are ſix more lines to introduce her Tale; but, as theſe ſix lines are manifeſtly forged for the purpoſe, I have choſen rather to adhere to the other MSS. which acknowledge themſelves defective in this part, and give us the Nonnes Tale, as I have done, without any introduction. It is very probable, I think, that Chaucer himſelf had not determined, whether he ſhould connect the Nonnes Tale with that of the Nonnes Preeſt, or whether he ſhould interpoſe a Tale or two, or perhaps more, between them.

Seide unto the Nunne as ye ſhul heer.—

"THE TALE OF THE NONNE is almoſt literally tranſlated from the life of St. Cecilia in the Legenda aurea of Jacobus Januenſis. It is mentiond by Chaucer, as a ſeparate work, in his Legende of good women [ver. 426.] under the title of "the life of Seint Cecile," and it ſtill retains evident marks that it was not originally compoſed in the form of a Tale to be ſpoken by the Nonne. However, there can be no doubt that Chaucer meant to incorporate it into this collection of Canterbury Tales, as the Prologue of the Chanones Yeman expreſsly refers to it.

"§ XXXVIII. The introduction of the Chanones Yeman to tell a Tale, at a time when ſo many of the original characters remain to be called upon, appears a little extraordinary. It ſhould ſeem, that ſome ſudden reſentment had determined Chaucer to interrupt the regular courſe of his work, in order to inſert a Satire againſt the Alchemiſts. That their pretended ſcience was much cultivated about this time, and produced its uſual evils, may fairly be inferred from the Act, which was paſſed ſoon after, 5 H. IV. c. iv. to make it Felonie to multiplie gold or ſilver, or to uſe the art of multiplication.

"§ XXXIX. In the PROLOGUE TO THE MANCIPLES TALE, the Pilgrims are ſuppoſed to be arrived at a little town called "Bob up and down, Under the blee, in Canterbury way." I cannot find a town of that name in any Map, but it muſt have lain between Boughton (the place laſt mentioned) and Canterbury. The Fable of the Crow, which is the ſubject of THE MANCIPLES TALE, has been related by ſo many authors, from Ovid down to Gower, that it is impoſſible to ſay whom Chaucer principally followed. His ſkill in new dreſſing an old ſtory was never, perhaps, more ſucceſsfully exerted.

"§ XL. After the Tale of the Manciple the common Editions, ſince 1542, place what is called the Plowmans Tale; but, as I cannot underſtand that there is the leaſt ground of evidence, either external or internal, for believing it to be a work of Chaucer's, I have not admitted it into this Edition.

"§ XLI. THE PERSONES PROLOGUE therefore is here placed next to the Manciples Tale, agreeably to all the MSS. which are known, and to every Edition before 1542. In this Prologue, which introduces the laſt Tale upon the journey to Canterbury, Chaucer has again pointed out to us the time of the day; but the hour by the clock is very differently repreſented in the MSS. In ſome it is ten, in others two: in moſt of the beſt MSS. foure, and in one five. According to the phænomena here mentioned, the Sun being 29° high, and the length of the Shadow to the projecting body as 11 to 6, it was between four and five. As by this reckoning there were at leaſt three hours left to ſunſet, one does not well ſee with what propriety the Hoſt admoniſhes the Perſon to haſte him, becauſe "the Sonne wol adoun," and to be "fructuous in litel ſpace;" and indeed the Perſon (knowing probably how much time he had good) ſeems to have paid not the leaſt regard to his admonition; for his Tale (if it may be ſo called) is twice as long as any of the others. It is entitled in ſome MSS. "Tractatus de Pœnitentia, pro Fabulâ, ut dicitur, Rectoris," and I much ſuſpect that it is a tranſlation of ſome ſuch treatiſe. I cannot recommend it as a very entertaining or edifying performance at this day; but the Reader will be pleaſed to remember, in excuſe both of Chaucer and his Editor, that, conſidering the Canterbury Tales as a great picture of life and manners, the piece would not have been complete, if it had not included the Religion of that time.

"§ XLII. What is commonly called the Retractation at the end of the Perſon's Tale, in ſeveral MSS. makes part of that Tale; and certainly the appellation of "litel tretiſe" ſuits better with a ſingle tale, than with ſuch a voluminous work as the whole body of Canterbury Tales. But then on the other hand the recital, which is made in one part of it of ſeveral compoſitions of Chaucer, could properly be made by nobody but himſelf. I have printed it, as I found it in MS. Aſk. i. with a few corrections from other MSS. and in the Notes I ſhall give the beſt account that I can of it.

"Having thus gone through the ſeveral parts of the Canterbury Tales, which are printed in this Edition, it may not be improper, in the concluſion of this Diſcourſe, to ſtate ſhortly the parts which are wanting to complete the journey to Canterbury: Of the reſt of Chaucer's intended Plan (as has been ſaid before) we have nothing. Suppoſing therefore the number of the Pilgrims to have been twenty-nine [ſee before, § VI.] and allowing the Tale of the Chanones Yeman to ſtand in the place of that which we had a right to expect from the Knightes Yeman, the Tales wanting will be only thoſe of the five City-Mechanics and the Ploughman. It is not likely that the Tales told by ſuch characters would have been among the moſt valuable of the ſet, but they might, and probably would, have ſerved to link together thoſe which at preſent are unconnected; and for that reaſon it is much to be regretted, that they either have been loſt, or (as I rather believe) were never finiſhed by the Author (110)."

(110) Tyrwhytt, ubi ſupra, p. 115—188.

Mr. Tyrwhytt, at the end of the third, and through a conſiderable part of the fourth volume, hath added a variety of learned notes, explaining the difficult paſſages in the Canterbury Tales. At the beginning of April, 1434, and was buried in that pariſh church, under a black marble tomb (k). By his wife Maud, or Matilda, who ſurvived him two years, he had one daughter named Alice, of the fifth volume, he hath prefixed an account of the works of Chaucer, to which the Gloſſary is adapted; and of thoſe other pieces which have been improperly mixed with his in the editions. The genuine writings of our Poet, excluſively of the Canterbury Tales, his greateſt production, are thus arranged by Mr. Tyrwhytt. 1. "The Romaunt of the Roſe." 2. "Troilus and Creſeide." 3. "The Court of Love." 4. "The Complaint of Pitee." 5. "Of Quene Annélida and falſe Arcite, with the Complaint of Annelida." 6. "The Aſſemblee of Foules." 7. "The Complaint of the black Knight." 8. "Chaucer's A. B. C." 9. "The Booke of the Ducheſſe." 10. "The Houſe of Fame." 11. "Chaucer's Dreme." 12. "The Flour and the Lefe." 13. "The Legende of goode Women." 14. "The Complaint of Mars and Venus." 15. "The Cuckow and the Nightingale." Beſide theſe more conſiderable works, it appears that our author had compoſed many "Balades, Roundels, Virelayes;" and that he had "made many a Lay and many a Thing." A few pieces of this ſort are ſtill extant, but Mr. Tyrwhytt thinks that ſcarcely any of them are of ſo early a date as the Legende. He hath ſet them down in the order in which they ſtand in the editions, and they are nine in number. Chaucer's works in proſe, are, his "Tranſlation of Boethius de Conſolatione Philoſophiæ;" his "Treatiſe on the Aſtrolabe;" and his "Teſtament of Love." The foregoing, Mr. Tyrwhytt conſiders as the genuine writings of Chaucer. Of thoſe, which have been improperly mixed with his in the editions, the following are known to be the productions of other authors. 1. "The Teſtament and Complaint of Creſeide." 2. "The Floure of Courteſie." 3. "La belle Dame ſang Mercie." 4. "The Letter of Cupide," written by Thomas Occleve. 5. "John Gower unto the noble King Henry the 4th." 6. "Sayings of Dan John" (Lydgate). 7. "Scogan unto the Lordes and Gentlemen of the Kinges Houſe." 8. "A Balade of goode Counſeil, tranſlated out of Latin Verſes into Engliſh, by Dan John Lydgate." 9. "A Balade made in the Preiſe, or rather Diſpreiſe, of Women for their Doubleneſs;" by Lydgate, according to M. S. Aſhmol. 6943. 10. "A Balade warning Men to beware of deceitful Women;" by Lydgate, according to M. S. Herl. 2251. To theſe, which are known to be the works of other writers, ſhould perhaps be added an 11th, viz. "Balade in Commendation of our Ladie." The anonymous compoſitions, which from time to time have been added to Chaucer's, in the ſeveral editions, ſeem to have been received, for the moſt part, without any external evidence whatever, and in direct contradiction to the ſtrongeſt internal evidence. Of this ſort are "The Plowman's Tale," "The Story of Gamelyn," "The Continuation of the Canterbury Tales," and "Jack Upland." Mr. Tyrwhytt ſuſpects, that the "Lamentation of Marie Magdalene" was not written by Chaucer; but he is ſtill clearer that the "Aſſemblee of Ladies," "A Praiſe of Women," and the "Remedie of Love," ought not to be imputed to him. The ſame ſagacious editor is of opinion, that it would be a waſte of time to ſift accurately the heap of rubbiſh, which was added, by John Stowe, to the edition of 1561: for though we might perhaps be able to pick out two or three genuine fragments of Chaucer, we ſhould probably find them ſo foiled and mangled, that he would not thank us for aſſerting his claim to them (111).

(k) Life of Chaucer.

(111) Tyrwhytt, ubi ſupra, vol. v. p. vii—xxiii.

After having made ſo copious and liberal an uſe of Mr. Tyrwhytt's edition of the Canterbury Tales, we ſhould be deficient in gratitude to this excellent writer, if we did not expreſs a high ſenſe of obligation to him, for one of the moſt learned and inſtructive publications which the age hath produced. Our own teſtimony, indeed, can be of little conſequence in a matter with regard to which there are various particulars that we are not able to ſpeak of with ſufficient accuracy and deciſion. We ſhall, therefore, alledge the evidence of an author who ſeems to be a perfect maſter of the ſubject; and who, if we may judge from his aſperity to other eminent men, is not of a diſpoſition that is apt to praiſe. We mean the acute but unreaſonably ſevere writer of the late Obſervations on Mr. Warton's Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry; who ſays, that, (excepting only that mine of literary treaſure, Dr. Hickes's Theſaurus, which never had, nor ever will have, its equal) Mr. Tyrwhytt's publication of Chaucer is the moſt erudite, curious, and valuable performance that has yet appeared in this country (112).

(112) Obſervations on the three firſt volumes of the Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, p. 48.

We come next to Mr. Thomas Warton, who, at the latter end of the firſt volume of his Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, hath entered largely into the merits of Chaucer. It will not be expected, that we ſhould minutely follow Mr. Warton through his long and ingenious detail; but we ſhall lay before our readers his general view of our great Poet's character.

"The moſt illuſtrious ornament of the reign of Edward the Third, and of his ſucceſſor Richard the Second, was Jeffrey Chaucer; a poet with whom the hiſtory of our poetry is by many ſuppoſed to have commenced; and who has been pronounced, by a critic of unqueſtionable taſte and diſcernment, to be the firſt Engliſh verſifier who wrote poetically. He was born in the year 1328, and educated at Oxford, where he made a rapid progreſs in the ſcholaſtic ſciences as they were then taught: but the liveline's of his parts, and the native gaiety of his diſpoſition, ſoon recommended him to the patronage of a magnificent monarch, and rendered him a very popular and acceptable character in the brilliant court which I have above deſcribed. In the mean time, he added to his accompliſhments by frequent tours into France and Italy, which he ſometimes viſited under the advantages of a public character. Hitherto our poets had been perſons of a private and circumſcribed education, and the art of verſifying, like every other kind of compoſition, had been confined to recluſe ſcholars. But Chaucer was a man of the world: and from this circumſtance we are to account, in a great meaſure, for the many new embelliſhments which he conferred on our language and our poetry. The deſcriptions of ſplendid proceſſions and gallant carouſals, with which his works abound, are a proof that he was converſant with the practices and diverſions of polite life. Familiarity with a variety of things and objects, opportunities of acquiring the faſhionable and courtly modes of ſpeech, connections with the great at home, and a perſonal acquaintance with the vernacular poets of foreign countries, opened his mind and furniſhed him with new lights. In Italy he was introduced to Petrarch, at the wedding of Violante, daughter of Galleazzo duke of Milan, with the duke of Clarence: and it is not improbable that Boccacio was of the party. Although Chaucer had undoubtedly ſtudied the works of theſe celebrated writers, and particularly of Dante, before this fortunate interview; yet it ſeems likely, that theſe excurſions gave him a new reliſh for their compoſitions, and enlarged his knowledge of the Italian fables. His travels likewiſe enabled him to cultivate the Italian and Provencial languages with the greateſt ſucceſs; and induced him to poliſh the aſperity, and enrich the ſterility of his native verſification, with ſofter cadences, and a more copious and variegated phraſeology. In this attempt, which was authoriſed by the recent and popular examples of Petrarch in Italy, and Alain Chartier in France *, he was countenanced and aſſiſted by his friend John Gower, the early guide and encourager of his ſtudies. The revival of learning in moſt countries appears to have firſt owed its riſe to tranſlation. At rude periods the modes of original thinking are unknown, and the arts of original compoſition have not yet been ſtudied. The writers therefore of ſuch periods are chiefly and very uſefully employed in importing the ideas of other languages into their own. They do not venture to think for themſelves, nor aim at the merit of inventors, but they are laying the foundations of literature: and while they are naturaliſing the knowledge of more learned ages and countries by tranſlation, they

* With regard to Alain Chartier, this has already been ſhewn to be a miſtake.

Alice, who was thrice married, firſt to Sir John Philips, Knt. and afterwards to Thomas Montacute, Earl of Saliſbury, who dying, left her very rich. Her third huſband was they are imperceptibly improving the national language. This has been remarkably the caſe, not only in England, but in France and Italy. In the year 1387, John Treviſa canon of Weſtbury in Wiltſhire, and a great traveller, not only finiſhed a tranſlation of the Old and New Teſtaments, at the command of his munificent patron Thomas lord Berkley, but alſo tranſlated Higden's POLYCHRONICON, and other Latin pieces. But theſe tranſlations would have been alone inſufficient to have produced or ſuſtained any conſiderable revolution in our language: the great work was reſerved for Gower and Chaucer. Wickliffe had alſo tranſlated the bible: and in other reſpects his attempts to bring about a reformation in religion at this time proved beneficial to Engliſh literature. The orthodox divines of this period generally wrote in Latin: but Wickliffe, that his arguments might be familiariſed to common readers and the bulk of the people, was obliged to compoſe in Engliſh his numerous theological treatiſes againſt the papal corruptions. Edward the Third, while he perhaps intended only to baniſh a badge of conqueſt, greatly contributed to eſtabliſh the national dialect, by aboliſhing the uſe of the Norman tongue in the public acts and judicial proceedings, as we have before obſerved, and by ſubſtituting the natural language of the country. But Chaucer manifeſtly firſt taught his countrymen to write Engliſh; and formed a ſtyle by naturaliſing words from the Provencial, at that time the moſt poliſhed dialect of any in Europe, and the beſt adapted to the purpoſes of poetical expreſſion.

" It is certain that Chaucer abounds in claſſical alluſions: but his poetry is not formed on the antient models. He appears to have been an univerſal reader, and his learning is ſometimes miſtaken for genius: but his chief ſources were the French and Italian poets (113)."

(113) Hiſt. of Engliſh Poetry, vol. i. p. 341—344.

Mr. Warton goes on to conſider, through ſeveral ſections, the various poems of Chaucer; and with regard to thoſe which had a foreign original, he ſhews how far the productions which gave riſe to them have been copied, altered, and improved. The compariſon turns out, in many reſpects, to the advantage of the Engliſh Poet. In the Knight's Tale, for inſtance, Boccace's " Le Teſeide" has received many new beauties, in paſſing through Chaucer's hands. Thoſe capital fictions and deſcriptions, the Temples of Mars, Venus, and Diana, with their allegorical paintings, and the figures of Lycurgus and Emetrius with their retinue, are ſo much heightened by the bold and ſpirited manner of the Britiſh Bard, as to ſtrike us with an air of originality. It is, likewiſe, to be remarked, that as Chaucer, in ſome places, has thrown in ſtrokes of his own, ſo in others he has contracted the tedious and unintereſting prolixity of narrative, which he found in the Italian Poet. And that he might avoid a ſervile imitation, and indulge himſelf, as he pleaſed, in an arbitrary departure from the original, it appears that he neglected the embarraſſment of Boccacio's ſtanza, and preferred the Engliſh Heroic Couplet, of which this poem affords the firſt conſpicuous example extant in our language (114.) Mr. Warton adds, that we are ſurpriſed to find, in a poet of ſuch antiquity, numbers ſo nervous and flowing; a circumſtance which greatly contributed to render Dryden's paraphraſe of the Knight's Tale the moſt animated and harmonious piece of verſification in the Engliſh language (115). In ſpeaking of the Troilus and Creſeide, our poetical hiſtorian obſerves, that pathetic deſcription is one of Chaucer's peculiar excellencies (116). With reſpect to " The Houſe of Fame," which contains great ſtrokes of Gothic imagination, bordering often on the moſt ideal and capricious extravagance (117), Mr. Warton has made the following remarks on Mr. Pope's imitation of that production of our ancient bard. " Pope has imitated this piece, with his uſual " elegance of diction, and harmony of verſification. " But in the mean time, he has not only miſrepre- " ſented the ſtory, but marred the character of the " poem. He has endeavoured to correct its extra- " vagancies, by new refinements and additions of " another caſt: but he did not conſider, that extra- " vagancies are eſſential to a poem of ſuch a ſtruc- " ture, and even conſtitute its beauties. An at- " tempt to unite order and exactneſs of imagery, " with a ſubject formed on principles ſo profeſſedly " romantic and anomalous, is like giving Corin- " thian pillars to a Gothic palace. When I read " Pope's elegant imitation of this piece, I think I " am walking among the modern monuments un- " ſuitably placed in Weſtminſter-Abbey (118)."

(114) Ibid. p. 357.

(115) Ibid. p. 367.

(116) Ibid. p. 387.

(117) Ibid. p. 389, 390.

(118) Ibid. p. 396.

In the Canterbury Tales, that of the Squier is conſidered, by Mr. Warton, as Chaucer's capital poem, and he hath admirably explained the origin of the fictions with which it abounds. With the like ingenuity and learning he illuſtrates the other characters, and the ſtories related by them (119). Concerning the licentious paſſages that are to be met with in Chaucer's works, Mr. Warton obſerves, that they are in a great meaſure to be imputed to the age in which they were written. " We are apt," ſays he, " to form romantic and exaggerated notions " about the moral innocence of our anceſtors. Ages " of ignorance and ſimplicity are thought to be ages " of purity. The direct contrary, I believe, is the " caſe. Rude periods have that groſſneſs of manners which is not leſs friendly to virtue than luxury itſelf. In the middle ages, not only the moſt " flagrant violations of modeſty were frequently " practiſed and permitted, but the moſt infamous " vices. Men are leſs aſhamed as they are leſs po- " liſhed. Great refinement multiplies criminal plea- " ſures, but at the ſame time prevents the actual " commiſſion of many enormities: at leaſt it pre- " ſerves public decency, and ſuppreſſes public licen- " tiouſneſs (120)." In delineating Chaucer's talent for humour, Mr. Warton agrees with Biſhop Hurd, who, in his excellent letters on Chivalry, ſuppoſes that the " Rime of Sir Thopas" was intended to expoſe the leading abſurdities of the old romances. That this was the Poet's aim, appears from many paſſages; and, therefore, the tale may juſtly be called a prelude to Don Quixote. " But it is to be remem- " bered, adds Mr. Warton, that Chaucer's deſign " was intended to ridicule the frivolous deſcriptions, " and other tedious impertinencies, ſo common in " the volumes of chivalry with which his age was " overwhelmed, not to degrade in general, or ex- " poſe a mode of fabling, whoſe ſublime extrava- " gances conſtitute the marvellous graces of his own " CAMBUSCAN; a compoſition which at the ſame " time abundantly demonſtrates, that the manners " of romance are better calculated to anſwer the " purpoſes of pure poetry, to captivate the imagi- " nation, and to produce ſurprize, than the fictions " of claſſical antiquity (121)." Chaucer's vein of humour, although conſpicuous in the Canterbury Tales, is chiefly viſible in the characters with which they are introduced. His excellence, in this reſpect, is ſtrongly diſplayed by Mr. Warton, who juſtly remarks, that we are ſurprized to find, in ſo groſs and ignorant an age, ſuch talents for ſatire, and for obſervation on life; qualities which uſually exert themſelves at more civilized periods. " Theſe curious " and valuable remains are ſpecimens of Chaucer's " native genius, unaſſiſted and unalloyed. The fi- " gures are all Britiſh, and bear no ſuſpicious ſigna- " tures of claſſical, Italian, or French imitation. " The characters of Theophraſtus are not ſo lively, " particular, and appropriated (122)."

(119) Warton, ubi ſupra, vol. ii. p. 397—456.

(120) Ibid. p. 431, 432.

(121) Ibid. p. 433, 434.

(122) Ibid. p. 435.

From the whole of Mr. Warton's ſurvey of the poems of Chaucer, theſe concluſions are deduced concerning him: that in elevation and elegance, in harmony and perſpicuity of verſification, he ſurpaſſes his predeceſſors in an infinite proportion: that his genius was univerſal, and adapted to themes of unbounded variety: that his merit was not leſs in painting familiar manners with humour and propriety, than in moving the paſſions, and in repreſenting the

was the famous William de la Pole, Earl, and afterwards Duke of Suffolk, who was firſt ſecretly married to the Counteſs of Hainault, by whom he had one daughter; but procuring a divorce from her, he married this Alice, by whom he had one ſon, John Duke of Suffolk (l). Duke William lived chiefly at Dunnington and Ewelm, at the firſt of which Stowe ſays he built an Hoſpital; but he ſeems to miſtake it for that founded by Adderbury, as before-mentioned, for Dugdale takes no notice of any other; but at Ewelm he founded one, called God's Houſe. He was an inſtance of the danger of a Prince's favour, and the envy that attends it; for, influencing the notions and the will of his Maſter Henry VI. too much, and abuſing the power he had over that eaſy Prince, he enraged the Commons to that degree, that nothing leſs than his baniſhment could appeaſe them; which, being agreed to, the Yorkiſts, fearful of his return, ſeized him on his paſſage in Dover-Road, and cut off his head upon the ſide of a cock-boat, and his body was buried at the Charter-Houſe at Hull (m). The Ducheſs ſurvived him ſeveral years; and, after an honourable life, died at Ewelm, in the year 1475. Their ſon John had iſſue, according to Leland (n), John Earl of Lincoln, Edmund, afterwards Duke of Suffolk; Richard, William, and a fifth ſon, who was a ſcholar in Gonvil-Hall, in Cambridge. Edmund de la Pole, the laſt of that name Duke of Suffolk, for being in treaſon againſt Henry VII. for which he had been once pardoned, forfeited his life to the Crown, and was beheaded in the ſeventh year of that King's reign, whereby the eſtates which Chaucer's family was poſſeſſed of came to the Crown, and particularly the Hoſpital of Ewelm, which was, by King James I. beſtowed on the Phyſick Profeſſor at Oxford, who is always Maſter thereof in virtue of his office (o). C.

(l) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 187.

(m) See his laſt Teſtament, Stafford, and Kemp, p. 189. b.

(n) As cited by Dugdale in his Baronage, vol. ii. p. 188.

(o) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Urry's edition.

beautiful or the grand objects of nature with grace and ſublimity. In a word, he appeared with all the luſtre and dignity of a true Poet, in an age which compelled him to ſtruggle with a barbarous language, and a national want of taſte; and when to write verſes at all, was regarded as a ſingular qualification (123). As it is true that he lived at a time when the French and Italians had made conſiderable advancements and improvements in poetry, Mr. Warton hath cloſed his account of him with a diſtinct and comprehenſive view of the nature of the poetry which ſubſiſted in France and Italy when he wrote; in order to point out how far, and in what manner, it influenced his genius and writings (124). It hath been imagined, that Chaucer imitated the provençal Poets. But Mr. Tyrwhytt, who is entirely of a different opinion, ſays, that he has not obſerved, in any of our Poet's works, a ſingle phraſe or word, which has the leaſt appearance of having been fetched by him from the ſouth of the Loire (125). Mr. Warton, who had ſuppoſed that "The Houſe of Fame" might originally be a provencial compoſition, hath ſince more particularly explained his ſentiments on this head. He doth not affirm, that Chaucer imitated the provencial Bards, although it is by no means improbable, that he might have known their tales. But as the peculiar nature of the provencial poetry entered deeply into the ſubſtance, caſt, and character of thoſe French and Italian models which he is allowed to have followed, he may be ſaid to have copied, although not immediately, the matter and manner of the Troubadours. Mr. Warton has, indeed, called his "Houſe of Fame" originally a provencial compoſition. He did not, however, mean that it was written by a provencial Troubadour; but that Chaucer's original was compounded of the capricious mode of fabling, and that extravagant ſtyle of fiction, which conſtitute the eſſence of the provencial poetry (126).

(123) Ibid. p. 457.

(124) Ibid. p. 357—468.

(125) Tyrwhytt's edit. of the Canterbury Tales, vol. i. Appendix to the Preface, p. xxxv.

(126) Warton, ubi ſupra, vol. i. p. 389. 458. Emendations and additions, prefixed to the ſecond volume.

It is aſſerted in the text, and it hath often been aſſerted by other writers, that Chaucer is the Father of our Engliſh Poets. This is not ſtrictly true, as appears from what hath been cited above from Mr. Tyrwhytt, and ſtill more particularly from the firſt volume of Mr. Warton's work, to which we have ſo frequently referred. But none can be mentioned, who lived before Chaucer's age, that were ſo truly poetical; neither for a long time were there any that came after him, who could pretend to compare with him in excelſence and fame. I conſider him, ſays Mr. Warton, "as a genial day in an Engliſh ſpring. "A brilliant ſun enlivens the face of nature with an "unuſual luſtre: the ſudden appearance of cloudleſs "ſkies, and the unexpected warmth of a tepid at"moſphere, after the gloom and the inclemencies "of a tedious winter, fill our hearts with the vi"ſionary proſpect of a ſpeedy ſummer; and we "fondly anticipate a long continuance of gentle "gales and vernal ſerenity. But winter returns "with redoubled horrors: the clouds condenſe more "formidably than before; and thoſe tender buds, "and early bloſſoms, which were called forth by "the tranſient gleam of a temporary ſun-ſhine, are "nipped by froſts, and torn by tempeſts (127)."

(127) Hiſt. of Engliſh Poetry, vol. ii. p. 51.

This note hath been protracted to ſuch an uncommon length, that we ſhall only pay a ſlight attention to a few other circumſtances which have occurred to us in the courſe of our reading. Dr. Joſeph Warton, in the ſecond volume of his admirable Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, hath added his teſtimony, that Chaucer excels as much in the pathetic and the ſublime, as he does in his manner of treating light and ridiculous ſubjects. His comic vein was only like one of mercury, imperceptibly mingled with a mine of gold (128). Sir John Hawkins hath made conſiderable uſe of Chaucer's works, in order to aſcertain the ſtate of Muſic in that period; and Dr. Burney hath produced a number of paſſages from him, for the ſame purpoſe. We muſt content ourſelves with referring to the pages in which theſe two writers have treated on the ſubject, ſo far as information concerning it may be derived from our great Poet (129).

(128) Eſſay on Pope, vol. ii. p. 5. 70.

(129) Hawkins's general Hiſt. of Muſic, vol. ii. p. 81—88. 101—113. Burney's ditto, vol. ii. p. 372—382.

We forgot to mention, in its proper place, that Dr. (now Biſhop) Percy, hath publiſhed, for the firſt time, from an ancient manuſcript in the Pepyſian library, an original ballad of Chaucer's, which hath eſcaped all the Editors of his works. The verſification is of that ſpecies which the French call Rondeau. From comparing this ballad with a poem on the death of King Edward I. the ingenious Editor of the Reliques of ancient Engliſh Poetry, thinks that ſome countenance is given to the opinion of thoſe Antiquaries, who ſuppoſe that Chaucer made conſiderable innovations in his mother tongue, and introduced many terms, and new modes of ſpeech, from other languages (130). Mr. Tyrwhytt's incomparable Eſſay, inſerted above, will enable our readers eaſily to judge how far this reaſoning is valid.] K.

(130) Reliques of ancient Engliſh Poetry, vol. ii. p. 7. 11, 12.

CHAUNCY (Sir HENRY), Knight, author of The Hiſtorical Antiquities of Hertfordſhire, was deſcended from a family which came into England with William the Conqueror [A]. He was educated in grammar-learning at Biſhop's-Stortford ſchool, under Mr. Thomas Leigh (a): and in the year 1647, admitted in Gonvil and Caius College in Cambridge (b). He removed, in 1649, to the Middle-Temple; and, in 1656, was called to the Bar. In 1661, he was conſtituted a Juſtice of Peace for the county of Hertford; made one of the Benchers of the Middle-Temple in 1675, and Steward of the Burgh-court in Hertford; and likewiſe, in 1680, appointed, by charter, Recorder of that place. In 1681, he was elected Reader of the Middle-Temple; and on the 4th of June, the ſame year, received the honour of Knighthood at Windſor-Caſtle, from King Charles II. He was choſen Treaſurer of the Middle-Temple in 1685. On the 11th of June, 1688, he was called to the degree of a Serjeant at Law, and the ſame year advanced to be a Welſh Judge, or one of his Majeſty's Juſtices for the counties of Glamorgan, Brecknock, and Radnor, in the principality of Wales. He married three wives; 1. Jane, youngeſt daughter of Francis Flyer, of Brent-Pelham, in Hertfordſhire, Eſq; by whom he had ſeven children. She died December 31, 1672. 2. Elizabeth, the relict of John Goulſmith, of Stredſet, in Norfolk, Eſq; one of the co-heirs of Gregory Wood, of Riſby, in Suffolk, Gent. By her he had no iſſue. She died Auguſt 4, 1677. 3. His third wife was Elizabeth, the ſecond daughter of Nathaniel Thruſton, of Hoxny, in Suffolk, Eſq; by whom he had two children (c). He died in the year 1700, and was buried at Ardley, or Yardley. He publiſhed 'The Hiſtorical Antiquities of Hertfordſhire [B]: with the Original of Counties, 'Hundreds,

(a) See the Hiſtorical Antiquities of Hertfordſhire, &c. by Sir Henry Chauncy, fol. Lond. 1700, p. 169.

(b) Ib. p. 59.

(c) Ib. p. 59. 611

'compleating it, he was forced to have recourſe to all 'thoſe that concerned that county, the better to en-'able him to ſerve ſuch gentlemen as had loſt their 'grants or charters, and would know the privileges 'belonging to their ſeveral manors.'—But he complains a little lower.——That many gentlemen who miſtook their intereſt, delayed; and others, denied him the opportunity of aſſerting their rights. And indeed this is a common obſtacle in works of this nature; moſt people not caring, or being afraid, of ſhewing the titles and writings belonging to their eſtates. Sir Henry left ſome additions to his book, which came afterwards into the hands of N. Salmon, LL.B. and were the chief foundation upon which he built his Hiſtory of Hertfordſhire. The author of the Engliſh Topographer (5) wiſhes, 'that more care had 'been taken in the engraving part of this work, and 'that that part of the performance had been better.' But he ſeems to find fault without ſufficient reaſon: for the plates in the copy now before us are really good, the greateſt fault being in the paper. M.

(5) Edit. Lond. 1720, 8vo. p. 66, 67.

[A] Was deſcended from a family which came into England with William the Conqueror.] The name of Chancy, or Chauncy, actually occurs in the roll of Battel-Abby (1). Sir Henry informs us (2), That that perſon was of Chauncy near Amiens in Picardy: and that ſeveral of this name remain ſtill in Normandy, and live there in good credit and reputation. William, the eldeſt ſon of him who came into England with the Conqueror, purchaſed the manor of Scirpenbeck in Yorkſhire, which continued in his family, (together with the manor of Willughton in Lincolnſhire, and other eſtates,) till 1399, when William de Chauncy mortgaged Scirpenbeck to Ralph Earl of Weſtmorland, who upon the forfeiture entered, and ſeized it into his hands; but, upon agreement, Richard Lord Scroop, Baron of Bolton, who married Margaret, the daughter of this Earl, granted the manor of Piſhobury in Sabridgeworth in Hertfordſhire, to William de Chauncy juſt now mentioned, whoſe poſterity lived there, till about the 25th of Queen Elizabeth. He laid out the money, which ſhould have diſcharged the mortgage of Scirpenbeck, upon the purchaſe of a fair eſtate at Stepney near London. His ſon, John Chauncy, married Margaret, one of the daughters and coheirs of William Giffard of Gedleſton, or Gilſon, in Hertfordſhire.—His deſcendant, Henry Chauncy, removed from Piſhobury, in the 25th of Queen Elizabeth aforeſaid, to Gedleſton, where he built a handſome houſe called New Place. This Henry's ſecond ſon, named George, married Jane the daughter and heir of John Cornwall of Ardley, Eſq; by whom he had a fine eſtate at Ardley in Hertfordſhire, the manor of Fairſtead in Eſſex, divers lands in Stebbing in the ſame county; together with ſome money, which enabled him to purchaſe of his elder brother's ſon (who was very extravagant,) his ſeat called New Place, with the manors of Giffards, and Netherhall in Gedleſton. He died in 1625, leaving his eldeſt ſon and heir Henry; who deceaſed in 1631. This Henry's eldeſt ſon, named alſo Henry, died in 1681. He was the father of Sir Henry Chauncy, who is the ſubject of this article. Sir Henry's mother was Anna, daughter and heir of Peter Parke of Tottenham in Middleſex, Gent (3).

(1) See Stowe's Annales, edit. 1631, p. 105; and Hollinſhed's Chron. vol. iii. p. 3.

(2) Hiſtorical Antiq. of Hertfordſhire, &c. p. 55.

(3) Ibid. p. 55—59; and from the Pedigree, p. 60, 61.

[B] The Hiſtorical Antiquities of Hertfordſhire, &c.] The author was very fit for ſuch an undertaking, being, in the firſt place, a native of that county, and a conſiderable proprietor therein, and therefore wanting neither means of information, nor money for carrying on ſuch an expenſive work. And then, as he obſerves himſelf (4), 'The near affinity Hiſtorical Antiquities 'have to that ſcience, which he had ſtudied, and all 'along practiſed, [viz. the Law] obliged him to be 'converſant in authors that treat thereof.—Nor had 'his frequent view of records, immediately relating to 'ſeveral parts of Hertfordſhire, in many caſes where 'he had been conſulted, a little contributed to qualify 'him for an undertaking of this kind: though for

(4) In the Preface, p. i.

 [The firſt eſſay towards a delineation of Hertfordſhire was attempted by John Norden, in his Speculum Britanniæ, publiſhed in 1593; but it is not to be compared, in point of compleatneſs and perfection, with Sir Henry Chauncy's hiſtorical deſcription of the county. Sir Henry's digreſſions are pedantic, and the work would have admitted of greater care with reſpect to the execution of the engravings. Mr. Foreſter, of Bradfield in this county, father of Dr. Pulter Foreſter, Chancellor of Lincoln, and a near relation of Sir Henry Chauncy, had made large additions to Sir Henry's book. The copy was in the hands of the late William Foreſter, Eſq; who died about the year 1767. Mr. Cole is poſſeſſed of another copy, with great manuſcript additions by the late Browne Willis. A third copy, with large additions, by Peter Le Neve, is in the library of the Society of Antiquaries. The Rev. Dr. Paul Wright, Vicar of Oakley in Eſſex, and who formerly reſided, as Curate and Lecturer, in the town of Hertford, having received ſome manuſcript papers relative to Sir Henry Chauncy's hiſtorical Deſcription of Hertfordſhire, propoſes to publiſh an accurate edition of that elaborate work, with continuations to the preſent time. Theſe continuations will be derived from the Doctor's own actual view of every pariſh, as well as from the communications of others. His intention is, that nothing ſhall be wanting to render the work as compleat as poſſible (6).

(6) Britiſh Topography, vol. i. p. 419, 420. Preface to ditto, p. ix.

The family of Chauncy was of conſiderable note among the Puritans and Non-conformiſts of the laſt century, both in this country, and in New England. The head of the family, in this reſpect, was Mr. Charles Chauncy, great uncle to the Hiſtorian of Hertfordſhire. He was the fifth and youngeſt ſon of George Chauncy, Eſq; of Yardley-Bury and New Place

'Hundreds, Wapentakes, Boroughs, Corporations, Towns, Pariſhes, Villages, Ham-'lets, &c.'

Place in that county, by Agnes*, the daughter of Edward Welch, and widow of Edward Humberſtone. Mr. Charles Chauncy was born in the year 1592, and baptized at Yardley, on the fifth of November, in the ſame year (7). His grammatical education he received at Weſtminſter School, from which he was removed to Trinity College, in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he was admitted to his ſeveral degrees, till he became Bachelor of Divinity. His reputation for learning was ſuch as gained him the eſteem and friendſhip of the celebrated Dr. Uſher, Archbiſhop of Armagh. In conſequence of his diſtinguiſhed ſkill in Oriental Literature, he was choſen, by the Heads of Houſes, Hebrew Profeſſor; but Dr. Williams, the Vice-chancellor, preferring a relation of his own, Mr. Chauncy reſigned his pretenſions, and was appointed to the Greek Profeſſorſhip. He was the author of the ἐπίκρισις which is prefixed to Leigh's Critica Sacra upon the New Teſtament. When Mr. Chauncy quitted the Univerſity, he became Vicar of Ware in Hertfordſhire (8). Being of puritanical principles, he was much offended with the Book of Sports; and oppoſed, likewiſe, the railing in of the Communion Table. Beſides this, he had the indiſcretion to ſay in a ſermon, that idolatry was admitted into the Church; that much Atheiſm, Popery, Arminianiſm, and Hereſy had crept into it; and that the preaching of the Goſpel would be ſuppreſſed. Having by theſe things excited the indignation of the ruling powers, he was queſtioned in the High Commiſſion; and the cauſe being referred, by order of that court, to the determination of his Ordinary, he was impriſoned, condemned in coſts of ſuit, and obliged to make the following recantation: "Whereas I "Charles Chauncy, Clerk, late Vicar of Ware, in "the county of Hertford, ſtand by ſentence of "this honourable Court legally convicted, for op-"poſing the ſetting of a rail about the Communion "Table in the chancel of the pariſh church of "Ware, with a bench thereunto affixed, for the "communicants to reſort unto, and to receive the "bleſſed Sacrament there, kneeling upon their knees, "and for uſing invective ſpeeches againſt the ſaid "rail and bench, ſaying it was an innovation, a "ſnare to men's conſciences, and a breach of the "ſecond commandment, an addition to the Lord's "worſhip, and that which hath driven me out of "town. I the ſaid Charles Chauncy, do here, "before this honourable Court, acknowledge my "great offence in uſing the ſaid invective words, "and am heartily ſorry for the ſame. I proteſt, and "am ready to declare by virtue of mine oath, that I "now hold, and am perſuaded in my conſcience, "that kneeling at the receiving of the holy Com-"munion is a lawful and commendable geſture; and "that a rail ſet up in the chancel of any church "by the authority of the Ordinary, with a bench "thereunto affixed for the communicants to repair "unto to receive the holy Sacrament kneeling, is a "decent and convenient ornament for that purpoſe; "and this Court conceiveth, that the rail ſet up "lately in the pariſh church of Ware, with the "bench affixed, is ſuch a one. And I do further "confeſs, that I was much to blame for oppoſing the "ſame, and do promiſe from henceforth, never by "word or deed to oppoſe either that or any other "the laudable rites and ceremonies preſcribed and "commanded to be uſed in the Church of England." Dr. Laud, then Biſhop of London, having been principally active in this proſecution, it was one of the things urged in proof againſt him, when he was brought to trial in 1642 (9).

As to Mr. Chauncy, his recantation, which had been extorted from him through fear, lay heavy on his mind. He continued, indeed, ſome years in his native country, and officiated at Marſton Lawrence, in the Dioceſe of Peterborough; but finding that he could enjoy no peace till he quitted the eſtabliſhed Church, he retired to New England, where he made an open acknowledgment of his crime; and a crime it certainly was, to act contrary to the dictates of his conſcience (10). In the latter end of 1637, Mr. Chauncy arrived at Plymouth in New England. For ſome conſiderable time ſucceeding his arrival, he aſſiſted Mr. Reyner, the Miniſter of that place; after which he removed to a town at a little diſtance, called "Scituate." Here he continued twelve years in the diſcharge of his paſtoral office. In a ſermon, preached upon the occaſion of his ſettlement, from theſe words of Solomon, "Wiſdom hath ſent forth his maidens (11); reflecting on his former recantation, he ſaid with tears, "Alas! Chriſtians, I am no "maiden: my ſoul hath been defiled with falſe "worſhip. How wonderous is the free-grace of the "Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that I ſhould ſtill be employed "among the maidens of wiſdom!" Such was the language of that age. When the republican party became predominant in England, Mr. Chauncy was invited, by his old pariſhioners at Ware, to return back to his native country, and ſettle among them. With this invitation he purpoſed to comply; but when he came to Boſton with that view, he was ſo earneſtly preſſed by the truſtees of Harvard College, in Cambridge, which then wanted a preſident, to accept of the government of that Society, that he could not reſiſt their ſolicitations. This event took place in 1654; and from that time to his death, which happened on the 19th of February, 1671, 2, in the 80th year of his age, Mr. Chauncy continued with great reputation at the head of the College, diſcharging the duties of his ſtation with diſtinguiſhed attention, diligence, and ability (12). So high was the eſteem in which he was held, that when he had reſided about two years in Cambridge, the Church of that town, to whom he was united, and among whom he preached, kept a whole day of thankſgiving to God, for the mercy they enjoyed in their connection with him. Mr. Chauncy, by his wife Catherine, whoſe life was publiſhed, had ſix ſons, all of whom were brought up for the Miniſtry. Iſaac, the eldeſt of them, became Paſtor of a Nonconformiſt Society in London, and wrote ſeveral treatiſes (13). Mr. Charles Chauncy had a number of deſcendants, who have long flouriſhed both in Old and in New England. One of them is the Rev. Dr. Chauncy, at this time a very reſpectable and learned Miniſter at Boſton. Another was the late Dr. Chauncy the Phyſician, ſo well known for his ſkill and taſte in pictures, and for his choice collection of them, now in the poſſeſſion of his brother, Nathaniel Chauncy, Eſq; of Caſtle-Street, Leiceſter Fields, to whom we are indebted for information concerning ſome of the particulars mentioned above.] K.

* She was his ſecond wife.

(7) From the information of Nathaniel Chauncy, Eſq;

(8) Mr. Cotton Mather's Hiſtory of New-England, p. 134.

(9) Neal's Hiſt. of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 273, 274. Prynne's Trial of Archbiſhop Laud, p. 93—96. 361, 362.

(10) Neal and Prynne, ubi ſupra.

(11) Prov. ix. 3.

(12) Cotton Mather, ubi ſupra, p. 136. 140. Hutchinſon's Hiſt. of Maſſachuſet's Bay, vol. i. p. 259.

(13) Mather, ubi ſupra.

CHEKE (John), a learned and ingenious writer in the XVIth century, was deſcended of an antient and worthy family [A], that flouriſhed long in wealth and reputation at Motſton, in the Iſle of Wight (a). He was born at Cambridge, June the 16th, 1514, being the ſon of Peter Cheke, Gent. and Agnes, daughter of Mr. Dufford (b), of Cambridgeſhire. After having been educated in grammar-learning under Mr. John

(a) The Life of Sir John Cheke, Knt. by J. Strype, 8vo. Lond. 1705, p. 2, 3.

(b) Or De Ufford, an ancient and good family. Mr. Wood calls him Duffield. Athenæ Oxon. vol. i. edit. 1721, col. 100.

[A] Was deſcended of an ancient and worthy family.] A certain Hiſtorian, who ſeldom gives a favourable account of thoſe who were inclined to the Reformation (1), ſays, That Mr. Cheke was a man of mean birth. But therein he is very much miſtaken. For the antiquity of the Cheke family is traced as far back as the reign of King Richard II. when one Cheke married a daughter of the noble family of Montacute. Their paternal eſtate in the Iſle of Wight, was three hundred pounds a year, which was never increaſed nor diminiſhed, till ſold outright about the year 1630 (2).

(1) Dr. Hayward, in his Life and Reign of King Edward VI. near the beginning.

(2) Fuller's Ch. Hiſt. Book viii. p. 37. Strype's Life of Sir John Cheke, p. 2—4.

Morgan,

Morgan (c), he was admitted into St. John's College in Cambridge, at about the age of ſeventeen years; where he ſo cloſely applied himſelf to his ſtudies, that he became very eminent for his knowledge in the learned languages, particularly the Greek tongue, which was then almoſt univerſally neglected (d). Being recommended as ſuch, by Dr. Butts, to King Henry VIII. he was ſoon after made that King's ſcholar, and ſupplied by him with money for his education, and for his charges in travelling into foreign countries. While he continued in College, he introduced there a more ſubſtantial and uſeful kind of learning, than what had been received for ſome years; and encouraged eſpecially the ſtudy of the Greek and Latin languages, and of Divinity (e). After having taken his degrees in Arts, being noted for an excellent Grecian, he was choſen Greek Lecturer of the Univerſity. There was no ſalary belonging to that place: but King Henry having founded, about the year 1540, a Profeſſorſhip of the Greek tongue in the Univerſity of Cambridge, with a ſtipend of forty pounds a year, Mr. Cheke, though but twenty-ſix years of age, was choſen the firſt Profeſſor (f). This place he held long after he left the Univerſity, namely, till October 1551 (g). In this ſtation he was highly inſtrumental in bringing the Greek language into repute, which was then very much ſlighted; and endeavoured to reform and reſtore the true and original pronunciation of it: but herein he met with great oppoſition from Stephen Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, Chancellor of the Univerſity (h) [B]. However, in the courſe of (c) D. Lloyd tells us, that 'a German had the 'care of his 'younger ſtudies, and a 'Frenchman of 'his carriage.' State Worthies, edit. 1679, p. 191.

(d) Wood, ibid. and Strype, as above, p. 6, 7.

(e) Strype, as above, p. 7—13. Aſchami Epiſt. lib. ii. p. 263. edit. Colon. Allobrogrum, 12mo.

(f) Strype, p. 16, 17. He was choſen, though abſent, and when he had no leſs than three competitors. Life of Cheke, by Dr. Langbaine.

(g) Strype, as above, p. 17.

(h) Ibid. p. 17, 18, &c.

[B] He endeavoured to reform and reſtore the true and original pronunciation of the Greek language; but—met with great oppoſition from —— Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter.] The Greek language was then but newly revived, and brought into the Univerſities, not without great oppoſition from the patrons of Ignorance and Popery, who could not endure any thing that had the face of novelty, though never ſo true and right in itſelf. The pronunciation of it was very vicious; and the received way of ſounding the vowels and diphthongs, and ſome conſonants, very odd and untoward. For inſtance, αι was pronounced as ε (e), οι and υι as ι (i), and η ι and υ were ſounded alike, as ιωτα, or (j). Some of the conſonants alſo were pronounced differently, according as they ſtood in the word; that is, the conſonant π when it came after ν, they pronounced as a ſoft B. And τ after μ was pronounced as our D. The letter κ was pronounced as we do CH, and β as we do the V conſonant. Now, ſince different letters muſt make different ſounds, Cheke concluded theſe to be very falſe ways of reading Greek; and not, certainly, what was practiſed by the ancient Grecians (3). He ſaw, that not only the beauty of the language was loſt in this way, but likewiſe it's very ſpirit and life were gone, by the loſs of ſo many vowels and diphthongs, and the language become jejune and languid. In this way of ſpeaking it, nothing of numeroſity appeared in the ancient Orators and Rhetoricians, nor thoſe flowing periods, for which they had been renowned in old Greece; neither could he himſelf ſhew his eloquence, in his orations or lectures, for want of the beauty and variety of ſounds (4). He ſet himſelf therefore to find out what was the right method: and, partly, by conſidering the power of the letters themſelves; partly, by conſulting Ariſtophanes, and other ancient authors, he concluded, that each vowel ſhould have it's proper ſound, and, that diphthongs, conſiſting of two vowels ſhould have the ſound of two. This took exceedingly among the more ingenious men of the Univerſity, and great improvements were daily made in the knowledge of the Greek tongue, ſo that Plato and Ariſtotle began to be much read. But there was another party in the Univerſity, who by being older fancied themſelves wiſer than the others. Theſe made a great diſturbance about this new way of ſpeaking Greek, as they called it, and oppoſed it with all their might, both by writing and ſpeaking. But not finding their arguments ſo effectual as they wiſhed, they carried their complaints to Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, Chancellor of the Univerſity; who, in the true ſpirit of Popery, made an edict, dated the 14th of May 1542, wherein he forbad all perſons to uſe the new faſhion of pronouncing Greek, upon the following penalties: If he were a regent to be expelled out of the Senate; if he ſtood for a degree, not to be admitted to it; if a ſcholar, to loſe his ſcholarſhip; and the younger ſort, to be privately chaſtiſed. This edict is framed in ſuch a dictatorial air, that I cannot forbear laying the greateſt part of it before the curious reader. —— Sic edico: Quiſquis noſtram poteſtatem agnoſcis, ſonos, literis ſive Græcis ſive Latinis, ab uſu publico præſentis ſeculi alienos, privato judicio affingere ne audeto.—Diphthongos Græcas, nedum Latinas, niſi id Diæreſis exigat, ſonis ne diducito, neve divellito. Quæſitam uſu alteri vocalium prærogativam ne adimito. Sed ut marem fœminæ dominari ſinito. Quæ vero earum in communione ſoni uſu convenerunt, iis tu negotium ne faceſſito. Αι & ε, οι & ει ab ι ſono ne diſtinguito. Tantum in orthographia diſcrimen ſervato. Η, ι, υ, uno eodemque ſono exprimito. Cujuſq; tamen propriam in orthographia ſedem diligenter notato. In κ & γ, quoties cum diphthongis aut vocalibus ſonos ι aut ε referentibus conſonantur, quoniam a doctis etiamnum in uſu variantur, aliis denſiorem, aliis tenuiorem ſonum affingentibus, utriuſque pronuntiationis modum diſcito: Ne aut horum aut illorum aures offendas; neve de ſonis litem inutiliter excites. Cæterum, qui in his ſonis a pluribus receptus eſt, illum frequentato. Β literam ad exemplum noſtri Β ne inſpiſſato, ſed ad imitationem V. conſonantis mollius proferto. Literas π & τ, item γ & κ, pro loco & ſitu alios atque alios ſonos adimere memento. Itaque τ & π, tum denique β, quum proxime locantur, hæc poſt μ, illa poſt ν, his locis videlicet litera τ referat noſtrum D, π vero B noſtrum exprimat. Litera porro γ cum proxima ſedem occupet ante κ, χ, aut aliud γ, huic tu non ſuum, ſed ſonum ν literæ accommodato. Ne multa. In ſonis omnino ne philoſophator, ſed utitor præſentibus. In his ſiquid emendandum ſit, id omne authoritati permittito.—Si quis autem, quod abominor, ſecus fecerit, &c. Then follow the penalties expreſſed above——And the whole concludes thus——In ſumma, hoc edictum omnes ſacroſanctum ita habento, ut nec contumacibus remiſſum, nec reſipiſcentibus ſeverum eſſe videatur (5). Upon the coming out of this edict, Cheke wrote an elegant letter to the Biſhop, wherein he ſaid, 'That the true ſounds of 'the letters were changed in the laſt barbarous ages, 'and that it was therefore better to mend that bar-'barity, than to follow it.' And for this he appealed to Eraſmus, (who had written a book of the true pronunciation of the Latin and Greek) and other learned men. The Biſhop replied, 'That the ſound of let-'ters was more like to be changed by the learned 'than the unlearned: the learned being wont to have 'ſo much regard to the euphony, and the gracefulneſs 'of the ſound of words.' Cheke ſhewed, how by pronouncing the diphthong οι as an ι, (as was then commonly done) there would be no diſtinction between Λοιμὸς and Λιμός. But the Chancellor was for no changes. Utere, ſaith he to Cheke, moribus antiquis, verbis vero præſentibus, & multo magis ſonis, i. e. uſe ancient cuſtoms, but preſent words, and much more ſounds. And when Cheke alledged, 'He 'acted merely out of love for the truth:' The Chancellor broke out into this expreſſion——Quid non mortalia pectora cogit veri quærendi fames? i. e. What does not too great an eagerneſs for ſeeking out truth drive men into? as if that had been ſo great a crime. However, truth at length prevailed; and this true way of reading Greek came to be received not only in the Univerſities, but alſo throughout the king-

(3) Strype, as above, p. 18, 19. 203, &c. and Eccleſiaſtical Memorials, vol. i. p. 372.

(4) Reflections upon Learning, by T. Baker, B.D. 5th edit. 1714, 8vo. p. 32.

(5) Printed among J. Cheki de Pronuntiatione Diſputationes, &c.

of his lectures, he went through all Homer, all Euripides, part of Herodotus, and through Sophocles twice, to the advantage of his hearers, and his own credit (i). He was alſo at the ſame time Univerſity-Orator (k). About the year 1543, he was incorporated Maſter of Arts at Oxford, where he had ſtudied ſome time (l). On the 10th of July 1544, he was ſent for to Court, in order to be School-maſter, or Tutor, for the Latin tongue, jointly with Sir Anthony Cooke, to Prince Edward: and, about the ſame time, for an encouragement and a reward, the King granted him one of the Canonries in his new-founded college at Oxford, now Chriſt-Church; but that college being diſſolved in the beginning of the year 1545, a penſion (m) was allowed him in the room of his Canonry (n). By this preferment it appears, he was then in holy orders. While he was entruſted with the Prince's education, he ſo adapted all the inſtructions he gave him, as that they ſhould tend to render him a wiſe man, and a good governor. And he made uſe of all the intereſt he had, in promoting men of learning and probity. He ſeems alſo to have had ſometimes the Lady Elizabeth under his care (o). In 1547, he married Mary, daughter of Richard Hill, Serjeant of the Wine-cellar to King Henry VIII. (p). When his royal pupil, King Edward VI. came to the crown, he rewarded him for his care and pains with an annuity of one hundred marks (q); and alſo made him a grant of ſeveral lands and manors [C]. He likewiſe cauſed him, by a mandamus, to be elected Provoſt of King's College in Cambridge; which place was vacant by the deprivation of George Day, Biſhop of Chicheſter (r). In May, 1549, he retired to Cambridge, upon ſome diſguſt he had taken at the Court; and was, notwithſtanding, one of the King's Commiſſioners for viſiting that Univerſity this ſummer. The October following, he was one of the thirty-two Commiſſioners appointed to examine the old Eccleſiaſtical Law books, and to compile from thence a body of Eccleſiaſtical Laws (s), for the government of the Church: and again, three years after, he was put in a new commiſſion, iſſued out for the ſame purpoſe (t). He returned to Court in the winter of 1549, but met there with great uneaſineſs, on account of ſome offence given by his wife to Anne, Ducheſs of Somerſet, whoſe dependent ſhe was. Mr. Cheke himſelf was not exempt from trouble, being of the number of thoſe who were charged with having ſuggeſted ill counſels to the Duke of Somerſet, and afterwards betrayed him (u). But having got over this ſhock at Court, he ſtood the firmer afterwards, and his intereſt and authority daily increaſed; ſo that he became the great patron of religious and learned men, both Engliſh and foreigners. In 1550 (w), he was made chief Gentleman of the King's Privy-Chamber, whoſe tutor he ſtill continued to be, and who made a wonderful progreſs through his good inſtructions. Mr. Cheke, to ground him well in morality, read to him Cicero's Philoſophical works, and Ariſtotle's Ethicks: And alſo, what was of great importance, inſtructed him in the General Hiſtory, the State and Intereſt, the Laws and Cuſtoms of England (x). He likewiſe directed him to keep a diary of all the remarkable occurrences that happened [D]. In October, 1551, his Majeſty conferred on him the honour of Knighthood; and to enable him the better to ſupport that degree, made him a conſiderable grant [E]. The ſame year he held two private conferences with ſome other learned perſons [F], upon

(k) Strype, as above, p. 27.

(i) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 100.

(l) Wood, Faſti, vol. i. col. 68. He ſays elſewhere that it was in 1542, or thereabouts. Athenæ, vol. i. col. 100.

(m) Of 26*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*

(n) Wood, ibid. and Strype, as above, p. 31.

(o) Strype, p. 40.

(p) Ibid. p. 43.

(q) Ib. p. 44. 46.

(r) Ibid.

(s) See the article COX (RICHARD) in the note concerning Reformatio Legum Eccleſiaſticarum.

(t) Strype, as above, p. 49. 55, 56.

(u) Ibid. p. 56. 58.

(w) Wood ſays it was in 1547; but we chuſe to follow Mr. Strype, Wood being viſibly miſtaken.

(x) Strype, as above, p. 59. 72, 73.

(6) Ibid. & Strype's Eccleſ. Memorials, vol. i. p. 372.

dom (6). This controverſy was managed between Biſhop Gardiner and Mr. Cheke, in ſeven elegant epiſtles: of which the originals being left in the hands of Coelius Secundus Curio, a learned man of Baſil, by Cheke himſelf, as he paſſed through that place in his journey to Italy, in the beginning of Queen Mary's reign, they were publiſhed from thoſe originals in 1555, 8vo. without Mr. Cheke's knowledge or conſent, by Curio, with the following title, Joannis Cheki Angli de pronuntiatione Græcæ potiſſimum Linguæ, Diſputationes cum Stephano Wintonienſi Epiſcopo, ſeptem contrariis Epiſtolis comprehenſæ, magna quadam & elegantia & eruditione refertæ (7).

(7) Strype's Life of Cheke, &c. p. 24. 127. 202—209.

[C] Made him a grant of ſeveral lands and manors.] In 1548 he granted to him, and Walter Moyle, the very advantageous purchaſe, of the College of St. John Baptiſt of Stoke, near Clare in Suffolk, and likewiſe all the meſſuages, tenements, &c. with the appurtenances belonging to the College of Corpus Chriſti, in the pariſh of St. Laurence Poultney, London, lately diſſolved; together with divers other lands and tenements in the counties of Suffolk, Devon, Kent, and in London; for the ſum of 958*l.* 3*s.* 5*d. ob.* a good penny-worth, undoubtedly, as Mr. Strype obſerves (8). The next year, in conſideration of his induſtry in teaching the King, he obtained the houſe and ſite of the late Priory of Spalding in the county of Lincoln, the manor of Hunden in the ſame county, and divers other lands and tenements in the counties of Lincoln, and Suffolk, to the yearly value of 118*l.* 11*d.* q. and no rent reſerved (9).

(8) Page 46.

(9) Ibid.

[D] He likewiſe directed him to keep a diary, &c.] And to write down briefly, under each day of the month, debates in Council, diſpatch of embaſſadors, honours conferred, and other remarks as he thought proper. This undoubtedly produced that King's journal, which is preſerved in the Cottonian Library, and thence printed in Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, Vol. II. Appendix.

(12) Ibid.

[E] Made him a conſiderable grant.] It was a gift in fee ſimple, (upon conſideration of his ſurrender of the hundred marks above-mentioned,) of the whole manor of Stoke near Clare, excluſively of the College before granted him, and the appurtenances in Suffolk and Eſſex, with divers other lands, tenements, &c. all to the yearly value of 145*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* And a paſture, with other premiſſes, in Spalding; and the Rectory, and other premiſſes, in Sandon (10).

(10) Ibid. p. 86.

[F] The ſame year he held two private conferences—upon Tranſubſtantiation.] The firſt conference was held November the 25th, in Secretary Cecil's houſe, and the ſecond December 3d, the ſame year, at Sir Richard Moriſon's. The auditors were, the Lord Ruſſel, Sir Tho. Wroth of the Bed-Chamber, Sir Anthony Cooke one of the King's tutors, Throgmorton Chamberlain of the Exchequer, Mr. Knolles, and Mr. Harrington, with whom were joined the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Rutland, in the ſecond Conference. The Popiſh diſputants for the real preſence were, Feckenham afterwards Dean of St. Paul's, and Yong; and at the ſecond diſputation Watſon. The diſputants on the other ſide, were, Sir John upon the ſubject of the Sacrament, or Tranſubſtantiation (y). He procured Bucer's manuſcripts; and in 1552, the famous John Leland's valuable collections [G], for the King's library (z). Being at Cambridge, at the Commencement in 1552, he diſputed there againſt Jeſus Chriſt's local deſcent into Hell [H]. On the 25th of Auguſt, the ſame year, he was made Chamberlain of the Exchequer for life: and in 1553, conſtituted Clerk of the Council; and, ſoon after, one of the Secretaries of State, and a Privy-Counſellor (a). In May, the ſame year, the King granted to him, and his heirs male, the honour of Clare in Suffolk, with divers other lands, to the yearly value of one hundred pounds. His zeal for the Proteſtant religion induced him to approve of the ſettlement of the Crown upon the Lady Jane Grey; and he acted as Secretary to her, and her Council, after King Edward's deceaſe (b) [I]. But upon Queen Mary's acceſſion to the throne, he was dealt with as a traitor; being committed to the Tower on the 28th of July, and an indictment drawn up againſt him, the 12th or 13th of Auguſt (c). The year following, after he was almoſt ſtripped of his whole ſubſtance, he obtained the Queen's pardon, and was ſet at liberty September 3, 1554 (d). But not being able to reconcile himſelf to Popery, which was then reſtored again; and foreſeeing the evil times that were drawing on, he obtained a licence from the Queen to travel for ſome time into foreign parts. He went firſt to Baſil, where he ſtaid ſome time; and thence paſſed into Italy. At Padua he met with ſome of his countrymen, whom he directed in their ſtudies, and read and explained to them ſome Greek orations of Demoſthenes. Upon his return from Italy, not caring to venture into his own country, he went and ſettled at Straſburgh in Germany, where the Engliſh ſervice was kept up, and many of his pious and learned friends reſided. But ſo offended at this were the Popiſh zealots in England, that his whole eſtate was confiſcated to the Queen's uſe, under pretence, that he did not come home at the expiration of his travel (e). Being hereby reduced to low circumſtances, he was forced to read a Greek lecture at Straſburgh, for his ſubſiſtence (f). In the beginning of the year 1556, his wife being come to Bruſſels, he reſolved, chiefly upon an invitation he had received from the Lord Paget and Sir John Maſon [K], to go thither to fetch her. But, firſt, he conſulted Aſtrology, in which he was very ſkilful and credulous [L], to know, whether he might ſafely

(y) Ibid. p. 85, 90, &c.

(z) Ibid. p. 12, 133 and Wood, Athenæ, edit. 1721, vol. i. col. 85.

(a) Strype, p. 119.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Ibid. p. 123.

(d) Wood, as above, col. 101.

(e) Strype's Life of Sir John Cheke, &c. p. 124, 125, 126. 135.

(f) Ibid. p. 134.

John Cheke, Sir William Cecil, Horn Dean of Durham, Whitehead, and Grindal. Some account of theſe diſputations is ſtill extant in Latin, in the library of MSS. belonging to Bennet-College in Cambridge; and from thence publiſhed in Engliſh by Mr. Strype (11).

(11) Life of Sir John Cheke, p. 90—112.

[G] In 1552 he procured J. Leland's Collections, for the King's library.] But, either by reaſon of Sir John's misfortunes, or through ſome other accident, they were not repoſited there. Four volumes of theſe Collections were given by his ſon Henry Cheke, to Humphrey Purefoy, Eſq; one of Queen Elizabeth's Council in the North, whoſe ſon Thomas Purefoy, of Barwel in Leiceſterſhire, gave them to the famous Antiquary William Burton of Lindley, in the ſame county, in 1612; and he made uſe of them in his deſcription of Leiceſterſhire. Many years after, he made a preſent of them to the Bodleian library at Oxford, where they now are. Some other of theſe collections, after Cheke's death, came into the hands of William Lord Paget, and Sir William Cecil (12). The original of the Itinerary, in five volumes, 4°, is in the Bodleian library; and two volumes of Collections, relating to Britain, are in the Cottonian. Julius C. 6 (13).

(12) Ibid. p. 113.

(13) Commentarii de Scriptoribus Britannicis, auctore J. Lelando, Oxon. 1709, in Vita auctoris, & ad calcem ſecundi Voluminis.

[H] He diſputed againſt Jeſus Chriſt's local deſcent into Hell.] This was a point very much canvaſſed in England, not long after the beginning of the Reformation (14); and which was grounded upon the authority of J. Calvin, who aſſerted, That Jeſus Chriſt went into hell, and there ſuffered the pains of the damned (15).——At this Commencement at Cambridge, Chriſtopher Carlile keeping a Divinity-Act, choſe this for his Theſis, That Chriſt went into no other hell but the very loweſt, i. e. that of the damned. Sir John Cheke agreed beforehand to diſpute upon that queſtion with him, on purpoſe to attack the Popiſh doctrine of the Limbus Patrum; that is, an apartment in hell, where, they ſay, the ancient patriarchs and good men before Chriſt were detained, and in which Chriſt deſcended on purpoſe to deliver them from thence (16).

(14) See the article BILSON (THOMAS).

(15) Calvini Inſtitut. l. ii. c. 16. § 10.

(16) Wood's Ath. vol. i. col. 144; and Strype, as above, p. 116.

[I] He acted as Secretary to her [the Lady Jane Grey] and her Council, after King Edward's deceaſe.] He was ſworn and admitted into that office June the 2d, and the two other Secretaries were yet continued, and all three Secretaries appeared in Council together, as is manifeſt from the council-book. But at this juncture Cecil was intended to be laid aſide, becauſe he ſcrupled coming into the ambitious deſigns of the Duke of Northumberland, who would have the Crown ſettled upon the Lady Jane Grey, who had married his ſon Guilford Dudley. But Cheke's zeal for religion made him come into thoſe meaſures; and that was the cauſe of his advancement (17). One author tells us, 'he had that place three years (18).' But he is much miſtaken; for he enjoyed it but little above four weeks: to which may be added the nine days of the Lady Jane's reign, for he acted to the laſt, viz. till July the 19th.

(17) Strype, p. 119.

(18) D. Lloyd's State Worthies, edit. 1679, 8vo. p. 194.

[K] Upon an invitation he had received from the Lord Paget and Sir John Maſon.] Theſe two perſons had been his friends and acquaintance in the late King Edward's reign; but having changed their religion, were in great favour with the Queen, and conſequently had altered their inclination towards him. Paget came into thoſe parts, under pretence of uſing the baths of Aix la Chapelle, but really with intent to have the Ducheſs of Suffolk, and her huſband, who had fled abroad for their religion, betrayed into his hands. As for Maſon, he was the Queen's Ambaſſador at the Court of Bruſſels. Failing in their attempt upon the Ducheſs of Suffolk, they uſed this ſtratagem to get Sir John Cheke, and Sir Peter Carew (who had been engaged in Wyat's inſurrection, and was fled abroad) apprehended. They deſired Sir John, to take the opportunity of fetching his wife, to come and ſee them at Bruſſels; and for his better ſecurity, Maſon aſſured him of a ſafe-conduct thither in King Philip's, and his own, name. He accordingly went thither, with Sir Peter Carew, and enjoyed his pretended friends Paget and Maſon; but, as he was coming back from them, he was ſeized between Bruſſels and Antwerp, as is above related. So that it appears, he and his friend Carew were betrayed (19).

(19) Strype, p. 135, 136. 139; and Dr. Ponet's Treatiſe of Politick Power, cited by Strype, p. 139, 140.

[L] He conſulted Aſtrology, &c.] That art was then much ſtudied, both by the Nobility and Gentry; in ſo much, that Dr. Laurence Humfrey, who lived in thoſe days, and was afterwards Divinity-Profeſſor at Oxford, in his book De Nobilitate (20), obſerves, how this ſcience above the reſt was ſo ſnatched at, ſo beloved, and even devoured by moſt perſons of faſhion (21), that safely undertake that journey; and being deceived by that delusive art, he fell into a fatal snare between Brussels and Antwerp. For, upon certain intelligence and orders from King Philip II. being way-laid there by the Provost-Marshal, he was suddenly seized on the 15th of May [M], unhorsed, blind-folded, bound, and thrown into a waggon; conveyed to the nearest harbour, put on board a ship under hatches, and brought to the Tower of London, where he was committed close prisoner (g). He soon found, that it was on account of his religion he was thus strangely used: for, two of the Queen's Chaplains were sent to the Tower, to endeavour, out of charity and good-will, as they pretended, to reconcile him to the Church of Rome, though without success. But the desire of gaining so great a man, induced the Queen to send to him Dr. Feckenham, Dean of St. Paul's, a man of a moderate and obliging temper, and with whom he had been acquainted in the late reign. This man's arguments were inforced by this dreadful alternative, either comply, or burn; which Sir John's frailty was not able to withstand. Seeming, therefore, inclined to turn, he was, at his own desire, carried before Cardinal Pole, who gravely advised him to depart from the variety of Doctors to the Unity of the Church: whereupon he was forced to submit his person to be ordered as should be thought best for his soul's wealth, to them that had authority in the Church upon such offenders. Then he drew up a paper, consisting of quotations out of the Fathers that seemed to countenance Transubstantiation, representing them as his own opinion, and hoping that would suffice to procure him his liberty, without any other publick declarations of his change. This paper he sent to Cardinal Pole, with a letter dated July 15, wherein he desired him to have so much compassion of his frailty, as to spare him from making an open recantation; but that was refused him. He wrote a letter to the Queen the same day, in which he declared his readiness to obey her laws, and other orders of religion. After this, to declare his repentance for rejecting the Pope, he made his solemn submission before the Cardinal, suing to be absolved, and received into the bosom of the Roman Catholick Church; and this was granted him as a mighty favour. But notwithstanding all that, he was forced to make a publick recantation before the Queen, on the 4th of October, and another long one before the whole Court [N]; and submitted, moreover, to whatever penances should be enjoined him by the Pope's Legate, i. e. the Cardinal (h). After all this drudgery, his lands were restored to him, but it was upon condition of an exchange with the Queen for others [O]. The Papists, to triumph in his conversion, and to mortify the Protestants, obliged him to keep company generally with Catholicks, and to be present at the examinations and convictions of those they called Hereticks (*). But his remorse, and extreme vexation for what he had done, sat so heavy upon his mind, that pining away with shame and regret, he died September the 13th, 1557, aged forty-three, at his friend Mr. Peter Osborne's house, in Wood-street, London, and was buried in St. Alban's Church there, in the north chapel of the choir, the 16th of September (i). A stone was set afterwards over his grave, with an inscription [P]. He left three sons [Q]; and

(20) Lib. iii. p. 347.

(21) Sic rapi ſic adamari, & devorari a pleriſque Nobilibus.

(g) Ib. p. 135, 136; and Wood, Athenæ, col. 101.

(h) Strype, as above, p. 142—166.

(*) J. Fox says, That he was drawn unawares to sit in the place where the poor Martyrs were brought before Bonner, and other Bishops, to be condemned. Acts and Monuments, edit. 1583, p. 1955.

(i) Ibid. p. 167—170.

that they needed no inticements to it, but a bridle rather; not to be set on, but rather taken off from it. And that many had so trusted to this, that they almost distrusted God.

[M] He was suddenly seized, on the 15th of May.] Or, as it is expressed in his second recantation,—— 'When he thought least,—he was taken as it were 'with a hurlewind from the place he was in, and 'brought over the sea, and never knew whither he 'went, afore he found himself in the Tower of Lon-'don, which of all places he abhorred most (22).'

(22) See Strype, p. 157.

[N] And another long one before the whole Court.] The second recantation, in particular, is manifestly in the style of Cardinal Pole, that is, long and tedious. Cheke is made to accuse himself therein, in the most ignominious manner———As may appear from these few lines——'I did most grievously offend, both to 'the ruin of myself, and of others that were conver-'sant with me in the Court, where I had more occa-'sion to do hurt for the place of schoolmaster I had 'with young King Edward, and with all the youth 'of the Nobility than any other had. And albeit 'mine office was not to teach him the matters of 'religion, which was committed to others; yet I con-'fess touching my pestilent error, I peradventure did 'no less to confirm and set forward the same in his 'mind, and all the rest of the youth than any other. '——Mine error [i. e. his being a Protestant] was a 'blasphemy of the holy name of God, under colour 'to glorify the same, and a persecution of the name 'of Christ, more grievous than ever were they, that, 'deceived by others, crucified Christ, or afterward 'did persecute those that were his disciples—(23).'

(23) See Strype, p. 152; and also p. 163.

[O] But it was upon condition of an exchange with the Queen for others.] Upon his surrendering the lands mentioned above in Note [E] the Queen granted him, April 12, 1556, the reversion of the manor of Brampton-Abbot in Devonshire, and the annual rents of 37*l.* 2*s.* 6*d. ob.* and the reversion of customary lands of Freshford, and Woodwick, in Somersetshire; the capital messuage of Batokysborough; the manor of Ayscote; and the manor of Northlode, in the same county; the manor of More in Devonshire; and some other things (24).

(24) Ibid. p. 167, 168.

[P] A stone was set afterwards over his grave, with an inscription.] Which inscription was composed by his learned friend Dr. Walter Haddon, and is as follows:

Doctrinæ lumen Checus, vitæque magister,
Aurea naturæ fabrica, morte jacet.
Non erat è multis unus, sed præstitit unus
Omnibus, & patriæ flos erat ille suæ.
Gemma Britanna fuit, tam magnum nulla tulerunt
Tempora thesaurum, tempora nulla ferent (25).

(25) Ibid. p. 191. Mr. Strype took it from a copy transcribed from the stone, by C. Lancaster, a herald, in 1611. By Dr. Langbaine and A. Wood, the first verse is thus read, Doctrinæ Checus, Linguæque utriusque magister.

[Q]. He left three sons.] John, and Edward, the two youngest, died without issue. Henry, the eldest, was Secretary to the Council in the North, and knighted by Queen Elizabeth: he died about the year 1586. Thomas, his eldest son and heir, was knighted by King James I. He purchased the seat of Pyrgo near Romford in Essex, where he and his posterity were settled several years. He was buried March 25, 1659, in St. Alban's Wood-street, near his grandfather. Sir Thomas's second son, Thomas, commonly known and was author of ſeveral books [R]. As to his character, he was a perſon of extraordinary wit, and was accounted one of the beſt and moſt learned of his age, and a ſingular ornament to his country. He was one of the revivers of polite literature in England, and a great lover and encourager of the Greek language in particular. The authors he chiefly admired and recommended, were Demoſthenes, Xenophon, Plato, Ariſtotle, Iſocrates, and Cicero. Theſe, together with the Bible, and a few more, were ſufficient, in his judgment, to render a man ſubſtantially learned, and withal to make him wiſe and good, which is the true end of learning (k). He was very happy in imitating the ancient and beſt writers, and had great judgment in tranſlating them. In the orthography, and pronunciation of the Latin and Greek languages, he was very critical and exact [S]; and alſo took great pains to correct, regulate, and improve his mother-known by the name of Colonel Cheke, inherited the eſtate, and was Lieutenant of the Tower in the reigns of King Charles II. and James II. This Thomas had two ſons, Henry, who died young; and Edward, who ſucceeded him in his eſtates. This Edward dying in 1707 left two ſons; but they died both under age; and ſo the eſtate devolved to Edward's younger ſiſter Anne, wife of Sir Thomas Tipping of Oxfordſhire, Baronet. She left only two daughters, whereof Catharine, the youngeſt, was married to Thomas Archer of Underſlade in Warwickſhire, Eſq; the late poſſeſſor of the Eſſex-Eſtate of the Cheke's (26).

(k) Ibid. p. 193, 194. 196—200.

(26) See Strype, as above, p. 179—192; and Hiſt. and Antiquities of Eſſex, by N. Salmon, fol. p. 245.

[R] And was author of ſeveral books.] Thoſe that are printed, are as follows. I. A Latin tranſlation of two of St. Chryſoſtom's Homilies, never before publiſhed, Contra obſervatores novilunii; and De dormientibus in Chriſto. Lond. 1543. 4°. II. A Latin tranſlation of ſix Homilies of the ſame Father, De Fato, and Providentia Dei. Lond. 1547. III. 'The hurt 'of ſedition, how grievous it is to a commonwealth.' The running title is, 'The true ſubject to the rebel.' It was written, and publiſhed, by Mr. Cheke in 1549, on occaſion of the inſurrections in Devonſhire and Norfolk; and contains very ſerious and earneſt expoſtulations with the rebels. It is inſerted in Holinſhed's Chronicle, under the year 1549, and was reprinted in 1576, as a ſeaſonable diſcourſe upon apprehenſion of tumults from malecontents at home, or renegadoes abroad. Dr. Gerard Langbaine of Queen's College Oxon, cauſed it to be reprinted again about 1641, for the uſe and conſideration of thoſe who took arms againſt King Charles I. in the time of the civil wars, and prefixed to it a ſhort life of the author (27). IV. A Latin tranſlation of the Engliſh Communion-book; done for the uſe of M. Bucer, that he might underſtand it, and paſs his judgment upon the ſame. 'Tis printed among Bucer's Opuſcula Anglicana. V. De obitu doctiſſimi & ſanctiſſimi Theologi domini Martini Buceri, &c. Epiſtolæ duæ. Lond. 1551, 4°. printed in Bucer's Scripta Anglicana. He alſo wrote an Epicedium on the death of that learned man (28). VI. Carmen heroicum, or Epitaphium, in Antonium Deneium clariſſimum virum. Lond. 4°. (29). This Sir Anthony Denny was originally of St. John's College in Cambridge, and a learned man: afterwards he became one of the Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber, and Groom of the Stole to King Henry VIII. and one of the executors of his will. VII. De Pronuntiatione Græcæ potiſſimum linguæ diſputationes, &c. See above, note [B]. Baſil. 1555. 8°. VIII. De ſuperſtitione ad regem Henricum. This diſcourſe on ſuperſtition was drawn up for King Henry's uſe, in order to excite that Prince to a thorough Reformation of religion. It is written in very elegant Latin, and was prefixed by the author, as a dedication, to a Latin tranſlation of his, of Plutarch's book of Superſtition. A copy of this diſcourſe, in manuſcript, is ſtill preſerved in the library of Univerſity College, Oxon, curiouſly written, and bound up in cloth of ſilver: which makes it probable, that it was the very book that was preſented to the King. An Engliſh tranſlation of it, done by the learned W. Elſtob, formerly fellow of that college, was publiſhed by Mr. Strype, at the end of his Life of Sir John Cheke. IX. Several Letters of his, are publiſhed in the Life juſt now mentioned (30), and perhaps in other places. X. A Latin tranſlation of Archbiſhop Cranmer's book on the Lord's Supper; was alſo done by Sir John Cheke; and printed in 1553. XI. He likewiſe tranſlated Leo de apparatu bellico. Baſil. 1554. 8°.

(27) Strype, p. 27. 38, 39. 51—55. Balei, Scriptorum Brytanniæ Centuria Octava, No. 97, p. 699, edit. 1557, fol.

(28) Printed in Strype, as above, p. 218.

(29) Printed there, p. 219, 220.

(30) Page 11. 21. 38. 49. 57. 69, 70. 75. 79. 81. 130. 144.

Thoſe pieces of his that are loſt, or elſe were never printed, are theſe. I. De Fide juſtificante. Of juſtifying faith; undoubtedly againſt the Papiſts. II. De Euchariſtiæ ſacramento. On the Euchariſt: Probably his conferences with Dr. Feckenham, as mentioned above note [F]. III. In quoſdam Pſalmos. IV. In Pſalmum, Domine probaſti, &c. Theſe Mr. Strype ſuppoſes to be ſome pious meditations of his on thoſe pſalms (31). V. De cineribus & palmis. Ad Wintonienſem. Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, was earneſt with the Protector, for retaining the old uſages in the Church; particularly, ſprinkling of aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, and carrying palms on Palm-Sunday. Perhaps, this tract of Cheke was an anſwer to Gardiner's letter on that ſubject to the Duke of Somerſet (32). VI. De Eccleſiâ; An poteſt errare? Of the Church; whether it can err? Still extant among J. Fox's manuſcripts. It is a diſpute againſt the Romaniſts, under theſe three queſtions; whether there be a Church; what the Church is; and, whether it can err? VII. An liceat nubere poſt divortium? Whether a woman may marry after being divorced? A caſe much handled in thoſe times. VIII. De nativitate Principis. On the Prince's nativity. The author of Heroologia Anglicana will have this to be a panegyric on the Prince's birth: and ſo accordingly Mr. Wood entitles it, Panegyric. in nativitatem Edwardi Principis (33). But Mr. Strype more truly ſuppoſes, that it was ſome private calculation of Prince Edward's nativity, an art in which Cheke had great ſkill, and depended on too much. IX. Introductio Grammaticæ, an introduction to Grammar. X. De ludimagiſtrorum officio. Of the duty of ſchoolmaſters. Theſe two were probably written by him for the uſe of his royal pupil, the Prince. XI. Elegia de Ægrotatione & obitu R. Edwar. 6. An elegy on the ſickneſs and death of King Edward 6. There is an Engliſh elegy, much of the ſame nature as this, printed in the Heroologia; but Mr. Strype does not ſeem to believe it to be his (34). XII. Epitaphia. Epitaphs. Beſides his epitaph on Sir Anthony Denny, mentioned above; and a Greek epitaph for his ſiſter Mary, wife of Sir William Cecil (35); Mr. Strype ſuppoſes, he alſo was author of the inſcription on the monument of his patron Dr. Butts, in Fulham-Church; and on his father-in-law, Richard Hill, in St. Michael's Queen-Hith, London. XIII. He alſo tranſlated from Greek into Latin, 1. Five books of Joſephus's Antiquities. 2. The Aſcetic of Maximus the monk. 3. Plutarch of ſuperſtition. 4. Three of Demoſthenes's Philippics. 5. And his three Olynthiacs. 6. His oration againſt Leptines. 7. The orations of Demoſthenes and Æſchines, on the two oppoſite ſides. 8. Ariſtotle de Anima. 9. He tranſlated Sophocles and Euripides literally. 10. And made corrections on Herodotus, Thucydides, Plato, Xenophon, and other authors. Finally, he collected the arguments and reaſons of both ſides, upon the buſineſs of the Euchariſt; at the time that point was learnedly and largely debated in parliament, when the Communion-book was appointed. Mr. Strype ſuppoſes, he wrote many other things, which are unknown to us at this diſtance. But, adds he, this is ſufficient to inform us what a ſcholar he was (36).

(31) Page 216.

(32) See Fox's Acts and Monum. edit. 1583, p. 1342, &c.

(33) Col. 101.

(34) See p. 218.

(35) Strype, ibid.

(36) This Catalogue is taken from Balei Scriptorum Brytanniæ Centuria Octava, No. 97, p. 699, 700. Wood's Athenæ. vol. i. col. 101. and Strype's Life of Sir John Cheke, p. 216, &c.

[S] In the orthography, and pronunciation of the Greek and Latin languages, he was very critical and exact.] What he did with regard to the Greek, hath been fully ſhown above in note [B]. And for the Latin; that it might be ſpoken truly, and the ſyllables in reading pronounced long or ſhort, according to their nature, mother-tongue, the Engliſh [T]. We are alſo aſſured, that he was an excellent Statesman, and a true and ſincere Chriſtian, and a hearty profeſſor of the Reformed Religion:

nature, he deviſed a way to write the vowels according to their quantity. Namely the long vowel O, after this manner ω, like a Greek omega, as in Uxωrem, Liberωs. And the long I, with two tittles over it, as in Diϊnitus; and as for the long E, eſpecially the Diphthong, which before was commonly written as the ordinary E, he put a tail to it, as in Le,tor (37).

(37) Strype, p. 211.

[T] And alſo took great pains to correct, regulate, and improve——the Engliſh.] Namely in theſe following particulars. 1. He would have no E put to the end of words, as being needleſs and unexpreſſive of any ſounds; for inſtance, in theſe words, excus, giv, deceiv, prais, commun: Unleſs where it is ſounded, and then to be written with a double E, as in neceſſitee. 2. Where the letter A was ſounded long, he would have it written with a double A, indiſtinction from A ſhort; as in maad, ſtraat, daar. 3. Where the letter I was ſounded long, to be written with a double I, as in deſiir, liif. 4. He entirely threw the letter Y out of the alphabet, as uſeleſs, and ſupplied it with I, as mi, ſai, awai. 5. U long he wrote with a ſtroke over it, as in præsum. 6. The reſt of the long vowels he would have to be written with double letters, as weer, theer, (and ſometimes thear,) noo, noon, adoo, thooſ, loov, to avoid an E at the end. 7. Letters without ſound he threw out, as in theſe words, frutes, wold, faut, dout, again for againſt, hole, meen for mean. And, 8. Changed the ſpelling in ſome words, to make them the better expreſſive of the ſounds; as in gud, britil, praiſabil, &c. He alſo had better ſkill in our language to judge of the phraſes, and properties of words, and to divide ſentences, than any elſe then had: And was thought to have greatly improved the language by a practice he had, when he read his Greek lectures, to take the book, and only looking upon the book, to read it in Engliſh. He farther brought in a ſhort and expreſſive way of writing, without long and intricate periods. And moreover in what he wrote himſelf, he would allow no words, but ſuch as were true Engliſh, or of Saxon original; ſuffering no adoption of any foreign word into the Engliſh language, which he thought was copious enough of itſelf, without borrowing words from other countries. This made him diſlike the then Engliſh tranſlation of the Bible, becauſe there were in it ſo many foreign words, and to undertake a new one. He went through the Goſpel of St. Matthew, and began that of St. Mark; wherein all along he laboured to uſe only true Engliſh Saxon words, though they were ſometimes odd and uncouth; as for inſtance deſiirful, ungre-vous, tollers for publicans, &c. The original under his own hand ſtill remains in the MS. Library at Benet College Cambridge. A ſpecimen whereof follows. Matth. I. ver. 18.—'After his mother Mari was enſured to 'Joſeph, before thei weer cupled together, ſhe was 'preived to be with child; and it was indeed by the 'Holi Ghooſt. 19. But Joſeph her huſband, being 'a juſt man, and loth to uſe extremitee toward her, 'entended privili to divorſe himſelf from her. 20. 'And being in this mind, lo the angel of the Lord 'appeired by dream, &c. Chap. II. ver. 16. Then 'Herod ſeeing that he was plaid withal by the wiſe-'heards,' &c.—Laſtly, Sir John Cheke brought in a fair and graceful way of writing; for he wrote himſelf an excellent and accurate hand, as did alſo the beſt ſcholars in thoſe times, namely Smith, Cecil, and eſpecially Aſcham. So that fair writing, and good learning ſeem to have begun in England together (38).

(38) Strype, as above, p. 211—215.

M.

 [In Harrington's Nugæ Antiquæ, publiſhed within theſe few years, there are eight original letters, written by Sir John Cheke. The firſt of them, which is to the Duke of Somerſet, relates to the education of the young King, Edward the Sixth. Among other things, Sir John gives the following excellent advice: "I do wiſh therefore oftentymes, "that which the King's Majeſtie was wont to labour "in, that he contynewed to be an Academike, ſlow "to judge, glad to here all men, miſtruſting his "own reaſon, taking trouthe to be hidden, and ſo "not to be found at the firſt ſight; thinking wiſdom "either to be in men of experience, or elſe in no "men; and alwaiſe perſwading himſelf in his "youthe, which Socrates believed when he was "olde, that he knoweth this onlye thinge, that yet "he knew nothing; and ſo ſhall he beſt avoid the "bottomleſs dangers, unknown faults, which elſe "unawarſe creepe into his minde (39)." The next letter is addreſſed to King Edward himſelf, and was written at a time when Sir John Cheke, in conſequence of a fit of illneſs, thought himſelf in certain view of a ſpeedy deceaſe. This letter diſplays ſo much wiſdom and integrity, together with ſuch a grateful remembrance of his friends, that it will not be diſpleaſing to our readers to have the whole of it inſerted.

(39) Nugæ Antiquæ, vol. iii. p. 13.

"Becauſe I am departing, my Sovereigne Lord, unto the King of all Kings, Almightie God, and muſt, by his appointment, leave you, whome of long tyme I have done my beſt to bring up in vertue and good learninge; and you are now coming to a government of your ſelf, in whiche eſtate I pray God you maye alwaies be ſerved with them that will faithfullye, trewlye, and playnlye give you counſeill: I have thought it my dutie, for a memorie of my laſt will, and for a token of my well-wiſhinge unto you (remayning preſentlye with me, even as it hath alwaies heretofore done) to requyre you, yea, and in God's behalf to chardge you, that, foraſmoche as yeares bothe have and will diminiſhe in you the feare of man, to have yet before your eyes continuallye the fear of God; with the which if you do not direct, order, and temper all your doings and ſayings, be you well aſſured neither to have good ſucceſs in the greate chardge that he hath committed to you, yet neither in th' end to enjoye that joyfull place that is promyſed timentibus eum: For if God do right extreamlye poniſhe men of baſe eſtate, and of low degrees, for wanting of that neceſſarie jewell, which hath in Scripture ſo many promeſes: how ſevearely will he poniſhe Kings and Princes failing thearein, in whome the lack thereof muſt needes be both to themſelves and to the commonwealth moſt perillouſe. My weakneſſe ſuffereth me not ſo long to talke with you in this matter as I coulde wiſhe, and your majeſties diſpoſition, (which I know moſt apt to receave all godlie admonitions) puttethe me in comforte to thincke this to be ſufficient, beſeaching God ſo to direct all your doings, thoughts, and meanings, as may tend to his glory and your honour and wealth, both here and in the worlde to come, when by death you ſhall be called thereunto; to the whiche all men, as well Princes as others, as well yonge as old, are ſubjecte. Moſt affectuouſlye beſeachinge your Grace, if any of your ſervaunts about you ſhall frendlye admoniſhe you of anye thinge whiche in you may be miſlyked to take it at their handes, and thincke them that ſhall ſo doe to be your only ſervants of truſt, and to conſyder them, and to rewarde them accordinglye. And if anye ſuche ſhall be, that ſhall of all things make fair weather, and, whatſoever they ſhall ſee to the contrarye, ſhall tell you all is well; beware of them, they ſerve themſelves, and not you.

"And wheare you have readd, in the tyme that it hath pleaſed God to lend me unto you, dyvers diſcourſes of dyvers ſortes, as well of ſtories, as of philoſophie, wherebye you have had proffit, and plentie of graye and wiſe rules and orders for the good government of your realme; yet, in myne opinyon, among them all, none hath ſo habundantlye furniſhed you in thoſe points, as hath Ariſtotle, to whome I beſeach you, for thoſe matters, often to reſorte, and eſpeciallye to two chapters in his Politiques, the one de mutatione regni, &c. and the other per quæ regna ſervantur, being the tenth and eleventh chapters of the S. of his Politiques.

"For your divinitie, I wolde wiſhe you wolde diligentlye contynew the reading of the New Teſtament, Sapientia, Eccleſiaſticus, and the Proverbs.

"And, underſtanding that it hath pleaſed you ſithen the tyme of my ſickneſſe to ſend unto me manie comfortable gion (l): and likewiſe extremely beneficent, charitable, and communicative (m). His unhappy fall is indeed a great blemiſh to his memory. But, before he is abſolutely condemned, let any one place himſelf in his circumſtances, and then conſider, how few can have reſolution enough to withſtand this dreadful dilemma, either turn, or burn? An author, of more zeal than charity or knowledge (n), treats him as 'a Libertine by profeſſion;' but, undoubtedly, he has borrowed that odious and unjuſt character of him from his enemies the Papiſts. With regard to his perſon, he had a full, comely countenance, ſomewhat red, with a yellow large beard (o); and, as far as can be judged by his picture, he was tall and well made.

(l) Ibid. p. 224, 225. Dr. Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 195.

(m) Strype, ibid. p. 227, 228.

(n) The author of the Hiſtory of Socinianiſm. See Memoires Literaires de la Grande Bretagne, tom. xv. p. 277.

(o) Strype, as above, p. 173.

comfortable meſſages, and among the reſt, that you have appointed (moche unto my comfort) the wardſhipp of my ſonne to his mother; like as I do therefore render unto your Grace my moſt humble thancks ſo to do, I with like humbleneſs deſyre you (my great debts conſydered) to remitt to hym (if all ſhall be too moche) yet ſome convenient peece of ſuch lands as, during his noneage, ſhall fall unto you.

"And, whereas I ſhall now leave my colledge in Cambridge deſtitute of an headd, if your Grace appoint thereunto Mr. Haddon, I think you ſhall appoint a worthie man. Finallie, one ſute charitye moveth me to make unto your Majeſtie: The Biſhop of Chicheſter * was my bringer-upp, and at his hands I gate an entrie to ſome ſkill in learning; lyving I could never do hyme anye good whereby I might be accompted a grateful ſcholler; if dyeing I might attaine for hym libertie with ſome ſmall aide of lyving, I ſhould be moche bound unto youe, thinking moſt aſſuredlye you ſhall fynde of hym, during his lyfe, bothe a dailye beadeſman for you, and a right obedient ſubject; thoughe, in ſome things heretofore, he hathe more throughlye perſwaded his conſcience, then to the perfection of Chriſtes religion was requiſyte. Thus the lyving God preſerve your Majeſtie long to raigne moſt proſperouſlye. Out of my death bedd (40)."

* This was George Day, the deprived Biſhop of Chicheſter.

(40) Ibid. p. 16—20.

The five next letters are one each to Biſhop Gardiner, Sir John Maſon, and Queen Mary, and two to Lord Paget. All theſe were written during the time of Sir John Cheke's perſecution and diſtreſs, and are of the ſupplicatory kind (41). The laſt and longeſt is a letter of advice to Mrs. Penelope Pie, who was daughter and heireſs of his deceaſed friend, Sir Thomas Pie (42). It is an admirable compoſition, abounding in piety and good ſenſe, and expreſſed with uncommon eaſe, and even elegance of language. It is a happy inſtance of the purity and correctneſs of his taſte, at a period when literary men, in general, had not emancipated themſelves from an uncouth and pedantic phraſeology.

(41) Ibid. p. 21—36.

(42) Ibid. p. 37—59.

Sir John Cheke can never be mentioned with too great reſpect, as one of the firſt introducers of true learning into this country; and the world is highly indebted to him for his ſucceſsful endeavours in reforming the pronunciation of the Greek and Latin tongues. But we cannot equally approve his ſcheme of innovation with regard to the orthography of the Engliſh language. The plan is not eaſily practicable, and, were it more practicable, would not, we think, be deſirable. That it could not readily be brought into practice, is plain from the total diſregard which hath always hitherto been ſhewn to every propoſal of this kind. Nor do we conceive that any material benefit could reſult from ſuch an attempt. If it were carried into execution, it would introduce a deal of confuſion between the peruſal of former writings, and thoſe which ſhould be printed in the new mode. We hope, therefore, that every future project of this nature will be immediately rejected.]

K.

 [CHESELDEN (WILLIAM)†, an eminent Surgeon and Anatomiſt, and a celebrated writer in both theſe reſpects, was born, in 1688, at Burrow on the Hill, in the pariſh of Somerby, in the county of Leiceſter. After having received a claſſical education, he was placed, about the year 1703, under the immediate tuition of Mr. Cowper, whoſe reputation for anatomical ſkill is well known in the medical world. In the houſe of this gentleman Mr. Cheſelden reſided, and, at the ſame time, ſtudied ſurgery under Mr. Ferne, the head Surgeon of St. Thomas's Hoſpital. Such was the proficiency he made under theſe able maſters, that he himſelf began, at the age of twenty-two, to read lectures in anatomy, a ſyllabus of which, in quarto, was firſt printed in 1711. Lectures of this kind were then ſomewhat new in this country, having been introduced, not many years before, by M. Buffiere, a French Refugee, and a Surgeon of high repute in the reign of Queen Anne. Till then, the popular prejudices had run ſo high againſt the practice of diſſection, that the civil power found it difficult to accommodate the lecturers with proper ſubjects; and pupils were obliged to attend the Univerſities, or other public ſeminaries, where, likewiſe, the procuring of bodies was no eaſy taſk. It is an extraordinary proof of Mr. Cheſelden's early reputation, that he had the honour of being choſen a Member of the Royal Society in 1711, when he could be little more than twenty-three years of age. The wiſdom of this choice he took care to juſtify by a variety of curious and uſeful communications [A]. Nor were his contributions limited to the Royal Society, but are to be found in the

† For various particulars in this article, we are indebted to the obliging information of Dr. William Hunter.

[A] By a variety of curious and uſeful communications.] In looking over the Abridgment of the Philoſophical Tranſactions, the following articles have occurred to us, as communicated by Mr. Cheſelden. "Caſe of an unuſual bone in the head, and a diſtempered optic nerve." "Account of oſſifications or petrefactions in the coats of the Aorta." "Anatomical obſervations (1)." Account of a bone taken from the falx." "Caſe of the optic nerve waſted." "Two caſes of dropſy." "Account of two and three ſpleens found in one body." "Account of human bones of an extraordinary ſize." Theſe were found near an urn, inſcribed "Marcus Antoninus, in the ſituation of a Roman camp, not far from St. Alban's (2)." "Obſervations by a young Gentleman born blind." Theſe we ſhall take notice of below. "Explication of the inſtruments uſed in couching him (3)."

Mr. Nichols hath mentioned the two following articles, which had eſcaped our enquiry. "A remarkable caſe of a perſon cut for the ſtone in a new way, commonly called the lateral." March 13, 1741, 2. Phil. Tranſ. N° 478. p. 33. "The effects of the Lixivium Saponis, taken inwardly by a man aged 75, who had the ſtone, and in whoſe bladder, after his deceaſe, were found 214 ſtones. Ibid. p. 36 (4).

(1) Continuation of Lowthorp's Abridgment, vol. i. Part 2d, p. 13. 37. 40.

(2) Abridgment of the Philoſophical Tranſactions, vol. v. p. 202. 231. 252. 387.

(3) Ibid. vol. vii. Part 3. p. 491—494.

(4) Nichols's Anecdotes of Bowyer, p. 638.

Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Surgeons at Paris, and in other valuable repoſitories (a). In 1713, Mr. Cheſelden publiſhed, in octavo, his "Anatomy of the human "Body." A ſecond edition appeared in 1722, a third in 1726, a fourth in 1732, a fifth, in folio, in 1734, and a ſixth in 1740. Not to enumerate the ſucceeding impreſſions, we may mention it as a deciſive proof of the eſteem in which the work is ſtill held, that the eleventh edition of it was printed in 1778. During the courſe of twenty years, in which Mr. Cheſelden carried on his anatomical lectures, he was continually riſing in reputation and practice. Upon Mr. Ferne's retiring from buſineſs, he was elected head Surgeon of St. Thomas's Hoſpital. At two other Hoſpitals, St. George's and the Weſtminſter Infirmary, he was choſen Conſulting Surgeon; and, at length, had the honour of being appointed Principal Surgeon to Queen Caroline, by whom he was highly eſteemed (b). It is not, indeed, ſurprizing, that all theſe diſtinctions ſhould be beſtowed upon him, ſince he was long and generally regarded as the firſt man in his profeſſion.

(a) Nichols's Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, p. 213. 341.

(b) Ibid. p. 343.

To revert to Mr. Cheſelden's writings; in 1723 he publiſhed, in octavo, his "Treatiſe on the high Operation for the Stone." This work was ſoon attacked in an anonymous pamphlet, called "Lithotomus caſtratus, or an Examination of the Treatiſe of Mr. Cheſelden;" and in which he was charged with plagiariſm. How unjuſt this accuſation was, appears from his preface, in which he had acknowledged his obligations to Dr. James Douglas, and to Mr. John Douglas [B], from one of whom the attack is ſuppoſed to have come. Mr. Cheſelden's ſolicitude to do juſtice to other eminent practitioners, is farther manifeſt, from his having annexed to his book a tranſlation of what had been written on the ſubject by Franco, who publiſhed "Traité des Hernies," &c. at Lyons, in 1561; and by Roſſet, in his "Cæſarei Partus Aſſertio Hiſtoriologica," Paris, 1590. The whole affair was more candidly explained in 1724, by a writer who had no other object than the public good, in a little work, entitled "Methode "de la Taille au haut appareile recuillie des Ouvrages du fameux Triumvirat." This triumvirate conſiſted of Roſſet, to whom the honour of the invention was due; Douglas, who had revived it after long diſuſe; and Cheſelden, who had practiſed the operation with the moſt eminent ſkill and ſucceſs. Indeed, Mr. Cheſelden was ſo celebrated on this account, that, as a Lithotomiſt, he drew to himſelf the principal buſineſs of the kingdom. The author of his Eloge, in the "Memoires de l'Academie Royale de "Chirurgerie," who was preſent at many of his operations, teſtifies, that one of them was performed in ſo ſmall a time as fifty-four ſeconds (c). In 1728, Mr. Cheſelden added greatly to his reputation in another view, by couching a lad of nearly fourteen years of age, who was either born blind, or had loſt his ſight ſo early, that he had no remembrance of his having ever ſeen (d). The obſervations that were made by the young gentleman, after obtaining the bleſſing of ſight, are ſingularly curious [C], and have

(c) Nichols, ubi ſupra, p. 342.

(d) Cheſelden's Anatomy, p. 300. Eleventh edition.

[B] In which he had acknowledged his obligations to Dr. James Douglas, and to Mr. John Douglas.] The following extract from Mr. Cheſelden's preface will be an ample teſtimony to the candour of his mind. "In the year 1717, 18, Dr. James Douglas pre- "ſented a paper to the Royal Society, in which he "demonſtrated, from the anatomy of the parts, that "the high operation for the ſtone might be per- "formed ſafely; and though moſt were convinced of "it, yet either no one underſtood which way to do "it, or cared to venture his reputation upon it, till "his brother Mr. John Douglas, a good anatomiſt, "and formerly a pupil in St. Thomas's Hoſpital, "performed it. His method is nearly the ſame with "Roſſet's, (Vid. Mr. Douglas's Treatiſe called "Lithotamia Douglaſſiana) though, as he declares, "he had never heard of that author at that time. "He performed his operations with ſucceſs, and if "he may not be called the inventor, he was ſurely "the firſt man that ever practiſed it this way upon "living bodies, (his operation and Franco's differ- "ing as much as the ways by the greater and the "leſſer apparatus) for which the Company of Sur- "geons (forward to encourage every improvement "in Surgery) have preſented him with his freedom, "with an exemption from ſeveral expenſive offices. "In my own account of this operation, I have fairly ſet "down every thing that I judged moſt material to "be known, without the leaſt diſguiſe or partiality "to myſelf: and that the reader might ſee what had "been before done, and that I might not be ſuſpect- "ed of arrogating to myſelf any part of this opera- "tion which was not my own invention (which I "confeſs is very little) I have added to it a tranſla- "tion of what had been written upon the ſubject by "ſeveral authors (5)."

(5) Nichols, ubi ſupra, p. 342.

[C] The obſervations that were made by the young gentleman are ſingularly curious.] We are perſuaded that it will be a gratification to our readers to inſert them.

"An account of obſervations made by a young gentleman who was born blind, or loſt his ſight ſo early that he had no remembrance of ever having ſeen, and was couched between thirteen and fourteen years of age.

"Though we ſay of this gentleman that he was blind, as we do of all people who have ripe cataracts, yet they are never ſo blind from that cauſe but that they can diſcern day from night, and for the moſt part in a ſtrong light, diſtinguiſh black, white, and ſcarlet; but they cannot perceive the ſhape of any thing; for the light by which theſe perceptions are made, being let in obliquely through the aqueous humour, or the anterior ſurface of the cryſtalline, by which the rays cannot be brought into a focus upon the retina, they can diſcern in no other manner, than a ſound eye can through a glaſs of broken jelly, where a great variety of ſurfaces ſo differently refract the light, that the ſeveral diſtinct pencils of rays cannot be collected by the eye into their proper foci; wherefore the ſhape of an object in ſuch a caſe cannot be at all diſcerned, though the colour may: And thus it was with this young gentleman, who, though he knew theſe colours aſunder in a good light, yet when he ſaw them after he was couched, the faint ideas he had of them before, were not ſufficient for him to know them by afterwards, and therefore he did not think them the ſame which he had before known by thoſe names. Now ſcarlet he thought the moſt beautiful of all colours, and of others the moſt gay were the moſt pleaſing; whereas the firſt time he ſaw black it gave him great uneaſineſs, yet after a little time he was reconciled have been much attended to, and reaſoned upon, by ſeveral writers on viſion, as we ſhall probably have occaſion more particularly to ſhew in a future article. In 1729, our author was elected a correſponding Member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris; and, in 1732, ſoon after the inſtitution of the Royal Academy of Surgery in that city, he had the honour of being the firſt foreigner aſſociated with their learned body (e). Mr. Cheſelden's "Oſteography, or Anatomy of the Bones," inſcribed to Queen Caroline, and publiſhed by ſubſcription, came out in 1733. It is a ſplendid folio, in the figures of which all the bones are repreſented in their natural ſize. Our author loſt a great ſum of money by this publication, which, in 1735, was attacked, with much ſeverity, by Dr. Douglas, whoſe criticiſm appeared under the title of "Remarks on that pompous Book, the Oſteography of Mr. Cheſelden." The work received a more judicious cenſure from the celebrated Haller, who, whilſt he candidly pointed out its errors, paid the writer that tribute of applauſe which he ſo juſtly deſerved. Heiſter, likewiſe, in his "Compendium of Anatomy," has done juſtice to his merit (f). Mr. Cheſelden, having long laboured for the benefit of the public, and accompliſhed his deſires with reſpect to fame and fortune, began, at length, to wiſh for a life of greater tranquillity and retirement; and, in 1737, he obtained an honourable ſituation of this kind, by being appointed head Surgeon to Chelſea Hoſpital; which place he held, with the higheſt reputation, till his death. He did not, however, wholly remit his endeavours to advance the knowledge of his profeſſion; for, upon the publication of Mr. Gataker's tranſlation of Monſ. le Dran's Operations of Surgery, he contributed twenty-one uſeful plates towards it, and a variety of valuable remarks, ſome of which he had made ſo early as while he was a pupil to Mr. Ferne (g). This was the laſt literary work in which he engaged. In 1751, Mr. Cheſelden, as a governor of the Foundling Hoſpital, ſent a benefaction of fifty pounds to that charity, encloſed in a paper, with the following lines:

(e) Nichols, ubi ſupra, p. 343.

(f) Ibid. p. 341, 342.

(g) Ibid. p. 342.

"'Tis what the happy to th' unhappy owe;
"For what man gives, the gods by him beſtow."

POPE (b).

(b) Ibid. p. 215.

reconciled to it; but ſome months after, ſeeing by accident a negro woman, he was ſtruck with great horror at the ſight.

"When he firſt ſaw, he was ſo far from making any judgment about diſtances, that he thought all objects whatever touched his eyes (as he expreſſed it) as what he felt did his ſkin, and thought no objects ſo agreeable as thoſe which were ſmooth and regular, though he could form no judgment of their ſhape, or gueſs what it was in any object that was pleaſing to him: He knew not the ſhape of any thing, nor any one thing from another, however different in ſhape or magnitude; but upon being told what things were, whoſe form he before knew from feeling, he would carefully obſerve, that he might know them again; but having too many objects to learn at once, he forgot many of them; and (as he ſaid) at firſt he learned to know, and again forgot a thouſand things in a day. One particular only, though it may appear trifling, I will relate: Having often forgotten which was the cat, and which the dog, he was aſhamed to aſk; but catching the cat, which he knew by feeling, he was obſerved to look at her ſtedfaſtly, and then, ſetting her down, ſaid, So, puſs, I ſhall know you another time. He was very much ſurpriſed, that thoſe things which he had liked beſt, did not appear moſt agreeable to his eyes, expecting thoſe perſons would appear moſt beautiful that he loved moſt, and ſuch things to be moſt agreeable to his ſight, that were ſo to his taſte. We thought he ſoon knew what pictures repreſented, which were ſhewed to him, but we found afterwards we were miſtaken; for about two months after he was couched, he diſcovered at once they repreſented ſolid bodies, when to that time he conſidered them only as party-coloured planes, or ſurfaces diverſified with variety of paint; but even then he was no leſs ſurprized, expecting the pictures would feel like the things they repreſented, and was amazed when he found thoſe parts, which by their light and ſhadow appeared now round and uneven, felt only flat like the reſt, and aſked which was the lying ſenſe, feeling, or ſeeing?

"Being ſhewn his father's picture in a locket at his mother's watch, and told what it was, he acknowledged a likeneſs, but was vaſtly ſurprized; aſking, how it could be, that a large face could be expreſſed in ſo little room, ſaying, it ſhould have ſeemed as impoſſible to him, as to put a buſhel of any thing into a pint.

"At firſt, he could bear but very little light, and the things he ſaw, he thought extremely large; but upon ſeeing things larger, thoſe firſt ſeen he conceived leſs, never being able to imagine any lines beyond the bounds he ſaw; the room he was in, he ſaid, he knew to be but part of the houſe, yet he could not conceive that the whole houſe could look bigger. Before he was couched, he expected little advantage from ſeeing, worth undergoing an operation for, except reading and writing; for he ſaid, he thought he could have no more pleaſure in walking abroad than he had in the garden, which he could do ſafely and readily. And even blindneſs, he obſerved, had this advantage, that he could go any where in the dark, much better than thoſe who can ſee; and after he had ſeen, he did not ſoon loſe this quality, nor deſire a light to go about the houſe in the night. He ſaid, every new object was a new delight; and the pleaſure was ſo great, that he wanted words to expreſs it; but his gratitude to his operator he could not conceal, never ſeeing him for ſome time without tears of joy in his eyes, and other marks of affection: And if he did not happen to come at any time when he was expected, he would be ſo grieved, that he could not forbear crying at his diſappointment. A year after firſt ſeeing, being carried upon Epſom Downs, and obſerving a large proſpect, he was exceedingly delighted with it, and called it a new kind of ſeeing. And now being lately couched of his other eye, he ſays, that objects at firſt appeared large to this eye, but not ſo large as they did at firſt to the other; and looking upon the ſame object with both eyes, he thought it looked about twice as large as with the firſt couched eye only, but not double, that we can any ways diſcover.

"I have couched ſeveral others who were born blind, whoſe obſervations were of the ſame kind; but they being younger, none of them gave ſo full an account as this gentleman (6)."

(6) Cheſelden's Anatomy, p. 300—304. Eleventh edition.

In the latter end of the ſame year, he was ſeized with a paralytic ſtroke, from which, in appearance, he ſoon perfectly recovered. The flattering proſpect, however, of his continuance in life, was not long enjoyed; for, on the 10th of April, 1752, he was ſuddenly carried off by a fit of an apoplexy. This event happened at Bath, in the 64th year of his age. He married Deborah Knight, a citizen's daughter, and, if we miſtake not, ſiſter of the famous Robert Knight, Caſhier to the South-Sea Company in 1720. By this lady Mr. Cheſelden had only one daughter, Wilhelmina Deborah, who was married to Charles Cotes, Doctor of Phyſic, of Woodcote in Shropſhire, and Member of Parliament for Tamworth in Staffordſhire. Dr. Cotes died without iſſue, on the 21ſt of March, 1748; and Mrs. Cotes, who ſurvived him, departed this life, ſome years ſince, at Greenhith, in the pariſh of Swanſcombe, in the county of Kent (). () Ibid. p. 213, 343.

Mr. Cheſelden's reputation was great in anatomy, but we apprehend that it was ſtill greater, and more juſtly founded, in ſurgery. The late eminent Surgeon, Mr. Sharpe, in a dedication to our author (i), celebrates him as the ornament of his profeſſion; acknowledges his own ſkill in ſurgery to have been chiefly derived from him; and repreſents, that poſterity will be ever indebted for the ſignal ſervices he has done to this branch of the medical art (k). In ſurgery he was undoubtedly a great improver, having introduced ſimplicity into the practice of it, and laid aſide the operoſe and hurtful French inſtruments which had been formerly in uſe. Guided by conſummate ſkill, perfectly maſter of his hand, fruitful in reſources, he was prepared for all events, and performed every operation with remarkable dexterity and coolneſs. Being fully competent to each poſſible caſe, he was ſucceſsful in all. He was, at the ſame time, eminently diſtinguiſhed by his tenderneſs to his patients. Whenever he entered the Hoſpital on his morning viſits, the reflection of what he was unavoidably to perform, impreſſed him with uneaſy ſenſations; and it is even ſaid, that he was generally ſick with anxiety before he began an operation, though during the performance of it he was, as hath already been obſerved, remarkably cool and ſelf-collected. Our author's euloguiſt relates a ſtriking contraſt between him and a French Surgeon of eminence. The latter gentleman, having had his feelings rendered callous by a courſe of ſurgical practice, was aſtoniſhed at the ſenſibility ſhewn by Mr. Cheſelden previouſly to his operations, and conſidered it as a great mark of weakneſs in his behaviour. Yet the ſame gentleman, being perſuaded to accompany Mr. Cheſelden to the Fencing School, who frequently amuſed himſelf with it as a ſpectator, could not bear the ſight, and was taken ill. The adventure was the ſubject of converſation at court, and both were equally praiſed for goodneſs of heart. Each of them, indeed, though the occaſions were ſo different, was affected by ſimilar ſentiments of humanity (l). The principle, however, of humanity appears to have been ſtronger in Mr. Cheſelden, becauſe the feeling of it was not weakened in caſes where, from long practice, it might be expected that it would have been almoſt totally deſtroyed. (l) Ibid. p. 342, 343.

The connections of our eminent Surgeon and Anatomiſt were not confined to perſons whoſe ſtudies and purſuits were congenial to thoſe of his own profeſſion. He was fond of the polite arts, and cultivated an acquaintance with men of genius and taſte. He was honoured, in particular, with the friendſhip of Mr. Pope, who (m) frequently ſpeaks of dining with him, and who thus writes concerning him, in a letter to Dr. Swift. "I wondered a little at your quære, who Cheſelden was. It ſhews that the "trueſt merit does not travel ſo far any way as on the wings of poetry. He is the "moſt noted and moſt deſerving man in the whole profeſſion of Chirurgery; and has "ſaved the lives of thouſands by his manner of cutting for the ſtone (n)." In 1742, Mr. Cheſelden, in a converſation with Mr. Pope at Mr. Dodſley's, expreſſed his ſurprize at the folly of thoſe who could imagine that the fourth book of the Dunciad had the leaſt reſemblance in ſtile, wit, humour, or fancy, to the three preceding books. Though he was not, perhaps, altogether ſingular in this opinion, it was no ſmall mortification to him, to be informed by Mr. Pope, that he himſelf was the author of it, and was ſorry that Mr. Cheſelden did not like the poem (o). Writers, unleſs they are well prepared for diſagreeable remarks, ſhould be cautious of making their anonymous compoſitions the ſubjects of diſcourſe. Mr. Cheſelden is underſtood to have valued himſelf more upon his taſte in poetry and architecture than he ought to have done, conſidering the different nature of his real accompliſhments and purſuits. His ſkill in the latter art is ſaid not to have been diſplayed to the beſt advantage in Surgeon's Hall, which was principally built under his direction. Theſe little ſhades in eminent characters will ſcarcely detract any thing from their merit, in the eſtimation of true candour and ſound judgment (p)]. K.

(i) Prefixed to Mr. Sharpe's "Treatiſe on the Operations of Surgery."

(k) Nichols, ubi ſupra, p. 343.

(m) In his letters to Mr. Richardſon.

(n) Nichols, ubi ſupra, p. 214. Pope's Works, vol. vi. p. 299. Edition of 1776.

(o) Nichols, ubi ſupra, p. 344.

(p) A friend once ſaying to Mr. Cheſelden at dinner, that as he was the beſt Anatomiſt in England, he ought to be the beſt Carver, he anſwered, "I am." Nichols, ubi ſupra.

* * [CHEYNE (GEORGE), a Phyſician of conſiderable eminence, and author of ſeveral learned works, was deſcended from a good family in Scotland, where he was born in the year 1671 (a). He received a regular and liberal education, and was at firſt intended by his parents for the Church (b); though that deſign was afterwards laid aſide. He paſſed his youth, as he himſelf informs us, in cloſe ſtudy, and in almoſt continual continual application to the abſtracted ſciences; and in theſe purſuits his chief pleaſure conſiſted. The general courſe of his life, therefore, at this time, was extremely temperate and ſedentary; though he did occaſionally admit of ſome relaxation, diverting himſelf with works of imagination, and "rouſing nature by agreeable company "and good cheer (c)." But upon the ſlighteſt exceſſes he found ſuch diſagreeable effects, as led him to conclude, that his glands were naturally lax, and his ſolids feeble: in which opinion he was confirmed, by an early ſhaking of his hands, and a diſpoſition to be eaſily ruffled on a ſurprize (d). He ſtudied phyſic at Edinburgh under the celebrated Dr. Pitcairne, to whom he was much attached, and whom he ſtyles "his great "maſter, and generous friend (e)." Having taken the degree of Doctor of Phyſic, he repaired to London to practiſe as a Phyſician, when he was about thirty years of age. On his arrival in the metropolis, he ſoon quitted the regular and temperate manner of life to which he had been chiefly accuſtomed, and partly from inclination, and partly from a view to promote his practice, he paſſed much of his time in company, and in taverns. Being of a cheerful temper, and having a lively imagination, with much acquired knowledge, he ſoon rendered himſelf very agreeable to thoſe who lived and converſed freely. He was, as he ſays, much careſſed by them, "and grew daily "in bulk, and in friendſhip with theſe gay gentlemen, and their acquaintances (f)." But, in a few years, he found this mode of living very injurious to his health: he grew exceſſively fat, ſhort-breathed, liſtleſs, and lethargic (g).

(a) Supplement to the New and General Biog. Dict. 8vo. p. 95.

(b) Engliſh Malady, p. 330.

(c) Caſe of the Author, in his Engliſh Malady, or Treatiſe of Nervous Diſeaſes of all Kinds, p. 325.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Pref. to his Eſſay on Health and long Life, p. ii.

(f) Engliſh Malady, p. 326.

(g) Id. ibid.

But before his health was in this unfavourable ſtate, he had publiſhed a medical treatiſe, in 8vo, under the following title: "A new Theory of acute and ſlow continued "Fevers [A]: wherein, beſides the Appearances of ſuch, and the Manner of their "Cure, occaſionally, the Structure of the Glands, and the Manner and Laws of Se-"cretion, the Operation of purgative, vomitive, and mercurial Medicines are mecha-"nically explained." To this he prefixed, "An Eſſay concerning the Improvements "of the Theory of Medicine." This treatiſe on fevers was drawn up by Dr. Cheyne, at the deſire of Dr. Pitcairne [B]; but it was a haſty performance; and, therefore, though it ſeems to have been favourably received, our author never choſe to prefix his name to it. His next publication was a piece on abſtracted geometry and algebra, entitled, Fluxionum Methodus inverſa; ſive quantitatum fluentium leges generaliores [C]. He afterwards publiſhed a defence of this performance, againſt Mr. De Moivre, under the following title: Rudimentorum Methodi Fluxionum inverſæ Specimina, adverſus Abr. De Moivre. In 1705, when he was about thirty-four years of age, at which time he was a fellow of the Royal Society, he publiſhed, in 8vo, "Philoſophical Principles of na-"tural Religion: containing the Elements of natural Philoſophy, and the Proofs for "natural Religion, ariſing from them." This piece he dedicated to the Earl of Roxburgh, at whoſe deſire, and for whoſe inſtruction, it appears to have been originally written.

In conſequence of the free mode of living in which our author had for ſome time indulged himſelf, beſides the ill conſequences that have been already mentioned, he at length brought on himſelf, as he informs us, an autumnal intermittent fever; but this he removed in a few weeks by taking the bark (h). He afterwards went on tolerably well for about a year, though neither ſo clear in his faculties, nor ſo gay in his temper, as he had formerly been. But the following autumn, he was ſuddenly ſeized with a vertiginous paroxyſm, ſo alarming in its nature, as to approach nearly to a fit of an apoplexy. By degrees, his diſorder turned to a conſtant violent head-ach, giddineſs, and lowneſs of ſpirits: upon which he entirely left off ſuppers, which he never reſumed, and alſo confined himſelf at dinner to a ſmall quantity of animal food, drinking but very little fermented liquors (i). The decline of his health and ſpirits occaſioned him

(h) Engliſh Malady, p. 326.

(i) Ibid. p. 327.

[A] A new theory of acute and ſlow continued fevers.] The fourth edition of this, with many additions, was publiſhed in 1724.

[B] Drawn up by Dr. Cheyne, at the deſire of Dr. Pitcairne.] Our author ſays, 'that Dr. Pitcairne 'thought himſelf ill uſed by ſome of his brethren of 'the profeſſion who were then at inteſtine war on 'the ſubject of fevers; and fancied the handſomeſt 'way to bring them down, was to exhibit a more 'ſpecious account of this diſeaſe, than any of them 'had ſhewn.' But 'his buſineſs in the practice of 'phyſic was then ſo great, as not to allow him ſuffi-'cient time for ſuch a work (1).'

(1) Cheyne's Pref. to his Eſſay of Health and long Life, p. ii. 4th edit.

[C] Fluxionum Methodus inverſa, &c.] Dr. Cheyne ſays himſelf of this work, that it was 'brought forth 'in ambition, and bred up in vanity.' 'There are 'ſome things in it,' ſays he, 'tolerable for the time, 'when the methods of quadratures, the menſuration 'of ratio's, and tranſformation of curves, into thoſe 'of other kinds, were not advanced to ſuch heights 'as they now are. But it is a long time ſince I was 'forced to forego theſe barren and airy ſtudies for 'more ſubſtantial and commodious ſpeculations: 'indulging and rioting in theſe ſo exquiſitely be-'witching contemplations, being only proper for 'public profeſſors, and thoſe born to eſtates, and who 'are under no outward neceſſities. Beſides, to own 'a great but grievous truth, though they may 'quicken and ſharpen the invention, ſtrengthen and 'extend the imagination, improve and refine the rea-'ſoning faculty, and are of uſe both in the neceſſary 'and the luxurious refinement of mechanical arts; yet 'having no tendency to rectify the will, ſweeten the 'temper, or mend the heart, they often leave a ſtiff-'neſs, poſitiveneſs, and ſufficiency on weak minds, 'much more pernicious to ſociety, and the intereſts 'of the great ends of our being, than all the advan-'tages they bring them can recompenſe (2).'

(2) Pref. ut ſupra, p. iv.

to be deſerted by many of his more airy and jovial companions [D]; and this circumſtance contributed to the increaſe of his melancholy. He ſoon after retired into the country, into a fine air, and lived very low: and at this time he employed himſelf in the peruſal of ſome of the moſt valuable theological writers. He had never, even in his freer moments, deſerted the great principles of natural religion and morality [E]; but in his preſent retirement he made divine Revelation the more immediate object of his attention [F]. The books that he read were recommended to him by a worthy and learned Clergyman of the Church of England, whom he does not name, but whom he repreſents to be the man, that, of all his numerous acquaintance, he the moſt wiſhed to reſemble (k).

(k) Engliſh Malady, p. 332.

Dr. Cheyne's retirement into the country, and low regimen, having not entirely removed his complaints, he was perſuaded, by his medical and other friends, to try the Bath waters. He accordingly went to Bath, and for ſome time found conſiderable relief from drinking the waters. But he afterwards returned to London for the winter ſeaſon, and had recourſe to a milk diet [G], from which he derived the moſt ſalutary conſequences. He now followed the buſineſs of his profeſſion, with great diligence and attention, in ſummer at Bath, and in the winter at London, applying himſelf more particularly to chronical, and eſpecially to low and nervous caſes (l): and at this period of his life, he generally rode on horſeback ten or fifteen miles every day, both ſummer and winter: in ſummer on the Downs at Bath, and in winter on the Oxford road from London.

(l) Ibid. p. 339.

After our author had found his health to be thoroughly eſtabliſhed, he again made a change in his regimen, gradually leſſening the quantity of his milk and vegetables, and by ſlow degrees, and in moderate quantities, living on the lighteſt and tendereſt animal food. This he did for ſome time, and at laſt gradually went into the common mode of living, and drinking wine [H], though within the bounds of temperance (m); and appears to have enjoyed good health for ſeveral years. But his mode of living, though he indulged in no great irregularities [I], was ſtill more free than his conſtitution would admit; and at length produced very ill effects. In the courſe of ten or twelve years he continued to increaſe in ſize, and at length weighed more than thirty-two ſtone (n). His breath became ſo ſhort, that, upon ſtepping into his chariot quickly, and with ſome effort, he was ready to faint away, and his face would turn black. He was not able to walk up above one pair of ſtairs at a time, without extreme difficulty; he was forced to ride from door to door in a chariot even at Bath; and if he had but a hundred paces to walk, he was obliged, as he informs us himſelf,

(m) Ibid. p. 342.

(n) Ibid. p. 342.

[D] Deſerted by many of his more airy and jovial companions.] He ſays, 'Even thoſe who had ſhared 'the beſt part of my profuſions, who, in their neceſ'ſities had been aſſiſted by my falſe generoſity, and 'in their diſorders relieved by my care, did now en'tirely relinquiſh and abandon me; ſo that I was 'forced to retire into the country quite alone, being 'reduced to the ſtate of Cardinal Wolſey, when he 'ſaid, that if he had ſerved his Maker as faithfully 'and warmly as he had his prince, he would 'not have forſaken him in that extremity; and ſo will 'every one find, when union and friendſhip is not 'founded on ſolid virtue, and in conformity to the 'divine order, but in ſenſual pleaſures and mere 'jollity (3).'

(3) Engliſh Malady, p. 328.

[E] Never——deſerted the great principles of natural religion and morality.] He ſays, that he had always 'preſerved a firm perſuaſion of the great and funda'mental principles of all virtue and morality; viz. 'the exiſtence of a ſupreme and infinitely perfect 'Being, the freedom of the will, the immortality of 'the ſpirits of all intelligent beings, and the certainty 'of future rewards and puniſhments (4).'

(4) Ibid. p. 330.

[F] He made divine Revelation the more immediate object of his attention.] He intimates, that he had before made little progreſs in his inquiries concerning revealed religion; having almoſt taken Chriſtianity and Revelation on truſt; but now, ſays he, 'I col'lected a ſet of religious books and writers, of moſt 'of the firſt ages ſince Chriſtianity, with a few others 'of the moſt ſpiritual of the moderns, which have 'been my ſtudy, delight, and entertainment, in my 'retirements ever ſince; and on theſe I have formed 'my ideas, principles, and ſentiments: ſo as, under 'all the varieties of opinions, ſects, diſputes, and 'controverſies, that of late, and ſince the earlieſt 'ages, have been canvaſſed and bandied in the world, 'I have ſcarcely ever ſince been the leaſt ſhaken, or 'tempted to change my ſentiments or opinions, or 'ſo much as to heſitate in any material point (5).'

(5) Ibid. p. 333.

He afterwards obſerves, that he did not attain to true tranquillity of mind, till he came to this firm and ſettled reſolution, and to which he ſincerely endeavoured to adhere: "To neglect nothing to ſecure his eter"nal peace, any more than if he had been certified "he ſhould die within the day; nor to mind any "thing that his ſecular obligations and duties de"manded of him leſs, than if he had been inſured to "live fifty years more (6)."

(6) Ibid. p. 336.

[G] Had recourſe to a milk diet.] He ſays, 'I 'drank cow-milk from the park every morning, and 'engaged a milk-woman, at a higher price than 'ordinary, to bring me every day as much pure and 'unmixed, as might be ſufficient for dinner and 'breakfaſt. I uſed ſeeds, bread, mealy roots, and 'fruit with my milk indifferently, taking them all to be 'pretty nearly of the ſame nature and claſs of foods: 'milk being vegetables immediately cooked by 'animal heat and organs, and directly (without 'going the circulation) drawn from their chyle, or 'from an emulſion of vegetables in the ſtomach (7).'

(7) Engliſh Malady, p. 337.

[H] Gradually went into the common mode of living, and drinking wine.] 'For near twenty years,' he ſays, 'I continued ſober, moderate, and plain in my 'diet, and in my greateſt health drank not above a 'quart, or three pints at moſt, of wine any day (8).'

(8) Ibid. p. 342.

[I] Though he indulged in no great irregularities.] Speaking on this ſubject, in an after period of life, he ſays, 'After all I have ſaid of my exceſſes, eſpe'cially in liquor, if it be conſidered, that I was near 'thirty years old before I drank ſcarcely any thing 'ſtrong, at leaſt for a continuance: and that for near 'one half of the time ſince, viz. from thirty to ſixty, 'I ſcarcely drank any ſtrong liquor at all: It will be 'found, that, upon the whole, I drank very little 'above a pint of wine, or at moſt, not a quart one 'day with another, ſince I was near thirty: and I 'was never ſix times in my life overtaken with wine, 'and ſcarce ever taſted any diſtilled liquors, but as 'a medicine, however mixed or brewed (9).'

(9) Ibid. p. 352, 353.

to

to have a ſervant following him with a ſtool to reſt upon (o). He had alſo ſome other complaints, and grew extremely lethargic; and at Midſummer, in the year 1723, he was ſeized with a ſevere ſymptomatic fever, which terminated in a moſt violent eriſipelas. He continued to be in a very bad ſtate of health for about a year and a half, having now reſided for a conſiderable time almoſt entirely at Bath. But in December, 1725, he went to London, where he had the advice of his friend Dr. Arbuthnot, Dr. Mead, Dr. Friend, and ſome other phyſicians. From nothing, however, did he find ſo much relief as from a milk and vegetable diet; by a ſtrict adherence to which, in ſomewhat more than two years, his health was at length thoroughly eſtabliſhed; and he almoſt entirely confined himſelf to this regimen [K] during the remainder of his life.

(o) Ibid. p. 343.

In the mean time, our author continued to publiſh ſome other medical works; particularly "An Eſſay of the true Nature, and due Method of treating the Gout, toge- "ther with an Account of the Nature and Quality of Bath Waters, the Manner of "uſing them, and the Diſeaſes in which they are proper: as alſo of the Nature and "Cure of moſt Chronical Diſtempers." This paſſed through at leaſt five editions; and was followed by "An Eſſay on Health and long Life [L];" which was well received by the public, but occaſioned ſundry reflections to be thrown out againſt him by ſome perſons of the medical profeſſion [M]. In 1726, he publiſhed the ſame work in Latin, enlarged, under the following title: Georgii Cheynæi Tractatus de Infirmorum Sanitate tuenda, vitaque producenda, libro ejuſdem argumenti Anglice edito longe auctior & limatior; huic acceſſit de natura fibræ ejuſque laxæ ſive reſolutæ morbis tractatus nunc primum editus." In 1733, he publiſhed a piece, in 8vo, under the following title: "The "Engliſh Malady: or, a Treatiſe of Nervous Diſeaſes of all Kinds [N], as Spleen, "Vapours,

[K] Confined himſelf to this regimen.] In his account of his own caſe, he ſays, 'My regimen, at preſent, 'is milk, with tea, coffee, bread and butter, mild 'cheeſe, ſalladin, fruits, and ſeeds of all kinds, with 'tender roots, (as potatoes, turnips, carrots,) and, 'in ſhort, every thing that has not life, dreſſed, or 'not, as I like it; (in which there is as much, or a 'greater variety than in animal foods:) ſo that the 'ſtomach need never be cloyed. I drink no wine, 'nor any fermented liquors, and am rarely dry, moſt 'of my food being liquid, moiſt, or juicy; only, after 'dinner, I drink either coffee, or green tea, but 'ſeldom both in the ſame day, and ſometimes a glaſs 'of ſoft ſmall cyder. The thinner my diet is, the 'eaſier, more chearful, and lightſome I find myſelf. 'My ſleep is alſo the ſounder, though perhaps 'ſomewhat ſhorter than formerly under my full ani- 'mal diet. But then I am more alive than ever I 'was, as ſoon as I awake and get up. I riſe com- 'monly at ſix, and go to bed at ten (10).'

(10) Engliſh Malady, p. 361.

[L] An Eſſay on Health and long Life.] The fourth edition of this was publiſhed in 1725, 8vo. It was dedicated to Sir Joſeph Jekyll, Maſter of the Rolls, at whoſe deſire it was written.

It appears from a paſſage in this book, that Dr. Cheyne had a very unfavourable opinion of the effects of Punch. 'Next to drams,' he ſays, 'no liquor 'deſerves more to be ſtigmatized, and baniſhed the 'repaſts of the tender, valetudinary, and ſtudious, 'than Punch. 'Tis a compoſition of ſuch parts, as 'not one of them is ſalutary, or kindly to ſuch con- 'ſtitutions, except the pure element in it.'——'I 'could never ſee any temptation, for any one in their 'ſenſes, to indulge in this heatheniſh liquor, but 'that it makes its votaries the ſooneſt, and all of a 'ſudden the deepeſt drunk, holds them longeſt in 'the fit, and deprives them the moſt entirely of the 'uſe of their intellectual faculties, and bodily organs, 'of any liquor whatſoever. It is likeſt Opium, both 'in its nature, and in the manner of its operation, 'and neareſt Arſenick in its deleterious and poiſonous 'qualities: and ſo I leave it to them (11).'

(11) Eſſay of Health and long Life, p. 55. 59.

[M] Occaſioned ſundry reflections to be thrown out againſt him, &c] Of this we are informed by himſelf: 'Some good-natured and ingenious retainers 'to the profeſſion,' ſays he, 'on my publication of 'my book of long life and health, proclaimed every 'where that I was turned mere enthuſiaſt, and re- 'ſolved all things into allegory and analogy, adviſed 'people to turn monks, to run into deſarts, and to 'live on roots, herbs, and wild fruits; in fine, that 'I was at bottom a mere leveller, and for deſtroying 'order, ranks, and property, every one's but my own. 'But that ſneer had its day, and vaniſhed into 'ſmoke. Others ſwore I had eaten my book, re- 'canted my doctrine and ſyſtem (as they were pleaſed 'to term it) and was returned again to the Devil, the 'world, and the fleſh. This joke I have alſo ſtood. 'I have been ſlain again and again, both in verſe and 'proſe; but, I thank God, I am ſtill alive and well '(12).'

(12) Pref. to his Engliſh Malady, p. iii, iv.

[N] The Engliſh Malady; or, a Treatiſe of Nervous Diſeaſes of all Kinds.] In the preface to this work our author ſays, 'The title I have choſen for this trea- 'tiſe, is a reproach univerſally thrown on this iſland 'by foreigners, and all our neighbours on the conti- 'nent, by whom nervous diſtempers, ſpleen, vapours, 'and lowneſs of ſpirits, are in deriſion called the 'Engliſh Malady. And I wiſh there were not ſo 'good grounds for this reflection. The moiſture of 'our air, the variableneſs of our weather, (from our 'ſituation amidſt the ocean,) the rankneſs and ferti- 'lity of our ſoil, the richneſs and heavineſs of our 'food, the wealth and abundance of the inhabitants '(from their univerſal trade,) the inactivity and 'ſedentary occupations of the better ſort (among 'whom this evil moſt rages) and the humour of 'living in great, populous, and conſequently un- 'healthy towns, have brought forth a claſs and ſet 'of diſtempers, with atrocious and frightful ſymp- 'toms, ſcarcely known to our anceſtors, and never 'riſing to ſuch fatal heights, nor afflicting ſuch 'numbers in any other known nation. Theſe ner- 'vous diſorders being computed to make almoſt one 'third of the complaints of the people of condition 'in England.'

That it might not be ſuppoſed, that the milk and vegetable diet, and low regimen, which Dr. Cheyne recommended to valetudinary perſons, and thoſe who laboured under nervous diſeaſes, was thought proper by him for perſons in full health and vigour, he aſſerted, that he thought 'a thin, poor, cool, low diet, as 'improper and unnatural to a robuſt, active, ſtrong, 'healthy man, as a groſs, full, high diet, is for a 'poor, thin, low, valetudinary creature (13).' He alſo ſays, 'I here ſolemnly declare it, as my judg- 'ment and opinion (if it be worth the knowing) 'founded on the experience and obſervation of many 'years: 1ſt, That the diet and manner of living of 'the middling rank, who are but moderate and tempe- 'rate in foods of the common and natural product of 'the country, to wit in animal foods plainly dreſſed, 'and liquors purified by fermentation only, without 'the tortures of the fire, or without being turned 'into ſpirits, is that intended by the Author of nature 'for this climate and country, and conſequently the (13) Pref. p. 8.

" Vapours, Lowneſs of Spirits, Hypochondriacal, and Hyſterical Diſtempers, &c." His next publication, which was printed in 1740, was entitled, " An Eſſay on Regi- " men; together with five Diſcourſes, medical, moral, and philoſophical: ſerv- " ing to illuſtrate the Principles and Theory of Philoſophical Medicine, and point " out ſome of its moral Conſequences." The following paſſage, in a letter from Lord Cheſterfield to Dr. Cheyne, dated April 20, 1742, appears to refer to this work, though the date of the letter is conſiderably poſterior to the publication. 'I read, 'with great pleaſure, your book, which your bookſeller ſent me according to your di-

'moſt wholeſome, and fitteſt in general for prolong- 'ing life, and preventing diſtempers, that the ends 'of providence, and the conditions of mortality will 'admit. 2dly, That no wiſe man, who is but 'moderate and temperate in this manner, ought on 'any account to alter the kind and quality of his 'diet, till he has duly and ſufficiently tried, what 'proper medicines can do, by the advice of the moſt 'experienced and knowing phyſicians. 3dly, That 'the changes that are adviſed to be made, ought to 'be duly and maturely conſidered, and entered upon 'by degrees, whether from a higher to a lower, or 'from a lower to a higher diet. 4thly, That ſtrong 'high animal foods, and generous defecated ſpiri- 'tuous liquors, as begetting warm, full, and enli- 'vened juices, urging on the circulation with force, 'and the ſecretions with vigour, in young, robuſt, 'healthy conſtitutions, are fitteſt and moſt effectual 'for mechanical and animal ſtrength, force, action, 'and labour: and ſo abſolutely neceſſary for han- 'dicrafts, great fatigue, and military proweſs '(14).'

(14) Pref. p. 4, 5, 6.

In this book, Dr. Cheyne mentions a dangerous accident which happened to him about the year 1729, and of which he relates the following particulars: 'I was thrown,' he ſays, 'or rather threw myſelf, 'out of my chariot, (upon the fore-horſes being 'frighted, and the coachman being thrown off his 'box) and falling on my head, was taken up dead 'and ſenſeleſs, being wounded in my temple, and 'the wheels of the chariot having entirely ſhaved my 'eye-brow. But, on being blooded, I found my 'ſpirits and ſtomach moſtly affected with it. I grew, 'for ſome time, low, feeble, and loſt my appetite; 'but in two or three months recovered to a miracle, 'from what would have killed another with bad 'juices, and have continued perfectly well ever 'ſince (15).'

(15) Engliſh Malady, p. 360, 361.

This book alſo contains the extraordinary caſe of Colonel Townſhend, which is ſo ſingular, that we ſhall inſert it here in Dr. Cheyne's own words.

'Colonel Townſhend, a gentleman of excellent 'natural parts, and of great honour and integrity, 'had for many years been afflicted with a nephritick 'complaint, attended with conſtant vomitings, which 'had made his life painful and miſerable. During the 'whole time of his illneſs, he had obſerved the 'ſtricteſt regimen, living on the ſofteſt vegetables and 'lighteſt animal foods, drinking aſſes milk daily, 'even in the camp: and for common drink Briſtol 'water, which the ſummer before his death he had 'drunk on the ſpot. But his illneſs increaſing, and 'his ſtrength decaying, he came from Briſtol to Bath 'in a litter, in autumn, and lay at the Bell Inn. Dr. 'Baynard (who is ſince dead) and I were called to 'him, and attended him twice a day for about the 'ſpace of a week; but his vomitings continuing ſtill 'inceſſant, and obſtinate againſt all remedies, we 'deſpaired of his recovery. While he was in this 'condition, he ſent for us early one morning: we 'waited on him, with Mr. Skrine his Apothecary '(ſince dead alſo:) we found his ſenſes clear, and his 'mind calm! his nurſe and ſeveral ſervants were 'about him. He had made his will, and ſettled his 'affairs. He told us, he had ſent for us to give us 'ſome account of an odd ſenſation he had for ſome 'time obſerved and felt in himſelf: which was, that 'compoſing himſelf he could die or expire when he 'pleaſed, and yet by an effort, or ſome how, he could 'come to life again: which it ſeems he had ſome- 'times tried before he had ſent for us. We heard 'this with ſurprize, but as it was to be accounted 'for from no common principles, we could hardly 'believe the fact as he related it, much leſs give any 'account of it, unleſs he ſhould pleaſe to make the 'experiment before us, which we were unwilling he 'ſhould do, leſt in his weak condition, he might 'carry it too far. He continued to talk very diſ- 'tinctly and ſenſibly above a quarter of an hour 'about this (to him) ſurpriſing ſenſation, and inſiſt- 'ed ſo much on our ſeeing the trial made, that we 'were at laſt forced to comply. We all three felt 'his pulſe firſt: it was diſtinct, though ſmall and 'thready: and his heart had its uſual beating. He 'compoſed himſelf on his back, and lay in a ſtill poſ- 'ture ſome time: while I held his right hand, Dr. 'Baynard laid his hand on his heart, and Mr. Skrine 'held a clean looking-glaſs to his mouth. I found 'his pulſe ſink gradually, till at laſt I could not feel 'any, by the moſt exact and nice touch. Dr. Bay- 'nard could not feel the leaſt motion in his heart, 'nor Mr. Skrine the leaſt ſoil of breath on the bright 'mirror he held to his mouth: then each of us by 'turns examined his arm, heart, and breath, but 'could not by the niceſt ſcrutiny diſcover the leaſt 'ſymptom of life in him. We reaſoned a long time 'about this odd appearance as well as we could, and 'all of us judging it inexplicable and unaccountable, 'and finding he ſtill continued in that condition, we 'began to conclude that he had indeed carried the 'experiment too far, and at laſt were ſatisfied he was 'actually dead, and were juſt ready to leave him. 'This continued about half an hour, by nine o'clock 'in the morning in autumn. As we were going 'away, we obſerved ſome motion about the body, and 'upon examination, found his pulſe and the motion 'of his heart gradually returning: he began to 'breathe gently and ſpeak ſoftly: we were all aſto- 'niſhed to the laſt degree at this unexpected change 'and after ſome further converſation with him, and 'among ourſelves, went away fully ſatisfied as to all 'the particulars of this fact, but confounded and 'puzzled, and not able to form any rational ſcheme 'that might account for it. He afterwards called 'for his attorney, added a codicil to his will, ſettled 'legacies on his ſervants, received the ſacrament, and 'calmly and compoſedly expired about five or ſix 'o'clock that evening. Next day he was opened, '(as he had ordered) his body was the ſoundeſt and 'beſt made I had ever ſeen; his lungs were fair, 'large, and ſound; his heart big and ſtrong, and his 'inteſtines ſweet and clean: his ſtomach was of a due 'proportion, the coats ſound and thick, and the 'villous membrane quite entire. But when we came 'to examine the kidnies, though the left was per- 'fectly ſound and of a juſt ſize, the right was about 'four times as big, diſtended like a blown bladder, 'and yielding as if full of pap; he having often paſſ- 'ed a wheyiſh liquor after his urine, during his 'illneſs. Upon opening this kidney, we found it 'quite full of a white chalky matter, like plaiſter of 'Paris, and all the fleſhy ſubſtance diſſolved and worn 'away, by what I called a nephritick cancer. This 'had been the ſource of all his miſery; and the 'ſymptomatick vomitings from the irritation on the 'conſentient nerves, had quite ſtarved and worn him 'down. I have narrated the facts, as I ſaw and ob- 'ſerved them deliberately and diſtinctly, and ſhall 'leave to the philoſophick reader to make what in- 'ferences he thinks fit: the truth of the material 'circumſtances I will warrant (16).'

(16) Ibid. p. 307, &c.

'rections.

'rections. The phyſical part is extremely good, and the metaphyſical part [O] may 'be ſo too, for what I know, and I believe it is; for as I look upon all metaphyſics 'to be gueſs work of imagination, I know no imagination likelier to hit upon the 'right than your's; and I will take your gueſs againſt any other metaphyſician's what-'ſoever. That part, which is founded upon knowledge and experience, I look upon 'as a work of public utility, and for which the preſent age, and their poſterity, may 'be obliged to you, if they will be pleaſed to follow it (p).' The laſt work of our author, which he dedicated to the Earl of Cheſterfield, was entitled, "The natural "Method of curing the Diſeaſes of the Body, and the Diſorders of the Mind depend-"ing on the Body: in three Parts. Part I. General Reflections on the Oeconomy of "Nature in animal Life. Part II. The Means and Methods for preſerving Life and "Faculties; and alſo concerning the Nature and Cure of acute, contagious, and ce-"phalic Diſorders. Part III. Reflections on the Nature and Cure of particular chroni-"cal Diſtempers."

(p) Lord Cheſterfield's Miſcellaneous Works, vol. ii. p. 454.

Dr. Cheyne died at Bath, in the year 1742, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age. He had great reputation in his own time, both as a practitioner, and as a writer; and moſt of his pieces paſſed through ſeveral editions. He is to be ranked among thoſe phyſicians who have accounted for the operations of medicine, and the morbid alterations which take place in the human body, upon mechanical principles. A ſpirit of piety and of benevolence, and an ardent zeal for the intereſts of virtue, are predominant throughout his writings. An amiable candour and ingenuouſneſs are alſo diſcernible, and which led him to retract with readineſs whatever appeared to him to be cenſurable in what he had formerly advanced [P]. Some of the metaphyſical notions which he has introduced into his books may, perhaps, juſtly be thought fanciful and ill-grounded; but there is an agreeable vivacity in his productions, together with much openneſs and frankneſs, and, in general, great perſpicuity.] T.

[O] The metaphyſical part, &c.] The fourth of thoſe diſcourſes which he has annexed to his Eſſay on Regimen, contains "Philoſophical Conjectures of "ſpiritual Nature, and the human Spirit in parti-"cular." The fifth diſcourſe contains "Philoſo-"phical Conjectures on natural Analogy, its Laws, "and ſome of their Conſequences."

In the former of theſe diſcourſes are the following paſſages: 'It is highly probable and philoſophical, 'to think there is no perfectly pure and immaterial 'ſpirit, but the ſupreme ſpirit, the Father and Cre-'ator of all ſpirits; and that all created ſpirits, how 'high and ſublime ſoever, have proper and peculiar 'bodies, and organized caſes, not only to circum-'ſcribe and limit their powers, and their extenſion 'and expanſion, but to enable them to communi-'cate, and commerciate with, to contemplate and 'admire the contrivance of the material world; to 'converſe with the lower ranks of intelligences, that 'we certainly know have material vehicles, ſuch as 'we of the human race are; but alſo to execute the 'orders of the divine œconomy and providence, over 'the whole ſyſtem of intelligences, and material 'world. And accordingly we find mention made in 'holy writ of a natural body and a ſpiritual body; 'and of the ſun and planets having a particular 'glory, in their bodies, peculiar to themſelves; and 'of the glorious appearance and radiation of our Sa-'viour's body on the mount.'

'What a ſpiritual ſubſtance, or of what nature the 'ſubſtratum of theſe faculties of underſtanding and 'will, or of thinking is, we ſhall never perfectly 'know, till we arrive at the world of ſpirits, and drop 'this coarſe earthly tabernacle. Indeed, we know 'nothing of the internal ſubſtance of any being: all 'we know, or can know, is, their ſenſible qualities, 'and the effects of them on us; and ſomething in 'general we learn of inanimated bodies, and their 'laws, from the uniformity of theſe effects: and we 'may be certain, that ſpiritual ſubſtance is in moſt, 'if not in all its qualities, contradictory, at leaſt 'contrary, to body, or material ſubſtance, and vice 'verſa.'

'Living, ſenſation, or actuation of matter, is not 'eaſy to define or deſcribe. Exiſtence or being be-'longs to matter as well as ſpirit; but life, ſenſa-'tion, or perception, and their conſequences, belong 'only to ſome one rank of ſpirit or mind; and I 'may defy all the philoſophers and mathematicians, 'that ever have been, to explain conſiſtently, from 'matter and mechaniſm alone, as it now obtains, the 'life, growth, and fecundity of the loweſt plant or 'vegetable, at leaſt its ſeed or ſeeding, much leſs of 'the leaſt inſect or animal, and leaſt of all of a ra-'tional, ſentient, and percipient being: ſo that 'wherever there is any degree of life, vegetative, 'ſenſitive, or rational, there is probably ſome degree 'of a ſoul, or ſpirit, immaterial, immortal, and 'progreſſive; ſo that life, or animation, in all crea-'tures in general, is indeed matter organized and 'actuated by a ſpirit, or ſoul, of ſome one rank or 'degree or other. I mean only created life, or life 'derivative, as it is in creatures; for in the Creator, 'life is without matter, without body or vehicle, and 'without limits, or poſſibility of non-exiſtence or not 'living. The beſt notion, idea, or perception, we 'can frame of created life, is that of a nice, delicate, 'finely contrived machine, of a vaſt variety of organs 'ſet in motion by the firſt cauſe, and continued by an 'internal ſelf-motive ſpring, which ſpring is this 'ſpiritual ſubſtance (17).'

(17) Eſſay on Regimen, &c. p. 122, 123, 124.

[P] Led him to retract with readineſs whatever appeared to him to be cenſurable, &c.] Of this we have a remarkable inſtance in the preface to his Eſſay on Health and Long Life, in which is the following paſſage: 'The defence of that book his (Methodus Fluxiorum 'inverſa,) againſt the learned and acute Mr. Abr. 'de Moivre, being written in a ſpirit of levity and re-'ſentment, I moſt ſincerely retract, and wiſh undone, 'ſo far as it is perſonal or peeviſh, and aſk him and 'the world pardon for it; as I do for the defence of 'Dr. Pitcairn's Diſſertations, and the New Theory 'of Fevers, againſt the late learned and ingenious 'Dr. Oliphant. I heartily condemn and deteſt all 'perſonal reflections, all malicious and unmannerly 'terms, and all falſe and unjuſt repreſentations, as 'unbecoming gentlemen, ſcholars, and Chriſtians; 'and diſprove and undo both performances, as far as 'in me lies, in every thing that does not ſtrictly and 'barely relate to the argument (18).']

(18) Pref. p. vi, vii. 4th edit.

CHICHLEY, or CHICHELY (Henry), Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the reigns of Henry V. and VI., was born of an obſcure family, at Higham-Ferrars, in Northamptonſhire (a). He was educated in Grammar-learning at Wincheſter-School (b), and afterwards became Fellow of New-College in Oxford, where he took the degree of Doctor

(a) Arthur Duck's Life of Henry Chichele, &c. made Engliſh. Lond. 1699, 8vo. p. 1.

(b) Harpsfield, Hiſt. Angl. Eccleſ. Duaci 1622, fol. p. 620.

Doctor in the Civil and Canon Law. He was next Chaplain to Robert Medford, Biſhop of Saliſbury, who, about the year 1402, preferred him to the Archdeaconry of Saliſbury [A], which he exchanged, two years after, for the Chancellorſhip of that dioceſe [B]. His eminent qualifications being now generally taken notice of, he was employed by King Henry IV. in ſeveral important negotiations. He was ſent Embaſſador to Pope Gregory XII. to congratulate him on his advancement to the papacy (c). The Biſhoprick of St. David's becoming vacant during his abſence, he was promoted to that ſee by the Pope, who conſecrated him with his own hands at Sienna, the 4th of October 1407 [C]. He returned into England in April following, and on the 26th of Auguſt made profeſſion of canonical obedience in the Cathedral Church of Canterbury. In the beginning of the year 1409, he was deputed by the Synod of London, with Robert Hallum, Biſhop of Saliſbury, and the Prior of Canterbury, to the General Council of Piſa, held for the putting an end to the ſchiſm of the Church (d). After the breaking up of that Council, Biſhop Chichley returned into England, and was preſent in two Synods holden at London in 1410 and 1411 (e). In 1413, he was ſent by King Henry V. Embaſſador, together with Richard, Earl of Warwick, firſt to the King of France, and then to the Duke of Burgundy, for concluding a truce between England and France, then at war (f). And being returned into England, he was ſent again the ſame year, with the Earl of Warwick, to demand the Duke of Burgundy's daughter in marriage for King Henry (g). The next year, 1414, upon the death of Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, our Biſhop of St. David's was tranſlated, by virtue of the Pope's bull, to the Archiepiſcopal See [D]. The King delivered to him the temporalities the 30th

(c) Arth. Duck, ubi ſupra, p. 2, 3, 4.

(d) Id. ib. p. 5, 6.

(e) Ibid. p. 33.

(f) Monſtrelet. c. 106, ap. Ar. Duck, ubi ſupra, p. 34, 35.

(g) Monſtrelet. c. 109, ap. Ar. Duck, ib. p. 35.

[A] He was preferred to the Archdeaconry of Saliſbury.] The learned Dr. Duck tells us (1), that one Walter Fitzperes, a prieſt, commenced a ſuit againſt him for this dignity, claiming it by virtue of a Grant from King Henry IV. under the Great Seal. But, the cauſe being brought by appeal before Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Archdeaconry was adjudged to Henry Chichley by the Auditor of the Archbiſhop's court, who was deputed with full power to determine this affair.

(1) In his Life of Henry Chichele, &c. made Engliſh, Lond. 1699, 8vo. p. 2.

[B] He exchanged it for the Chancellorſhip of that dioceſe.] He made this exchange with Walter Medford, the Biſhop of Saliſbury's brother, who enjoyed that dignity; which was allowed to be lawful by the conſtitutions of the Canon Law: and having both quitted their ſeveral dignities, Henry was made Chancellor, and Walter Archdeacon. There was annexed to the Chancellorſhip the Parſonage of Odyham in the dioceſe of Winchester, which was then vacant, and was given him by the Biſhop, and he was immediately put in poſſeſſion of it by the Cuſtos Rotulorum of the See of Winchester, which was then vacant by the death of William Wickham (2). Here it may be proper to obſerve from the ſame author (3), that theſe two preferments (the Archdeaconry and Chancellorſhip) were both given him by the Biſhop of Saliſbury, who always highly eſteemed him, and when he died, which was about three years after, left him by will a golden cup with a cover, and appointed him the chief of his executors.

(2) Id. ib. p. 3.

(3) Ibid.

[C] He was conſecrated the 4th of October 1407.] Biſhop Godwin (4) aſſigns the 12th of June 1409, which is almoſt two years later, for the time of his conſecration. But, if he was deputed, in quality of Biſhop of St. David's, to the Synod of Piſa, in the beginning of the year 1409 (5), it is plain his conſecration to that See muſt have preceded that date: and therefore I adhere to the authority of the Life-writer in this point.

(4) Comment. de Præſul. Angl. inter Epiſ. Menev. ann. 1409.

(5) See the text, ref. (d).

[D] He was tranſlated, by virtue of the Pope's bull, to the Archbiſhopric of Canterbury.] Upon the death of Archbiſhop Arundel, John Woodenburgh, Prior of Canterbury, and the monks of that church, deſired the King's leave for electing a new Archbiſhop; which prerogative, the learned author of Chichley's Life affirms, the Kings of England had challenged to themſelves ſince the time of Edward III. who took it away from the Pope, and conſtituted Biſhops by his own authority; and that theſe royal elections were agreeable to the conſtitutions of the Canon Law (6). But this ſeems to be a miſtake: for the author of the Antiquity of the Britiſh Church expreſsly tells us, that, at the very time we are ſpeaking of, notwithſtanding the laws in being againſt Papal proviſions, the many royal proclamations and petitions of the Clergy, and even the threats of the nobility and people, againſt obtaining thoſe proviſions for biſhopricks and other benefices, they were ſtill ſuffered and obtained, with as much licence and impunity, as if there were no law forbidding them. Lege atque ſanctione jam diu ante contra Papales proviſiones lata, multiſq; regum decretis & cleri interceſſionibus, procerumq; & populi minis interpoſitis, ne impetrarentur à Papa epiſcopatum & beneficiorum proviſiones; ea tamen adhuc impunitate ac licentia permiſſæ atque obtentæ ſunt, ac ſi nullo jure vetari putarentur (7). The King's leave being obtained under the Great Seal, the monks aſſembled in the Chapter-Houſe, and, after divine ſervice, and a ſermon, proceeded to the choice of an Archbiſhop; and, the election unanimouſly falling upon Chichley, it was declared by John Langdon, one of the monks, in the name of the reſt, to the people, who were aſſembled in the church in great numbers. The ſame day two of the monks, William Moleſh and John Moland, were appointed proxies for the reſt; who, on the 15th of March, waited upon the Biſhop at London, and acquainted him with the humble requeſt of the prior and monks, that he would take upon him the government of the church of Canterbury. He deſired a day's time to conſider of it; and the next day, when they came to him again in the Biſhop of Norwich's houſe, in the preſence of Edward Duke of York, and ſeveral of the nobility, he expreſsly told them, he could not gratify their requeſt without the Pope's conſent, to whoſe arbitration he referred their petition. Whereupon the prior and the monks, by their proxies, ſent to Rome, humbly requeſted of Pope John XXIII. that he would confirm their election of the Biſhop of St. David's to the See of Canterbury. The King alſo ſignified to his Holineſs, that he had granted leave to the Chapter of Canterbury to elect an Archbiſhop. The Pope, who was then at Bologne, would not confirm the election of the monks, but, on the 27th of April, in virtue of his own authority, tranſlated Chichley by way of Proviſor (*), to the Archbiſhoprick (8). The author of the Antiquity of the Britiſh Church tells us, that the Pope, reſolving to keep faſt hold of the right of nominating to benefices, by way of Papal Proviſion, and not to depart from it by any diſuſe, or by permitting any contrary acts, ſignified to the monks of Canterbury by letter, that he had reſerved to himſelf the collation to the See of Canterbury, before the death of Thomas Arundel, and that he annulled whatever they, or any other perſons, might have done in prejudice of his Proviſion. However he collated, by his Bull of Proviſion, the ſame Henry Chichley, whom they had elected, to the archiepiſcopal ſee. Papa vero Joannes viceſimus tertius, ut proviſionis uſu captionem teneret mordicus, nec ab ea deſuetudine ulla aut contrariis

(6) Ar. Duck, ubi ſupra, p. 36, 37.

(7) Matt. Parker, De Antiq. Brit. Eccleſ. edit. S. Drake, Lond. 1729, fol. p. 414.

(*) Proviſionis titulo.

(8) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 37—40.

30th of May, and on the 29th of June following (h), the pall was delivered to him by the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Norwich, delegated by the Pope for that purpoſe, with great ſolemnity, in the preſence of the King, and many of the Nobility, at the King's palace of Sutton (i): at which time he took an oath of obedience and fidelity to the Pope [E]. In a Parliament held the ſame year at Leiceſter, Archbiſhop Chichley perſuaded King Henry V. to aſſert his title to the crown of France [F]. On the 28th of November, 1415, he held a Provincial Synod at London [G], and another on the 1ſt of April, 1416 [H]; after the breaking up of which, the Archbiſhop went over into France to the King (k). He came back ſoon after with the King from Calais, and, by the King's command, held a third Synod at London on the 9th of November, 1416 [I]. The King being again departed for France, the Archbiſhop commanded all the Biſhops of his province to cauſe proceſſions to be made in all churches and chapels, for the ſafety of the King, and the ſucceſs of his arms (l). The ſame year he exerciſed the power of eccleſiaſtical cenſures, in a remarkable manner, againſt the Lord and Lady Strange [K]. On the 26th of November, 1417, he held a fourth Synod at (b) Regiſtr. Chichele.

(i) Ibid.

(k) Ar. Duck, ibid. p. 75.

(l) Id. ib. p. 75, 76.

trariis tolerandis actibus recederet, monachis Cantuarienſibus reſcripſit; Cantuarienſis Archiepiſcopatus collationem ſuæ proviſioni ante mortem Thomæ Arundel fuiſſe reſervatam; ſeque irritum ac inane decreviſſe, quicquid ab his, aut aliis quibuſcunque, in ſuæ proviſionis prejudicium fieret. Tum Archiepiſcopatum eidem Henrico Chichley proviſionis ſuæ prætextu donavit (9).

(9) M. Parker, ubi ſupra.

[E] He took an oath of obedience and fidelity to the Pope.] It was conceived in the following terms (10). I Henry, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, will be faithful and obedient to St. Peter, to the holy Apoſtolical Church of Rome, and to my Lord John the twenty-third, and his ſucceſſors that ſhall be canonically elected. I will not conſent to, nor engage in any deſign againſt their life, limbs, or liberty. The ſecrets that they ſhall entruſt me with, either by themſelves, by their legates, or by letters, I will not reveal to any one to their prejudice. I will aſſiſt them in maintaining and defending the Papacy, and the rights of St. Peter, againſt all perſons whatſoever, as far as is conſiſtent with the privileges of my own ſtation. I will honourably attend the Legate of the Apoſtolick See both at his coming and return, and will ſupply his neceſſities. When I am called to a Council, I will come, unleſs hindered by ſome lawful impediment. I will viſit the Apoſtolical Palace every three years, either in my own perſon, or by my deputy, unleſs excuſed by leave from the Pope. The poſſeſſions belonging to my Archieſpicopal See I will not ſell, nor give away, nor mortgage, nor grant any new infeoffments of them, nor any other way alienate them without the conſent of the Pope. So help me God, and his holy Goſpel. This tie of canonical obedience to the Pope ſeeming to bear hard upon the duty of a ſubject, and to contain ſeveral clauſes not reconcileable to the oath of allegiance, the Archbiſhop, when he did homage to the King, was obliged to renounce all clauſes in the Pope's bull of tranſlation, or any other engagements to that See, which were prejudicial to the royal prerogative (11).

(10) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 42.

(11) Id. ib. p. 43.

[F] He perſuaded King Henry V. to aſſert his title to the crown of France.] King Henry having demanded of the Parliament a ſubſidy, the Commons thereupon revived a former project againſt the wealth of the Clergy, and addreſſed the King to ſeize their revenues, and apply them to the ſervice of the publick. The Archbiſhop, apprehenſive of the Church's danger, and fearing the King's youth might be ſurprized by the plauſibleneſs of the bill, adviſed the Clergy to make an offer of a large ſubſidy, and to put the King in mind of his title to the Crown of France; the ſtarting a new enterprize, and opening the proſpect to another Crown, being the moſt likely way to divert the ſtorm. Moſt of the writers of that age relate, that the Archbiſhop, upon this occaſion, called a Synod at London: but none of it's decrees are now to be found among the publick records. The Archbiſhop's expedient being approved, he prepared himſelf for the ſubject, and addreſſed himſelf in a ſpeech to the King, ſitting on his throne. He began with inſinuating the virtues of the King, ſaying, he was worthy to wear, not the Crown of England only, but that of the whole world. Then he repreſented to him, 'That it was inconſiſtent 'with his glory to let the French King peaceably 'enjoy Normandy, Anjou, Touraine, Maine, and 'part of Guienne, all thoſe provinces having been 'taken away from the Kings of England by mere 'force, and upon frivolous pretences: that he had 'not only an inconteſtable right to theſe countries, 'but even might very juſtly pretend to the whole 'kingdom of France, in quality of heir and ſucceſſor 'of Edward III.' Here the Archbiſhop made a long deduction of the reaſons, upon which the King's title was founded. He ſpeaks of the Salique Law as a mere chimera, ſupported upon no good foundation, and which, being contrary to natural right, could not be admitted, even ſuppoſing it to be as true, as it was imaginary (†).

(†) The Archbiſhop, or whoever made the Speech for him, forgot, that without the Salique Law, Edward III. himſelf could have no pretenſion to the crown of France.

[G] He held a Provincial Synod at London, the 28th of November, 1415.] The firſt day of their meeting was taken up in religious aſſemblies. The following days, the Biſhops and Abbots met in St. Mary's chapel, and the Priors, Deans, Archdeacons, and Proctors of the ſeveral Dioceſes, withdrew into the Chapter-Houſe, where they conſulted ſeparately about the affairs of the Church; from whence (ſays my author) they are generally called, The Upper and Lower Houſe of Convocation.

[H] ——Another Synod on the 1ſt of April, 1416.] This Synod was held, to conſult with the Biſhops and Clergy about ſending Delegates to the Council of Conſtance (12).

(12) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 71; and M. Parker, ib. p. 415.

[I] He held a third Synod at London on the 9th of November, 1416.] In this Synod, at the requeſt of Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Earl Marſhal, and Henry Ware, Keeper of the Privy Seal, who for that purpoſe were ſent thither by the King, he prevailed with the Clergy to grant the King two tenths for his expedition into France. There was nothing elſe done in this Synod, but the appointing the days of John Beverley, and of Criſpin and Criſpianus, on which the battle of Agincourt was fought, to be holy days (13).

(13) Ibid. p. 75, 76; and M. Parker, ib. p. 416.

[K] He exerciſed the power of eccleſiaſtical cenſures —againſt the Lord and Lady Strange.] The affair was this. On Eaſter-Day, the Lord Strange, with the Lady Elizabeth his wife, and a great train of ſervants attending them, came to St. Dunſtan's Church to veſpers; and meeting Sir John Truſſel there, between whom and the Lord Strange there had been an ancient quarrel, the Lord Strange's ſervants drew their ſwords in the church, wounded Sir John, his ſon, and ſome others of his family, and killed one Thomas Petwardy a citizen of London, who, to accommodate the matter between them, had thruſt himſelf into the ſcuffle. The affair being brought before the Archbiſhop, he interdicted the church, as having been polluted with blood, and publickly excommunicated the authors and accomplices of the crime at Paul's Croſs. And ſitting as Judge in St. Paul's Church, after he had examined the fact, he obliged the Lord Strange and his Lady to aſk the Church's pardon on their knees before him; and impoſed this farther penance on them, that their ſervants in their ſhirts and drawers only, and he and his wife with tapers in their hands, ſhould walk through the great ſtreet of the city from St. Paul's to St. Dunſtan's: which was accordingly performed with great ſolemnity, and, when the Archbiſhop purified St. Dunſtan's church, the Lady Strange filled the veſſels with water; and each of them were commanded to offer a pyx and an altar-cloth (14).

(14) Ibid. p. 77, 78; and M. Parker, ib. p. 427.

London [L], upon a command from the King by letters out of France (m). Towards the end of this year, the Archbiſhop repaired to the King at Rouen in Normandy, and was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for treating of a peace between England and France (n). He ſtaid ſome time with the King at Rouen, being entertained in a Convent of preaching Friars there, and afterwards attended his Majeſty in his camp at Meudon and Pontoiſe; whence he returned into England about the end of Auguſt 1419 (o). On the 30th of October that year, he held a fifth Synod at London [M]; after which he again ordered proceſſions to be made to all churches for the King's ſucceſs in France (p). On the 10th of June, 1420, the Archbiſhop took ſhipping at Winchelſea, and ſailed over to France, to congratulate the King upon his late marriage with Catherine of France, and was preſent in the King's camp at the ſiege of Melun; after the ſurrender of which, he accompanied the King to Paris; from whence he returned into England about the end of November (q). The next year, 1421, he ſolemnly crowned Queen Catherine (r), and about that time called a ſixth Synod at London [N]; after the breaking up of which, he uſed ſome endeavours to unite the churches of France and England [O]. In December that year, he chriſtened the young Prince Henry, afterwards King Henry VI. who, when he came to the crown, uſed to call the Archbiſhop godfather, and always paid him a great deal of reſpect (s). On the 4th of Auguſt, 1422, the Archbiſhop held a ſeventh Synod at London [P]. In the firſt Parliament after the death of Henry V. held at Weſtminſter the 9th of November, 1422 (t), Archbiſhop Chichley was commanded by the Protector to declare the cauſe of their meeting [Q], and was likewiſe nominated to be the firſt Privy Counſellor during the minority of the King: but he choſe to decline publick buſineſs, and retired within the bounds of his province, in which he performed the duties of his function with great diligence. The next year, 1423, by virtue of his metropolitical authority, he viſited the dioceſes of Chicheſter and Saliſbury, and the year following that of Lincoln. About this time he founded a noble college at Higham-Ferrers, the place of his birth, in honour of the Virgin Mary, St. Thomas of Canterbury, and King Edward the Confeſſor, for eight Fellows, four Clerks, ſix Choriſters, and over them all a Maſter, to pray for the ſouls of the deceaſed. He alſo built a large hoſpital, for the maintenance of the poor of that place. Both theſe foundations he endowed with ample revenues, which were afterwards augmented, with great legacies, by his brothers Robert and William Chichley, Aldermen of London (u). He held an eighth Synod at London, the 12th of October,

(m) Ib. p. 86—88.

(n) Ib. p. 94, 95.

(o) Ib. p. 97, 98.

(p) Ib. p. 99.

(q) Ib. p. 101, 102.

(r) Ibid.

(s) Ib. p. 105.

(t) Rotul. Parl. ann. 1 H. VI.

(u) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 113, 114; and M. Parker, Antiq. Brit. Eccleſ. edit. S. Drake, Lond. 1729, fol. p. 426, 427.

[L] He held a fourth Synod at London the 26th of November, 1417.] In this Synod were preſent Thomas Biſhop of Durham, Lord Chancellor of England; Thomas Beaufort Duke of Exeter, Henry Piercy Earl of Northumberland, and Ralph Nevil Earl of Weſtmorland; being ſent by the Regent, John Duke of Bedford, to deſire of the Clergy a ſupply of money for the King, who was then carrying on the war ſucceſsfully in France; which being ſeconded by the Archbiſhop, they granted two tenths.

[M] He held a fifth Synod at London the 30th of October, 1417.] It was ſummoned, that the Clergy might conſult about granting a ſupply of money to the King, who was carrying on the war in France with ſucceſs. The Synod granted half a tenth upon all livings; and it was alſo agreed, that thoſe that held chapels or chantries, or that received ſtipends for ſaying maſs, ſhould pay to the King ſix ſhillings and eightpence each: but withal a publick proteſtation was made by William Lyndewood, in the name of the Proctors for the Clergy, that this conceſſion ſhould be no prejudice to them hereafter, nor be made a precedent for ſucceeding ages (15).

(15) Ibid. p. 98.

[N] He called a ſixth Synod at London.] He obtained of them a tenth for the ſervice of the King; which was granted upon ſome conditions, put in by William Lyndewood, in the name of the Proctors for the Clergy. They were theſe: That the King's purveyors ſhould not meddle with the goods of the Clergy; that they ſhould not be committed to priſon, but upon manifeſt conviction of theft or murther; that for all other crimes they ſhould only find ſureties for their appearance at their trial, but ſhould not be impriſoned; and that it ſhould be felony to geld a prieſt: all which the King confirmed in parliament (16).

(16) Ibid. p. 103.

[O] He endeavoured to unite the Churches of France and England.] To this end, he recalled thoſe judges he had placed, to exerciſe eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, in moſt of the dioceſes conquered by the King; and by his letters commanded all the people of France, that for the future they ſhould obey their Biſhops, and the Ordinaries of the places in which they lived (17).

(17) Ar. Duck, ibid. p. 105.

[P] He held a ſeventh Synod at London the 4th of Auguſt, 1422.] In this Synod, ſeveral Biſhops, and others of the Clergy, were appointed to repreſent the Engliſh nation at the Council of Pavia (18).

(18) Ibid. p. 107.

[Q] He was commanded by the Protector to declare the cauſe of their meeting.] This he did in a ſet ſpeech, wherein, having ſpoken largely in praiſe of the virtues of King Henry V. and made honourable mention of his actions in France, he came to ſpeak of the young King, and affirmed, 'That it was by the 'ſpecial favour of Almighty God, that a ſon of ſuch 'promiſing hopes ſhould ſucceed ſo great a father; 'that his very title of the Sixth was attended with a 'lucky omen; for, as the number Six was the moſt 'complete of all the reſt, becauſe in ſo many days 'God Almighty had made this vaſt fabrick of the 'world; ſo this King Henry, the ſixth of that name, 'would prove the greateſt of all his predeceſſors, and 'compleat what his father had ſo proſperouſly begun 'in France; and that, as he was deſcended both from 'the Kings of England and France, ſo he would at 'length enjoy both thoſe crowns, which were devolv'ed to him by lawful inheritance.' Then the Archbiſhop declared, in the King's name, to the Peers, and all the people, 'That they ſhould enjoy all the privi'leges and immunities granted them by his Highneſs's 'predeceſſors; and that he was commanded to give 'them three reaſons for calling this Parliament; which 'were, That governors might be aſſigned the King by 'a publick act; that they might conſult about the 'peace of the realm, and the adminiſtration of juſtice; 'and that they might provide for the defence of the 'kingdom againſt the inſults of foreign enemies.' Laſtly, he exhorted them, from the example of Jethro, Moſes's father-in-law, 'To make choice of the 'beſt and wiſeſt of the nobility, to take upon them 'the government of the King and kingdom, and to 'uſe their utmoſt endeavours for the ſafety of the 'King, and the benefit of their country (19).'

(19) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 111—113.

1423 [R]; and a ninth the 23d of April following [S]. The ſame year he was very inſtrumental in healing the differences between the Protector Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, and Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter (w). He held a tenth Synod at London, the 15th of April, 1426 [T]. About this time Pope Martin ſhewed his diſpleaſure againſt our Archbiſhop [U], for having vigorouſly oppoſed the encroachments of the See of Rome (x). The Archbiſhop held an eleventh Synod at London, the 5th of July, 1428 [W]; a twelfth, the 19th of February, 1430 [X]; a thirteenth, the 15th of September, 1432 [Y]; a fourteenth, the 7th of November, 1433 [Z]; a fifteenth, the 7th of October, 1434 [AA]; and a ſixteenth, the 30th of April, 1437. About (w) See the article BEAUFORT (HENRY).

(x) Ib. p. 132.

[R] He held an eighth Synod at London, the 12th of October, 1423.] This Synod was called, to demand of the Clergy a ſupply of money for the war with France. The Biſhop of Wincheſter, in a formal ſpeech, laid before them the preſent condition of affairs in France, and exhorted and intreated them to beſtow ſome part of their revenues for ſubduing the remains of the Dauphin's forces (20).

(20) Ibid. p. 115.

[S] ——And a ninth the 23d of April following.] This Synod was prevailed upon, by the florid ſpeeches of the Lord Chancellor, and the flatteries, threats, and promiſes, of the court Lords, to grant the King half a tenth (21).

(21) Ibid. p. 118.

[T] He held a tenth Synod at London, the 15th of April, 1426.] This aſſembly did nothing but grant the King half a tenth towards carrying on the war (*).

(*) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 123, 124.

[U] Pope Martin V. ſhewed his diſpleaſure againſt the Archbiſhop.] The ſtate of this affair is briefly this. His Holineſs, it ſeems, thought this prelate to blame for having made no oppoſition to the ſtatute of Premunire 1 Henry IV. But, Henry V. being the greateſt Prince in Chriſtendom, the Pope did not think it adviſeable to remonſtrate in his time. But now, the Engliſh affairs being ſomewhat upon the decline, he laid hold of the opportunity, and expoſtulated ſeverely with the Archbiſhop for his remiſſneſs, in a letter dated December the 5th, 1426 (22). If it be aſked, what was Chichley's peculiar guilt in this matter, ſince he could not oppoſe a ſtatute, which was paſſed before his time; and why his predeceſſors Courtney and Arundel were not reprimanded upon this ſcore: the anſwer is, that the Pope ſeems to have had a peculiar grudge againſt Chichley; firſt, becauſe that prelate, in his firſt Synod, had moved for the annulling Papal Exemptions (23); and, in the next place, becauſe he had written to King Henry V. to ſtop the Cardinalate of the Biſhop of Wincheſter (24). Beſides, the Papacy had been hitherto greatly embroiled by ſchiſms: but now Pope Martin, having gotten the better of his competitors, had time to look about him (25). The Archbiſhop, not willing the matter ſhould come to extremities, ſent an excuſe of his conduct to Rome. But the Pope, it ſeems, was not ſatisfied with this anſwer; for his Holineſs's next letter is ſtill more ſevere, and ſuſpends the Archbiſhop's legantine power. Upon this Chichley appealed from the Pope to the next General Council, and, if none met, to the tribunal of Chriſt (26). The Pope's next to the Archbiſhop is dated the ſixth of May, and requires him to make his utmoſt effort for repealing the ſtatute. He is likewiſe ſeverely reprimanded for having ſaid, the Pope's zeal in this matter was only to raiſe a good ſum of money upon the Engliſh (27). The next letter is in a ſtill higher ſtrain. It is directed to the two Archbiſhops, and, to mortify Chichley, the Archbiſhop of York is named firſt. In this the Supremacy flies a very lofty pitch: for his Holineſs pretends to make void the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Premunire made in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II. and commands the Archbiſhops never to act upon the authority of thoſe ſtatutes. It is dated the 8th of December (28). To mollify the Pope's diſpleaſure, the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhops of London, Durham, and Lincoln, wrote in Chichley's behalf. The Univerſity of Oxford likewiſe interceded for him with Pope Martin, in a letter bearing date the 24th of July that year; in which, after giving him a very extraordinary character, calling him the mirror of life, the light of manners, a perſon moſt dear to the people and clergy, and a golden candleſtick ſet up in the Church of England, they beſought his Holineſs, that he would not ſuffer the credit of ſo eminent a prelate to be blaſted by the ſecret calumnies of detractors (29). To this purpoſe alſo, in the Parliament at Weſtminſter (30), the Houſe of Commons petitioned the King to ſend an Embaſſador to the court of Rome to intercede with the Pope in behalf of the Archbiſhop (31). Theſe apologetical applications the Archbiſhop ſent by an expreſs to Rome, and wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to the Pope, proteſting that he had done, and would ſtill do, his utmoſt towards repealing thoſe ſtatutes. One paſſage in his letter is particularly remarkable. He tells the Pope, he hears he had proceeded to a ſentence againſt him, which had never been done from the days of St. Auguſtin (32) to that time: that he knew this only by report, having not ſo much as opened the bulls, which contained the cenſure, becauſe he had been commanded by the King to lodge thoſe inſtruments, with the ſeals whole, in the Paper-Office, 'till the meeting of the Parliament (33). The Archbiſhop had already moved the Commons to vote for the repeal of the Premunire act. But the Commons, after debating the matter, had come to no reſolution, either for repealing or explaining that act (34). And here the matter reſted for that time.

(12) See Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, vol. i. in the Records, p. 95.

(23) Walſingham, Hiſt. Angl. p. 387.

(24) Ar. Duck, ibid. p. 124, &c.

(25) Spondan. Annal. ad ann. 1429.

(26) Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 110.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Ibid.

(29) Epiſt. Acad. Oxon. 36 in Archiv. & Wood, Hiſt. &c. Univ. Oxon. l. i. p. 212.

(30) Rot. Parl. 6 H. VI.

(31) Ar. Duck, ubi ſupra, p. 133.

(32) The firſt Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

(33) Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 111.

(34) Id. ib. p. 100.

[W] He held an eleventh Synod at London, the 5th of July, 1428.] In their firſt ſeſſion, at the requeſt of the Archbiſhop of York Lord Chancellor, and Walter Hungerford Lord Treaſurer, they granted the King half a tenth. This Synod was prorogued, by reaſon of the exceſſive heat of the ſummer, to St. Martin's day in November following; and then again to the 29th of October the next year: at which time, the Archbiſhop of York, with ſome other Lords, was ſent to them again from the King; at whoſe requeſt, a tenth and a half was granted, and ſolemn proceſſions were ordered to be made for the ſucceſs of the war. Theſe liberal conceſſions were rewarded by an act of Parliament, granting the Clergy, aſſembled in Convocation, the privilege, as was enjoyed by members of Parliamant, of being exempted, they and their ſervants, from arreſts (35).

(35) Ibid. p. 137.

[X] —— A twelfth, the 19th of February, 1430.] In this Synod Delegates were choſen, to be ſent to the Council of Baſil, and two-pence in the pound was allowed them out of all the revenues of the Clergy. This Synod alſo, at the ſolicitation of the Archbiſhop of York, Lord Chancellor, granted the King a whole tenth. It likewiſe prohibited the uſe of falſe weights and meaſures, under pain of excommunication (36).

(36) Id. ib. p. 141, 142.

[Y] —— A thirteenth, the 15th of September, 1432.] It was ſummoned in relation to the diſſention between Pope Eugenius IV. and the Council of Baſil; and it was unanimouſly concluded to ſend Delegates to the Fathers at Baſil, and others to his Holineſs at Bologna; and, for the expences thereof, they voted a penny in the pound out of all the profits of the Clergy, beſides the two-pence granted by the former Synod. They likewiſe granted the King half a tenth (37).

(37) Ibid. p. 144.

[Z] —— A fourteenth, the 7th of November, 1433.] It was called on occaſion of the differences ſtill ſubſiſting between the Pope and the Council; and it was reſolved to nominate more Delegates, many of thoſe, who were ſent before, being dead at Baſil: whereupon eight Doctors of Divinity and Law were choſen, to be ſent to Baſil, provided the Fathers would admit them, without impoſing upon them any new oath. In this Synod, three quarters of a tenth were granted to the King towards re-eſtabliſhing the affairs of France, which declined daily (38).

(38) Id. ibid. p. 150, 151.

[AA] —— A fifteenth, the 7th of October, 1434.] About this time, the Clergy complained grievouſly of the proceedings of the King's Judges, and the Common Lawyers; 'That, againſt all law and equity,

'prieſts

[BB]. About this time, Archbiſhop Chichley founded the Convent of St. Bernard [CC], and the College of All-Souls [DD], at Oxford (y). The next year, 1438, he held a ſeventeenth Synod at London [EE]; and an eighteenth, the 21ſt of November, 1439 [FF]. This was the laſt Synod called by this Prelate (z); who, about the ſame time, drew up a form of excommunication [GG], ordering it to be publiſhed in all the (y) Ib. p. 156, 157.

(z) Ibid. p. 166.

‘ prieſts were brought before the ſecular courts; that ‘ the power of the eccleſiaſtical judges was reſtrained ‘ by their unjuſt prohibitions; and, particularly, that ‘ they wreſted the ſtatute of Richard II. againſt Pro- ‘ viſors, to the prejudice of the Eccleſiaſtical Courts.’ The Archbiſhop hereupon, in a pathetical ſpeech to the Synod, expreſſed, ‘ how ſolicitous he was that ‘ the Church ſhould receive no prejudice under his ‘ government, and that it might be delivered from ‘ the illegal oppreſſion of the Lawyers, and be re- ‘ ſtored to its antient dignity;’ and commanded them to conſider ‘ what meaſures were to be taken to eaſe ‘ the Clergy of the weight of thoſe oppreſſions.’ But, the plague breaking out in the city, the Synod was ſoon diſſolved, having only appointed a holiday to be kept in honour of St. Frideſwide, Protectoreſs of the Univerſity of Oxford, and denounced excommunication (39) againſt all thoſe that ſhould detract from the privileges and juriſdiction of the Church (40).

(39) See the remark [GG].

(40) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 153; and M. Parker, ib. p. 419.

[BB] —— And a ſixteenth the 30th of April, 1437.] This Synod did nothing more than grant the King a tenth for carrying on the war in France (41).

(41) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 155.

[CC] He founded the convent of St. Bernard.] The Archbiſhop had a long time deſigned to erect ſome noble monument, for the ſervice of religion and learning, and for his own glory, at Oxford, the place of his education. For, at that time, the eſtates of private perſons, as well as the publick revenues, being greatly exhauſted by the long continuance of the French war, the Univerſity was ſo thin and empty, that moſt of the colleges and halls were quite forſaken by the ſtudents. Wherefore, that he might by his bounty repair the decays of learning occaſioned by the general poverty of the kingdom, he gave orders for building a large and ſtately edifice, of a ſquare form, in the north part of the ſuburbs of Oxford, which he deſigned for a college. But, when the work was almoſt finiſhed, whether it was that he found fault with the ſtructure, or did not like the ſituation of it, he changed his mind, and gave it to the Monks of St. Bernard, for the reception of novices out of all the convents of that order, to ſtudy the Arts and Divinity. Afterwards, at the diſſolution of the monaſteries, it was purchaſed by Sir Thomas White, Merchant of London, who founded there the college of St. John Baptiſt (42).

(42) Id. ib. p. 155—157.

[DD] —— And All-Souls College.] Having choſen another place for building a college, very commodious for the ſtudents, in the middle of the town, near St. Mary's church, and pulled down the houſes, which ſtood there, he laid out a ſquare court; and on the 10th of February 1437, the firſt ſtone of this auſpicious building was laid, and the inſpection of the work was committed to the care of one John Druel, a clergyman, who executed that truſt with great integrity and diligence (43). The walls of this new ſtructure were finiſhed about the latter end of the year 1439, and the workmen had begun to lay the roof. The Archbiſhop had purchaſed lands and manors for the perpetual maintenance of his foundation: all which he acquainted the King with, and humbly beſought him to permit, that the college might be founded in his name, becauſe the lawyers were of opinion, that the ſplendor and authority of the King's name was of great importance towards founding a college in due and lawful manner. Whereupon the King, by his letters patent under the Great Seal, erected this building into a college, and granted it very large privileges. He alſo gave the founder leave to place in it a Warden and Fellows, and to make laws and ſtatutes for the government of the ſociety. Upon this the Archbiſhop went the next year to Oxford, where he ſolemnly conſecrated the chapel of his college, and made Richard Andrew, Doctor of Laws and Chancellor of Canterbury, Warden of it. He alſo appointed twenty Fellows, being all choice men pick'd out of the whole Univerſity; to whom he gave power to elect into their ſociety twenty more: out of which number he ordered that twenty-four ſhould ſtudy Divinity and the liberal ſciences, and the other ſixteen the Civil and Canon Law. He alſo commanded all the members of his foundation to pray for the ſouls of King Henry V. of Thomas Duke of Clarence, and of the nobility and common ſoldiers that had been killed in the French war. For which cauſe he ordered his college to be called The College of All-Souls departed in the faith. He added alſo two chaplains, ſeveral choriſters, and ſervants. After this he preſcribed them laws and ſtatutes, and committed the care of beautifying and enlarging it to Robert Keyes, afterwards Warden (44).

(43) Ibid. p. 157, 158.

(44) Ib. p. 163—171.

[EE] In 1438, he held a ſeventeenth Synod at London.] The King having appointed ſome perſons of eminent quality to go Embaſſadors to the Council of Ferrara, the Biſhops voted them an allowance ſuitable to their rank; which however was not complied with by the Proctors for the Clergy in the Lower Houſe, who were more inclined in favour of the Council of Baſil; only the Proctors for the Convents granted four pence in the pound out of their revenues. In this Synod the Archbiſhop complained heavily of a late injury offered him by Pope Eugenius, who, by his ſole authority had given the Biſhoprick of Ely in commendam to Lewis Archbiſhop of Rouen, and by his bull had confirmed him in the government of that See; and therefore he recommended it to the Synod to conſider, how to put a ſtop to a proceeding, which had never been attempted by any Pope before. But Philip Morgan, who was then Biſhop of Ely, outliving the Archbiſhop of Rouen, the Pope's deſign was fruſtrated (45).

(45) Ibid. p. 160.

[FF] ——And an eighteenth, the 21ſt of November, 1439.] The Archbiſhop, being hindered by ſome indiſpoſition, was not at the opening of this Synod. However, a few days after, he came, and in a long ſpeech, in which he could hardly refrain from tears, he reckoned up the miſeries of the Church, proceeding from the penalties daily inflicted by the eccleſiaſtical judges, which by the ſtatute of Premunire were deſigned againſt Proviſors; and from the citations of the Clergy to the ſecular courts. Whereupon it was unanimouſly agreeed, that the Archbiſhop ſhould preſent a remonſtrance to the King upon the ſubject of theſe grievances. Which being done, the King anſwered, ‘ That he ‘ would lay their petition before the next Parliament, ‘ and that in the mean time he would take care that ‘ no one ſhould be moleſted by his Judges upon the ac- ‘ count of that ſtatute, unleſs the cauſe were firſt ap- ‘ proved by himſelf or the Privy-Council.’ This gracious anſwer of the King's ſo pleaſed the Synod, that they immediately granted him a whole tenth, with this expreſs condition, that the revenues and benefices belonging to the college of All-Souls (of which the Archbiſhop was the founder) ſhould not be included in the conceſſion (46).

(50) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 171—174.

(51) Ib. p. 174.

(46) Ib. p. 166—168.

[GG] He drew up a form of excommunication.] I ſhall tranſcribe part of it from Lyndewood (47), and give it the reader as a ſpecimen of the Engliſh language at that time.

(47) Provincial. in calce, p. 73. edit. Oxon.

Fyrſte, Yei be accurſy'd that preſume to take away or pryſe any chirche of the right yat longyth thereto, or elſe agayn right to ſtroy, breke, or ſtrobyll ye liberties of the chirche.

And alſo yoo that parchaſes any manner of letterys from any temporal courte, to let any proceſs of ſpiritual juggs in ſuch cauſes as longyth to ſpiritual courte; And all yoo yat with puple and noyſe come to ſpiritual courte, and put the juggs or partyes yat their pletts in feer, or elſe for alſmoche as the partyes ſew in ſpiritual courte ſuch cauſes as longyth to ſpiritual courte, make or procure any of the ſaid parties, advocats, procurators, or other mynyſteres of ſpiritual courte, to be endytt, or reſbytt, or any wiſe be vexyd, &c.

This excommunication, moſt probably, was drawn up in conſequence of a decree of the Synod of 1434 (48).

(48) See the remark [AA].

cathedral and parochial churches of his province (a). He was the firſt, who ordered the Proctors of the Court of Arches to wear the ſame habit in Court that Bachelors of Arts do in the Univerſities (b). He was a very liberal benefactor to the Univerſity of Oxford [HH], and to the church of Canterbury [II], and contributed largely towards the building of Croydon church, and Rocheſter bridge (c). This illuſtrious Prelate died in a good old age, the 12th of April, 1443, having ſat twenty-nine years and upwards, and was buried in the cathedral church of Canterbury [KK].

(a) Lyndewood Provincial. edit. Oxon. in calce, v. 73.

(b) Antiq. Brit. ubi ſupra, p. 427.

(c) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 174.

[HH] He was a benefactor to the Univerſity of Oxford.] There had been begun ſome time before, by the munificence chiefly of the Duke of Glouceſter, a lofty and magnificent ſtructure; the upper part of which was deſigned for a library, and the lower for the Publick Divinity Schools. To this work the Archbiſhop gave a great ſum of money himſelf, and was very earneſt in ſoliciting all the Biſhops and Peers, who came to the Parliament at Weſtminſter, to contribute towards it: all which is gratefully acknowledged by the Univerſity in their letters to him (49). He alſo gave two hundred marks to the publick cheſt of the Univerſity; which he ordered to be kept by three Maſters of Arts, two Regents, and one Non-Regent, who were to be choſen yearly, and were bound by an oath to the faithful diſcharge of that truſt: out of which money the Univerſity might borrow for the publick uſe five pounds, every particular college five marks, a Maſter of Arts forty ſhillings, a Licentiate or Bachelor two marks, and an Under-Graduate one; with this condition, that every one ſhould depoſit a ſufficient pawn, which, if the money were not repaid within a month, was to be forfeited. Beſides theſe benefactions, it appeared by his private accounts, that he had allowed yearly ſtipends to ſeveral poor ſtudents. And, to perpetuate the memory of theſe favours, it was ordered by a publick decree of the Univerſity, that Archbiſhop Chichley's name ſhould be regiſtered among their benefactors, and read every year in the Publick Schools by the chaplain of the Univerſity; and that a ſolemn maſs ſhoold be ſaid for him on the anniverſary of his death (50).

(49) Epiſt. Acad. Oxon. 26.

(50) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 171—174.

[II] ——And to the church of Canterbury.] He laid out a conſiderable ſum of money in beautifying and adorning that cathedral, and in building a ſteeple, and a library, which he furniſhed with many valuable books in all kinds of learning: which are all reckoned up in a publick inſtrument made by the Prior and Monks of Canterbury, and deſcribed among the publick acts of that church; in which they promiſe on their parts, that his body ſhould be laid in the tomb that he had cauſed to be built on the north-ſide of the chancel, and that no one beſide ſhould ever be buried in that place (51).

(51) Ib. p. 174.

[KK] He was buried in the cathedral church of Canterbury.] His body was depoſited (according to what was ſaid in the preceding remark) under the monument built by himſelf; on which is his effigy at full length in his Pontificalia, and under it another of a ſkeleton in it's ſhroud; and round the ſide pillars, which are gilt and painted, are ſmall images, in niches, of the apoſtles, &c. The inſcription on his monument is as follows (52). Hic jacet Henricus Chichele Legum doctor, quondam Cancellarius Sarum, qui anno ſeptimo Henrici IV. Regis ad Gregorium Papam XII. in ambaſciata tranſmiſſus, in civitate Senenſi per manus ejuſdem Papæ in Menevenſem Epiſcopum conſecratus eſt. Hic etiam Henricus anno ſecundo Henrici V. Regis in hac ſancta eccleſia in Archiepiſcopum poſtulatus, & à Joanne Papa XXIII. ad eandem tranſlatus eſt: Qui obiit Anno Domini MCCCCXLIII, Menſis Aprilis die XII.

(52) Dart's Hiſt. and Antiquities of the Cath. Ch. of Cant. p. 158; and Ar. Duck, ibid. p. 174.

Cœtus ſanctorum concorditer iſte precetur,
Ut Deus ipſorum meritis ſibi propitietur.

Round the verge, at the bottom of the monument is written;

Quiſquis eris qui tranſieris, rogo memor eris,
Tu quod eris mihi conſimilis qui poſt morieris,
Omnibus horribilis, pulvis, vermis, caro vilis.

Mr. Camden, in his Remains, attributes this inſcription to him.

Pauper eram natus, poſt primas hic elevatus,
Jam ſum proſtratus, & vermibus eſca paratus.
Ecce meum tumulum MCCCCXLIII.

B.

 [However political Archbiſhop Chichley's conduct might be in exciting Henry the Fifth to claim the crown of France and attempt the conqueſt of that kingdom, it was very little conſiſtent with the character of a truely Chriſtian prelate and divine. That he might prevent the wealth of the clergy's being touched, he involved the nation in a dangerous and deſtructive war. Dangerous it evidently was in its firſt appearance; and, notwithſtanding the ſplendour of Henry's victories, it may well be called deſtructive, ſince it involved England, as well as France, in a long ſeries of calamities. The ſpeech which Shakſpeare, in the beginning of his play of King Henry the Fifth, hath put into the mouth of the Archbiſhop, is agreeable, in general, to hiſtorical truth; being copied, in a manner verbatim, either from Hall or Hollinſhed (53).

(53) Shakſpeare's Works, vol. vi. p. 17. Johnſon and Steevens's edition of 1778.

The circumſtance mentioned in note [N], "that it ſhould be felony to caſtrate a prieſt," deſerves to be remarked, as a feature in the character of the age. It not only ſhews what was the nature of the crimes ariſing from the celibacy of the clergy, but to what a ſeverity of revenge laymen were ſometimes carried by a ſtrong feeling of injury in the deareſt connection of life.

Archbiſhop Chichley, in the ſpeech which he made to parliament, at the acceſſion of Henry the Sixth, was very unfortunate in his omens, and in his reaſons for proving that the young King would be greater than any of his predeceſſors. The ſanguine propheſiers, concerning what will be the glory and happineſs of a new reign, have often been deceived.

A full account of All-Soul's College, of its Founder, Benefactors, Wardens, Biſhops, Writers, and Buildings, down to 1674, may be ſeen in Anthony Wood's "Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis (54)." Governor Codrington, a great modern benefactor, will hereafter be recorded (55). All Soul's College is one of the nobleſt inſtitutions at Oxford. To the preſent reſpectable warden, the Hon. and Rev. Dr. Tracy, the writer of this note is indebted for much civility and attention, and for ſubſequent information, when making Biographical enquiries at the Univerſity.

(54) Lib. ii. p. 172—176.

(55) See the article CODRINGTON.

Archbiſhop Chichley, or Chichele, as his name was ſometimes ſpelt, had two younger brothers; of whom, Sir Robert, Lord Mayor of London, left only daughters; but William, Sheriff of London, had a grandſon Henry, of Wimpole, in Cambridgeſhire; whoſe poſterity, in the male line, flouriſhed in great reputation till the beginning of the preſent century, when it ended in Richard Chichele, Doctor of Laws. This gentleman left no more than one daughter, who became the wife of Chriſtopher Griffith, Eſq; of Sadworth, in Berkſhire; which Lady is dead, and alſo her only child Chriſtopher Griffith (56).

(56) From the communication of John Loveday, Eſq; of Caverſham.

A farther account of the family of Chichele, and of the numerous deſcendants of Thomas Chichele, of Higham-Ferrers, father to the Archbiſhop, may be ſeen in the "Stemmata Chicheleana," publiſhed at Oxford, in Quarto, in the year 1765.]

K.

CHICHESTER (Arthur), a brave officer in the XVIth century, and made Lord Deputy of Ireland, and Baron of Belfaſt [A], in the beginning of the XVIIth, was born at Ralegh, near Barnſtaple, in the county of Devon (a). Some part of his youth he ſpent in the Univerſity, but that being too ſedentary a life for his active genius, he went into the wars [B]; and at every place where his Sovereign's ſervice required, there he was, by ſea and land, in England and in France; in the laſt of which, for ſome ſignal exploit done by him in the preſence of King Henry IV. he was knighted by that excellent Prince (b). But his aſſiſtance being moſtly wanted in Ireland, where things were in the utmoſt confuſion, he put himſelf into that ſervice: and in this employment manifeſted great valour and wiſdom, ſo fairly and even tempered, that his generous actions expreſſed an uncommon capacity (c). In June, 1600, he was at the taking of the ſtrong caſtle of Ballinſhor (d). And in the enſuing winter, was put in garriſon at Carrickfergus, with eight hundred and fifty foot, and a hundred and twenty-five horſe, under his command (e). In Auguſt, 1602, he and Sir Henry Danvers, took the ſtrong fort of Eniſlaghlin, wherein moſt of the Earl of Tir-Oen's plate and choice goods were depoſited (f). The March following he expelled Brian Mac-Art from Killultagh, where he had ſecretly lodged himſelf with five hundred men (g); and brought the rebels in Ireland to ſo low a condition, that they were forced to eat human fleſh [C]. In a word, he was ſo effectually aſſiſtant, as one expreſſes it (h), firſt to plow and break up that barbarous nation by conqueſt, and then to ſow it with the ſeeds of civility, when he was made Lord-Deputy of Ireland (which was in 1604), that he did more than could be done in ſeveral years before. Good laws and proviſions had indeed been made by his predeceſſors, but they were like leſſons ſet for a lute out of tune, uſeleſs, till the inſtrument was fitted for them. Being therefore raiſed to that eminent ſtation, in which he was ſworn the third of February (i), he acted with ſuch prudence and reſolution, that he quite put an end to all inſurrections in that kingdom; and did three great things towards a reformation therein (k). The firſt was, his management of the moſt ſtubborn Parliament that ever was in Ireland, which nevertheleſs he prevailed with to attaint the Earls of Tir-Oen, and Tirconell, Sir Cahir O'Dogharty, and others, and to make an Act of Recognition, and give the King a ſubſidy. The ſecond was, the plantation of the forfeited eſtates in Ulſter, which he very much influenced and promoted. And the third was, the eſtabliſhing a new circuit for Judges of Aſſize in the province of Connaght, and retrieving the circuit of Munſter, which had been diſcontinued for two hundred years (l). So that, whereas the circuits were before confined to the Engliſh Pale, they were extended by him throughout the kingdom (m). By this wiſe regulation, Ireland was, in a ſhort time, ſo cleared of thieves and capital offenders, that ſo many malefactors were not found in the two and thirty ſhires of that kingdom, as in ſix Engliſh ſhires in the weſtern circuit (n). He alſo reduced the mountains and glinns on the ſouth of Dublin, which uſed to be thorns in the ſides of the Engliſh, into the county of Wicklow (o). And ſo watchful was he over the actions of ſuſpected perſons, that Tir-Oen was heard to complain, 'He could not drink a full carouſe of ſack, but the 'State was, within a few hours, advertiſed thereof (p).' In the year 1612 (q), he was, for a reward of his great ſervices, advanced to the dignity of Baron of Belfaſt (r). Whilſt he continued Lord-Deputy, namely, in 1614, the harp was firſt marſhalled with the arms of Great-Britain (s): and about the ſame time the Iriſh began to imitate the Engliſh faſhions, and to cut their mantles into cloaks (t). In the beginning of the year

(a) The Worthies of Devon, by J. Prince, fol. Exeter, 1701, p. 200.

(b) Ibid. and Fuller's Worthies, in Devon, p. 254.

(c) Prince, ubi ſupra.

(d) Hiſtory of Ireland, by R. Cox, Part i. fol. edit. 1689, p. 437.

(e) Ibid. p. 440.

(f) Ibid. p. 447.

(g) Ibid. p. 449.

(h) Fuller's Worthies, ubi ſupra.

(i) R. Cox, Hiſt. of Ireland, P. ii. p. 9.

(k) R. Cox, Pref. to the 2d part of the Hiſtory of Ireland.

(l) Ibid. and Hiſt. P. ii. p. 9.

(m) Fuller and Prince, ubi ſupra.

(n) Sir John Davis, in his Diſcourſe of Ireland, p. 270.

(o) Fuller and Prince, ubi ſupra.

(p) Ibid. p. 271; and Fuller's and Prince's Worthies, ubi ſupra, p. 255, & 201.

(q) R. Cox ſays, it was Feb. 23, 1615, P. ii. p. 33.

(r) Iriſh Compendium, 3d edit. 12mo. 1735, p. 97; and Fuller and Prince, ubi ſupra.

(s) Iriſh Compendium, ibid.

(t) Fuller and Prince, ubi ſupra.

[A] CHICHESTER (Arthur), a brave officer in the ſixteenth century, &c.] The family of Chicheſter hath flouriſhed for many generations at Ralegh above-mentioned. Arthur, who is the ſubject of this article, was the ſecond ſon of Sir John Chicheſter, of that place, Knight, by Gertrude his wife, daughter of Sir William Courtenay of Powderham, Knight. They had a very numerous iſſue; namely, five ſons, four whereof were knights, and one, (viz. Arthur) was made a Baron: And eight daughters, all married into the chiefeſt families in thoſe parts. 1. Elizabeth to Hugh Forteſcue of Phillegh, Eſq; 2. Dorothy to Sir Hugh Pollard of King's Nimpton, Knight. 3. Eleanor to Sir Arthur Baſſet of Umberlegh, Knight. 4. Mary to Richard Blewet of Holcombrogus, Eſq; 5. Cecilia to Thomas Hatch of Aller, Eſq; 6. Suſanna to John Forteſcue of Buckland Phillegh Eſq; 7. Bridget to Sir Edmund Prideaux of Farway, Baronet; all in Devonſhire. And, 8. Urith to —— Trevillian of Nettlecomb in Somerſetſhire, Eſq; (1).

(1) Prince's Worthies of Devon, p. 199, 200.

[B] He went into the wars.] In his youth he was guilty of great extravagance, and, to ſupport it, robbed one of Queen Elizabeth's Purveyors. To avoid being proſecuted for that crime, he fled into France, where he behaved with great bravery and conduct. The fame of this reaching the Queen's ears, his friends took thence an opportunity to ſue for his pardon, which the Queen readily ſent him, with an invitation home. Whereupon ſhe employed him in her wars in Ireland, where he made his fortune, as is related in this article. This is mentioned in no hiſtorian, but has been handed down in the family, as a certain fact. The famous Richard Boyle, created afterwards Earl of Corke, is ſaid to have been his Secretary, when he was Lord-Deputy.

[C] That they were forced to eat human fleſh.] Three children were ſeen eating the entrails of their dead mother, upon whoſe fleſh they had fed twenty days, and roaſted it with fire; and it was manifeſt that ſome older people had been in ſuch a ſtarving condition, that they murdered and eat children for a long time together, and were at laſt diſcovered and executed for that barbarity. In ſhort, as R. Cox, Eſq; obſerves (2), the famine of Jeruſalem did not exceed that amongſt the rebels of Ireland; and therefore it is no wonder, that on the 30th of March 1602, the Earl of Tir-Oen, not knowing of Queen Elizabeth's death, did at Meliſont, in moſt humble manner, and upon his knees, make his ſubmiſſion to the Deputy.

(2) Hiſt. of Ireland, P. i. p. 449.

1616,

1616, after this worthy perſon had continued Lord-Deputy of Ireland above eleven years (u), King James I. appointed him Lord High-Treaſurer of that kingdom (w), and recalled him to England; not out of any diſpleaſure, but, as far as can be conjectured, through the artifices of the Iriſh Papiſts, over whom he kept a ſtrict hand (x). Being thus returned home, ſo conſiderable were his abilities that he was not ſuffered to lie unactive: for in May 1622, he was ſent by King James I. to the Palatinate, and from thence to the Emperor (y). While he was in Germany, Manheim was ſeaſonably victualled through his prudent direction and advice. And being in that place when it was beſieged by Count Tilly, the Emperor's General, his Lordſhip ſent the Count word, 'That it was againſt the law of nations to beſiege an Embaſſador.' Tilly returned for anſwer, 'That he took no notice that he was an Embaſſador.' Upon which the Lord Chicheſter replied to the meſſenger, 'Had my Maſter ſent me with as many hundred 'men, as he hath ſent me on fruitleſs meſſages, your General ſhould have known, that 'I had been a Soldier, as well as an Embaſſador (z).' At his return from this embaſſy, in the October following, his Lordſhip was very well received by King James, and the 31ſt of December made one of his Majeſty's Privy-Council in England (a). He died about the ſame time as his Maſter King James, namely, about the beginning of the year 1625 (b): but, in This ſuperior to his Sovereign, that he died in as great honour as any Engliſhman of his age (c); and to the great grief of his country, becauſe it was in ſuch a time as moſt required his aſſiſtance, courage, and wiſdom, which ſeldom meet, but in him were united, and challenged an equal ſhare in his perfections (d). He was buried at Belfaſt, in Ireland (e) [D]. He was ſtout in his nature, above any diſorder upon emergencies, reſolved in his temper above any impreſſions from other Princes, and high in his propoſal beyond the expectation of his own. With regard to Ireland his ſentiments were, that time muſt open and facilitate things for reformation of religion, by the Proteſtant plantations, by the care of good Biſhops and Divines; the amplification of the college; the education of wards; an inſenſible ſeizure of Popiſh liberties; reducing the number of Privy-Counſellors, which were fifty or ſixty at leaſt, and that occaſioned great debates, and cauſed buſineſs to be divulged, &c. (f). In a word, he was a good ſoldier, and a true Engliſhman (g), which is as great a character as can be given. He married Letice, daughter of Sir John Perrot, Lord-Deputy of Ireland [E]; and having no iſſue by her, made his youngeſt brother, Sir Edward Chi(u) Clark's Lives, in Archbiſhop Uſher, p. 206, Lond. 1662.

(w) Iriſh Compend. ubi ſupra.

(x) See R. Cox's Hiſt. of Ireland, P. ii. p. 25—33.

(y) Fuller, Prince, and Iriſh Compend. ubi ſupra. Camdeni Annal. Jac. I.

(z) Fuller and Prince, ubi ſupra. Lloyd's State Worthies, 2d edit. 1679, p. 754.

(a) Iriſh Compend. ubi ſupra.

(b) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, vol. i. col. 510. Mr. Prince, by miſtake, ſays it was about the year 1620.

(c) Fuller, ubi ſupra.

(d) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 510. Alex. Spicer, his Chaplain, wrote elegies on his death, printed in 1625. Ibid.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Lloyd's State Worthies, ubi ſupra, p. 754, 755.

(g) R. Cox, Preface to P. ii. of his Hiſt. of Ireland.

[D] He was buried at Belfaſt in Ireland.] Mr. Prince ſuppoſes, that his brother and heir, the Lord Edward Chicheſter, might afterwards bring over, and lay his remains in the ſepulchre belonging to his houſe at Eggesford in Devonſhire. And obſerves, that in a little oratory adjoining to the church of Eggeſford, on the north-ſide of the chancel, he ſaw this memorial of him; namely, a head cut out in coarſe marble, where his face is repreſented to the life, with a look ſtern and terrible, like a ſoldier. They who are ſkill'd in ſculpture, ſay, it is an excellent piece of art (3). There are extant, two Letters of my Lord Chicheſter's writing, in the Cabala (4).

[E] He married Letice, &c.] F. Nicholls, author of the Iriſh Compendium, is guilty of a very great error (5), in ſaying, that 'he married Mary eldeſt 'daughter to John Digby the firſt Earl of Briſtol.' Whereas, he that married that Lady, was, Arthur, the firſt Earl of Donegall, ſon of Sir Edward Chicheſter, Knight, mentioned above in the text (6). C.

(3) Prince, ubi ſupra, p. 201.

(4) Edit. 1663, p. 211. 213.

(5) Page 97, edit. 1735.

(6) See Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 437.

 [Dr. Leland gives a high character of Sir Arthur Chicheſter, as Lord-Deputy of Ireland. He advanced the work of reformation farther than had been done by any preceding governor. By his wiſe conduct, inferiors were emancipated from the tyranny of barbarous chieftains; and the whole body of old natives were taught to regard the ſyſtem of Engliſh polity more favourably, when it was executed, not like that mockery of juſtice with which they had too often been inſulted, but with general impartiality, without oppreſſion or impunity (7). With reſpect to the plantation of Ulſter, Dr. Leland thus deſcribes the ſuperior abilities of the Lord-Deputy, for carrying on that important undertaking. "The thoughts "of Lord Bacon on this ſubject had been more preciſe and accurate, if his great genius had been "aſſiſted by a competent knowledge of the ſtate of "Ireland. But the man whoſe counſels were of "greateſt ſervice on this intereſting occaſion, was Sir "Arthur Chicheſter, now Lord-Deputy of the "realm. He had capacity, judgment, firmneſs, and "experience, and was already diſtinguiſhed by his "ſervices, both in war and peace. What was of "greateſt conſequence, no man was better acquainted "with the territories to be planted, the ſtate of the "inhabitants, their characters, expectations, and "pretenſions; ſo that none could be better qualified "to propoſe a ſcheme for the plantation, or to di-"rect the execution of it. He cauſed ſurveys to be "taken of the ſeveral counties where the new ſet-"tlements were to be eſtabliſhed, deſcribed particularly the ſtate of each, pointed out the ſituations "proper for the erection of towns and caſtles, delineated the characters of the Iriſh chieftains, the "manner in which they ſhould be treated, the temper and circumſtances of the old inhabitants, "the rights of new purchaſers, and the claims of "both, the impediments which had obſtructed "former plantations, and the methods of removing "them (8)." The meaſures purſued by the Lord-Deputy in this affair, are diſtinctly related by Dr. Leland; who afterwards obſerves, that Sir Arthur Chicheſter's adminiſtration was indeed active, vigilant, cautious, and firm, ſuited to a country ſcarcely emerging to tranquillity and order; where diſaffection was yet unextinguiſhed, and diſcontents were publicly and boldly avowed (9). The chief governor's moderation, with regard to his treatment of the recuſants, is likewiſe celebrated by the Hiſtorian of Ireland. Sir Arthur's management, in this reſpect, was, indeed, highly diſpleaſing to the Puritans, and even occaſioned complaints and murmurs to be whiſpered againſt him in the Privy-Council: but Dr. Leland is clearly of opinion, and, we think, with good reaſon, that his conduct was dictated by the plaineſt rules of diſcretion, and that it was the only conduct which could be purſued with ſafety (10).

A few of Sir Arthur Chicheſter's ſtate papers are preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum. One of them is entitled, "A Note of ſome of the moſt material Service, which I have performed, ſince I came into the Government of your Majeſty's Realm, in Feb. 1604 (11)." Dr. Leland hath made conſiderable uſe of a collection of the Lord-Deputy's manuſcript papers, now remaining in the Library of the Univerſity of Dublin.] K.

(7) Hiſt. of Ireland, vol. ii. p. 418.

(8) Ibid. p. 430.

(9) Ibid. p. 438, 439.

(10) Ibid. p. 449.

(11) Ayſcough's Catalogue, p. 331. 339.

cheſter,

cheſter, Knt. his heir: who was created by King Charles I. Baron Belfaſt, and Viſcount Chicheſter, of Carrickfergus, in the county of Antrim. His ſon Arthur was created Earl of Donegall; which dignity hath been ever ſince enjoyed by his poſterity (b).

(b) Prince, ubi ſupra. Iriſh Compend. Dugdale's Baronage, vol. iii. p. 437.

